'There would not be elegance nor would it be interesting: so I write in the vernacular mixed with the foreign (i.e. Persian) vocables'.

During the days of Bharatchandra the influence of Persian in the business style of the vernacular was so overwhelming that the style appeared to be a mixed one. Even verbal stems were borrowed from Persian. The occupation of Bengal by the East India Company did not stop this process because the company retained Persian as the business language at the higher level. It was only in the fourth decade of the century when Persian was replaced by English at the upper level and the vernacular (Bengali) at the lower that the importance of Persian declined.

Bengali prose was cultivated in the independent states of Cooch Bihar, Cachar and Assam as the administration of these states was carried mainly in the vernacular, and we have specimens of literary prose from these areas since the seventeenth century. In Bengal proper two epistolary styles developed towards the end of the eighteenth century. One was cultivated by the Brahmans and persons learned in Sanskrit and the other came out of the pen of those who had learned Persian and also had a smattering of Sanskrit.

The British administrator wanted a common prose style for Bengali which would be used as the administrative language of the country. To achieve this William Carey of Serampore Baptist Mission who had been placed in charge of the Sanskrit and Bengali sections of Fort William College established in 1801 in Calcutta for the education of newly recruited clerks from Britain, took up the task of preparing model prose works in Bengali. Carey's teacher Ramram Basu wrote two books in 1801. But soon Carey fell in love with Sanskrit and the subsequent works published from the College were all written in a highly Sanskritized style. The best and the most favourite writer of Carey in this style was Mrityunjay Vidyalkar, a Bengali teacher of the College. This was how the 'sadhu bhasha' style of Bengali prose was born.

Vidyalkar was followed by the first good writer of non-text books, Raja Rammohan Ray. He was universally lauded as the best writer of Bengali prose in the second and the third decades of the nineteenth century. Then came Vidyasagar who made Bengali 'sadhu bhasha' fit for universal use. Vidyasagar was followed by creative writers like Pearychand Mitra, Bankimchandra Chatterjee and others who knew English and who moulded their language partly according to the English way of thinking. This made Bengali prose even more mobile. Finally came Rabindranath Tagore whose handling of Bengali in prose and verse made it a language of high cultivation and capable of fine and precise expressions.

The most important characteristic of Modern Bengali is the ever-increasing borrowings from English vocabulary and idioms, semantic, phrasal and syntactic.

LANGUAGE (Dogri). Dogri, the language of the Dogras is spoken in the region which includes parts of three states Jammu and Kashmir, Himachal Pradesh and undivided Punjab. The whole of Jammu province south of Pir Panchal, some parts of Himachal Pradesh, viz. Kangra, Chamba, Kullu, Mandi Suket, some parts of Punjab, viz. Gurdaspur, Pathankot, Nurpur, Hoshiarpur and some parts of Pakistan, viz. Shakargarh tehsil of Sialkot, comprise the area of the Dogri language. John Beams including Dogri in the group of eleven Indian languages gives its area as lying between the Punjab and the valley of Kashmir. According to Gaurishankar, three terrains form the Dogra region: Kandi (the lower hills), Andarwah (riverine region lying in the plains) and Pahari (mountainous region). Dogri is a feminine form of the word Dogra which is a tribal name signifying the people of Duggar. Various views have been expressed about the origin of the word Duggar. Words like Dvigarta (Gaurishankar, 1931), Durgaha (H.R. Divekar, 1970), Dugar (Dharamchand 'Prashant', Jammu and Kashmir Research Bi-annual Volume II) and Durgar (Gaurishankar, 1982, Shivanath, 1976) have been suggested as the source. The last one corroborated by a Chamba copper-plate inscriptions of the eleventh century (Vogel, 1911) seems to be the most plausible.

In the census of 1961, the number of the Dogri speakers of Jammu is given as 869199. The number has gone up to 15 lacs in the census of 1981, but this does not include the speakers of various other dialects which come under Western Pahari. Taking all these dialects together,

LANGUAGE-GUJARATI

The earliest known mention of Dogri language is found in Amir Khusrau's list of Indian languages—Sindhi, Lahauri, Dogra, Dhurasamundari, Tilangi, Gujarati, Malabari, Gaudi-Bangali, Avadhi and Dehalavi. As Amir Khusro lived from 1253 to 1325, the existence of the Dogri language earlier to the 13th century is proved. Inscriptions dating from the 12th century contain Dogri expressions. Shivanath, Ramnath Shastri (Dogri shodha-1981) refer to some 'sanads, letters, agreements and title deeds written in Takri script and Dogri language dating from 1750 to 1860. The earliest extant Dogri work is Rajauli-a Dogri translation by Tehaldas from the original Persian work by Bali Ram. The work was translated for Raja Dhyani Singh of Kotla in the latter half of the 18th century. Carey mentioned Dogri in his list of Indian languages in 1816. A Dogri translation of the New Testament is said to have been published by Christian missionaries of Serampore. A few pieces of Dogri poetry of Dattu of the second half of the 18th century and of Rudradatta, Ganga Ram and Lakkhu of the 19th century are available. Jyotishi Vishveshvar translated Lilavati, a Sanskrit work on Mathematics, into Dogri in 1873. It was in the 20th century that Dogri writing showed a quick growth in various fields of poetry, prose, novels, short stories, plays etc.

Dogri belongs to the Indo-European family of languages in India and is derived from Shauraseni Prakrit. Vocabulary of Dogri is largely derived from Sanskrit, but it has absorbed a large number of Arabic, Persian and English words, e.g., 'asar' (effect), 'araj' (request), 'tarif' (praise) are Arabic; 'kosh ash' (effect), 'gajara' (subsisting), 'nagarani' (inspection) are derived from Persian; 'tagma' (medal) and bahadur (brave) are of Turkish origin; 'afsar', 'injan', 'pulas', 'faisan', 'taim', etc. are from English words officer, engine, police, fashion, time, etc.

George Abraham Grierson describes Dogri as a dialect of Punjabi, and Kandeali, Kangra and Chameali as its three subdialects. Some Punjabi writers like Ujjal Singh Bahri, Piara Singh Padam and Harkirat Singh have expressed a similar opinion but the veteran linguist Siddheshwar Varma has pointed out that Dogri is structurally an independent language and not a dialect of any other language. Shivanath mentions seventeen dialects spoken in the area of Duggar. These are standard Dogri, Kandyali, Kangari, Bhatiali Sirmauri, Baghati, Kiunthali, Kullui, Gujari, Rambani, Pongli, Hoshiarpur Pahadi and Lahanda. Bhadrawahi, Rambani and Pongli have common features with Dogri and Kashmiri, while Kangri, Hoshiarpur Pahadi and Lahanda have common features with Dogri and Punjabi.

Some prominent phonological features of Dogri are: initial /v/ y are changed to /b/ j/; /ch/ generally changes into /Sh/; voiced aspirates of Hindi /gh/ jh/ dh/ dh/ are changed to unvoiced and voiced mutes with tones; velar and palatal nasals occur initially also /nur/ (grapes), nana/ (child); nasalization is phonemic /ja/ jan/; Vowel length and consonant length are phonemic; as stress and tone go together, tone only can be regarded phonemic /la/ (to place), /la/ (to take down), /a/ (to shake). There is free variation between /sh/ and /s/ /shirak/ /sirak/. syllabic system of Dogri does not possess cvccvcv (bajjara), cvccvcv (Kapatta), cvccvcv (Chalaki).

The main morphological characteristics of Dogri are: preference for passive voice constructions, mere sha nei janoda (I cannot go); the use of 'ha', 'tha', 'a', 'hi', 'hi', 'thi', 'the', etc., for the expressions was and were. The conjugation of the auxiliary verb in accordance with the gender of the subject is unlike Punjabi where it remains unchanged. For example.

Punjabi: raja ge da si	The king had gone.
Dogri: raja ge da ha

Punjabi: rani gei di si	The queen had gone.
Dogri: rani gei di hi

The additional vowel 'i' in the past verbal forms like 'turi gea', 'sunilea'. (had gone, had heard) is used; the special pronominal forms like tugi (to you), 'migi' (to me); post positions like 'kanne' (with), 'kasa' (from); special liking for forms ending in 'u', e.g., 'chachu' (father), 'kurtu' (shirt) and 'manu' (human being); verb stems made with 'er', e.g., 'khaderana' (to make stand), 'baderana' (to give bath).

LANGUAGE (Gujarati). Gujarati, like Hindi, Bengali, Marathi and other languages of the Indo-Aryan group is a regional form of the third or the modern phase of the Indo-Aryan language. The third phase known as Apabhramsha, has about 27 regional variations, one of which is 'Gurjara'. It was prevalent in that part of India where a nomadic tribe of the name of 'Gurjara' had established its rule between the 6th and 8th centuries A.D. This part was western Rajasthan or Marwar. Its capital was Bhimamula. One branch of this tribe ruled south Gujarat.

Gujarati evolved from Gurjara Apabhramsha around the 10th century. A Sanskrit word 'Gujaratra' and its Prakrit form 'guzarat' mentioned in the book Al-Hind, written by the Arab traveller; Al-Biruni in early 11th century, means the region of the people called 'Guzr'.

LANGUAGE-HINDI

In the ninth and tenth centuries, and thereafter, 'Shauraseni' or West-Indian Apabhramsha was prevalent in the regions of Gujarat, Rajasthan and from western Punjab to Bengal. From this Apabhramsha modern Indian languages of western India have evolved. Hindi, Gujarati and Rajasthani have their origin in 'Shauraseni'.

When Chalukya dynasty captured the country beyond Mount Abu in the 10th century, the dialect which they brought with them was not very different from the dialect that was prevalent in the present Gujarat state. The great grammarian, Acharya Hemachandra (1088-1172), used this dialect in the last Chapter of his Prakrit grammar Siddha-Hema-subdanushashana. He has given some illustrative 'dohas' (couplets) which were current among the people. The language of these dohas has been called old Gujarati by Grierson and Keshavlal Dhruva, while Sunitikumar Chatterjee calls it similar to western Hindi. Hemchandra calls it 'Shauraseni Apabhramsha'. From this Apabhramsha gradually Hindi, Rajasthani and Gujarati evolved from the 11th century onwards. The Apabhramsha trend is seen being gradually softened, till, at the beginning of the 15th century it ceases to be a dialect and becomes a language of the people. During this period the language that was in vogue was named as old western Rajasthani by Tessitori, while Narsimhrao Divetia calls it 'Antima Apabhramsha' (last phase of Apabhramsha). Keshavlal Dhruva calls it 'Old Gujarati' while Umashanker Joshi calls it 'Maru-Gujar', because it was prevalent both in Marwar and Gujarat. From the later half of the fifteenth century, Gujarati and Rajasthani established their separate identity. Keshavdas Dhruva taking into consideration the process of evolution, has divided Gujarati into three periods.

(1) Apabhramsha or old Gujarati flourished from the 10th or 11th century to the 14th century. Thus according to him the Dohas of Hemchandra, bharateswar bahubali rasa (1185 A.D.) by Shalibhadra Suri Sandesh rasa (12th century) by Abdur Rehman and Hansauli by Asharjit (13th century) are works of old Gujarati;

(2) Medieval Gujarati was in use from the 15th to the 17th century. Narsinh Mehta, Mira, Premananda were some of the authors, Kanhadade Prabhandha is a work Medieval Gujarati.

(3) Modern Gujarati represents the period commencing from the 18th century. Thus the works of Dayaram, the poems of the Swaminarayan sect are according to him works of modern Gujarati.

Narsinhrao Divetia traces the development thus:

(1) Antima Apabhramsha from the 13th century to 1493-Thus Asharjit's Hansauli, which was in old Gujarati according to Keshavlal Dhruva, is Antima Apabhramsha according to Narsinhrao Divetia.

(2) Old Gujarati, from 1493 A.D. to 1593 A.D. Thus Narsinh Mehta's poems is Old Gujarati poetry according to him.

(3) Medieval Gujarati, 1593 A.D. to 1693 A.D. The works of Premananda are medieval Gujarati both according to Dhruva and Divetia.

(4) Modern Gujarati begins from 1693. Thus medieval fiction writer Shamal will be a writer of Modern Gujarati according to Divetia while according to Dhruva he will be a Medieval Gujarati writer. Medieval poet Bhalana (1500-1550) in his Nalakhayna terms his language 'Gurjur bhasha' (a language called Gurjur). The name Gajarati is just mentioned by famous poet Premananda (1650-1700).

Gujarati vocabulary consists mostly of Sanskrit words which are known as 'tatsama' words, such as 'karya' (work); 'tadbhava' words which have been derived from Sanskrit through Prakrit and Apabhramsha such as 'kama' (work), which has been derived from Sanskrit 'karma'—Apabhramsha 'karma', and from it was derived Gujarati 'kam'. As Gujarat was ruled for centuries by the Muslims, and Persian and Arabic were the official languages, many words from those languages also have percolated into Gujarati, such as 'faraj' (from Persian farj, duty). As Portuguese had settled in Gujarat and they ruled over Gujarat for some time some Portuguese words also are to be found in Gujarati such as 'batata' (potato). British rule has enriched Gujarati vocabulary by words like 'station', 'ticket', etc.

Five Gujarati dialects are accepted by the linguists. They are: (1) Surati, South Gujarat dialect, (2) Charolari, a dialect of mid-Gujarat, (3) Patni of north Gujarat, (4) Saurashtra—dialect spoken in the region of Saurashtra, (5) Kutchi—spoken in Kutch region which similar to Sindhi.

LANGUAGE (Hindi). Hindi belongs to that group of languages in India which is generally called the Indo-Aryan languages, a sub-group of the Indo-European family. The Indo-Aryan languages show an uninterrupted chain of development from 3000 B.C. to the present day which is broadly classified into three major periods: Old Indo-Aryan (OIA)—commonly understood as the period of Sanskrit, Prakrit-Apabhramsha and Bhakha respectively. The spoken dialects of Aryan family are generally classified into three groups—(1) North-Western (udichya), (2) Midland (madhya deshiya) and (3) Eastern (prachya). It was the dialect of Midland which from OIA period through MIA stage (i.e. Shauraseni Prakrit and Apabhramsha) culminated into the group of dialects belonging to Western Hindi, a cover-term used to include Bundeli, Braj, Bangaru and Khari boli. The linguistic matrix of regional Hindi is an outgrowth of Kaurawi, a sub-group of Western Hindi covering its two dialects—Khariboli and Bangaru.

The word 'Hindi' stood for different things in different phases of its development. In its initial broader sense Hindi was used to designate the inhabitants who lived east of the river Sindhu. It is in this sense that the famous poet Iqbal wrote—"Hindi hain ham vatan hai hindostan hamara" (We are Hindi, our motherland is Hindustan). As the domain of Mughal Sultanat and their political sovereignty were territorially confined to the north of India, the use of the word Hindi got restricted to the inhabitants of Northern India. In its later phase, its semantic range was further delimited to the residents who spoke the dialects of Midland (i.e. from Delhi to Bhagalpur). It was in this sense that Grierson used the word Hindostan; for him Hindostan was synonymous with the Hindi-Pradesh.

Whereas Hindi was initially used for the inhabitants of India, Northern India or Madhyadesh, 'Hindavi', or 'Hindooi' was the word commonly used for the major languages of this territory. It is of no less consequence that when dialects of Bhakha period (NIA) were evolving their norm of usage and standard variant for literary pursuits, Northern India was constantly facing the pressure from foreign invasions. Soon the Mughals succeeded in establishing their political supremacy and a fertile contact with their social and cultural systems started influencing the course of developments of indigenous languages.

This contact with foreign invaders, destined to settle down in India, offered a complex situation. Whereas the invaders had Turkish as their mother tongue, Arabic as language of religion and Persian as the language of official transaction and literary activities, literary creativity of local inhabitants of Madhyadesh was being pursued in their regional language—primarily of Braj bhasha, the most cultivated of them, and secondarily, in Awadhi, Dingal and Maithili. The dialect group Kaurawi, so to say, Khariboli, was not considered as an appropriate medium either for the official transactions in the feudal courts nor for the standardized usage in creative pursuits. However, Khariboli which was in practice as a vernacular by the common people was in the way to serve as a language of wider communication in the north. Mughal rulers did not fail to recognise the representative vernacular of their time. Official status was assigned to it for the first time in Golkunda (present Hyderabad and Bijapur) by the Muslim rulers and for literary pursuits it was used in the first phase by Sufi saints in South. It was for this reason that this form and usage of 'Zaban-e-Hindi' was given the name Dakkhini.

Hindi in its role of wider communication is based on those indigenous dialects of the West which attest a ending in masculine nouns and adjectives; 'is', 'us' as oblique forms of pronouns and show a development of sound sequence of a type of a long vowel with a single consonant, i.e., $\check{V}CC > VC$. It should be observed that Brajbhasha, Kanauji and Bundeli attest 'au' or 'o' as the nominal ending and have 'ya', 'wa' form of pronominals. On the other hand, Punjabi and Bangaru preserve the sound sequence of double consonants preceded by a short vowel.

They also retain the 'anuswara' (homorganic nasals) while the '-a' ending dialects show in their native vocabularies a development of 'anunasika' ($\check{V}N^*C > \check{V}C$). When the Turks came to India in the 10th-11th century, it was this 'a' ending dialect which was forcing its way into the various domains of the speech communication system of the people of north.

A section of scholars believes that Hindi as a vernacular is an outcome of intermixture of two cultures (or languages)—the native and the Muslim. It was this mixed language that stabilized in usage in the sublime royal camp and was called Zaban-i-Urdu-e-mualla. This mixed style which was developed in Urdu-e-mualla was later called Rekhta. However, there is no evidence of Rekhta being used in poetic compositions till Wali Aurangabadi came to northern India. While Amir Khusrau (b. 1253) made excellent and creative use of Hindavi, Wali wrote his Divan in Dakkhini. Inspired by Wali's Divan, Muslim poets of north adopted Rekhta for poetry considering it more elite in nature and more expressive for poetic creation than Dakkhini.

It was in the royal court, more precisely in Oudh, the broad-based elements of Bhakha from Hindavi were consciously replaced by foreign loan words and expressions of Persian origin. Urdu as a language or style was used to designate this variant of Hindi which was non-Indian in spirit, alien in literary norms and styles, and was restricted to the official transactions by the elite class of the feudal order. This pro-feudal literary variant of language style should not be confused with the broad-based Zaban-i-urdu-e-mualla a colloquial variant of Hindavi coming into existence out of contact phenomenon. It is to be noted that the word 'Urdu' for a language was not used till 18th century though the Muslim invaders got settled in India at least 500 years before the word Urdu was used.

By the time the British rulers settled themselves as masters in India, there was deep gulf between the two forms of verbal expression—Hindavi style as vernacular coloured by the dialectual usage of the region and Urdu style bearing the alienated culture of the sophisticated elite class of the courts. It was for this reason that Gilchrist enumerating a great diversity in styles, noticed three distinct varieties—(1) the High Court or Persian style, (2) the genuine (or middle) style, and (3) the Hindavi (or vulgar) style. There are enough evidences to show that English rulers tied down the question of styles first to the cultural heritage and social hierarchy and later to religion and political games. Slowly, the middle style i.e. Hindustani, which was accepted as a genuine style was geared to be identified with Urdu and the two became more or less, synonymous for the English grammarians of the 18th and 19th century.

No doubt, it was under the influence of Gilchrist of Fort William College of Calcutta that the two distinct trends in literary writings in prose came to reality. Consequently, one gets Mir Amman's Bagh-o-Bahar and Hafizuddin Ahmad's Khirod Afroz in Urdu prose style, and Lallu Lal's Premasagar and Sadal Mishra's Nasiketo-pakhyān as the initiating grounding in Hindi prose writing.

Mahatma Gandhi sensed the political twist given by the English rulers to the language problem and their support for the racial and communalistic base of the Hindi-Urdu rivalry. He put forward the composite concept of lingua franca and after accepting Hindustani as a common invariant of the colloquial usage characterized Hindi and Hindustani written in Devanagari script and Urdu in Perso-Arabic alphabets as the national language of the country. It is worth mentioning that much before the proposal of the Indian National Congress and also of Mahatma Gandhi to accept Hindustani as a carrier of composite mass culture, Raja Shivprasad in his book of grammar in the year 1875 stated clearly that Hindi and Urdu had no difference on the level of vernacular. He wrote: "The absurdity began with the Maulvis and Pandits of Gilchrist's time, who being commissioned to make a grammar of the common speech of Upper India made two grammars..... The evil consequence is that instead of having a school grammar of the vernacular as such,... we have two diverse and discrepant class books, one for the Muhammadan and Kayastha boys and the other for the Brahmins and Banias."

There have been different kinds of forces at different historical points that helped enlarging the gulf between Hindi and Urdu literary styles of common vernacular. The cultural renaissance instigated the intellectuals to take refuge in the 'golden past' and prompted the creative writers to reshape the language of inspiration with chaste and pure lexicon and expressive devices. It is for this reason that in the Chhayavad period of Hindi literature one finds poets going for Sanskritic elements. No less has been the effort of different Boards of Technical terminologies to look back to Sanskrit roots and suffixes for Hindi and Perso-Arabic resources for Urdu in evolving technical terms and expressions for translation.

LANGUAGE (Kannada) Kannada is one of the four major languages of the Dravidian family and is the official language of Karnataka. It has rich documents in the form of literary works and epigraphs. The word Kannada is said to have been derived from the name for the country (Kannadu) which the people inhabited in the past. The first part of the name i.e., 'Kan-' (Kal?) suggests a clan and not a country. The fact that the names of many other language communities in India like Tamil, Telugu, Gujarati etc., have their origin in their clan names further strengthens this statement.

Kannada separated itself from the southern branch of Dravidian to which Tamil, Malayalam and several other spoken languages belong; it developed into a separate language. The glotochronological calculation—a method based on the principle that each language will lose the basic words of its parent language at a fixed rate in due course of time and the period of its separation can be calculated by knowing the percentage of basic words retained—suggests that Kannada came to be separated from its pre-Tamil-Kannada stage in around 400 A.D. But this is not a fully reliable method and is not accepted by all. The oldest sample of Kannada available is documented in the Halmidi inscription of 450 A.D. But there is evidence to prove that Kannada was in use still earlier. Scholars have shown that at least a few words that are found in the early Sanskrit and Prakrit inscriptions and literary works and also in some of the foreign sources are fragments of Kannada. In Gatha saptashati, an anthology of Prakrit poems (100 A.D.), there are a few words like 'potte', 'pitta', 'tuppa' that are believed to be those of Kannada. The excavations conducted in the lower Egypt towards the end of the 19th century have brought forth a collection of manuscripts called Oxyrynchus Papyri and one of these contains a Greek farce wherein a portion is in a non-Greek language. Many scholars have tried to read it as Kannada. But there are conflicting opinions. These apart, there is a Kannada word occurring in Ashoka's-Brahmagiri inscription that dates back to about three centuries before Christ. The word 'isila' that occurs there as a place name of that time, according to D.L. Narasimhachar, is the Aryanised form of Kannada 'esila' meaning 'fort'. This seems to be the first ever tangible proof of the beginning of Kannada. Therefore, it can be safely said that Kannada came into existence at least a few centuries before Christ and it is here that the words of T.N. Sreekantayya,—“It is not known when exactly Tamil and Kannada separated from each other and became distinct languages; but the middle of the first millennium B.C. may not be wide off the mark”—have some significance.

Starting from the Halmidi inscription of 450 A.D. Kannada has a history of one and a half thousand years in the written form. During these years it has passed through several stages of development. Changes took place at all levels of structure: phonology, word formation, sentence structure and vocabulary. Because of these there has been a noticeable change in the very way of thinking itself. The causes of such an overall change in the language are both internal and external in character. They are internal because the cultural and socio-political changes involved in different stages in course of time gave birth to new forms either by replacing the old ones or by way of their modification. The geographical separation of the people in groups and the changes in their habits of pronunciation reinforced the change further. These changes had their chain effect on other levels of structure resulting thereby in a total change. The contacts with different language groups at different periods of history brought changes externally. Languages like Sanskrit, Prakrit, Persian, Arabic, Hindustani, Portuguese, English and the neighbouring languages like Tamil and Telugu have directly or indirectly influenced Kannada in the course of its history. The nature and scope of borrowing into Kannada were different as the nature of contact and the mutual relationship was different in each case.

It is customary to conceive four stages in the development of the Kannada language: Ancient Kannada (AK), Kannada of Pre-850 A.D., Old Kannada (OK) of 850-1200 A.D., Middle Kannada (MK) of about two centuries following MK. There might be differences of opinion as regards the length of time affixed to each of these stages but there is generally little disagreement over the division into four periods of time.

The earliest literary work available in Kannada is Kavirajamarga, a treatise on poetics, by Srivijaya, a court poet. This work (of the 9th century) mentions several poets and quotes from earlier works but none of them is available to this date. But there are numerous inscriptions available in Kannada from that of Halmidi (450 AD) onwards, and these help us to know about Ancient Kannada. Some of the characteristics of AK can be mentioned here. The voiced-voiceless contrast which was not in proto-Dravidian has already taken place. The proto-Dravidian sounds *v, *p, *l and *r along with others are still retained at this stage. Many of the case suffixes and personal suffixes in the verbs have long vowels in them. It is seen in words like 'kotta-an' ('he gave'), 'sand-an' (he reached), 'adar-a' ('its'), 'Mangalishan-a' (Mangalisha's). '-ul' is used as locative suffix which is not found in the later Kannada. Relative nouns are obtained by suffixing personal endings to participle forms as in 'madid-on' (one who did), 'nodid-or' ('those who saw') etc. Negative participles like 'nod-a-de', 'mad-a-de' have long vowel as negative suffix. In sandhi formation the initial stop sound of the latter stem in many instances is found geminated (as in pogaleppottanam pogale+pattanam). It is a feature of proto-Dravidian and is retained in Tamil. With regard to the number system (singular-plural), gender system suggested by nouns and full verbs (i.e., three-way classification as neuter, masculine and feminine, denoting irrational things, human males and females respectively), tense system (i.e., past-nonpast distinction in full verbs and present-past-future distinction in non-finite verbs) AK stands together with other south Dravidian languages. In sentence structures the subject-object-verb and equative type (without verb) are the common ones. Sentences or structures below its rank which are functionally similar are compounded by conjunctive markers. Sentences are also compounded by changing the full verbs of previous sentences into non-finite past forms (like 'bandire' 'when/while (subject) came', 'pooire' when/while (subject) went' and so on).

By the turn of the 9th century there were noticeable changes in the language. During the next four centuries—the period that is considered to be the Classical Age in Kannada literature—poetic works of high merit were composed. Poets like Pampa (902 A.D.) and Ranna (949 A.D.) brought out their works. Vaddaradhane, a prose work, appeared in the same period (930 A.D.).

During about 400 years of OK especially in the 9th and 10th centuries some of the significant sound changes took place. The four sounds of AK namely, v, p, l, r either were merged into or were replaced by other sounds. The sound v occurring initially in a word changed into a stop sound b. The voiceless stop p changed into v, h and b. In an earlier period, when p occurred initially in the second stem in a compound except after a nasal (as in key+pola keyvola) it changed into v. But when it occurred after a nasal in such a position (as in capam+pole=capambole) it changed into b. At a later period p was replaced by h both in word-initial and word-medial position and also in gemination (but not of the base). l a retroflex fricative and r, an alveolar trill changed into a lateral l and a flap r of the respective places. Of these four significant changes the first two started at the end of AK stage itself and continued to be completed during OK. Other significant changes of this period are: the long vowels in the suffixes became short thereby giving such forms as 'sandan,' 'adara', from the earlier 'sandan' and 'adara'; the nasals (before a homo-organic stop), occurring after a long vowel or in the non-first syllable are lost thereby changing words like 'devaringe', 'dantu' into 'devarige' ('to the god'), 'datu' ('to cross'); there was a tendency to lose the word final-nasal sounds either or stems or of suffixes but that of stems were retained in derivations; the vowels e, o of the roots changed into i and u respectively (and so words like 'kedu', 'pogu' became 'kidu', 'pugu') but again the original vowels were retained in the derived past tense forms. In sentences two new types were developed, but these were probably confined to literary language. One is the passive construction got by using a passivised verb made up of an infinitive form of a verb plus an auxiliary 'padu'; the other is a predication of a noun phrase by suffixing personal endings and used as a sentence (with no verb). These two types are due to the influence of Sanskrit.

The above mentioned changes that took place during the OK period are reflected not only in the inscriptions but also in the descriptions of the grammarians. Quite surprisingly nobody seems to have taken the trouble to write a grammar of Kannada before the 12th century. A poet as well as a grammarian, Nagavarma, dealt with the grammar for the first time in a lengthy Chapter of his Kavyavalokana and also separately in another work entitled Karnataka bhasa bhushanam, a Kannada grammar, written in Sanskrit in the 12th century. About a century later Keshiraja wrote his Shabdamanidarpanam in the sutra vritti style. There is another work by Bhattakalanka (1604 A.D.) entitled Karnataka shabdanushasanani written in Sanskrit. All these deal with Old Kannada. Of these Keshiraja is more informative though less accurate in descriptions. Even when dealing with the influence of Sanskrit and Prakrit on Kannada, Keshiraja's contribution cannot be underestimated.

It is but natural in any language that the changes that take place in the spoken form will not be reflected in the written form especially in works of literature for several years, and so it happened in Kannada. The phonetic changes mentioned above had completed their process by about the middle of the 10th century. But the poets even at a later period almost retained these archaic sounds in their works. Keshiraja who has referred to such works in his grammar gives a detailed list of words where such sounds did occur and warns against their improper use with an idea to retain them. But in many other cases he is descriptive in his statements. For instance, he says that the v and y sounds in words like 'bavi', 'mayana', etc., are nasalized and are different from those in many other words like 'vayal', 'sav,' etc. Sometime during the end of the AK some other changes along with those mentioned earlier occurred. The consonant ending words became vowel-ending either by losing a consonant (as in 'maramā-mara') or by the addition of -u (as in 'min-imnu,' 'kalāka-lu', etc.). A change with regard to pronominal forms could also be mentioned here. There were two forms for the first person plural during the AK, namely, nam and am. The first one was used to include a person(s) to whom the user is speaking along with others and the latter form was meant to exclude him but to include others. Such a distinction occurred in the proto-Dravidian stage itself and is retained in languages like Telugu and in Havyaka Kannada, a sociolect of Kannada but was lost in Kannada during the AK itself.

For these changes to occur as the AK turned into OK and this again into MK the influence of Sanskrit and Prakrit are responsible to some extent along with other causes purely internal. Such an influence can, of course, be expected. The Aryans with their Sanskrit were considered superior by the Dravidians. In the history of Karnataka, right from the beginning of the Christian era, Sanskrit and Prakrit had a renowned place. They were the languages of the religion and culture of the 'higher order'. The Satavahanas who ruled over Karnataka in the first few centuries after Christ were the patrons of the Jaina, Buddhist and the Vedic cultures. Prakrit was regarded as the official language. Poets and kings composed their works in Sanskrit or Prakrit. King Hala brought an anthology of Prakrit poems. Sarvavarma, a grammarian, who wrote a grammar in Sanskrit and Nagarjuna, a Sanskrit poet, were encouraged by the Satavahana kings. Later, even during the Kadamba rule, Prakrit was the official language. The situation was not much different till the Rashtrakutas appeared on the political scene. Kannada was encouraged by the Rashtrakuta kings during the eighth century and onwards. But nothing came in the way of the prestigious position of Sanskrit and Prakrit. And most of the poets and grammarians of Kannada of the OK period, i.e., in the beginning of the history of Kannada literature, were well versed in both these languages. Therefore it is natural for Kannada to have been influenced by these languages in both of its varieties—spoken and written. This is especially true of the Kannada lexis. It is evident from the very first inscription in Kannada found in Halimidi. There are hardly any words of Kannada and the rest are of Sanskrit. Even on the syntactic level the influence of Sanskrit is apparent. There is a phrase "(dana) Pasupatiyendu pogaleppottana" used here of which 'Pogaleppottana' ('of him who is praised') is a passive construction which is foreign to the Kannada language. It is a common observation that the Kannada inscriptions begin and end with Sanskrit shlokas. It is also not rare to see Sanskrit phrases mixed with those of Kannada. Such a style of mixed constructions is known as 'manipravala' in Malayalam. In Kannada also it was characteristic of some to use such a style. In one of the manuscripts of a commentary named Dhishodhini to Kedarabhata's Vrittaratnakara (a work on prosody in Sanskrit) the term manipravala is used as an adjective to a person (manipravala Subbashastrinah). This style developed in the literary and inscriptional languages is not the colloquial variety. But this is not the case with many other words and compound forms borrowed into Kannada. There are words like 'puje', 'sime', 'purva', 'amase', 'kula', 'gotra', 'gamunda' and countless others that are Sanskrit in origin and borrowed into the spoken Kannada directly or through Prakrit with or without modification. There are many examples of personal names of Sanskrit used in Kannada like Gunakirti, Kundacharya, Ranavikrama, Amoghavarsa, Sripurusha, etc., even during the Old Kannada period itself. The native names of several places became Sanskritized. These words or names that entered Kannada caused some change in the phonology of Kannada. The sounds h and sh and the aspirates made their appearance in Kannada. There was also a change in the distribution of sounds. Earlier in Kannada (and in Dravidian) non-homo-organic sounds could not cluster together in the stems. But due to the borrowed words like 'kasta', 'agni', 'gotra', 'purva' there was a change in the habit of pronunciation, but not to the same extent among all classes of people. Therefore, such words were also nativized as in 'piriti' (pṛiti), 'mukuti' (mukti) by a section while borrowing on the whole brought Kannada nearer to Sanskrit with regard to its phonological system. Comparatively the impact of Sanskrit on the grammar of (spoken) Kannada is much less. But here the literary Kannada differed from the spoken Language and caused the grammarians like Keshiraja (who based his work mainly on the literary works) to show discrepancy in their statements with regard to the sandhi process; they had to formulate one rule for the Kannada words and another for the borrowed words. While describing the gender system they could not restrict it to the three categories (masculine, feminine and neuter) but had to create new categories like masculine-feminine, masculine-neuter, etc., because there were usages like 'Ravi mudidam' (sun rose+male suffix) and 'ravi muditu' (sun rose, neut) before them. They sought an adjustment in their grammar to include the borrowed items.

While the influence on Kannada was restricted to that of Sanskrit and Prakrit till the beginning of the 12th century, it was not so later. Other languages, Indian and foreign, came to influence Kannada. Even during the eighth century, the Rashtrakutas had friendship and trade-relations with the Arab kings. Later in 1193 A.D. there was an invasion by Mohammed Ghorī. Since then, for about seven centuries, India was under the Muslim rule from Delhi. In 1310 when Mallik Kaffur fought with Viraballala III of the Hoysala dynasty, the Muslims came in direct contact with the Kannadigas. During the Vijaynagara period there were frequent invasions by the Muslim kings, and later during the Muslim rule, Persian became the court language and gained a prestigious position. As a result numerous words relating to administration, court, army, agriculture, music, etc., from Persian and Arabic were borrowed into Kannada. 'Tayita', 'tastiku', 'gori', 'daphan' (religious), 'banduku', 'sipayi', 'topu', 'kandaka' (pertaining to war and armoury), 'jille', 'talluku', 'jagiru', 'khajane' (administrative terms), 'phiryade', 'dastave ju' (relating to court), 'tabala', 'sitar', 'vastada' (connected with music), 'raitā', 'jāminu', 'gulabi', 'baki'. 'juju', 'kagada' a few such words were. But the influence on the grammar was little.

Along with the Persian and Arabic words some Portuguese words were also borrowed during the Vijayanagara period. Words like 'kadatusu', 'pappayi', 'natala sabunu', are such borrowings. But they are very few in number.

With regard to the literary language there was apparently a sudden change by around 1200 A.D. That is seen in the Vachana literature, and it looks as though the language of the fourteenth and fifteenth century literature is a continuation of the OK, rather than that of Vachana literature. The reason for such an apparent break is that the Vachana writers belonged (mostly) to the low castes and that they rebelled against the established high culture. Therefore their writings i.e., Vachanas are unlike those of the court poets of the earlier and the later periods. The Vachanas are more prose-like and are nearer to the spoken language of the time but this lends them a unique poetic elegance, different from that of "pure literature".

The Sanskrit forms—words, phrases and sentences were mixed with Kannada in the inscripational language and many inscriptions are completely in Sanskrit. This tendency continued till the beginning of the 19th century. In a similar way (due to the political contacts with the Tamil kings) the Tamil mixed Kannada language was used in the inscriptions of MK period, especially during the Hoysala period.

As far as the literary language is concerned. Vachanas that appeared in the beginning of MK were markedly different with regard to their theme (intending to bring social reform), form and their language. Vachanas were followed in the 13th century by the epic poets once again but here onwards the language used in the literary works was less Sanskritised than that of OK works and the native metrical forms were used. Again in the 15th century a different literary tradition called Haridasa (devotees of Lord Krishna) literature came into being side by side with the epic tradition and this was popular for more than a century. The works of this tradition, mostly by brahmins, consisted of songs that are devotional but often highly satirical. The language of the Haridasas is simple and nearer to the spoken variety of the brahmins with regard to syntax but lexically highly Sanskritised.

Till the seventeenth century the northern part of Karnataka dominated the literary scenes, and this is expected when the political background is considered. In the 17th century it was the court poets of Mysore of southern Karnataka who contributed much to literature. But the theme, form and the language of the literary works resemble considerably those of classical works of OK.

A change to a considerable extent in the linguistic structure of Kannada took place once again due to the contact with English (towards the close of the eighteenth century). So far, the external influences with the exception of Sanskrit and Prakrit in the early history, were mostly limited to vocabulary. There were some changes in grammar and phonology in the MK which were purely internal. But with regard to English the nature of contact was (and still is) different and the need to borrow was urgent. It became the medium of instruction higher levels of education and later even at the primary level. It was the official language. New branches of knowledge, and in short, the whole of modern way of life can be said to have been introduced through English. This resulted in a heavy domination of English. It interfered with the structure of Kannada at all levels. A new sound z was borrowed into Kannada. Hybrid compounds with English and Kannada stems like 'tarenne', 'anubambu' were formed. Words were borrowed with minimum or no change. Translated equivalents (like 'visa vartula' 'kendra bindu') were created. Archaic forms were revived to serve as equivalents of English words. There was a change in the sentence structure also. Phrases like 'Rama mattu Krishna' (in place of 'Ramanu Krishnanu', a native structure) parallel to English 'Rama and Krishna' came into use. Sentences like 'avanu helida, nanu nale hoguttene' ('He said, he would go tomorrow') along with the native construction 'nanu nale hoguttene endu avanu helida' where the order of main and subordinate clauses is changed, appeared. Embedded sentences of the type 'rupagalu' 'padagalu', 'padagucchagalu' 'hagu vakyagalu'—srikaradindagi bandavugalu (these forms—words, phrases, and sentences—are due to borrowing) are because of the influence of English. Even the punctuation marks used in writing are due to this. Such an influence was inescapable if one considers the role of English in bringing a change in the society as a whole.

While on the one hand the external influences during the past 2000 years or more brought similarity in the language across its regional varieties, the social and political happenings and the differing density of mutual communication together with the influence of the neighbouring languages caused the regional varieties to fall apart (along with the already existing social differences in the language). The dialect formation is not a characteristic of the modern age. In the 10th century itself the poet, Pampa, mentioned places which he referred to as the 'area of pure Kannada'. The author of Kavirajamarga (9th century A.D.) also said that there were innumerable varieties of the Kannada language. At present, at least four distinct dialects of Kannada spoken around Mysore, Mangalore, Dharwad and Gulberga respectively are recognized. Though the official Kannada can be said to be the Mysore variety there is not a single variety of Kannada which can be called standard Kannada. Instead there are as many regional standards as the regional dialects.

LANGUAGE (Kashmiri). The Kashmiri language is spoken in the Kashmir valley and some surrounding areas of the state of Jammu and Kashmir. The state of Jammu and Kashmir is the northern-most State of India and its boundaries touch Afghanistan, the U.S.S.R. and China in the North; Pakistan is in the south and Tibet in The east. The present boundary of the State comprise 0.81% of India's population. Kashmiri is also spoken in a small area in Pakistan. The total number of Kashmiri speakers cannot be determined in the absence of the availability of reliable figures in India and Pakistan.

The inhabitants of Kashmir call their language 'Kashur' and the country 'Kashir'. In Hindi-Urdu and other Indian languages, the term 'Kaashmiri' or 'Kashmiri' is used. In English, is variety spell-as the word Kashmiri 'Kaschemiri', 'Cashmiri', 'Cashmeeree', etc.

Kashmiri and the Dardic family: The term 'Dard' (Dardic for the inhabitants of Dardistan) has a long history and is found in the puranas and also in Kalhana's Rajatarangini. In Sanskrit, the word 'Darada' means 'mountain', and was, perhaps, used because most of the Dardistan (the place of the Dards) is mountainous. In some works, including the Linguistic Survey of India, the term Paishicha the languages for the so-called Dardic group, has been used as a cover term, which seems to have been used earlier in Sanskrit to refer to these languages. In this regard the following statement of George Abraham Grierson may be noted: "Some of the speakers of these languages take exception to it on the grounds that, in Indian mythology, the word 'Pishacha' was also used to connote a cannibal demon, and it must be admitted that this was the most common acceptance of the word. In such circumstances, it is useful to explain that tribe speaking a Pishacha language is not necessarily of Pishacha descent."

The Dardic family is traditionally divided into three main language groups, viz., 'Kafir-group', 'Khowar-group' and 'Dard-group'. These groups are further classified as follows. Kafir-group: Bashgali (Kati), Wai-ala (Wai), Wasi-veri (Veron), Ashkund, Kalashapasha, Gowar-bati (Narsati), Pashai (Laghmani, Deghani), Bashkarik, Tirahi, Prasun, Gujuri, Waigali and Zonjigali. Khowar-group: Chitralli, Chatrai and Arniya. Dard-group: Shina, Kashmiri (Kashur) and Kohistani.

The position of Kashmiri in the Dard family and its origin continue to be discussed by scholars representing different schools of thought, and no conclusive answer has yet been found. The question was originally raised by George Abraham Grierson (1915) and Sunitikumar Chatterji (1963), who claimed that linguistically Kashmiri holds a peculiar position as it has some formal features which show its Dardic characteristics, and many other features which it shares with the Indo-Aryan languages, such as Punjabi, Hindi etc. Consider Chatterji's following observations: "As a language, Kashmiri at least in its basic stratum, belongs to the Dardic section of the Aryan or Indo-Iranian. Possibly one section of the Aryans who came to India before 1000 B.C., and who spoke dialects very much like the language of the Rigveda but with certain special characteristics (which later gave rise to the Dardic branch of Aryan) became established in the valley of Kashmir, and in the surrounding mountainous tracts; and very early, possibly after the Vedic age, Brahmanical Aryans with their Indo-Aryan 'Spoken' Sanskrit (and subsequently with the Prakrits) came and settled in Kashmir and other Himalayan areas... In this way, Kashmiri, in spite of a Dardic substratum in its people and speech, became a part of the Sanskritic culture-world of India. The Indo-Aryan Prakrits and the Apabhramsha from the midland and from the northern Punjab profoundly modified the Dardic base of Kashmiri so that one might say that the Kashmiri language is a result of a very large over-laying of a Dardic base with Indo-Aryan elements."

Chatterji's observations might not be a mere linguistic speculation but a predictable truth, but it has not been proved, nor has he been able to support such speculation either by his own researches or the evidences produced by others. One simple reason responsible for this lack of evidence is the fact that no significant serious research in Kashmiri has been done to answer such questions. That this lack has been responsible for the conflicting theoretical view-points on the question of the origin of Kashmiri and its affiliation to various language families, is further evidenced in the following report which appeared in Kashmir Census Report of 1911: "Kashmiri used to be hitherto treated as of Sanskrit origin. It has this time been grouped with Shina-Khowar according to the revised system of classification, but the claim locally urged that it is essentially a Sanskrit language persists, and in view of the historical fact that the valley of Kashmir, before its conversion to Islam, was wholly populated by Brahmans with their 'Shastric' lore, that claim might merit reconsideration".

One does not fail to notice the unscientific criterion adapted for the classification of the language in the above report. Instead of following a logical or scientific approach backed by an appropriate linguistic technique such as typology, linguistic features, similarities in sound structure etc., the question of affinity is being decided here on the basis of sentiment. It was against this sentiment-based plea of "reconsideration" that Grierson presented some data so that the question may be decided purely on scientific grounds. According to him: "... the Pishacha languages, which include the Shina-Khowar group, occupy a position intermediate between the Sanskrit languages of India proper and the Eranian languages farther to their west. They thus possess many features that are common to them and to the Sanskrit languages. But they also possess features peculiar to themselves, and others in which they agree rather with languages of the Eranian family... The language (Kashmiri) possesses nearly all the features that are peculiar to Pishacha, and also those in which Pishacha agrees with Eranian" (Grierson, 1915).

The main points which, according to Grierson, separate Kashmiri from the Indo-Aryan languages are given below. This is based on how the items of Sanskrit stock function in Kashmiri and how, in this respect, it differs from the other languages of the sub-continent. Lack of voiced aspirates in Kashmiri; confusion between cerebral and dental letters; consonantal epenthesis, i.e. the change in a consonant under the influence of vowel or semi-vowel; aspiration of stops in the final position; no vowel change or gemination of Prakrit borrowing in Kashmiri; in the environment V + V, t is not dropped; n is "liable to elision", /r/ preceding another consonant is not dropped; a as an indefinite marker; the presence of a large number of post-positions in Kashmiri, which are peculiar to Pishacha; numeral system is typically Pishacha; three-fold distinction of demonstrative pronouns in Kashmiri; three-term system of the past tense; different word order.

It is true that due to some historical reasons, Kashmiri has acquired a significant number of Sanskrit lexical items but quite interestingly, it has also accepted a good number of lexical items from Perso-Arabic sources. In both the cases the distribution of such borrowed items does not seem a regular or patterned feature to justify the claims that Kashmiri is of Sanskrit or of Perso-Arabic origin. If languages were to be classified, and the questions of their origin decided on the basis of their lexical items alone, then languages could be grouped and learned by dictionaries only. Consider the following remarks of Grierson in this regard: "Finally we come to the question of vocabulary. It is on this that the claim that Kashmiri is a Sanskrit language is most strongly based, and, if languages were classified according to vocabulary, the claim would be difficult to controvert. But, it is well-known that vocabulary cannot be used as a basis of linguistic classification. But, nevertheless, some of the commonest words—words that are retained longest in any language, however mixed, and that are seldom borrowed, such as the earlier numerals, or the words for 'father', 'mother', and the like—are closely allied to the corresponding Shina words, and are, therefore, of Pishacha origin...".

This evidence leads Grierson to the following conclusion as regards the origin of Kashmiri and its affinity with other languages: "Kashmiri is a mixed language, having as its basis a language of the Dard group of the Pishacha family allied to Shina. It has been powerfully influenced by Indian culture and literature, and the greater part of its vocabulary is now of Indian origin and is allied to that of Sanskrit Indo-Aryan languages of northern India. As, however, its basis, in other words, its phonetic system, its accent, its syntax, its prosody is Pishacha, it must be classed as such and not as a Sanskrit form of speech".

There is still a great need for typological and comparative research on Kashmiri with the Indo-Aryan languages and with the Dardic languages, so that the questions of affinity and of the origin of Kashmiri can be determined. Questions of sentiment, however much we may sympathize with them, must be put altogether to one side in dealing with a purely scientific question; and unless something new and substantial, based on scientific study, comes up on the affinity of Kashmiri language, we have but to follow Grierson strictly.

It is well known that the Kashmiris have made important contributions to Sanskrit literature. The names of Kashmiri scholars like Damodara, Abhinavagupta, Kalhana, Bilhana, Kshemendra and others are prominent in the history of Sanskrit literature. Kashmiri also developed its own 'trika' system of 'Shaiva tantric philosophy' which has some points of contact with the 'Shaiva-Siddhanta School' of the South. On the basis of the model of linguistic and literary changes that occurred in the Aryan languages of India, it is presumed that there was a Prakrit and an Apabhramsha stage of Kashmiri. But there are no literary or any other documented specimen of the so-called Kashmiri Prakrit or Kashmiri Apabhramsha. A three-word example of what might be called Kashmiri

Apabhramsha has been found in Kalhana's Rajatarangini. The example is: 'Rangasa Helu dinna (or dinnu)'—'the village of Helu has been given to Ranga'. This in modern Kashmiri would be 'Rangas Hyulu dyun'. This example can be dated back to the 10th century.

The only conclusion one can draw from this example is that the texts or manuscripts that could testify to the presence of Apabhramsha or even Prakrit forms of Kashmiri in more detailed manner have, been lost them. In any case, the diachronic realities of Kashmiri are not clear due to these missing links. Therefore, at this stage, one has to be content with the synchronic understanding of the language only.

Dialects of Kashmiri: In recent years there has been no serious fieldwork for dialect research on Kashmiri. Grierson's tentative analysis continues to form the basis even for dialect classification. His statements about the dialects of Kashmiri are so vague that no special value can be attached to them. The dialect division of Kashmiri comprises two types of groupings, viz., (a) the dialects which are 'Area-defined' and (b) the dialects which are defined in terms of the 'users'.

a) Area-defined dialects:

Census of India 1961 lists the following as the area defined dialects of Kashmiri: Banjwali (550), Kishtwari (11,633), Poguli (9,508), Siraji-Kashmiri (19,978), and Kaghani (152), Kohistani (81).

Grierson, on the other hand, claims that Kashmiri has "only one true dialect—Kishtwari" and "a number of mixed dialects such as Poguli, Siraji of Doda and Rambani... Farther east, over the greater part of the Riasi district of the state, there are more of these mixed dialects about which nothing certain is known, except that the mixture is rather between Kashmiri and the Chibhali form of Lahnda".

It is possible that further dialect research will show that, in addition to the difference of village speech and the so-called religious differences, Kishtwari is perhaps the only dialect of Kashmiri. The other so-called dialects are only partially influenced by Kashmiri. Their areas cover the transition zones, and thus, naturally show some superficial influence of Kashmiri. It may not be difficult to show that these dialects have been equally influenced by Punjabi and its dialects and other neighbouring languages.

b) Religious dialects:

The dialects defined in terms of "users" are two, i.e. Hindu Kashmiri (HK) and Muslim Kashmiri (MK). This distinction, like the Serbo and Croation of Yugoslavia, continues to be followed in current literature perhaps without much structural justification. It is, however, argued that "the differences at the phonological level, which are based on the religion of the speech community, may be explained in terms of distribution and frequency of certain phonemes" (Kachru, 1969). The other differences are essentially lexical and in some cases morphological. Lexically Hindu Kashmiri has borrowed from Sanskrit, and Muslim Kashmiri from Persian and Arabic. This distinction is a traditional one and is maintained by Grierson and other later scholars.

The religion-based difference is not evident in certain literary forms and specialized registers (legal and official). In such literary forms a type of Kashmiri has developed which cuts across religious boundaries. A special characteristics of such forms is a large number of Persian and/or Arabic loans. It is possible, however, that future research may show that there is no significant variation other than lexical in the languages as used by the two religious communities in the villages. Both the speech communities of Kashmiri appear to share the same over-all phonological system.

But a number of registers (legal and business) with very high frequency of Arabic and/or Persian items are shared by both the communities. This seems true with the variety and style of Kashmiri which has emerged in the current literature. This observation, however, does not cover the spoken varieties, where the distinction has obviously been maintained.

The traditional writing systems associated with Kashmiri language are both 'Sharada' and script based on Perso-Arabic letters. It is believed that Sharada script developed around the 10th century. It seems that later, due to historical reasons, it slowly became obsolete though it did not die out. The older generation of priests of the Kashmiri Pandit community still use it in a restricted mammad, especially for horoscope writing. It is claimed that the name of the Sharada alphabet is based on the traditional Sanskrit name of the Kashmir valley, 'Shardabhami' or 'Shardapitham'. Sharada script was used by the Kashmiris to write Sanskrit texts chiefly. This script is closely related to 'Devanagari' or 'Nagari' system used for most of the northern Indian languages. Devanagari is being used by Kashmiri Hindu community alternately with other scripts. 'Roman' script, too, has also been used for Kashmiri. Many interesting and important works in Kashmiri and on Kashmiri are available in Roman script only, written mostly by European scholars in the 19th and early 20th centuries. Perso-Arabic is being used both by the Kashmiri Hindus and the Muslims. After 1947, it has also been recognised as the official script for Kashmiri by the State Government. In recent years, it has gone through many reforms in order to adapt it to the growing needs of the Kashmiri language, and obviously, is now being widely used. Almost 96% of Kashmiri literature is available in this script alone.

It was only in 1947 after the country became independent that the scholars started showing some interest in linguistic and other aspects of Kashmiri and the related Dardic languages. This naturally led to individual as well as organized research on different linguistic aspects of Kashmiri and surrounding languages. Since the area where Kashmiri and some other surrounding languages are spoken as native languages geographically occupies a peculiar position, research in these languages has not been so fast as one notices in other Indian languages devoid of such geographical circumstances. Moreover, although Kashmiri has been accepted as one of the national languages in the Constitution, yet it is not the official language of the State of Jammu and Kashmir. Urdu serves that purpose. This is perhaps the only Indian state where a non-native language has been recognized as the official language. One of the possible explanations of this strange phenomenon could be that the state of Jammu and Kashmir is basically a combination of three different cultural entities: Ladakh is Tibeto-Burman, Jammu is Indo-Aryan and Kashmir proper is Dardic; and, therefore, only a lingua franca acceptable to all could perhaps solve the problem. Urdu, due to historical reasons, was the only choice. However, in spite of these circumstances, a few agencies like J & K Academy of Arts, Culture & Languages and Post Graduate Department of Kashmiri in Kashmir University have been carrying on research on Kashmiri. Kashmiri has also attracted the attention of researchers outside the country.

The Kashmiri language (and literature also) has yet to draw the attention it deserves even in the area it is spoken as a native language. As said above, it is still not fully used for administrative or educational purposes. The government has shown no special initiative in encouraging scientific research in Kashmiri. In other words, Kashmiri studies in general and Kashmiri language in particular, have remained neglected for centuries. Besides others, one of the reasons for this neglect is the language attitude of its speakers developed over hundreds of years under varied foreign, political and cultural domination, and despite recent nationalistic and cultural upsurge, the attitude towards the language has not changed much. One can only hope that the younger generation may show an entirely different approach to the problem.

LANGUAGE (Konkani). The long stretch of land from the river Damanganga in the north to the river Gangavalli in the south on the west coast of India is known as Konkani from very ancient times, and old Sanskrit texts mention it as a distinct geographical entity (janapada). Konkani textually means the region of Konkas, the Kanned suffix is being indicative of region as in words like Tenken, Badagan, Moodan and Padavan.

Long before the Aryans entered into this region and made it their home, its inhabitants comprised various tribes like proto Autroloids, Kols, Mundaris, Nagas, Sumerians and Kushas. They were generically known as Konkas whose speech was Dravidian in character. Aryans led by the progressive Bheigus, who settled in this region and married local girls several centuries before the Christian era, got their original Vedic tongue greatly influenced by the local dialect in phonetics, vocabulary and idioms, though its structure remained essentially Indo-Aryan. Their original Vedic tongue moulded thus, through centuries, came to be known as Konkani and is spoken throughout Konkani in its six distinct variants. Its ancestry to the Vedic tongue is obvious from the highest percentage of 'tastsamas' and 'tadbhavas' prevalent in it even today.

Regarding its structure the famous linguist, S.M. Katre, in his Formation of Konkani categorically asserts, "Taking into account all the main features of Konkani, we may now definitely assign it to the South-Western group (having Marathi and Gujarati as its nearest of kin), with a tinge of the Central group (Hindi, especially in the dative postposition 'ka'). Along with these similarities, Konkani has its own intrinsic peculiarities of phonetics, vocabulary, morphology and syntax which give it a distinctive linguistic character."

The oldest inscription of Konkani available to us is a sentence carved on the feet of Gommateshwara of Shravanabelagola in Karnataka. The verb-form 'karaiyalem' in it clearly shows that it is Konkani. It is dated 983 A.D. and is in Nagari characters. It is obvious, therefore, that its earliest script was Nagari. But during the Kadamba rule, which lasted over Goa for nearly three centuries, Konkani adopted the Kannada script and absorbed many Kannada vocables.

Portuguese records confirm this fact, but further add that it was also written in Nagari and 'Modi' scripts.

The Konkani language is now spoken widely in the areas along the Arabian sea coast in western India. The area known as Konkani proper within Maharashtra State and Gomantaka, the modern Goa, on the west coast of India, forms the home of the Konkani language.

Structurally, Konkani is an independent language belonging to the southern group of the Outer Branch of the Indo-Aryan sub-family.

It is from the time of the settlement of, Aryans in Goa on the western coastal belt of India that the history of Konkani begins. The Bhagavata-purana, the Sahyadri khanda in the Skandapurana, the Salya parvala in the Mahabharata, which comprises 'Saraswatopakhyana' and the Satapata Brahmana, give an account of the migration of Aryans from the Saraswati Pradesh of Punjab to the East of Bihar, i.e. Trihotrapura of the then State of Magadha (now the Tirhut division of Bihar) and their further migration from there in successive groups to Gomantak for permanent settlement. These Aryan immigrants, belonging originally to Saraswati Pradesh, later came to be designated Konkanadeshya, which means that the Saraswats of Goa are Aryan migrants from the north, domiciled in Konkandesh in the South. Sebastiao Rodolfo Dalgado (1855-1922), polyglot Professor of Sanskrit, Lisbon University, says "...that it (Konkani) belonged to the Gaurian group; that probably it represented the old Saraswati which the orientalisists consider as extinguished, and it would corroborate the oral and written tradition also based on ethnical affinities about the emigration of brahmins from Trihotra to Gomachala (modern Goa)." The Saraswats, who first settled down in Tirhut division of Bihar, accepted Magadhi Prakrit in their day to day life, as that was the principal language of the people there. But Konkani of today, which is the direct off-shoot of Eastern Magadhi, has got a good deal of Dardic influence i.e., Paishachi Prakrit, the most ancient among Prakrits of India. As Taraporewala in his book, Elements of Science of Languages, states, "In Konkani and along the Western Ghats Konkani is spoken. It shows a good deal of Dardic influence."

Konkani is the only language in southern India which has been influenced by Paishachi. The Saraswat immigrants, who settled down in Trihotrapura where Magadhi was spoken, had accepted Magadhi Prakrit in their day to day life. But it had to submit to the influence of Paishachi which they had brought with them from Saraswati Pradesh. One important characteristic of this dialect Paishachi is the substitution of the voiceless for the voiced mutes. To cite an example, 'Thamotor' for 'Damodara'. In Konkani it is 'Thamtora'. Aryans who migrated in successive groups from Trihotrapura to Gomantaka, also brought with them the Magadhi Prakrit with its strong Paishachi element, and the said Paishachi element might be traced even today to the Konkani spoken in Gomantaka and parts of the western littoral. Gradually a new Prakrit variation called Gomantak Prakrit or Konkani came into being in Goa. The language came to be called Konkani because of its old association with Konkandesh. Today all classes of Hindus, Muslims, Christians and others living in Goa speak Konkani.

The earliest inscription in the Konkani language is that of the Gupta period ascribed to the 2nd century A.D. There is also an inscription of the Silahara king, Aparaditya, of the year 1166. The famous inscription at the foot of the colossal Jain monolith statue of Gomateshwara at Shravanbelgola (1116-1117) is in Konkani. Konkani was used to be written in the Nagari script during the Dutch period. The introduction containing a testimonium in Konkani to the Dutch governor Van Rheeds, to a Dutch botanical book in 12 volumes, Hortus Indicus Malabaricus, published in 1678, was written in Nagari. It written by Appu Bhat, Vinayaka Pandit and Ranga Bhat, the three Konkani Ayurvedic physicians of Cochin.

Konkani has a continuous literary tradition for the last 450 years. Konkani has been mentioned as a spoken as well as a vigorous literary and cultural language by missionaries of the 16th century. In the matter of folklore, such as proverbs, riddles, similes, stories, drama, songs, etc., Konkani is a rich gold mine. Konkani has to its credit a number of grammatical works, dictionaries and other outstanding works of literary merit written by a number of authors from Goa, Maharashtra, Karnataka and Kerala. At a fair estimate, there are at present 25 dictionaries and 21 grammars. William Carey, translated the Bible into Konkani. Konkani's first major literary text is a collection of tales from the Mahabharata and the Ramayana written by Krishnadas Sharma, poet of Saxty in Goa of the 16th century. Ashwamedha, Krishnacharita and Raghuvamshachi katha can be cited as examples of early Konkani literature pertaining to pre-Portuguese period. Konkani had, thus, developed its own literature before the Portuguese conquest. From the first century of the conquest, the Portuguese civil and ecclesiastical authorities of Goa recommended and favoured the study of the vernaculars of the place and the need to govern the conquered lands and to carry on commercial intercourse later created a demand for the knowledge of Konkani. Thomas Stephen's Konkani book is the Doutrina Christam em Lingua Bramana Canarim (Christian Doctrine in Brahman Canarim Language), written in the form of a dialogue to teach children. A grammar of the Konkani language was also published by Stephen under the little Arte de Lingua Canary (1640). During this period we have had many other grammars of Konkani and dictionaries as well as. During the 17th and the 18th centuries, Antonio Saldanha published, among other books, a treatise on the miracles of St. Antony from Rachol (1655). The book consists of two parts, the first part being written in Konkani prose and the second part in Marathi verse. Further, the great Miguel de Almedia's (1610-1683) monumental work, Onvalleanicho Mallo, in five tones gave to Konkani one of the first sophisticated prose works in the modern Indo-Aryan languages. Divine soliloquies were translated into Konkani by Joao de Pendrosa and printed in the College of St. Paul in 1660. Side by side with the Portuguese missionaries we find some native Goan (Konkani speaking) priests, who started writing in their mother tongue using the Roman script like Manuel Jaques de Noronha at Sancoale (Goa), who wrote, besides other books, a poem about the Passion of Christ in Konkani.

In the first period it was mainly the foreign missionaries who gave us books in Konkani. In the second period the sons of the soil tried hard to develop Konkani literature. Among the first pillars of this movement, we have the renowned Orientalist, Sebastiao Dalgado, who gave a solid scientific base to Konkani by publishing two great dictionaries, Konkani-Portuguese in 1893 and Portuguese-Konkani in 1905.

Shenoy Goembab of the 20th century wrote brilliantly in many forms of literature from drama, short story and biography to philosophical writings and research works, grammar and children's literature.

In Kerala, many scholars among the Konkanis and by their literary output such as drama, poetry and other works, nourished and enriched the Konkani language. Amulaka Sheno, Narayana Narasimha Pai, R.C. Sharma, N. Anantha Sharma Sastri, and others have done commendable work for the development of the Konkani language. The north and south Canara districts of Karnataka also produced eminent writers in Konkani. Chandrasa nataka, Prahladacharitra nataka (1912) by Bolanthur Krishna Prabhu and Savitri nataka (1922) by Kumble Narasimha Naik (South Canara) are some of the serious works on Konkani drama written by the authors from the South Canara. In profane literature mention may be made of the Konkani dirvem (or Konkani wealth) printed by the Codialbail Press, South Canara, Mangalore. P. Narayana Prabhu of the Prabhakara Press also brought out Konkani works of merit. Especially in the domain of the drama, poetry and literary journalism, much is being written in these regions which is responsible for the development of the language. The beginnings of Konkani drama can be traced back to 1890. Among the younger generation of today, writers of fiction, prose and short story are coming up, who keep pace in developing the language introducing new terms in the process.

There are many organisations that came into being in different States for the development of Konkani. The All India Konkani Sahitya Parishad came into being as a result of the first session held at Karwar in 1939. Other organisations namely Konkani Bhasha Mandals of Bombay, Mangalore and Goa and, Konkani Bhasha Prachar Sabha of Cochin work for the development of Konkani literature, art and culture.

Konkani enjoys a due place in the broadcasting stations of the A.I.R., in Bombay, Panaji, Delhi, Dharwar, Mangalore, Calicut, Trichur, Trivandrum and Alleppey. Many periodicals, weeklies and magazines are now brought out in Konkani language.

In Goa, the Government has accepted Konkani as one of the languages for education, administration, law and justice. In Kerala, Konkani enjoys the status of a recognised language and is taught in the primary schools in Cochin as a language for study. Konkani has now been recognised as an independent literary language of India for awards by the Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi.

LANGUAGE (Maithili). Because of its antiquity and rich literary tradition the Maithili language has drawn the attention of the scholars for over two centuries. It has been variously known as 'Awahattha', 'Mithila Apabhramsha', 'Touruntiana', 'Mithelee', 'Mythil' and the present name, 'Maithili', popularised by G.A. Grierson.

Maithili belongs to the Indo-Aryan branch of the Indo-European family of languages and has been in existence with distinct characteristics for about a thousand years. The mother-dialect of Maithili, as also of Magahi, Bengali, Assamese and Oriya is known as Magadhi, which was a part of the 'Prachya' group of dialects mentioned in the Brahmanas.

Maithili, in one form or the other, is spoken in the districts of Darbhanga, Madhubani, Samastipur, Muzaffarpur, Vaisali, Katihar, Saharsa, Sitamarhi, Purnea, Khagaria and also in some parts of Munger, Bhagalpur and Santal Praganas. In Nepal, the tarai area including Rautahat Saralahi Saptari, Mohattari and Morang constitute the Maithili speaking region (16000 square k.m.) the In Bihar (total area 173,877 square k.m.) Maithili speaking area covers about 50000 square k.m.

Maithili is surrounded by Nepali on the North, Oriya, Sanjati and Munda on the South: Bhojpuri on the West; and Bengali on the East.

There is wide disagreement among scholars regarding the total number of people speaking Maithili. According to The Linguistic Survey of India, it was 10,263,357 in 1911 which included 23,000 Tharus of Northern Purnea and 610,624 of Nepal. Subhadra Jha gives this figure to be 13,374,147 in 1931. Umesha Mishra calculates it to be 20,000,000 which includes 500,000 Pravasi Maithils and also 6,504,817 Magahi speakers. But this is wrong. Govinda Jha puts the number in the neighbourhood of 27,998,706. In his History of Maithili literature, Jayakant Mishra gives this number as 25,000,000 which erroneously includes 8,000,000 Magahi speakers. In the 1981 Census, figures for Maithili, Magahi or Bhojapuri are absent. All have been clubbed with Hindi. Yet by the process of permutation and commutation of the population figures of the Maithili speaking areas a fairly dependable estimate is possible.

When the Maithili speaking population of Assam (66,575), West Bengal (196,782), Santal Praganas (95,937), and Nepal (5,000,000) are added to the above figure, the total number will be 29,412,400. Again if 50,000 Pravasi Maithils are also incorporated the aggregate will come to 29,912,400 or about 3 crores.

To have an idea of the chronological account of the origin and development of Maithili one has to look back to the Prachya group of languages. Maithili, one of the direct descendents of Magadhi Apabhramsha, has originated from some early form of Indo-Aryan (IA) current in the Eastern part of Northern India, named Magadhi, which formed the Prachya or Eastern group of dialects in the late

OIA (1500 BC-500/600 BC) and early MIA (600 BC-200 BC) periods. Some of the phonetic characteristics of Magadhi i.e., -ṣ for -s-, -s-, -s- and -l- for -r- are still preserved in its modern descendants. This process continued till its break up into Bhojpuri, Magahi, Maithili, Bengali, Assamese and Oriya. Use of -ka-, -kera with the genitive, of -ill-, -ell-, or -all- with the passive participles, of the verbal noun in -ebba- or abba for the future, of an active construction for the past tense and certain other morphological features and syntactical tendencies brought it to a stage of development (late MIA 600 A.D.-1000 A.D.) which is described as Magadhi Apabhramsha. This process of transformation of the Prachya dialects from Prakrit to Apabhramsha stage, which started in the early MIA period, was almost complete by the beginning of the NIA (1000 A.D.). During this period the representatives of the Magadhi Apabhramsha had some common traits. This is corroborated by Hiuen Tsang (middle of the 7th century A.D.) who found one language spoken from Bihar to Assam.

It was during the later part of the third MIA (600-1000) and early NIA (1000 onward) that individual traits developed distinctly making differentiations among the modern descendants of Magadhi Apabhramsha appreciable. This was a period of Proto-Maithili. By 1300 Maithili reached a stage of full development as is evinced by the Varna-ratnakara of Jyotirishwara Thakur. A cursory view of the classifications and groupings of these languages will be useful in understanding the respective differences and affinities among them.

Prior to Grierson, Bihari dialects were classed with Bengali, Eastern Hindi and Chhattisgarhi. This mistake was rectified when Grierson declared that Bihari belonged to the Eastern group of languages and classed it with Bengali, Assamese and Oriya. But he himself was wrong in terming Maithili, Magahi and Bhojpuri as 'Bihari' and his putting of Maithili with Bhojpuri is untenable on philological and cultural grounds. S.K. Chatterjee has classified the modern Magadhan speeches into three groups:

Eastern	: Bengali, Assamese, Oriya
Central	: Maithili, Magahi
Western	: Bhojpuri with Nagpuria

Umesha Mishra suggests an improvement upon Chatterjee's by dividing them in the following manner:

North-Eastern	: Assamese
South-Eastern	: Oriya
Central	: Maithili, Bengali
Western	: Bhojpuri, Magahi.

There is no basic difference between Chatterjee and Mishra. Now it is clear that owing to its central place combined with historical and cultural factors Maithili played an important role in the growth of the Magadhan dialects belonging to eastern and central groups. Chatter-jee observes that geographical situation, linguistic evidence, tradition, history—all go to prove that the Aryan languages came to Bengal as an overflow from Bihar—to North Bengal probably from Mithila and to Central and West Bengal from Anga. Linguistically and culturally Anga has been a part of Mithila. And in its turn Bengali influenced Assamese and Oriya to a great extent.

Among the Magadhan languages Maithili has been singularly fortunate, for its speakers, renowned for ancient learning and culture, not only did not dispise their mother tongue, but had evinced great love and pride for it. Even in their Sanskrit writings Maithilis have used vernacular terms. Vachaspati Mishra (9th cent.) used the word 'hari' (=log of wood with hole) in his famous Bhamati. In Sarvananda's (11th cent.) commentary on Amarakosha about 400 Maithili words have been identified. The Prakrita-paingalam, a work on Prakrit prosody, (900-1400) has many pieces in Maithili verb forms like 'bahai' (flows) and 'jalai' (burns), adverb of place 'jaha' (=there), adverb of time 'jakhan' (then), second person pronoun 'tua' (thou), the use of numerals like 'chaudaha' (fourteen), 'chaurasi' (eighty-four) etc. are the specimens of the Maithili of that period. R.K. Choudhary has given a long list of colloquial Maithili words used in this work and Rajeshwar Jha considers it to be, without doubt, a Maithili work.

The Bauddha gana o doha composed in the late MIA and early NIA periods is a valuable material for the study of Maithili's formative stage. Scholars like Rahula Sankrityayana, Kashiprasada Jayaswala, Subhadra Jha and others have emphatically declared these 'ganas' to be the specimens of old Maithili. Noted Assamese scholar K.L. Barua, opines that 'the Buddhist dohas' should be a mixed Maithili Kamarupi language. Preparation of the manuscript in the Maithili speaking region of Nepal, local colours and the characteristics of the language support the above contention. Dominant position of the dental sibilants, the use of 'en' as instrumental suffix, of 'n' (chandrāhindu) as postposition, of—'apen' as possessive pronoun, of 'e' and 'hi' as locative, of 'jahi' and 'tahi' as adverbs of place, etc. are the few noticeable features. To sum up the Bauddha gana o doha is basically in old Maithili with local variations.

The Varna ratnakara of Jyotirishwara Thakur is the earliest prose-work in the modern Aryan languages of Northern India. Discovered by Haraprasad Shastri and edited by S.K. Chatterjee and Babuaji Mishra, this veritable encyclopaedia, intended to guide the biginners in penmanship, belongs to the early 14th century. The language is archaic: specially noticeable is the simplicity of verbal system and absence of pronominal infixes and affixes. The use of cerebral s for palatal s, of palatal s for dental s, of 'takar, in third person genitive and 'lagi' in dative are the characteristics still present in modern Maithili. Existence of a masterpiece like Varna ratnakara proves that by this time Maithili had attained the maturity to be the medium of aesthetic expression of a highly cultured people.

The advent of Vidyapati (1360-1448) gave a new fillip to Maithili. Having outflowed to Bengal, Assam and Orissa his lyrics led to the development of a 'curious poetic jargon' called 'Brajabuli' which became the medium of the Vaishnava literature for about four centuries. Brajabuli poetry is the standing example of the extent to which an entirely artificial dialect (Maithili-Bengali mixed) can be utilised for poetic exercise. In its home and neighbouring Nepal and Assam, Maithili was enriched through lyrical and dramatic writings by the local writers.

No language is impervious to foreign influence much less a living language like Maithili which has thousands of loan words. Dravidian words like 'puja' (worship), 'pushpa' (flower), 'kambal' (blanket), 'kalpana' (imagination), etc. came through Sanskrit and Santhal words 'edi' (heel), 'mangi' (woman), 'barahi' (rope), 'ghet' (neck) from direct contact. Turki loan-words 'tabla' (musical instrument), 'kenchi' (scissors), 'kurta' (upper garment) and Arabic-Persian vocables 'anchal' (garment), 'asharfi' (gold coin), 'amir' (rich), 'asal' (genuine), 'ponthi' (book), 'kim' (less) 'nik' (good), 'khub' (much) and hundreds of such words came both directly and indirectly. Some Portuguese words like 'kata' (sword), 'jangla' (window), 'saya' (lady's undergarment), 'tanla' (earthen-pot), 'ancher' (pickles) have become naturalised in Maithili. Three Greek words have also been identified: 'dam' (price), 'damdi', (small coin) and 'sebai' (eatable). Words from Indian languages and English are numerous. In its structure, early Maithili was influenced by Sanskrit. Like Sanskrit, Maithili did not follow, fixed rule in the placement of subject, object and verb in a sentence. Sentence could begin with a verb or an object. But due to the influence of English, subject-object-verb sequence became fixed. Standardisation of spelling, use of punctuation marks and division of passages in paragraphs are also the result of English influence.

Till recently Maithili's status was a matter of controversy. It started with Erskine Perry who described it as a dialect of Bengali. Later on Hindi enthusiasts vainly tried to prove Maithili a sub-dialect of Hindi. But Colebrook, William Carey, Grierson, S.K. Chatterjee and other scholars after scientific analysis dispelled this notion. According to Grierson, 'Maithili is a language and not a dialect... it differs from both Hindi and Bengali both in vocabulary and in grammar, and is as much a distinct language from either of them as Marathi or Oriya.' This is clear from the survey of the following special feature of Maithili.

It is also to be noted that Maithili has a script of its own, Tirhuta, which is derived from a variety of Gupta script current in the 6th century. A large number of Buddhist and Tantrika manuscripts written in Tirhuta character are scattered in Tibet, Nepal and Mithila. At present Maithili like Marathi and Nepali has adopted Devanagari.

Spoken in widely scattered areas, Maithili has local variations. Keeping this in view Grierson suggested six sub-divisions of Maithili, viz. i) True Standard Maithili, ii) Southern Standard Maithili, iii) Eastern Maithili with Bengali contamination in Eastern Purnea, iv) Chhikachhi-Boli of Bhagalpur having fondness for 'o' sound at the end of words, lengthening of final 'i' and the use of 'chhi' as verb substantive, v) Western Maithili infected by Bhojpuri and vi) Jolaha-Boli, a corrupt form of Maithili spoken by Mohamedans. The standard form is spoken everywhere by the educated upper class.

Recognised by PEN and Sahitya Akademi, Maithili is taught upto M.A. standard in the various Universities including those of Banaras, Allahabad, Calcutta and, Kathmandu.

Because of her sweetness, polish and delicacy Maithili can be called the Italian of the East.

LANGUAGE (Malayalam). The word 'Malayalam' was originally a place-name and it was with the advent of its modern form that the place-name began to be used for the language. Till then the word in vogue throughout Kerala was Tamil which meant only 'language' though it later signified that particular language. It is hardly 200 years since the word 'Malayalam' came into popular use.

Linguists and philologists have put forward six theories regarding the origin of Malayalam. They are as follows. Malayalam is (i) an offspring of Sanskrit, (ii) an offspring of one of the early Prakrits; (iii) a hybrid of Sanskrit and Tamil, (iv) an offspring of Tamil, (v) an independent language born of a proto-Dravidian ancestor along with Tamil, Telugu and Kannada, and (vi) the elder sister of Tamil which itself sprang from the proto-Dravidian language later.

Of these, the first is a strange brain-child of one or two Sanskrit partisans and has not gained support from discerning scholars. The second is also equally fanciful and fictitious. The third has also been dismissed as something impossible because two languages can only enrich or influence each other and cannot give rise to a third one. It was the well-known European linguist Robert Caldwell who for the first time suggested that Malayalam is the offspring of Tamil. A.R. Rajaraja Varma subscribed to the above view. Hermann Gundert first took Malayalam as a sub-language ('upa-bhasha') of Tamil but later regarded the two languages as sisters belonging to the Dravidian family. But after elaborate, independent research Attoor Krishna Pisharody came to the conclusion that Malayalam, like Chem-Tamil, Kannada, etc., is an independent branch that has evolved from the original Dravida. Ulloor Parameswara Iyer, Goda Varma and K.M. George are also among the scholars who have substantiated the truth of the above conclusion by their own research and reasoning. This is the latest stand taken by scholars in regard to the origin of Malayalam as a language.

Once this theory of the origin of the language as accepted the question naturally arises is to whether Malayalam is the elder, twin or younger sister of Tamil. Attoor and Ulloor Parameswara Iyer have found that Malayalam is the elder sister. Several others including Sooranad Kunjan Pillai have also expressed the same view.

According to P. Damodaran Pillai, Malayalam separated itself to become an independent entity about 2000 years ago. He argues that proto-Dravida (Adi-Tamil) must have mixed with Sanskrit brought in by Namboodiris from the North, resulting in the most ancient form of Malayalam and this must have taken place before Chem-Tamil, the ancestor of modern Tamil, itself originated. Geographical isolation of Kerala from Tamilnadu is also said to have favoured such a development. The language thus formed remained in the spoken state for centuries mainly because of the continued dominance language and the use of Chem-Tamil in royal courts.

Modern Malayalam alphabet is made up of the sounds found in the proto-Dravidian language and those incorporated from Sanskrit. The latter category consists of aspirated plosives and the sounds represented by the symbols g,j,d,d,b,s,ś,sh, and h.

Unlike in certain other languages, there is a well-defined distinction between the flapped consonants r and ɾ as in 'kara' (shore) and 'kaɾa' (sap). The laterals are also similarly distinguished. Thus 'kala' means 'art' and 'kala' means 'weed'. The occurrence of the typical retroflex continuant ɭ, after symbolized by the digraph 'zh' is another feature of the alphabet, e.g. 'mazha' (=rain), 'pazham' (ripe fruit), etc.

The present script is believed to have derived from 'Vattezhuttu' which was widely used in royal edicts and inscriptions throughout Kerala till the end of the 18th century. The term literally means 'writing in a circular form' and the letters used were round in shape. This script depended for its development on Brahmi script which was prevalent in most parts of the country. With the addition of some letters from what is known as the 'grandha' script also, the Malayalam script got its full complement of letters, which became more or less systematised by the first half of the 13th century.

With some local differences the script consisting of 500-odd consonant-vowel combinations and double consonants continued in use down to the middle of the 20th century. Thanks to the reform introduced by the Government of Kerala in 1971 the total number of type faces has been reduced to 90. All government documents and most newspapers and books are now printed in the new script. But opinion is still divided on the desirability of the reform. The most far-reaching adverse effect is that children who are often taught only the new script will find it difficult to read books written in the old script.

In the matter of pronunciation, Malayalam is a phonetic language. Each letter, i.e., a pure consonant combined with a vowel, stands only for one sound and is a syllable by itself. The following consonants, however, are not syllabic: n,ɳ,l,l̥, and ɾ. For these there are separate symbols also. Likewise, the consonants in each pair of the aspirated plosives are pronounced almost identically. e.g., ph and bh; th and dh.

There are a number of nouns ending in semi 'u' sound, usually indicated by the symbol 'u' This is an approximate equivalent of the sound represented by the phonetic symbol 'ə'. e.g. katuku (;mustard) poovu (;flower), etc.

Morphologically, Malayalam is an agglutinative language. In most places the morphemic boundaries are clearly distinguishable. prefixes and suffixes are joined to the stem of the word. For instance, 'Peruvayaranmarute' can be split up into peru (=big), vayaru (=belly) an (masculine ending), mar (plural suffix) and ute (case marker, here genitive). The word means 'of big-bellied or gluttonous men'.

Another peculiarity is that the form of the finite verb is the same in all three tenses irrespective of the number, gender and person of the subject. It other words. verbs in Malayalam do not use pronominal terminations unlike those in the other Dravidian languages.

In Malayalam, the word order in a sentence is subject-object-verb, with the qualifiers invariably preceding the word qualified. As all nouns except those in the neuter gender are inflected. When used as the object, there will be no confusion even if the subject and the object are inter-changed and they are often interchanged for emphasis or convenience. Dependent clauses come before the main clause.

'Yes' or 'no' questions are formed by replacing the final vowel in the principal verb with a long o. Other questions are formed by inserting the interrogative word between the subject and the verb.

There are only two tag questions, 'alle?' and 'ille?' and they mean 'Isn't it so?' and 'Isn't there?' respectively.

Of all languages the one to which Malayalam is most indebted is Sanskrit. Besides the sounds mentioned above, innumerable words, mostly nouns and verbs, either as such (tatsamas) or with slight modifications (tabdhavas, have been borrowed from it. This has been going on ever since the advent of the classical language and even now whenever the need is felt for new coinages, scholars in Kerala turn to that language. Some of the Sanskrit words have actually supplanted the older Dravidian ones. Such for example are 'nakham' (finger-nail), 'mukham' (the face), etc., which are still in everyday use. The total number of words borrowed from language runs into tens of thousands, which account for 70 per cent of the modern vocabulary in Malayalam.

The other language from which Malayalam has received words are Hindustani, Arabic, Portuguese, Dutch and French. But in modern times no other language has enriched the vocabulary as English. Of the hundreds thus accepted and put into use, many words such as actor, aeroplane, book, bus, car, circus, doctor, dress, engine, estate, fool, gas, heart, institute, judge, kitchen, letter, music, number, order, photo, queue, road, side, type, union, vacation, wool, X-ray, zoo, etc. are quite familiar even to illiterate Malayalees. But Malayalam has not made use of the roots of verbs taken from any language other than Sanskrit. The attempts made by some enthusiasts to extend the process to the other languages have not proved popular so far.

The language used in newspapers and academic publications may be regarded as the standard. In certain creative works such as novels, short stories and plays one comes across an admixture of colloquialisms and localisms. Likewise there are ideas signified by synonymous words in the northern and southern parts of Kerala some of them being unintelligible except to those born and brought up where they are in ordinary parlance and some having different significations. There are also parallel proverbs in the north and the south. In addition to all this, some sections of the people like the Moplas of Malabar and the hill tribes, the Adivasis and the Harijans have dialects of their own.

Rich in non-technical vocabulary and flexible enough to express subtle shades of thought, Malayalam is comparable to any other well-developed Indian language. It is the medium of instruction upto the end of the secondary stage and of administration in certain government departments and in the law courts upto the district level. Though English continues to enjoy pride of place at the university level, Malayalam has been recognized as an alternative medium of examination in some subjects and suitable text books are now available to enable candidates to answer in the language. Ardent lovers of Malayalam are, however, looking forward to the dawn of the day when that language will begin to be used for education and administration at all levels.

LANGUAGE (Manipuri). Manipuri belongs to the Tibeto-Burman group of languages which is one of the two important branches of the Sino-Tibetan family of languages. Beginning with Brian Houghton Hodgson it is G.A. Grierson who has made extensive studies of the origin and features of the Manipuri language. He observes that Manipuri has the nearest kinship with the language that is still spoken in Kachin in respect of vocabulary. Its agreement with Burmese is with regard to the second personal pronoun and adjectival prefix, while it agrees with Tibetan rather than with Burmese in respect of the suffix pa which serves almost all the functions of the corresponding Tibetan suffix. Tapering it down further Grierson prefers to describe the group to which Manipuri belongs as Kuki-Chin or Meitei-Chin. Paul K. Benedict, a well-known researcher in Sino-Tibetan languages, says: "Meitei, the State language of Manipur, shows significant points of contact with Kachin as well as with Kuki-Naga though the affinities are prominently with the latter."

The present Manipuri language evolved out of the traditional Meitei language, the speech of the politically dominant group in ancient Manipur. Legends, songs and manuscripts found in this language evidently suggest a long and sustained existence from very ancient times. For example, Ougri, a ritual song traditionally believed to have been associated with the creation of the earth itself and till today an inseparable part of the Lai Harouba festival is referred to in the manuscript Laisra Pham as having been sung at the coronation of Nongda Lairen Pakhangba. This coronation, according to the chronicle Cheitharol kumbaba, took place as early as 33 A.D. Legends speak of many kings reigning before him, of whom the names of Kangba and Moriya Phambalcha constantly occur in the manuscripts.

On the basis of the available documents and texts it will be probably justified to divide the history of the Manipuri language broadly into three stages: (1) Early (2) Middle (3) Modern. The Early Period shows no contact with any other language and covers a period almost upto the end of the seventeenth century. The Middle Period marks its association with Indo-Aryan languages particularly Sanskrit and Bengali and extends upto the close of the nineteenth century. The Modern Period begins with the spread of English education at the turn of the twentieth century. There has since been a liberal influence of English words. And these were followed by a number of Hindi and Urdu vocables brought in by the British.

Both legends and history speak of seven clan dynasties and some other groups of people living in the valley which was divided into small principalities. In different stages of history they were later merged into the Meitei fold ruled by the powerful Ningthouja clan. Though the Meitei or Manipuri language was the lingua franca in the early times, the dialects of other clan peoples greatly contributed to the richness of this language. There were constant borrowings of new words which were used as synonyms with proper Manipuri for the sake of embellishment. For example, as some manuscripts show, the people of the Khuman clan use phuraba in place of siraba (dead) in Meitei; the Moirangs in plaintive notes call kangphal (dry land) kong and easing (water) loklaw; the Luwangs use tingbi (bridge) as thong and mungbi (highway) for lambi and so on. The distinctive features of old Manipuri as found in the works of the Early Period are marked by: (a) the use of periphrasis and long sentences; (b) combination of the instrumental noun and the functional verb; (c) difference in the form of adverbs; (d) difference in the form of nominative absolute; (e) shortened form of post-position; (f) shortened expression of nominative absolute; (g) an adjective following a noun qualified by it (h) a noun followed by a pronoun for the sake of emphasis (i) an imperative verb ending with -o or -yo instead of -u or -yu of Modern Manipuri; and (j) the use of hard consonants like k, t, p in the middle or at the end of a word in place of g, d, b commonly used in Modern Manipuri. Apart from periphrasis one comes across in Old Manipuri the extensive use of synonyms, occasional interrogative address to the readers as if to take them into confidence and avoidance of conjunctions particularly the equivalent of and.

This homogeneity was maintained till the close of the seventeenth century when the valley was not so much exposed to migration from the neighbouring states of India and to the overwhelming influence of Hinduism. Thus the Middle Period of the Manipuri language may be said to commence with the conversion of the people to the new religion and the consequent production of literary works mostly adapted from the great epics and works of religious nature. The change is not much felt in the structure of sentences or formation of words as the liberal borrowing of Sanskrit or Bengali words to be placed side by side with those of Manipuri for the sake of embellishment. For example: satya wachum, gara matik, bir panganba, shyam sangbannaba, sabda khonjen, purna mapung, ahar chinjak, swami inongthou and so forth. These borrowings were, however, confined to vocables of abstract nouns and some adjectives only. Of course, with the passage of time archaic words were dispensed with and circumlocution was not so often resorted to. This is seen even in secular works of romance, heroism and history. But there was no marked change in other aspects of the language except in prose which was greatly improved in the later part of the eighteenth century when it was employed in the writing of the chronicle, Cheitharol kumbaba, and a work of aphorisms, Langlon. However, it has to be pointed out that as the people of the valley were increasingly attracted towards Gaudiya Vaishnavism i.e., the worship of Radha and Krishna after the phase of Ramanandi, the Rama cult, performing arts by degrees attained prominence over literary pursuits and by the latter half of the nineteenth century the course of old Manipuri literature had almost dried up. On the other hand an exalted court free from foreign interference since the alliance with the British in 1823 and a cultured nobility caused to develop a refined form of speech. The following examples may illustrate the point. Chatpa 'to go' for ordinary use is lengba for the highly placed, so phida 'a seat' is khuda, chaba 'to eat' is haba, setpa 'to wear' is thonba, tumba 'to sleep' is cheppa and so on. Added to this was the accepted notion of showing off one's good upbringing or cultural distinction by interlarding tadbhava and tatsama words in social communication. Jal is preferred to the indigenous word eeshing (water), shan to eerujaba (bath), mandir to laishang, seva to thaugal, etc.

These two aspects of the language were a legacy to Modern Manipuri though it has not inherited much from the old literature in respect of the manner of composition and archaic diction. G.A. Grierson himself makes a curious observation on the swift transformation from the old language into the modern. As a result of the defeat in the Anglo-Manipuri War in 1891, Manipur came under the domination of the British; along with that English education was introduced with the establishment of lower and upper primary schools and subsequently a high school. (In fact, some of the schools were there already before 1891). Side by side Bengali language and literature too was taught in the schools. It was the vernacular paper upto the Matriculation level till 1920. So Modern Manipuri, at the turn of the century was most influenced by both English and Bengali. The grammar of Modern Manipuri is more or less cast in the mould of the English grammar as in the case of many other Indian languages and the rules of its punctuation have been entirely adopted. Conjunctions as in other developed languages have been conveniently used. The hard syllabic letters have given place to the soft ones. A standard principle of spelling in conformity with the tonal character of the language (the main characteristics of all Tibeto-Burman languages) has been adopted. There is a strong wind blowing for the revival of the original Manipuri script which was replaced by that of Bengali since the close of the 19th century. The enormous publication of Manipuri books, introduction of Manipuri as elective and honours courses into the colleges, opening of M.A. classes in the Manipur University and broadcasting of Manipuri programmes from the AIR for more than three decades have indeed helped modern Manipuri to a luxuriant growth.

LANGUAGE (Marathi). The Marathi-speaking people have occupied a geographically contiguous area known as Maharashtra at least since the 11th century, if not since the 8th. The Marathi inscriptions date from 983 A.D. (at the feet of the Jain colossus at Shravana Belagola in Karnataka). The earliest written work was once thought to be Mukundaraja's philosophical treatise Vivekasindhu (dated 1188, now re-assigned to the 13th century on the basis of external and linguistic evidence); now the honour is deemed to go to the Marathi auto-commentary on Shripati's astrological treatise Jyotisaratnamala (1039). According to the 1971 census, Marathi constitutes the fourth largest group (42 million) after Hindi, Telugu and Bengali. Besides, 2.7 million people have returned it as an additional language.

According to the traditionally received account, Marathi represents a further stage of Maharashtra Apabhramsha and goes back through Maharashtra Prakrit to Sanskrit. In terms of linguistic geography, Marathi was assigned, along with Sinhalese spoken in Sri Lanka, to the southern branch of the outer group of New Indo-Aryan languages. This picture now stands considerably modified, if not rejected, on the following grounds. (1) The variation within Prakrit and Apabhramsha has been exaggerated: far from representing the actual spoken dialects they probably were their formalized and even ossified versions that flourished long after their time. Marathi coexisted with Maharashtra Apabhramsha and did not succeed it. (2) The name 'Maharashtri' has no geographical significance; Marathi does not seem to be especially closer to the Maharashtra Prakrit than to the others. (3) Sinhalese is a farther stage of Pali and West-Central Asokan Prakrit taken by the migrants from the North to Sri Lanka. Its three-gender system is 'natural' like the Dravidian gender systems and has no affinity to the 'artificial' three-gender system of Marathi. (4) The inner-outer division seems to have some substance, though its supposed origin from two waves of migration is not wholly clear. (5) A hypothesis has been put forward that Marathi, unlike other New Indo-Aryan languages, does not stand at the end of a continuous linguistic inheritance. It has too many Dravidian-like phonetic and syntactic features that become more pronounced as we go down the social ladder and go farther back in time. It probably represents a contact speech form that later displaced some Dravidian language as a mother tongue and became respectable. The speakers of some Dravidian language must have become bilingual by acquiring some Middle Indo-Aryan speech-form, which they spoke with a Dravidian slant. More work is necessary before the picture becomes clear.

The precise historical relationship between Marathi, with its various geographical dialects, and the Ahirani dialect spoken in north-west Maharashtra by some castes, the Halbi dialects spoken in north-east Maharashtra and beyond by some castes, and the Konkani dialects spoken in south-west Maharashtra and beyond (in Goa and coastal Karnataka) has been the subject of scholarly and popular controversy. It may be noted that while the name Konkani applies to the whole of coastal Maharashtra, the dialects of northern and central Konkani are undoubtedly varieties of Marathi. The cultural relationship seems to be clearer. The speakers of all three dialects have accepted literary Marathi as their culture language in the past with two exceptions. Halbi speakers in Madhya Pradesh have accepted Hindi insofar as they have any cultural aspirations; and Christians and Sarasvat brahmins in Goa and further south either are Kannada-oriented or now want some form of Konkani to replace Portuguese as the culture language. Recent work enables us to offer a tentative picture on the following lines. Further work is necessary for making it less tentative and more detailed. Ahirani, Katkari, Konkani and Varhadi (of Vidarbha) appear to have successively broken off from this south-western branch of New Indo-Aryan between the 5th and the 10th centuries; the place of Halbi is still unclear; how far back the name Marathi (or its older form Marahathi) was applied is an issue that has to do more with culture-history than with language-history proper.

A process of standardization in the modern sense of that term did not set in till the early 19th century with large-scale printing and school education, and the emergence of Bombay and Pune as the centres of enlightenment in western India.

There are many non-Marathi-speaking groups in Maharashtra. Some immigrant groups, however, like ex-Tamil Dravida brahmins, the ex-Telugu Padmasalis, the ex-Kannada Digambar Jains and the Bene Israelis now speak Marathi at home.

Marathi speakers who have moved to Haryana, Himachal Pradesh, Garhwal and Mauritius have forgotten their Marathi. Marathi speakers who have moved to the Maratha principalities in Vododara, Indore, Gwalior, Tanjavur, or who work as tailors in Andhra Pradesh and Karnataka, or who have moved to the coastal Karnataka, to Kerala, and lately to East Africa, Great Britain, the United States have retained their Marathi so far to some extent and in different forms.

From the point of view of the political and literary history of Maharashtra rather than of the internal changes in the language, it is customary to recognize the following periods: 700-1000: Early Old. No written literature is available; there are only the stray inscriptions and mentions of the language.

1000-1350: Late Old. Close of the pre-Muslim 'Medieval Age'. Written literature is inspired by the Nath, Mahanubhava, Vaishnava (Varkari Bhagavata) sects a nativistic revolt against domination of Sanskrit Marathi was the State language of the Yadava Dynasty (1187-1318) and the sacred language of the Mahanubhavas. This is clear from the scholarly prose treatises and Mahanubhava prose and inscriptions.

1350-1500: Early Middle: This is regarded as rather a dark period for literature under the first Muslim onslaught.

1500-1700: Classic Middle: This period indicates the waning of the Bahamani rulers and their inheritors, the Nizamshahi and the Adilshahi rulers and the rise of the

LANGUAGE-NEPALI

Maratha power. Written literature was inspired by the Vaishnava and Datta sects, the Brahmanical revival and the Maratha political revival, the rise of the bakhar prose modelled after Persian chronicles and Shivaji's attempts to de-Persianize administrative language (1676). Documents in Marathi (which was a subsidiary administrative language under the Muslim rulers for whom Persian was the State language) abound. 1700-1820: Late Middle. The period is marked by the emergence of the Peshwa rule, written literature of a devotional and scholarly kind, spoken literature of the military camp and the folk theatre, Marathi flourishing as a State language (not wholly de-Persianized) and the bakhar prose.

1820-1874: Early Modern. This period is regarded as a dark period under the first impact of the British rule, and is known for Anglicized and/or Sanskritized prose. The pandit took to writing Marathi prose and verse, body of school books, didactic 'improving' books, translations from English. Rise of newspapers. Written prose inspired by the Indian enlightenment. Grammars and dictionaries.

1874: Late Modern. This was a period of the enlightenment and its reactions are: nativist attempts to de-Anglicize and later de-Sanskritize Marathi, rise of the audiovisual mass media and the theatre, proliferation of magazines, popular fiction, school and college texts, the use of Marathi as a medium of secondary education, and of higher education, the rise of the literary self consciousness, lately, the rise of other cultural centres besides Bombay and Pune and the adoption of Marathi as a State language in theory in 1965.

An allusion has already been made to the inherited (native), the Sanskrit and the Perso-Arabic layers. English loan words are still incompletely assimilated, and the so-called 'deshya' (unidentified) and Dravidian elements are not consciously distinguished from the native. Some translation loans exist, motivated by the nativistic impulses; but direct loans abound.

There is a tendency from the 19th century to approximate the original sound. Thus, 'prayatn' replaces the earlier 'pretn' for Sanskrit 'prayatna' (effort); 'gaes' for the earlier 'gyas' for English 'gas'. Currently, many proverbs and idioms redolent of traditional ways or smacking of segregationist ways are slipping out of urban or elite use. An interesting case in point are the three pronouns for you—tu, tumhi, apan (in an ascending order of social superiority or social distance). Address indicative of social inequality (asymmetrical tu-tumhi or tumhi-apan) is being made more egalitarian (mutual tu or mutual tumhi). Address indicative of social distance (mutual tumhi between college classmates of the opposite sex or mutual apan between strangers who are being polite) is being made more free and easy (mutual tu and mutual tumhi). Ceremonious or dignified diction is often conveyed by the use of loan words ('patni' or 'mises' for 'bayko').

Marathi speakers today find the language not particularly mellifluous, polished, or tender. In the first flush of nativism in the late Old Marathi period, however, they claimed for it all these qualities. Retroflex consonants (t,d,n,l), aspirates, and the vowels a,u,o connote crudity, unwieldiness or the like; palatals (ch, j, sh, the vowels i, e) connote the opposite. Compared to the British English, Marathi tends to overstress sentiment; compared to other modern Indian languages, it tends to understress it. Gestures, whether vocal (baby talk, mimicry, sing song, or the like) or bodily (face or hand), are more restrained in males, adults, elites; more demonstrative in females, children, non-elites.

In diction and syntax the history of Marathi verse and prose shows two opposed trends: the tendency to floweriness, longwindedness, overstatement and the tendency to sparseness, shortwindedness, understatement, crispness. To some extent this was functional—the norm has been Sanskrit loans and Sanskritized diction for serious work and plain language drawing upon native words for the ordinary people (prakritajana). The distinction in some sense persists even today except that some area may be reclassified. Statecraft once called for Sanskritized languages, now there is a plea to bring it close to the prakritajana.

LANGUAGE (Nepali). Nepali belongs to the Indo-Aryan family of languages and is spoken by the Nepalīs of Sikkim, of the southern part of Bhutan, of parts of the northern districts of West Bengal, of the north-eastern States, of Uttar Pradesh, of Himachal Pradesh, of Punjab and also of many major towns and cities of the country. Sunitikumar Chatterjee accepted it as one of the major languages of India.

The oldest Nepali inscription that has been discovered so far is on a stone pillar at Dullu in mid-western Nepal and is dated 903 of the Saka era which is 981 A.D. This alone affords ground to believe that the origin of the Nepali language was contemporaneous with that of the other modern Indo-Aryan languages. As regards the geographical region of its origin Kumar Pradhan writes in his History of Nepali Literature, 'The birth and growth of Nepali took place in Bharatvarsha or the Indian subcontinent long, long before the emergence of the political India and the political Nepal of today.'

Further R.L. Turner in the Introduction to his book A Comparative and Etymological Dictionary of the Nepali Language writes, 'The proof that Nepali is descended from Sanskrit rests upon the fact that many details of its grammatical structure find their explanation only in the corresponding forms of the earlier language, and that much of its vocabulary, allowing for a regular correspondence of sounds between the two languages, is identical with that of Sanskrit'. Whereas the derivation of Nepali from Sanskrit cannot be in dispute, its exact position within the Indo-Aryan family is open to discussion. To which of the modern Indo-Aryan languages is Nepali most closely akin? Indisputably its nearest relative is its western neighbour, Kumaoni. And, in fact, all the Indo-Aryan languages along the southern face of the Himalayas have certain features in common. This is intelligible if these languages were carried into their present habitats by the migration of the Khas (Sanskrit Khasa) from their earlier home in the North-West.

But again there is no unanimity as to whether the Khas spoke the Khas Prakrit or the Shauraseni Prakrit, that is, whether Nepali originated from the Khas Prakrit as hypothetically assumed by Sunitikumar Chatterjee and a few others or from the Shauraseni Prakrit as Surya Bikram Gewali and an increasing number of Nepali scholars have come to believe. In the later case the Khasas alone might not have been the sole begetters and carriers of this language.

But in spite of the absence of unanimity it may be accepted that before the language came to be called Nepali it had been known during the various stages of its development as Khas-kura, Parbata, Parbattiya, Gorkhali or simply as Bhasha. The Indo-Aryan Khasa speech, however, came into contact with the other speeches of the same family when, as a result of the Muslim conquest of the northern and western India, many Brahmins and Rajputs sought shelter in western Nepal. The Tibeto-Burman Mongoloids such as the Magars and the Gurangs also with their speech contributed to the growth of the language. In course of time, along with the political ascendancy of the Gurkhas, various speech forms and dialects developed into standard Nepali. As with other Indian languages, Nepali has also borrowed words from various sources, not only from Maithili, Rajasthani, Bhojpuri, Awadhi, Hindi and Bengali, but also from the Tibeto-Burman and the Austric languages as well as from foreign languages like Persian, Arabic, Turkish, Portuguese and English.

M.D.R.

LANGUAGE (Oriya). The Oriya language, as its sister languages like Bengali and Assamese, belongs to the eastern group of the Indo-Aryan branch of the Indo-European language family. It is spoken in a part of the east coast of India and has to its north Bengali and to its south Telugu, which belongs to the Dravidian family of languages. Towards the west, the Oriya language stretches far inland where in the highlands it changes gradually into Chhattisgarhi, a dialect of the eastern Hindi and into Halbi (through Bhatri in the Bastar state), a dialect of Marathi. In the north it is also partly contiguous to the Nagpuria-speaking areas of Bihar. In short, it is spoken principally in the state Orissa and in some areas of the neighbouring states, viz., the Singhbhum district of Bihar, parts of the Midnapur district of West Bengal and the Srikakulam district of Andhra Pradesh.

The earliest records of the Oriya language are a few inscriptions dating back from 1051 A.D. Earlier Sanskrit inscriptions contain a few Oriya words here and there. One of these early Oriya records is the bilingual stone inscription of King Narasimhadeva discovered in Bhubaneswar. It is written in Tamil and Oriya and is generally assigned to 1346 A.D. Five Oriya inscriptions in Telugu script are carved in a temple at Simhachalam in the district of Visakapatanam in Andhra Pradesh. Two sets of copper-plate inscriptions of 1384 A.D. and 1395 A.D. of King Narasimhadeva IV of Orissa contain long prose passages in Oriya which, apart from a few archaisms, appear strikingly modern in phonology, morphology and syntax. From this it appears that the Oriya language had originated centuries before. The Oriya lithic records of the 14th, 15th, and 16th centuries are scattered not only in the various districts of Orissa but also in a few places of Andhra Pradesh, viz., Srikakulam, Visakapatanam, Kurnool, Warangal and Nellore.

In literature its rudiments can be traced in the Charyacharya-binishchaya ascribed to the 9th century A.D.

In the Indo-European sub-family this language is unique in a number of ways. First, it is relatively more conservative in character. This conservatism is possibly due to the topographical features of Orissa, the comparative inaccessibility of its forest-clad mountainous highlands. Another reason could be the relatively more political freedom it enjoyed through the ages. Secondly, as Grierson points out, this language has an advantage in that it is pronounced exactly as it is spelt. Thirdly, like in Telugu, every word in it ends in a vowel. Fourthly, it still uses the old verbal endings -nti or -anti and -ntu so that 'hasanti' (they laugh) and hasantu' (let them laugh) are the same in modern Oriya as in the language of the Vedas. Thus it has the unique distinction of retaining a salient feature of the primitive Indo-European. The Indo-European ending -ont and -nt of the present participle still survive in Oriya in the form of -nta.

The Oriya vocabulary consists of five categories of words. They are: tatsama, tatbhava, deshi, Perso-Arabic and foreign. The first two are traceable to Sanskrit and the older language of the Vedas. The fourth category consists of loan words from Arabic and Persian and the fifth chiefly from English, Portuguese and French. The third group includes the rest of the vocabulary. The tatbhava words are pivotal to the language. Some of them are traceable to forms in the Vedas. The deshi words are traceable to the Munda family of languages.

It is generally held that Oriya has evolved from Magadhi Prakrit through Magadhi Apabhramsha and through Prakrit it is traceable to the language of the Vedas.

While the declension in Prakrit is synthetic, the same in Oriya is generally analytic and post-positional. The same post-positions are used both in singular and plural forms to denote different case-relations and are added to the stems directly. There are no oblique forms. Colloquial Oriya has lost the grammatical gender. Early Oriya inflection has not been entirely free from the Prakrit influence. The ending -e in the nominative plural, and the ending -em in the instrumental singular are survivals of the Prakrit inflection. Similarly the ending -u or -hu of the ablative case, e.g., 'ehau ana' 'other than this' 'different from this' is a Prakrit survival. The pronominal ending -tahu and -tahim used in the locative singular are traceable to Sanskrit tasmin-tatah. The solitary and interesting -su of the fifth case is still used. For instance, 'belasu', literally 'from time', is traceable to Prakrit original.

The post-positions of modern Oriya are corruptions of words of the Old Indo-Aryan stage, e.g., kike (dialectal) kai-kahi. -ku of the dative or sometimes of the accusative case is traceable to -kakshe; -pai (dative) 'for' is traceable to Sanskrit -atmane; -re (genitive sign) is traceable through Prakrit kera or kerake to Sanskrit krita. The early Oriya plural sign -nta, also found in early Assamese, is traceable to Sanskrit santah, plural of sat. In early Oriya inscriptions -sa is used as a sign of genitive singular. This may be regarded as Prakritism. On the other hand, many examples of Sanskritism can be found in early Oriya literature especially in the Bhagavata of Jagannatha Dasa.

The pronouns in Oriya are traceable through Prakrit to Sanskrit origin. They are declined normally by means of suffixing post-positions or post-positional words as in the case of the declension of nouns.

The inflexional base of the pronouns is formed by the simple genitive singular form e.g., toha your, moha mine, taha his, jaha of whom etc. The shortened forms of all these, -to, -mo, -ta, -ja are also used alternatively.

In Oriya there are seventeen tenses and moods. Of these the two called radicals survive from the Sanskrit present indicative lat and imperative lot through the Middle Indo-Aryan with the necessary phonetic decay. The simple past, the simple future and the simple conditional in Oriya, e.g., 'se harita', 'se hariba', 'se haranta' may be called participial tenses in Oriya inasmuch as they use as their base the past participle, the future participle and the present participle of the Old Indo-Aryan passing through the Middle Indo-Aryan. The old Oriya infinitive ending -te (now confined to northern Orissa) or -ta is traceable through the Ardha Magadhi ending -ttāe or -ittae to the Vedic dative infinitive sign -tave. The usual Oriya infinitive ending -ibaku is really the dative sign -ku added to the verbal noun ending in -iba.

The Sanskrit passive sign -ya is the basis of Prakrit -a, -jja, -ia, or -ijja. The usual passive in Oriya is called compound passive, e.g., 'diajae' and 'karajae'. These are traceable to the Maharashtri forms like 'dijjai' whereas the simple passive ending in -i used in Old Oriya is traceable to forms like -ia.

The usual Oriya absolutive ending -i is traceable through Prakrit -ia to Sanskrit -ya whereas the rare absolutive ending -ina (now confined to poetry) may be traceable through the Prakritic -una to the Vedic form -tvinam.

It may thus be seen that Oriya as a language is an important member of the Indo-Aryan group of languages growing parallel to other modern Indian languages and has finally acquired a distinct character of its own. Even the modern Oriya, enriched by generous borrowings, has retained its basic character.

LANGUAGE (Prakrit). Prakrit was the spoken language of the Indian people after the Vedic period. According to Indian grammarians it was not the name of any particular language. Prakrit in the widest sense of the term was indicative of any language that in any manner deviated from the standard one, i.e. Sanskrit. Consequently it was the common name for all the Indian popular dialects in ancient India and only remotely it signified the particular forms of the Prakrit dialects that were remodelled from the popular dialects to the status of literary languages. The etymological meaning of the word 'prakrita' is 'natural'. Actually the spoken language was used as the primary dialect in early Vedic period in the form of Prakrit. Some scholars are of the view that the dialects are not deviations from classical and accepted modern standard, but all have a history stretching right back through the centuries. Sanskrit was the artificially perfected literary language. The dialects were known as Prakrits, and as these Prakrits developed literatures of their own, even they became influenced by the literary Sanskrit. In Vedic texts the terms 'Prakriti' is also regularly used for the word which 'isolate' in contradistinction to 'vikasa' (modification, variant), the latter being applied to the junction forms. There are so many words used in Rik-pratishakhya, e.g. 'Samhita padaprakritih' and 'Padaprakritih' where the meaning of 'Prakritih' is obviously basic Prakritic or Prakrit especially refers to the natural language or common speech of people. Broadly speaking, Prakrit is a generic term; it covers half a dozen dialects (including Apabhramsha) and its literature has been enriched by Jain, Brahmanic and Buddhist authors in different parts of India. Apabhramsha is one important Prakrit; it inherits a good deal of Prakrit vocabulary; but has developed some new features which are parallel to and fore-runners of the new Indo-Aryan all over India. Prakrit has a wider canvas as compared with Pali.

There is still a tendency in linguistic works to treat it as an intermediary and to regard it merely as a transitional stage between the Vedic and the classical Sanskrit on the one hand, and Apabhramsha and the modern languages on the other. A careful study of literary texts in the Prakrit dialects and a comparison with the inscriptional usage shows a remarkable uniformity prevailing in the form and function of the obligatory participle. L.A. Schwyzler observes that middle Indo-Aryan was in some ways a richer language than old Indo-Aryan. Instead of three morphemes being used for the one obligatory participle, viz., 'tavya', 'aniya', 'ya';/Pkt (iy) avva > evva (Apa.) developed in Middle Indo-Aryan.

In the early stage of Indo-European language, there were some vowel sounds which gradually disappeared in Indo-Aryan. These include short e.o. also. This is definitely the tendency of dialects that have prevailed in Apabhramsha frequently. It is a historical fact that there were some popular dialects. It is true to say that 'ri' sound was lost long ago and remained only in spelling bound by grammar, but became a, i or u in Pali, Prakrit and modern Vernaculars. Therefore, we find 'Kada' for 'Krita', 'Vuda' for 'Vrita', 'Mada' for 'Mrita' etc. in the Vedic literature. Modern philologists mentioned many words and usages which crept into the Vedas and Sanskrit also. It is confirmed that Prakritisation began even in the Vedas and it was not a later development as many still believe. In addition to the loose style and use of many archaic forms and obsolete words, the Vedic language is also characterised by a lack of rigid 'sandhis' and long compounds. In Sanskrit, sandhi within a word is compulsory, but in the Vedas anaptyctic forms and words without sandhis are frequently used as 'Indera', 'suarga', 'tita', 'prauza'. In Prakrit also anaptyxis is abundant in usage. Prof. L. Alsdorf rightly observes: 'Even in the Vedas there are words, which bear unmistakable evidence of the Prakrit influence, so far as the phonological changes are concerned. One of the basic characters of Prakrit prevailed over the period of the Vedas which were composed as Sandhi between Padanta and Padadi in the Rk Sahita, as is well known, is due to the manipulation of the text by later redactors, the material evidence clearly showing that in the original text no sandhi was allowed in such a position. In fact the Siksha recommends the pronunciation of anaptyxis as 'a', (vowel) which represents a geographical area to which Ardhamagadhi belonged. Thus, the large scale use of Anaptyxis which is found in Prakrit has similarity with the Vedic dialects. There are so many words which are found in the Vedas which originally belong to Prakrit dialects." For example, the word 'satya' is derived from 'sat' abundantly used in RK-Samhita, but for 'satyasatya' we find 'sachchasacha' (RK 7.104.12), and like that Sanskrit words, Marisha, Ingala, and Maireya are actually Prakrit words: Marisa, Ingala, Miara; like this meha, vayu, vanka, titau, dadha, maranda, khidakkia, etc. are frequently used in samhita texts. R Pischel's hypothesis that the Prakrits, mostly those of Ashokan times, were current at the time of the Vedic language even is supported by Geldner.

The word 'Prakrita' is used to include a number of languages or dialects, traces of which are found in the religious, literary and dramatic literature of the Jains and non-Jains, beginning from about the 6th or 5th century B.C. down to the 10th or 11th century A.D., covering a period of over fifteen centuries. The linguists have employed the term Middle Indo-Aryan as opposed to Indian term 'prakrita', by maintaining a parity with the old and new stages of Indo-Aryan languages. Hence the Middle Indo-Aryan does not only include Prakrit as described by the grammarians and rhetoricians, but also Pali and other inscriptional languages, such as the edicts of Ashoka, the pillar edicts of Kaluvaki and Heliodoras, the copper plate inscriptions of Kalawan, Hathigumpha inscription of Kharvela, the Kharosthi documents from Niya region and the Khotan Dhammapada from Chinese Turkestan, etc. Beside the Ashokan inscriptions, other Brahmi inscriptions are also available in India. These inscriptions are more than two thousand and were inscribed between 300 B.C. and A.D. 400 within seven hundred years. A comprehensive history of Prakrit dialects can easily be reconstructed on the basis of documents written in different Prakrit dialects. We can easily divide them into four stages: i) First Stage (600 B.C.-200 B.C.)—early stage, Ashokan Prakrit; ii) Second Stage (200 B.C.—A.D. 400)—(transitional stage); iii) third Stage (A.D. 400-700 A.D.)—dramatic prakrit stage; iv) Fourth stage (A.D. 700-1500)—Third Middle Indo-Aryan Stage.

In the first stage we have a great number of inscriptions and coins relating to the period of B.C. 400-A.D. 300. The second stage was replenished with inscriptions, from Pali, Jaina writings, Ashvaghosha's Prakrit etc. The canonical literature and dramas of Ashvaghosha fall within the third stage. The literary Prakrits also belong to this stage. Prakrit and Apabhramsha literature, in fact, belong to the fourth stage which ended with Avahattha.

The importance of the Jain writings for studying Deshaja words is two-fold. Some Jain writers have made direct contribution to Deshaja lexicography. In the field of Prakrit lexicography Hemachandra's Deshinamamala is an authentic work that gives the meanings of about four thousand Deshaja words. Apabhramsha had a stronger tendency to use Deshaja. Svayambhu's Paumcharia has about five hundred words and Pushpadanta's Mahapurana about thirteen hundred, which can be classified as Deshaja. The Puhaichandchariya of Shantisuri, composed in A.D. 1105, contains about eight hundred Deshaja words. There are so many works and literary compositions which restored Deshaja words properly. These numerous Deshaja words are also significant to prove the tradition that has sprung down from the Prakrit dialects containing folk elements which cannot be derived by rules from established words in Sanskrit lexicon nor used in their secondary (i.e. metaphorical) senses. Words used in other regions would be infinite in number; but these words used in Prakrit are called Deshi.

There is no doubt that from the very beginning Prakrit has been a spoken language. Hence it has short vowels, some simple inflectional forms and loss of vibhakti cases. The Indo-European languages had six phonemes called semivowels, each of which could function as a vowel, as a consonant, or a vowel plus a (homorganic) consonant. These three forms composed; i, u (vocalic form), y, w (consonantal form), iy, uw (vocalic plus consonantal). Out of these Prakrit has vocalic and consonantal, but Apabhramsha has vocalic forms only. H.C. Bhayani believes that during the later days of Prakrit inherent tendencies of the speech were such that the old inflexions obtained traditionally were fast disappearing and making the language short of terminational elements. The disintegration of the old morphological system paved the way for the use of the stem-forms in all numbers and cases—a phenomenon which is remarkably found in the old Marwari speech, commonly known as Dingal.

It is clearly noted that the tendency of duplication is a common feature in Prakrit and Apabhramsha also. In the history of phonological development this tendency obviously appears in the old dialects, as it is preserved in the form of padanta consonantal formations, such as: nadda, sadda, chhadde, ghatta, ghalla, galla, badda, futta, etc. in the modern, languages—Punjabi, Rajasthani, Lahandi, Sindhi, Kacchi, etc.

A large mass of Vedic variants that bear striking resemblance to the phonetic features of the latest middle Indic dialects has been collected by Bloomfield and Edgerton in their Vedic Variants. This was followed by studies of Oertel, Wackernagel, Tedesco and Devasthali, on this aspect for the Vedic Sanskrit. These studies are convincing for the existence of dialects in the contemporary Vedic texts having phonological features that we know from the later attested Middle Indo-Aryan dialects. It is also obvious that Prakritic influences are revealed in the works of Panini, Katyayana and Patanjali. Skold states that the Sanskrit of Yaska and Panini was the spoken language of the educated class, the brahmins, but it could not remain uninfluenced by the vernaculars. In Panini, Emeneau finds some clear evidence of this nature which he easily expects in view of the chronological proximity of Panini to the Buddha who taught in the colloquial or Middle Indo-Aryan dialects. When we find a whole class of words assumed by Panni showing irregularities of formation and yet granted a special sanction by him, it is not difficult to agree with the conclusion of Emeneau.

As pointed out by A.M. Ghatage, usually assimilation of all kinds of conjunct consonants along with a few other changes, is considered the most characteristic feature of the Middle Indo-Aryan by which it is distinguished from the Old Indo-Aryan stage. The testimony of the inscriptions is instructive in showing that the Prakrit and Apabhramsha were popular dialects and mainly Brahmi script is found in the Prakrit inscriptions. The Jain inscriptions of Mathura are almost pure Prakrit which prevails down to the first century A.D. Macdonall remarks clearly that these medieval Prakrits are important in connection with Sanskrit literature, as they are the vernaculars employed by the uneducated classes in Sanskrit drama. They are the sources of all the Aryan languages of modern India. From the Brachad Apabhramsha are derived Sindhi, western Punjabi and Kashmiri; from Saurasheni come eastern Punjabi and Hindi (the old Avanti), from Nagara Gujarati, Rajasthani, Pahari, Lahanda, etc. and from Ardhamagadhi come eastern Hindi (Bhojapuri, Magahi, Awadhi and Chhattisgarhi, etc.), and from Magadhi come Bihari, Bengali, Oriya, and Assamese. Now it is an established fact that the Middle Indo-Aryan literature is closely connected with our understanding of the Prakrit and Apabhramsha literature. It is also realised that the knowledge of Prakrit is indispensable for understanding not only the old Hindi literature but also the literature in Old Rajasthani, Old Gujarati, Old Marathi, Old Bengali, Old Maithili, etc. and in fact all the languages of the Middle Indo-Aryan group.

The phonetic structure and the consonants, vowel sounds of Prakrit and Apabhramsha are preserved in the present Indo Aryan central languages. Apart from this certain other phonetic features have also developed in other Indo-Aryan languages. Some of the salient features are:

- 1) 'Ri: The pronunciation of ri was not in use during the period of Pali. In Indo-Aryan languages this came to be pronounced as ri and ru. Even the pronunciation of i is now centralised, not fronted as previously.
- 2) Sh is not pronounced in any modern Indo-Aryan languages.
- 3) The low vowel sounds of e and o have been retained in Modern Indo-Aryan, e ē, o, ō came to be pronounced as pure vowels.
- 4) Cerebral or retroflex sounds 'r' 'rha' developed in Hindi, Urdu, Sindhi, Punjabi, Oriya, etc.
- 5) The declension system got reduced in both Prakrit & Apabhramsha. Instead of seven, only four declensions were used.
- 6) Post-positions started being evolved at the time of Apabhramsha. 'Na', 'ni', in Gujarati, 'cha' in Marathi, and da, dā in Punjabi are post-positions showing the sixth declension.
- 7) In Apabhramsha all words belonging to neuter gender were treated either as masculine or feminine. So the neuter gender was lost. Except Marathi and Gujarati no Modern Indo-Aryan has neuter gender.

LANGUAGE (Rajasthani). Rajasthani is comparatively a recent name given to a group of languages earlier known as 'Marubhasha' or 'Maruvani'. It originates from 'Rajasthan', a geographical name adopted in lieu of 'Rajawara' or 'Rajaputana' of the British period. The word 'Rajasthan' has its own history. Medieval Rajasthani historians used it to denote the capital or main seat of a princely state. James Tod took a fancy for it and adopted it as a part of the title of his immortal work, Annals and Antiquities of Rajasthan (1829). This was the first use of the word signifying the entire tract of land held by the Rajput princes and nobles. The litterateurs of the land are indebted to Tod for this innovation. However, it was G.A. Grierson, who first coined the word 'Rajasthani' to use it in his Linguistic Survey of India (1908), which was first followed by L.P. Tessitori and subsequently by a host of others.

Though Marubhasha or Rajasthani has been a separate group of languages for over eight hundred years, no attempt was ever made to conduct a survey of its various dialects or constituents and to specify their characteristics. Credit in this respect also goes to G.A. Grierson, who devoted a separate part (Vol. IX, Pt. II) of his Linguistic Survey of India to this purpose. Piecemeal attempts were made earlier also to present grammatical studies of some of the dialects, prominent among them being that of G. Macaliester (1899), on the 'sub-dialects spoken in the erstwhile state of Jaipur.

As is apparent, Rajasthani is a language of the Indo-Aryan group. It claims its descent from the 'Abhira Apabhramsha'. A predecessor of the joint family of Rajasthani and Gujarati languages has been termed 'Maru Gurjara' or Old Western Rajasthani by modern scholars. Linguists hold different opinions as to the mother Apabhramsha. While the majority name it Abhira or Saurashtra or Gurjara, there are others who plead for the 'Shauraseni'. As Shauraseni Prakrit happens to be the main source of both these Apabhramshas, the latter opinion seems to have prevailed for want of proper understanding of the problem. Notwithstanding the fact that even L.P. Tessitori has subscribed to this latter theory, there are strong reasons to believe that Shauraseni, the mother of 'Nagara' and 'Pingala', was much different from that form of Apabhramsha (Saurashtra or Gurjara or Abhira) which gave birth to 'Maru Gurjara'. Moreover, it is still to be seen how far the 'Maharashtri' Prakrit, which has been profusely used by many a Jaina scholars in this part of the country, was responsible for imbibing some of its striking peculiarities in Rajasthani, which are so evident even to the casual reader.

Tessitori has also hinted at the eastern dialects of Rajasthani (Mevati, Dhundhadi, etc.) being more influenced by 'Western Hindi', just as the western dialects (prominently Marwadi) were influenced by Gurjari. This observation goes much in favour of the contention that the literary languages known as Pingala (western Hindi) and Dingala (western Rajasthani) had different roots in two separate Apabhramshas known as Shauraseni and Gurjara (or Abhira or Saurashtra). The theory of origin has been further stretched to suggest that there was a literary language known as 'Avahattha' which should be treated as the original language.

Tessitori was the first scholar who traced the historical development of Rajasthani, especially that of western Rajasthani from the root Apabhramsha during the period from the 14th to the 16th century. Eminent linguists like S.K. Chatterjee have hailed it as a unique and the very first attempt to identify the missing links between Apabhramsha and the modern regional languages in Rajasthan. He put in much labour in deriving the modern grammatical forms from old acknowledged literary texts, extensively quoted in support of his theory.

George A. Grierson was the only scholar to have done a detailed survey of the language with all its dialects and sub-dialects. Besides giving the grammar and specimen text of each dialect, he has provided comparative charts of grammatical forms of all major dialects which help in understanding the peculiarities of each of them. Though linguistic studies of some of the dialects have been attempted in recent years, the one that of Grierson still continues to be the backbone of all linguistic know-how for inquisitive scholars. Studies of Vagadi, Hadauti (Dhundhadi), Shekhawati, (Marwadi) and Bikaneri (Marwadi) have been presented by L.D. Josi, K.L. Sharma, Dr. Kailasha Chandra and R.K. Vyas respectively. Scholars have also worked separately on the composite grammar of the language as well as on its various forms. Ramakarna Asopash's Marwadi vyakaran, Sitaram Lalasa's Rajasthani vyakaran and N.D. Swami's Rajasthani vyakaran deal with the entire grammatical structure, while K.C. Bahala of Chicago University and W.S. Allen of England have mentioned some of the grammatical forms. Historians of the language, such as H.L. Maheshwari and M.L. Menariya have also given some outlines and discussed the subject in their own way.

LANGUAGE-RAJASTHANI

Linguistic studies, inclusive of those dealing with the grammatical part, have not gained any momentum among the scholars. Apart from the derivational aspect, which has been awfully lacking, no attempt has yet been made for recording the phonetic patterns and the resultant difference in spellings of one and the same word. There has been no attempt at studying the geographical, historical, social, anthropological and cultural factors responsible for such sound effects.

Rajasthani as a language could not attract the attention of ancient grammarians and there is practically no earlier grammar available. But the drawback has been compensated for more than enough by attempts in the derivational side by no less an authority than the great Hemchandra, the doyen among grammarians and linguists of his age. Hemchandra's Deshinamamala stands unique among all works of this type, though some of his findings are now being challenged by modern scholars. Some other Jain scholars have also registered Rajasthani equivalents of Sanskrit words, but no attempt has been made at giving any philological base. As such, it has remained only an exercise in search of synonyms. As a matter of fact this practice has been in use for long in Sanskrit lexicons and commentaries which quote such equivalents by mentioning 'iti bhashayam'.

Before discussing the gradual development of the language, its basic structure at the dialectal levels as philologically and grammatically analysed by Grierson in his study in 1910 needs mention. While registering his findings in the second Volume of the Linguistic Survey of India, the renowned linguist has mentioned the following major groups of dialects, each consisting of several minor constituents: 1. Marwadi (spoken in the entire Bikaner and Jodhapur divisions and large tracts of Udaipur and Ajmer divisions). 2. Dhundhadi (spoken in the Kota division and large tracts of Ajmer division). 3. Mevati or Ahiravati (largely spoken in Alwar district). 4. Shekhavati-Marwadi Spoken in the tract of this very name in Ajmer division). 5. Malavi (Malava-in Madhya Pradesh). 6. Nimadi (spoken in Nimad area of Madhya Pradesh) and 7. Bhili (spoken in the hilly tracts of the Aravali and the Vindhya ranges). The number of subdialects under each of the above major heads may be guessed from a study of the Jaipuri dialect spoken in the erstwhile state of Jaipur, including the Shekhavati region of Marwad, done by G. Macalister in 1898. He has mentioned twelve sub-dialects of Jaipuri (itself a sub-dialect of Dhundhadi) alone and supported his theory by no less than eighty specimens of them. A more thorough investigation of the sub-dialects of the other groups may swell up the existing figures to a still larger number. The seemingly different looking sub-dialects are more so on account of the variation in spelling, with practically very little change in the structural forms of words. Still there are certain peculiarities attached to some major groups which separate them from the others.

Scores of such peculiarities have been noticed by Tessitori in the works mostly composed during the 14th and the 15th centuries. The process of gradual change lingered on till the end of the seventeenth century when the language was able to achieve a standard of its own. This was mainly due to the frequent visits of Dingala poets from all parts of the state. Practically all of them hailed from the stock of Charana caste and their emotional integration helped in bringing about uniformity in the language.

Though the princely states had come in contact with the Muslim overlords of Delhi long back, the impact of the language of the conquerors was not so pronounced till the advent of the Mughals. It was during the Mughal period that the Rajputs were closely associated with the imperial courts at Agra and Delhi. This association was responsible for bringing out a swift and deep-rooted change in the language and culture of the states and the literary writings during this period bear testimony to this fact. The influence was so striking that about fifty per cent of their vocabulary contained words of Arabic, Persian and Turkish origin.

Poets like Prithviraj Rathore and his contemporaries, during the later half of the 16th century, hardly used more than two to three per cent of foreign words, and that also mostly proper nouns concerned with warfare. But the trend of such usage continued to increase till the vast vocabulary of foreign words was assimilated and made an intrinsic part of the lexicon.

At the very start, during the 13th century, the language was first used only in poetical compositions. But soon, during the 15th, stories were attempted and 'Bala-vobodha Tablas' were written by the Jainas to propagate their faith and to help the students in understanding the old texts. The Charana poets also developed prose forms of 'varta', 'vachanika' and 'duvavaita', which were styled as prose metres by the prosodists, being composed with rhymed terminations. The 'duvavaita' followed the grammatical structure of modern Urdu or Hindi, which was the common link language used for interstate communication.

Another genre of poetry known as 'nisani' was also introduced during the 15th Century, which contained majority of Punjabi words woven into the structure of the Punjabi grammar. This was, perhaps, due to the wandering minstrels of the Dhadhi clan who frequented Punjab and Rajasthan to give professional performances of their ballads. The genre was, thus, borrowed from Punjabi and introduced into Rajasthani. Some of the earliest and the best nisani works are their creation.

During the 16th and the 17th centuries historical accounts were written which provided ample ground for the development of the language as a vehicle of non-literary writings also. Translations and commentaries of technical works on medicine, astronomy, astrology, sexology and of occult learning were also done. Thus, it was made possible to take the language to the masses who could be benefited by the knowledge so far limited to the Sanskrit texts. Translations were also done of Persian texts, such as the Ain-i-Akbari, Akhalaqa-ul-Mohasani, etc., which proved its capability as a potential language. The eighteenth and the nineteenth centuries saw scores of prose works containing short stories, histories, commentaries and various other forms which enriched the old prose. During this period, it was an accepted vehicle of correspondence, administrative work, commercial translations, education and other fields of life. Even the British overlords had to adopt it for regular correspondence with the princes.

With the advent of the British rule after 1858, the princely states adopted Persian and Urdu alongwith English for higher administrative purposes while at the lower levels and in the educational curricula Hindi ousted the local language. It continued to be so for about 90 years. By that time the language and its dialects were reduced to nonentity so far as its use for education and administration was concerned.

The cultural renaissance during the post-Independence period again brought the language to the forefront, and literary works including poetry, novels, short stories, one-Act plays, dramas, essays, translations and adaptations began to appear. Monthlies, weeklies and fortnightlies were brought out. A daily paper under the title Jagati jot was also published as an experiment. Research works and journals also were not wanting. Editorials on topics other than literature tended to enrich the language by adding to its vocabulary to suit all types of subjects. Radio talks and discussions on a variety of subjects were more such attempts in the same direction. Fresh genres were introduced. A beginning was also made in literary criticism. Private literary bodies, the Board of Secondary Education and the Universities conducted examinations in Rajasthani which required the students to answer in that language. All these factors proved much helpful for the development of the language. It is hoped that the introduction of the language in educational curricula and the patronage offered through the central and state academies will go a long way in further strengthening the language and in enabling it to regain its lost glory.

LANGUAGE (Sindhi). A language of the Indo-Aryan family, Sindhi is spoken by about fifteen million people, distributed in two countries, Pakistan and India. About eighty per cent of them are in Sindh and Lasa B'elo (Baluchistan) regions of Pakistan. Nearly three million Sindhi speakers are in India; approximately one third of them are from the Kutch-Saurashtra region in Gujarat and the Jaisalmer district in Rajasthan; the rest are associated with the post-Partition migration from Sindh spread throughout the urban and semi-urban centres in the country with concentrations in Maharashtra, Gujarat, Rajasthan, Madhya Pradesh and Delhi. Many Sindhi speakers engaged in overseas trade called 'Sindhwarkis', are also scattered in important trade centres throughout South-East Asia, the Gulf, African coast and Gibraltar, USA, England and Canada.

The 1951 Indian Census records 12.5 lakh claimants of Sindhi; in 1961 Census the number increased to 13.7 lakhs; and in 1971 Census it claimed 16.8 lakh Sindhi speakers, and now the estimated figure is three million.

Different varieties of Sindhi speech are classified into six major dialects: 1. Siraiki (spoken in Siro, upper Sindh), 2. Vicholi (spoken in Sindh), 3. Lari (in Laru, Lower Sindh), 4. Lasi (in Lasa B'elo state and a part of Kohistan on the western side of Sindh), 5. Thari or Thareli (in Tharu, the desert region on the south-east border of Sindh and a part of Jaisalmer district in Rajasthan) and 6. Kachhi (in the Kutch region and a part of Kathiawar, now known as Saurashtra, in Gujarat, on the southern side of Sindh).

Vicholi is considered to be the standard dialect by all Sindhi speakers except those speaking the Kacchi dialect. It is commonly used by the educated class and is accepted as the language of literature, education and administration. Although Kachhi is very close to Sindhi, a Kachhi speaker does not make any effort to speak the prestige dialect Vicholi because of political and social separation of the Sindh and the Kutch regions for the last four centuries, and he shows a much closer socio-cultural affinity with the Gujarati speaking community. Now, with the Partition of the Indian subcontinent, the Sindh-Kutch border has come to form the international boundary demarcating Pakistan and India on the western side.

Sindh was the seat of the ancient Indus Valley Civilisation during the third millennium B.C., On the basis of an interpretation of the objects excavated from the bottom layer of this pre-historic site, it is considered to be a pre-Aryan settlement. In the second millennium B.C., Sindh became one of the early settlements of the Indo-Aryan speakers in India.

The seals and clay tablets obtained by the excavation of Mohen-jo-daro still await proper decipherment by epigraphists. This has given rise to many speculative inferences regarding the origin of the Sindhi language, mostly based on external evidences claiming unique character of the language, its antiquity and its supposed superiority over the sister languages. Ruchandani has tried to show the correspondences of modern Sindhi vocables with Phoenician and Sumerian sources with the claim that those languages must have been influenced by Sindhi. Taking cue from Kramer's remarks on Dilmun, a Sumerian site near the Gulf, Siraj concludes that the Indus Valley civilisation spread among the Babylonian and the Sumerian people. Etymologising 'Phoenician' as 'Pani' or 'Ponir' mentioned in the Rig Veda and then correlating it with Sindhi 'vanyo', Sanskrit 'vanikah' (trader), it has been claimed that they belonged to the Sindhi stock. Siraj even surmises that the Phoenician script was derived from Proto-Sindhian of Mohen-jo-daro times. Under the spell of language chauvinism, Siraj and Ruchandani were so biased that they claimed the heritage of the Indus Valley civilisation, identified the supposed pre-Indo-Aryan stage anterior to Sanskrit with the protostage of the Sindhi language and held that the other languages of Northern India were later off-shoots of Sindhi.

But the structural evidence of the language establishes, beyond any doubt, its affinity with the Indo-Aryan language family. Grierson classifies it as a member of the North-Western group of the family; the other member of the group is 'Lahnda' (also known as 'Lahndi' or Western Punjabi). Sindhi shares the antiquity of Primary Prakrits with its sister modern Indo-Aryan languages. Like its sisters, it has passed through the stages of the Old Indo-Aryan (OIA), Middle Indo-Aryan (MIA) and New Indo-Aryan (NIA), till it reached the stage of present day Sindhi. Trumpp regards it as much more closely related to the old Prakrit than Marathi, Hindi, Punjabi and Bengali of our days and shows that it has preserved an exuberance of grammatical forms for which all these sisters may well envy it.

Pischel claim it to have been directly derived from the Vrachada Apabhramsha on the basis of Markandeya's statement in Prakritasarnvasva that the Vrachada Apabhramsha from Prakrit had its origin in Sindhu Desha. Very little is known about the Vrachada Apabhramsha itself, except for the nine peculiarities noted by Markandeya. Grierson supports Markandeya's statement by illustrating certain Vrachada characteristics in Sindhi like cerebralisation of Middle Indo-Aryan dental stops, implosive (ɣ) representing Vrachada (y), etc. In support of this theory of Inner and Outer Indo-Aryan languages, he claims that the modern languages of the North-West India (including Sindhi) are intimately connected with those of the East (from Bihar to Assam).

Turner discusses the development of Sindhi cerebrals in Sindhi from Primitive Indian dentals suggesting that Dravidian speech habits might have affected the final direction of a tendency already existing in the language. Turner also claims the development of recursives in Sindhi, termed 'implosives' by Bailey, from geminated voiced plosives: Sanskrit, 'agra', 'agga', Sindhi ag'u (before).

During the present century, various Indo-Aryan scholars have modified the myth that all New Indo-Aryan languages could be traced directly to the early "primary" Prakrits spoken during the Vedic period and that classical Sanskrit depicts a standardised variety of one of the later "secondary" Prakrits. In this light, Jairamdas Daulatram also raises doubts concerning Pischel and Grierson's view that the Sindhi language was derived from Vrachada and suggests that an ancient variant of the pre-Vedic period spoken by the people of the lower Indus Valley, probably continued to evolve, acquiring the form of Old Sindhi in the phase of the "secondary" Prakrits.

On the other hand, scholars in the post-partition Sindh such as Baloch, Jatoti, Allana, have been painfully striving to demonstrate the ancestry of Sindhi as different from the other Indo-Aryan languages; some of them even speculate its close connection with the Semetic languages and claim that 'the Sanskrit Prakrit languages have only insignificant influence on Sindhi' (Baloch).

At present there is no earlier record of or reference to the features of the Sindhi language than Bharatamuni's Natyashastra of the second century, which makes mention of the language of the people of Sindhu-Sauvira and refers to some of its features. The languages of the Saindhavas figured among the important 'desabhasas' of the country in Udyotana's Kuvalayamala written in 779 A.D. (Upadhy, 1959). It includes short specimens of early NIA dialect variations including the variety spoken by Saindhavas. In this work the author speaks of the poetry of the people of Sindh as 'graceful, sweet, soft-toned and inspired by patriotic sentiment'. Hemchandra's Desinamamala also includes a specimen of Sindhi.

Sunitikumar Chatterji referred to a Persian version of the Mahabharata translated by Abul-Hasan in 1026 from Arabic which itself was translated from an Indian language by Abu Salih. On the basis of the phonological study of the forms of the Indian names, as they can be reconstructed from the Arabic transcription, Chatterji claims that the language of the original composition may be called Old Sindhi, the Sindhi language at the time of its emergence as a New Indo-Aryan speech from Middle Indo-Aryan prior to or around 1000. The initial portion of the Persian version covers the early history of Sindh prior to Sindh's connection with the Mahabharata heroes. Jairamdas refers to the same version, summarised at a later date, in Mujamil-al-Tarikh and on the strength of certain historical references, infers that the original Sindhi composition must be of around 300 B.C., written by a minister of the court named Saper. Khubchandani, on the basis of the phonological reconstruction of the proper names, supports Chatterji's conservative claim that the original composition belonged to about 1000.

From certain oblique references in the historical records of Al-Biruni (11th century) and other Arab writers, it can be deduced that Sindhi was not only spoken but written as well during the 8th century. The Quran was first translated into Sindhi in 883 A.D. A Persian history of ancient Sindh written around 1216 called Chachanama, also refers to the varieties of writings prevalent in Sindh during the eighth-ninth centuries.

The folklore attributed to Mamur Fakirs and Rajput poets is traced back to 14th and 15th centuries. From the 16th century onwards, writings in Sindhi are available in the form of Sufi poetry, till the beginning of prose in Sindhi in the 19th century. Shah Abdul Latif of Bhit

LANGUAGE-TAMIL

(1689-1752) popularly known as Shah Bhitai ranks very high among classical Sufi poets in Indian literature.

The Sindhi region is surrounded by Balochi (an Iranian language) and Brahui (a Dravidian language) on the west, Pashto (another Iranian language) and Kashmiri (a Dardic language) on the north, Multani and Bahawalpuri (Lahnda dialects: Indo-Aryan) on the north and north-east, Marwadi (a Rajasthani dialect: Indo-Aryan) on the east and Gujarati (Indo-Aryan) on the south.

Sindh, situated astride some of the major approaches to north-western South Asia, had been a much frequented invasion route and served as a meeting ground of different cultures from the North-West such as the Aryan, Greek, and Sythian, Arab, Turk. Hence the language shows great susceptibility towards borrowings from different languages. In the eighth century, Sindh was the land of earliest invasion by the Muslims in India. Since then the Sindhi vocabulary and grammar has become saturated with Arabic and Persian elements in roughly similar proportions as English is with French. Besides, with the persistent influences of Hinduism, the Bhakti Movement and the spread of the Sikh faith (during the 15th-18th centuries) with the cultural impact of the British rule during the one hundred years before 1947 and with the influence of modern technical advancement in both the countries, Sindhi has come to include a large stock of borrowings from Sanskrit, Hindi, Urdu and English, as a pan-Indian characteristic.

During the past three decades, two different drifts affecting the phonological, grammatical and lexical patterns of the language, have caused a conspicuous breach in the Pakistani Sindhi and the Indian Sindhi styles. The language of the post-Partition Sindh (in Pakistan) continues to lean heavily on Perso-Arabic and Urdu styles to identify itself with Islamic culture, whereas in Indian Sindhi the use of unassimilated Perso-Arabic elements are getting considerably reduced. The contemporary Indian Sindhi is drifting towards tatsamisation under the influences of Sanskrit and Hindi, in order to conform to the general pan-Indian trends. Another prominent feature affecting the style of Indian Sindhi is the drift towards Anglicisation under cosmopolitan and modern influences on the immigrant population. Though Hindi, English and other contact languages show profound influences on the very core of the Sindhi language (in quantum), yet these have so far not radically changed its essential core, i.e., the structure.

LANGUAGE (Tamil). Tamil is one of the oldest spoken languages in the world today with a very long history—even prehistory. In the absence of reliable historical documentation, scholars found it difficult for a long time to trace its development and growth and the changes it had undergone. Only recently, after the publication of Caldwell's Comparative Grammar of the Dravidian Languages and the significant progress made by the new discipline of linguistic studies and the considerable research done by Indian scholars like Prof. T.P. Meenakshisundaran, it has been possible to piece together some kind of a historical account of the language.

The sources of information are many but they have to be used with circumspection. The literary sources are not available in print and when available, do not display much evidence of careful editing. They contain old and new usages as later writers reverentially retained in their works, old phrases out of vogue in the speech of their times. The grammars like Nannool, too, often reiterated the rules of earlier grammars even though they had changed during their times. We have a number of inscriptions available to us and since they use colloquial terms, they are certainly useful in a study of the history of the language; but they generally use conventionalised legal terms which have been in vogue for quite some time and hence prove unreliable as sources of history unless used with the greatest care. The study of modern dialects reveals certain valuable processes at work and the resultant changes brought about by such processes are helpful in reconstructing the history of Tamil, if the study is conducted with the full knowledge of the accepted principles of linguistics.

The fact, now widely comprehended, that Tamil belongs to a big language family of which the other more prominent members are Telugu, Kannada and Malayalam came to be realised only through the work of Ellis of the East India Company and the incomparable Caldwell in the early decades of the 19th century. And it was Caldwell who placed this study on a firm footing; it must be remembered that comparative language studies were in their infancy at that time and the science of phonetics was yet to develop. The structure of Dravidian language studies was built on the foundation laid by Caldwell by the epoch-making work of Emeneau, Burrow and Jules Bloch. Among the native scholars mention should be made of L.V. Ramaswamy Aiyar and S. Bhattacharya who had collaborated with Burrow. The work of scholars like T.P. Meenakshisundaran, P.S. Subramanian, Sunitikumar Chatterjee and B. Krishnamurty have been of the highest order in this field.

LANGUAGE-TAMIL

Statistically, it is computed that out of the total population speaking the 20 Dravidian languages, 35 million speak Tamil forming the second biggest group, next only to Telugu. Out of these 20 languages, only four, viz., Tamil, Telugu, Kannada and Malayalam, are literary languages. It must be borne in mind that Brahui which is spoken in Baluchistan in Pakistan is a Dravidian language; there are considerable sections of the population in Sri Lanka, Malaysia, South Africa and Fiji who speak one or the other of the Dravidian languages.

As can be predicated from a knowledge of the history of civilizations the areas most easily accessible like those on the sea-shore and river valleys are the most advanced and the languages spoken there are the most advanced, having a well-developed literature. The Dravidian languages spoken in the mountains and in the interior Madhya Pradesh and Orissa are much less developed and lack a formal literature. But research on the history of this language family is based both on the literatures available and on the spoken languages which may not have a formal literature.

This research from the last century encourages the postulation of a source language, Proto-Dravidian, from which all these were derived at various points of time. Emeneau has suggested a vowel and consonantal structure for the Proto-Dravidian which is accepted with minor changes by most scholars. Thus a consensus has been arrived at on the outlines of the phonology and the morphology of this postulated source language which marks a very good beginning for the study of the history of the Dravidian languages. The family itself is divided into three groups, the northern, the central and the southern, as languages geographically contiguous show certain affinities. Tamil belongs to the southern group of languages.

There are two cardinal factors that make it difficult to fix the probable date of the Proto-Dravidian languages. There are a number of words in Sanskrit which cannot be traced to the Indo-European source; many of them can be traced to the Dravidian languages. There is an acrimonious debate going on regarding this and this has been clouding the issue and impeding objective research on the subject.

The second circumstance is the discovery of an iron-using Megalithic culture at Brahmagiri, found in one layer, suggesting that the authors of this culture were Dravidians who must have come newly to South India around 500 B.C. As this date is being disputed and there is yet no clue about who the natives could have been whom they displaced, this discovery, though of great significance, has not been able to clinch the issues in Dravidian history.

Now, the Southern Dravidian group deserves some closer attention as Tamil belongs to it. The characteristic feature of this group is the fully developed feminine singular as distinguished from the neuter singular and there is still no distinction between them in the languages of the other two groups. Scholars also feel that there is an absence of metathesis in these languages while it is observed in Telugu and other central Dravidian languages. Further, a difference is noticed even between the Tamil and the Kannada sub-groups in which the latter agrees in this respect with the languages of the other groups; the law of palatalisation of the initial velars when followed by a front vowel finds application in Tamil and Malayalam as in the instances where 'kinna' becomes 'chinna' (young) and 'ken' becomes 'chem' (red). This palatalisation, however, will not occur, if, in the second syllable, there is a retroflex; 'keitu' and 'kili,' thus, will not become 'chetu' and 'chili' in Tamil as they do in Telugu.

A special feature of Proto South Dravidian was the persistence of forms like 'kcheyyum' commonly used for 3rd person singular with human and non-human subjects alike. These are clearly earlier forms preserved in the later tongue even after the development of pronominal suffixes; the forms for the I and II persons and for the III person plural appear with pronominal suffixes. The analysis of some of the forms shows that the pronominal suffixes came to be added to the predicate forms of the older language, the Proto-Dravidian 'cheytu', 'ninru', 'kandu' taken as participles by moderns must have really been finite predicates; we find commentators, too, interpreting them in this manner.

It is also a remarkable fact that many primitive forms which had a definite element of tense in them have lost this and have become part of compound verbs today with auxiliaries like 'vanduvuduvān' where the auxiliary is indicative of the future and the whole compound verb is also indicative of the future while the main verb is in the past tense. It may be remarked here that in Tamil the past is clearly indicated while often the present is used to indicate the future too as when we say 'nalai varukiren' in preference to 'nalai varuven'. It is certainly possible that even the past tense developed later and in the earliest days of the development of the language the "pastness" of an action was suggested by the relative positioning of the predicate, the earlier action being indicated by the earlier positioning of the predicate, which in those days must have been a substantive.

We now come to the great grammar, Tolkappiyam. Despite the perennial debate going on about its age, the major part of the work can be assumed to be pre-Sangam, with perhaps some sutras added by later writers. However, it would also appear that the entire old work has not come down to us as there are hiatus here and there. Tolkappiam, while giving the alphabet is unique among ancient grammars in giving the distribution of the sounds or phonemes.

Tolkappiyar's vowel and consonant structure is as it is today; the structure he derived from Proto-Dravidian is retained mostly but Tolkappiyar adds the diphthongs ai and au. According to T.P. Meenakshisundaran, Tolkappiyar has taken au from Sanskrit and uses this to rewrite words like 'avvai' and 'pavvam' as 'auvai' and 'pauvam'; ai, according to him, is a vowel cluster, a+i.

Tolkappiyar retsored order and discipline everywhere as befits a great grammarian; but everywhere his great power of observation and minute knowledge not only of scholarly, poetic diction but of the speech of the common people are evident in the practical concessions he makes. His dispensations are: 'vittisai', kutriyalukaram' and the intractable 'aytam' are all similarly most resonable and in conformity with people's natural proclivities.

Tolkappiyar divides words into two divisions—nouns and verbs, which is not remarkable; but his legislating for 'uricchol' and 'itaicchol' is wonderfully modern as his thinking seems to run on the lines of recent writers who group all words expressive of the ideas of the concepts as one and those that indicate the connections between them as another. His definition and development of the concept of uricchol are very brilliant and are of fundamental importance.

Tolkappiyar's treatment of itaicchol is comprehensive; he includes the following under this broad banner: tense signs, case signs, particles of comparison, expletives (called 'asainilai' in Tamil, like 'mato' which are formatives whose meaning has been mostly lost), sound—or metre-fillers (works used to satisfy the exigencies of metres), suggestive particles and chariyai, like 'am' and 'an', which were originally suffixes whose force was lost in course of time and which had to be reinforced by new particles.

'Peyerechcham,' the Tamil equivalent of the English gerund is extremely well-developed in Tolkappiyar's times, as also the 'vinaiechcham', the verbal participle. Certain older forms continue to be current in his time like 'ceyku' and 'nuvantrichin' which lack pronominal suffixes. His forms for the II person 'ika' also must have been slowly disappearing during his time, for it has totally vanished from the Tamil land being heard only in Sri Lanka. The expletives 'mati' (Kenmati), and 'mo' (used in 'viyankol') are also similar; they receive the great grammarian's attention but are sparingly used after him.

Compounds are analysed by Tolkappiyar with clarity and brilliance and little change was needed in the rules governing them in the succeeding centuries; his 'panputtokai' and 'anmolittokai' still rule the field, though such compounds are decreasingly used in daily conversation or even in writing today. But the significance of case signs has been changing fairly fast and Tolkappiyar's dicta are not all relevant today, though it is surprising how he is right on the spot in so many cases even in this. It is customary in such cases where there is difference in usage to cover them under the convenient over-all device of 'verrumai mayakkam'.

Tolkappiyar's language except for a few changes is essentially the language of the Sangam age. The changes need not all be set down to the efflux of time; for in literary usage, poets may bring in older forms though they may not be very much current in the people's speech. While some of the changes can be put down to poetic needs, others can be traced to the influence of foreign languages (like Greek) and of Sanskrit; for instance, initial palatals c, n and y were not followed by the short a during Tolkappiyar's times; but words like namali (dog) and 'yavanar' (the Greeks) are common in the language of the Sangam. We see the first person suffixes ku, tu, tu and their versions with m disappearing from the language. Some other changes are: 'vantan and 'vantai' are used alternately with 'vantanan' and 'vantana'; the 'vayankol' forms 'valiya' and 'vali' are replaced by valka; viyankol' becomes common to all persons and numbers, developing additionally the signification of blessing, cursing and request.

An important development arising out of the contact with Sanskrit is the use of the passive voice. A similar development on a much larger scale is seen in our own times when the media like the newspapers, the radio and the TV use the passive voice more freely than is seen in people's speech, this is clearly the result of the domination of English. The passive is not at all native to the Tamil and its use should be understood to be the result and even a measure of the influence of other languages.

When we come to the language of the Pallava and Chola regimes, we find that the same vowels continue as phonemes. We see a number of changes in this consonants, clearly owing to the influence of Sanskrit; stressed letters like, kh, dh and combinations like ks appear in the learned dialect but not as phonemes; in some works r and l occur as initials—a heresy in the eyes of Tolkappiyar; clusters not permissible in Tamil also appear because of the Sanskrit words used. But this seems more the characteristic of individual poets than a generally prevalent tendency.

The shortening of vowels especially before long consonants or clusters, the tendency to cluster as 'pala' becoming 'pla' and changes like 'kata' becoming 'kita' are noteworthy in the Tamil of this period; and changes (of this type) like 'chelavu' becoming 'chlavu' and 'kontatu' becoming 'kontutu' became more common as time progressed. In regard to Sanskrit words, changes like 'puttakam' becoming 'pottakam' and 'ulakam' becoming 'olakam' were very common in popular speech, u becoming o even in native Tamil words progressively as in 'ural' > 'oral' and 'unakku' > 'onakku'. In Sanskrit words, a became e quite often, a tendency that continues even today, as 'retam' for 'ratam' (chariot) and 'kenkai' for 'Ganga'; this happened to Tamil words, too, though less often. We also notice a labialisation of a followed or preceded by a labial 'kampam' becoming 'kampom' and 'unkal' becomes 'unkol'; also i becomes u as in 'tampiran' getting pronounced as 'tampuran'.

In regard to consonants, the more remarkable and widespread change is when preceded by a front vowel becoming palatalised into long cc like 'Vaitha' vaichcha; and n becomes n as we see in Malayalam of today. A confusion between the two letters t and r due to the sounds falling together is seen frequently as time progresses. Falling in of l and l is also frequently noticed, kel being written as kel; on this principle, we may infer that alvar must originally have been alvar, though a very acceptable meaning is offered for the former in Viashnava tradition. People clearly found y easier to pronounce as they substituted y for k and c in many places—as vaiyachi for vaikachi and iyaitta for ichaitta. The aytam also underwent some modifications; we now have muttaytam (fully pronounced 'aytam') being one matra in length and a 'aytyakkutukkam' being half a matra in length.

In morphology, a new particle kil (to be able) appears in this period and it began to be used as a separate root in its conjugated forms like kitpan (I am able). Forms of the Sangam age like 'ceykintu' gave rise now to the form 'cheykinta' by the addition of a relative participle suffix a and then personal suffixes were added to form the various kinds of finite verbs like 'cheykinten', 'cheykintan' etc.

After Malik Kafur's invasion of the south in the 14th century, the influence of the North naturally increased; there was a greater admixture of Sanskrit words, most of which, however, were Tamilised as risi becoming richi and 'kshanam' becoming 'chanam'; a more radical change was ashyam becoming achinkam. In Tamil words themselves, a tendency to shorten the vowels after long consonants or clusters was becoming evident, as 'kanpam' and 'tanner' becoming respectively 'kanpam' and 'tanni' clearly convenience of enunciation guided this as well as the loss of final u after r as in vayitu becoming 'vayar'; also 'untan' becomes 'untan' universally in the Tamil country.

The likely borrowings from Tamil to Sanskrit as suggested by Emeneau and other eminent writers are: 'mayura' 'khala' and 'phala' are borrowed from 'mayil', 'kalam' and 'palam'; 'bala' was borrowed at a very early (Vedic) stage from 'val', a Dravidian root meaning "to be strong". From these pieces of evidence one may infer that Dravidian people were neighbours of the Rig Vedic people who borrowed many such words (besides customs and gods and methods of worship) from the former. Clearly words for the fauna and flora not found in Central Asia but met with by the Aryans in India were adopted from the Dravidian, like 'Ketaki' from 'Kaitai' for the fragrant screwpine, 'ela' from 'elam', the cardamom, and 'mayura' from 'mayil', the peacock. Similarly the Aryans who were a land-locked race took most of the maritime vocabulary from the Dravidian like 'mina' from 'min' (fish) and 'mouktikam' for 'muthu' (pearl).

Tamil and Dravidian words are found in the languages of many countries with which there was commerce or other forms of contact; thus Dravidian words have been traced in Chinese and Thai languages in Sinhalese and in the languages of the Middle East. For instance articles sent from India like peacock feathers which were welcomed as curiosities in Assyria carried their Tamil name too and were known only by that name in the country importing the article. French words and English words have been borrowed in the last 3-4 centuries but it is not always realised that French and English languages have borrowed a number of Tamil words, in their turn.

We can now consider briefly the changes that have taken place in the language in recent times. The progressive steps through which these changes have taken place can be traced in some cases through grammars written at various points of time like the Viracoliyam.

An important development in recent times, linguistically speaking, is the multiplication of dialects among the Tamils in Sri Lanka, Malaysia and South Africa and in India itself, in Bangalore and Andhra Pradesh. Talking of the variations within South India itself we can point to the different ways in which i is pronounced—as y in 'payam' for 'palam' in Madras, as c in North Arcot ('icru' for 'ilu') as s in Chidambaram ('tiruvisa' for 'tiruvila') and as i in the southern districts and in Sri Lanka. 'Pandal' is used in Chettinad only to indicate a funeral shed.

On account of these differences of dialects, contrasts existing in one do not exist in others. Another thing to be noted is that some changes usually noted to occur do not occur in some specific cases to avoid a pathological homonymic tension; for instance; though i and u in the initial syllable change into e and o respectively when not followed by a high vowel, 'ivan' (this man), 'muttai' (egg) and 'muttam' (courtyard) do not become 'evan' and 'mottai' and 'mottam' as the meanings change radically.

An important development is the nasalisation of vowels; it will be found that the nasal vowels have become distinct phonemes from the last century.

A development leading to the introduction of the voiced plosives as separate phonemes is due to the use of foreign words with voiced plosives in the initial position like 'pavam' (sin) and 'bavam' (idea). Clusters were avoided in the earlier forms of the language but they occur in today's speech frequently; clusters of even these consonants are heard. Vowel contrasts get clearly established as in 'idu' (put) and 'idu' (equal, comparable) and 'odi' (break) and 'Odi' (having run).

In morphology, in past tense conjugation of finite verbs and even some participles, the final morph with the longer vowel has been uniformly adopted like 'tinna' (he ate). Also 'kontu' becomes 'ktu' in most dialects and 'k'nu' in Madras as in etuttuk 'tu' and etuttuk 'nu' (having taken).

Some honorific suffixes developed as society became more sophisticated and it was felt necessary to distinguish some from the others; the plural suffix 'ar' was added to the masculine and feminine forms to show respect. This is in the third person; in the I and II person, the plural form itself was used.

New words are being formed with the help of auxiliaries in Tamil: 'mel' (above) and 'par' (look) together yield 'metpar' (supervise). This is a prolific device in modern Tamil yielding a host of meaningful terms that have enriched the language; this device is particularly useful for forming words to express new concepts spawned by the vast changes in the world of today.

A.V.S.

LANGUAGE (Telugu). Telugu is the most widely spoken language of the Dravidian family. In terms of population Telugu ranks second to Hindi among the Indian languages. According to the 1971 Census, Telugu is spoken by 43.4 millions in Andhra Pradesh. Taking into account the Telugu speakers residing in the other states within India and also in the other parts of the world, we can easily say that Telugu is the first language of at least 60 million people.

The evolution of Telugu can be traced through centuries in terms of its form as well as its function. The formal evolution of Telugu should show how modern Telugu can be traced to its earliest beginnings through several stages of change. The functional evolution should deal with the varying roles in which the language has been used through centuries.

The reconstructed parent of all the modern Dravidian languages, called Proto-Dravidian, split up into three sub-families some 5,000 years ago, viz., South Dravidian, Central Dravidian and North Dravidian. The Southern sub-family split up into two branches around 2000 to 1500 B.C. One of these branches known as South Dravidian I developed into the modern Southern languages—Kannanda, Toda, Kota, Kodagu, Inula Tamil and Malayalam. The other branch known as South Dravidian II developed into Telugu, Gondi, Konda (or kubi), Kui, Kuvi, Pengo, and Manda. There is evidence to show that even by the 5th or 6th century B.C. Telugu emerged as an independent language—no longer mutually intelligible with its sister languages. Although culturally Telugu is closer to its southern neighbours—Tamil and Kannada, genetically it is closer to its northern neighbours, Gondi, Konda, Kui, Kuvi, Pengo and Manda. There is evidence to show that these languages freely borrowed vocabulary from Telugu even from the pre-historic period, whereas borrowing between Telugu and Tamil-Kannada has been mostly during the historic period, i.e., after the 5th century B.C.

It is possible to identify broadly four stages in the history of the Telugu language: (1) 200 B.C.-500 A.D., (2) 500 A.D.-1100 A.D. (3) 1100 A.D.-1400 A.D. (4) 1400 A.D. -1900 A.D. During the first phase we only come across Telugu place names and personal names in the Prakrit and Sanskrit inscriptions found in the Telugu country. From this we know that the people's language was Telugu although the language of the rulers was different. The first complete Telugu inscription belongs to the Renati Cholas, found in Errangudipadu, Kamalapuram Taluk, Kadapa district about 575 A.D. It appears that literature also existed in Telugu about the same time, because we find a literary style in the inscriptions some three centuries even before Nannaya's (1020 A.D.) Mahabharata. By the time of Nannaya the popular language had considerably diverged from the literary language as can be inferred from such forms as 'istimi' 'we gave', 'eembhay' 'fifty', 'tombha' 'ninety' as opposed to the corresponding literary forms of Nannaya, viz., 'ichchitimi', 'yabadi', 'tombadi'. Telugu was exposed to the influence of the Sanskrit and Prakrit languages and literatures as early as the 3rd century B.C.

The literary language confined to the poetic works flourished in the courts of Kings and among the scholars. Sound changes which occurred in the popular language are reflected in the literary language, although the two streams remained apart in grammar and vocabulary. Most of the sound changes which took place between the 7th and the 9th centuries got settled by the 11th/12th centuries.

The literary language got stylized and rigid shutting itself off the influence of the contemporary spoken language. Keetana (13th century A.D.), a disciple of Tikkana, prohibited the use of spoken words in the poetic works and quoted some spoken forms; 'techchutaadu' 'he will bring', 'mammu' 'us also', 'panchaakumu' 'don't divide', 'toopin chakumu' 'don't cause to push', etc. These examples provide valuable evidence on the form of the spoken language of that period as well as on the high-brow attitude of the literati even on the educated speech.

Many changes, phonetic and grammatical, continued to affect the spoken language as are evidenced from the inscriptional language. Z which split up into r and D was slowly on its way out in the written form.

During 1400-1900 A.D. period many changes culminating in today's form of Telugu took place: Kr-, tr-, pr-, etc. totally became K-, t-, p-, by losing r, e.g. krotta kotta, krinda kinda etc. Iyaka/iyaka 'without giving', cheyaka/cheyyaka 'without doing', etc.

Forms in -tu make their appearance in the inscriptional language, e.g., palistu 'ruling', cheestu 'doing'. In the sense of 'must' in the 2nd person, forms like etteedi '(one) must raise' became popular in the place of the poetic ettundi, etc. In the place of older wachchinan, cheesinan, one finds by the 16th and 17th centuries only forms like wachchina, cheesina etc. They are there in present-day Telugu.

The prose language of the 19th century as can be seen from 'kaifiyats' shows the educated speech as base with occasional influence of the literary language. We also notice the influence of the Urdu language on Telugu before the English education spread.

From the foregoing overview of the history of the Telugu language one can see that what we now use as modern standard Telugu had its origins in the spoken variety right from the 10th century. The language was progressively enriched by contact with Sanskrit, Prakrit, Urdu and English from the beginning of its history.

Until the advent of the printing press and the school system of education, Telugu was broadly used in four areas: (1) inscriptions, (2) folk literature, (3) poetry and (4) common speech (social and perhaps official). The language of the inscriptions has always been based on the contemporary speech of the educated with occasional admixture of literary and rustic expressions. Folk literature—in the form of songs—drew mainly on the speech of the common people among whom it circulated—basically rural in its base. Both in its appeal and its form, the poetic language was confined to royal courts and the interested elite and care was taken to keep it insulated from the speech of even the scholars and poets who used it in other areas of communication. Because of this restriction on the medium, prose never emerged as a form of classical literature in Telugu. Even the sparse scientific writing on prosody, arithmetic, medicine, and grammar was cast either in Telugu verse or in Sanskrit shlokas. The emergence of popular literary forms like the shataka, devotional songs, and the yaksagana, necessitated extensive reliance on contemporary spoken language to extend their appeal and expressiveness. Early commentaries, historical accounts (like Rayavachakam), and the few prose works that were written for instructional purposes in the first half of the 19th century were all written in educated speech which was distinct from the language of the literary dialect. In 1853, Chinnayasuuri, a Telugu Pundit in the Pachchayyappa College, first experimented with a prose variety based on the classical poetic language in his book Nitichandrika. In 1855 he published Baalavyakaranamu, an excellent grammar of the poetic language—but was intended for school study and as guide to 'correct writing'. These works had, to some extent, given support to the traditional pundits who upheld the kaavyabhasha as primary and the spoken language as its degenerate variety. The influence of Chinnayasuri temporarily arrested the growth of creative prose by famous writers until Gurazada appeared on the scene and first produced his social play Kanyashulkam in 1897 in a near-modern language. The controversy that raged between the two schools, classical and modern, subsided in 1919 with a victory for the classicists to perpetuate the use of the so-called granthika (or the poetic dialect) as the text-book language and as the examination medium. However, teaching has all along been done only in the spoken variety of the teacher.

For about 90 years (1850-1940) Telugu prose had a stunted development, although scholars like Kandukuuri Viresalingam and Paanuganti used a 'liberalized poetic variety' in their writings which was neither fully classical nor fully modern. But for Chinnayasuri and the subsequent controversy, perhaps better novels in Telugu would have come at about the same time as in Bengali or even earlier.

Since the forties, Telugu prose style got out of the clutches of the traditional pundits. The emergence of the mass media of communication—like the radio, the cinema, the language newspapers and new forms of writing under the impact of the Nationalist movement reinforced the importance of the spoken word and various literary forms blossomed in modern language. By and large, the prosperous Krishna-Godavari belt became the breeding group of many writers and scholars and their spoken variety entered various prose forms and slowly spread to the other areas assimilating other dialects. The language used in all modern forms of literature and newspapers now has a great degree of uniformity and acceptability which lends it the status of a standard language. Now the nationalized text-books and those prescribed for Telugu language degrees by Universities are the only 'sanctuaries' of the poetic dialect.

In April 1964, a Seminar sponsored by the State Government was held on the campus of Sri Venkateswara University under the Chairmanship of the late Sri Pingali Lakshmikantham to resolve the style controversy in school books. It was resolved at this seminar that only the modern language should be used for all subjects (non-1st language) books written in Telugu and in all the 2nd language books. This resolution has been implemented in the case of subject text-books produced by the Telugu Akademi, although a few odd forms like chuuDawale (instead of chuuDaali) '(one) must see', pustakamu (instead of pustakam) occur in the name of standardization of the language. The Andhra University Academic Council resolved in 1973 that modern Telugu should be allowed as the examination medium and modern literature should also be prescribed for study at the University level. In 1971 the Sri Venkateswara University permitted the use of modern Telugu for Ph.D. theses in Telugu. In 1966 Telugu became the official language of the State and it was decided in 1974 that correspondence at the Taluk level would only be in Telugu. In 1969 Telugu as the medium of instruction was introduced on a large scale in higher education.

It must be noted that no language can ever be spoiled. However, wrong planning and rigidity may slow down the process of its growth. Correct language planning involves mainly creating conditions under which the inherent processes of language-change and growth are allowed free play to speed up the development of the language.

LANGUAGE (Tibeto-Burman). A large number of languages of India spoken in the States of Assam, Nagaland, Manipur, Tripura, in parts of Meghalaya Sikkim, Arunachal Pradesh and Mizoram in north-eastern India and in the Laddakh region of Jammu & Kashmir and in northern hill areas of U.P. and Himachal Pradesh bordering Tibet, belong to the Tibeto-Burman sub-family in the Indo-Chinese or Sino-Tibetan family. All the languages of Indo-Chinese family except those belonging to the Tai or Chinese branches were considered to belong to the Tibeto-Burman sub-family. There are about 3 million people in India speaking these languages scattered in an area covering about 3,00,000 sq. Km.

The study of the Tibeto-Burman sub-family of languages was initiated through the work of a Norwegian scholar, Sten Konow, with Sir George Abraham Grierson for a linguistic survey of India. For this work sample vocabularies and texts were gathered from about 113 languages and 82 dialects, all of which showed similarities in vocabulary, grammar and phonology. These languages were then classified together as members of the Tibeto-Burman sub-family.

There was inherent limitation in the linguistic studies involved in Grierson's Linguistic Survey of India, mainly due to two reasons: (a) The Survey was conducted mainly for the languages of India within the geographical boundary of India and even the reliable data pertaining to a large number of the languages spoken on the borders were not-available. Later on linguistic data regarding more than 300 different Sino-Tibetan languages belonging to India and the neighbouring countries were published throwing more light on their linguistic traits. (b) The Grierson study was of a very preliminary nature which is a common trait of any pioneering work. Grierson classified the Tibeto-Burman sub-family of languages into three branches, which are (a) Tibeto-Himalayan, (b) North-Assam branch and (c) Assam-Burmese branch of languages. The classification of the North-Assam branch of languages, spoken by the people of Arunachal Pradesh was not based on philological considerations; it was only a geographical one. The reason was that only four out of about thirty languages of Arunachal Pradesh were included in the Linguistic Survey of India and the material available at that time was too scanty for any detailed philological study. Apart from the vocabulary of the Aka language spoken in the hills immediately north of the plains of the Darang district of Assam and on the south-east corner of Bhutan by a small tribe—prepared by Robinson (1841), Hesselmeyer (1868) and Enderson (1896) and the grammars and dictionaries of Abor-Miris, residing in the neighbourhood of Sadiya in the immediate nearness by Needham, Lorrain and Haimilton,—there was no other published material available at that time. The same was true of a large number of Naga languages as the area covered by the Tuensang and Mon districts of Nagaland and the Tirap district of Arunachal Pradesh remained unadministered even after the publication of the Linguistic Survey of India.

The Tibeto-Himalayan languages were classified by Grierson into three groups. The first group was termed as Tibetan or Bhoti group. The main Tibetan is a tonal language and is highly developed and has enormous Buddhist literature in it. Laddakhi, Balti and Purik languages are spoken in Laddakh and Baltistan regions of Jammu & Kashmir. Among them Laddakhi has dictionaries and some literature. They constitute Western Bhotia sub-group of languages. The main Tibetan constitutes the Central sub-group of the same. The Eastern sub-group consists of Lhoke (Bhotia) of Bhutan, Danjongka (Sikkimese Bhotia) of Sikkim, a few minor languages of Nepal and Bhotia languages of the northern hills of Uttar Pradesh i.e., Nyamkat, Jad, Kagta, etc. and the Spiti dialect of Himachal Pradesh.

The other two groups of Tibeto-Himalayan languages are pronominal languages and non-pronominal languages. Pronominal languages include the languages spoken in parts of northern U.P. hills (Kanawari is most important among them) and northern Nepal, where Limboo, Rai, Dhimali, Khambu, Thami etc. are spoken. A large number of people speaking these languages have settled in Sikkim and Darjeeling hills of West Bengal. Pronominal languages show great resemblance to the Munda languages in many ways. Non-pronominal languages show less influence of Munda languages on them. Many of these languages (like Gurung, Murmi, Sunwar, Newari etc.) were originally spoken in Nepal. They are spoken by a large number of Nepali people of Darjeeling. Rong (Lepcha) is used in Sikkim.

The Assam-Burmese branch of the Tibeto-Burman family, according to Grierson, was classified into 4 groups, viz., Bodo, Naga, Kuki-Chin and Kachin group of languages.

Bodo (Kachari), Dimasa, Lalung, Koch, Rabha, Garo, Tripuri, Chutia and Moran constitute the Bodo group of languages. Except in the case of the Bodo-speaking population of parts of Golapara and Kamrup districts of Assam, other Bodos in the plain areas of the Brahmaputra and the Surma valleys have more or less forgotten their mother tongue, and have adopted the Assamese and Bengali languages respectively. The Naga group of languages are spoken in Nagaland, in the Tirap district of Arunachal Pradesh and the northern hill districts of Manipur. There are sixteen major languages spoken in the State of Nagaland. They are Ao, Angami, Sema, Lotha, Konyak, Chokri, Kheja, Rengma, Sangtam,

LANGUAGE-TIBETO-BURMAN

Pochury, Yimchungru Phom, Chang, Khiamngan, Zemi and Liangmai. Except Zemi and Liangmai. The languages of Nagaland are divided into Western, Central and Eastern sub-groups. Zemi and Liangmai along with Kabui and Khoirao languages of the north-west Manipur hills constitute Naga-Bodo sub-group of the Naga group of languages. They form a link between the Naga and the Bodo languages. Languages of north and north-east Manipur i.e., Mao (or Sopvoma), Tangkhul, Maram and Maring along with the Karbi language of the Mikir Hills district of Assam form a link between the Naga and the Kuki languages and are termed as Naga-Kuki sub-groups of the Naga group of languages.

Kuki-Chin group of languages are spoken in Mizoram, in the south and western hills of Manipur and in parts of the North Cachar Hills of Assam and in south-west Nagaland. The most important member of this group is Manipuri, which is not a tribal language. Mizo (previously known as Lushai) is the lingua franca of Mizoram. Paite, Hmar, Thadou, Gangte, Simte, Zou, Kom etc. are other languages of this group. Singpho is the only Kachin language in India which is spoken by about 3,000 people in Tirap and by a thousand people in the Lohit district of Arunachal Pradesh. Singphos are the Kachins of Burma who came to India in the later half of the 18th century. Initially it seemed incredible that about 200 mutually unintelligible languages of the Tibeto-Burman sub-family should be the mother-tongues of only 40,000,000 people, while hundreds of millions of people spoke a few dozen Chinese, Mizo-yao and Tali languages. The fact that there is indeed more linguistic diversity in the area covered by speakers of the Tibeto-Burman languages than in any other comparable area of group of related languages was confirmed after the publication of linguistic data on more than 300 different Sino-Tibetan languages.

Recently, scholars have started considering Sino-Tibetan to be a linguistic phylum or macro-family (a linguistic phylum or macro-family is a major division of languages, whose member families have common ancestral language, which may or may not be reconstructible), although undoubtedly, all the languages formerly classified as Tibeto-Burman tend to show more agreement among themselves than do other Sino-Tibetan languages. The Sino-Tibetan linguistic phylum consists of nine more or less co-ordinate language families, which are Chinese, Tibetan, Burmese-Lolo, Miao-Yao, Kam-Tai, Karen, r-Gyarung-Mishmi, Bodo-Tangsa-Kachin and Naga-Chin. Due to this classification the validity of Tibeto-Burman sub-family hypothesis is likely to remain questionable for years to come. Even then the term 'Tibeto-Burman' is still useful to cover those Sino-Tibetan families, which differ from the Chinese, Miao-Yao and Kam-Tai.

Among the Tibeto-Burman families, India does not have Burmese-Lolo and Karen speakers. The r-Gyarung-Mishmi family is divided into three widely separated branches consisting of the Mishmi dialects spoken in the Lohit district of Arunachal Pradesh.

A few dialects of Tibetan are spoken in India in the Himalayan Border states, which are divided into several distinct branches on the basis of pronominal affixes to the verb. The Naga-Chin family covers a few dozen languages spoken in Nagaland, Mizoram, and parts of Manipur, Assam-hills and Tirap district of Arunachal Pradesh. Apart from the Naga and Chin languages, they also include ancient Meithei and Sak. Their area extends upto the Chin Hills State of Burma and the Chittagong Hills of Bangladesh in the Arakan mountains. The cover term 'Bodo-Tangsa-Kachin' is given to the language family from its three major language branches. Bodo languages are spoken from Bhutan southward to Tripura State and in North Cachar Hills district of Assam. The Kachin languages are spoken from Western Yunnan throughout North Burma into the Arunachal Pradesh of India. Tangsa languages are spoken in between the two, mostly in the Tirap district of Arunachal Pradesh. They were formerly classed with the Naga languages.

Rong (Lepcha), Limboo and Laddakhi are the only three Tibeto-Burman Indian languages, which had their own scripts. Most of the Naga-Chin languages and some others e.g., Garo is now written in Roman script. Bodo and the dialects of Arunachal and some others are written in the Devanagari script and a few like Tripuri and Manipuri are written in the Bengali script.

Dictionaries of the Ao, Tangkhul, Dimasa Cachari, Lushai and a few other languages and grammars of Ao, Angami, Lotha, Sema, Mikir and few other languages were prepared by Christian Missionaries and British Administrators for which they used the Roman script. The Roman script is also used in a large number of the Bible translations. Nagaland Bhasha Parishad, a registered voluntary organisation has published lexicons, grammars and self-teachers of 56, 16 and 15 Tibeto-Burman tribal languages of India respectively in which Devanagari is used for writing the respective languages (except the Naga-Chin languages where Devanagari and Roman both are used).

1. Except for Balti and Purik, all the Tibeto-Burman languages are tonal in nature. The tonal contrasts are observed from the simple two level system of the Tibetan dialects (such as Mompa, Memba, Lahuli and Laddakhi) to complex three-four level system (as in most of the Naga languages) and in a rare case, as in Angami Naga language, up to six. The tone is an integral part of the phonetic syllable. The lexical meanings change with change of tone.

2. Most of the Tibeto-Burman languages of India are agglutinative. They show varying degrees of inflection usually expressed by affixes without changing the roots. They show a much lesser degree of monosyllabism and isolating structure.

LANGUAGE-URDU

3. The Naga-Chin, Mishmi and Tibetan dialects exhibit pronominal agreement expressed within the verb-affixal structure.

4. The primary or head word (noun and verb) is preceded by modifying words, phrases and clauses with affixal particles following. Categories of voice, mode, direction and aspect are usually included in inflectional affixes with verb forms.

LANGUAGE (Urdu). Like classical Persian, Urdu is a 'mixed' language, as is indicated by one of its early names 'Rekhta' (mixed one). However, its being a mixed language does not deprive it of having a root and a linguistic history. Like all modern Indo-Aryan languages, it has passed through three stages of development, viz., Old Indo-Aryan (OIA), Middle Indo-Aryan (MIA) and New Indo-Aryan (NIA). In the NIA period, it developed from Shaurseni Apabhramsha which was current in the eleventh century in the 'Madhya Desha' (Midland, comprising Haryana, western U.P. and the northern tracts of Madhya Pradesh). Grierson calls the language of this region Western Hindi, sub-divided into five dialects:

A. 'a' based dialects:

- (1) Khadi Boli
- (2) Haryanavi

B. 'o' based dialects:

- (1) Braj Bhasha
- (2) Kannauji
- (3) Bundeli

In the first group of dialects, the nominal and verbal endings take the (-a) form like 'ghora' (horse), 'chala' (went), while the dialects of the second group usually end in (-o) like 'ghoro' and 'chalo'.

Urdu is based on the first group of dialects converging on the royal city of Delhi. The linguistic shift is from Haryanavi to Khadi Boli.

The earliest mention of the Urdu language is found in the Persian writings of Amir Khusrau (Nuh Sepehr, 1318), who includes it as a separate language in his list of ten principal languages of India. He calls it "the language of Delhi and its environment", and clearly distinguishes it on the one hand from 'Lahauri' (Punjabi) and on the other hand from 'Aud' (Awadhi). He, however, makes no mention of Braj Bhasha.

The Muslims conquered Delhi in 1193. The Sultans of Delhi marched to Gujarat and Deccan under the banner of Allauddin Khilji and reached Tamil Nadu in 1312. Muhammad Bin Tughlaq (1325-1351) made his great experiment of shifting the capital from Delhi to Daulatabad (Devagiri) in 1327 unsuccessfully and lost his Deccan Empire to the Bahmanis in 1347. The ruling classes of the Bahmanis mostly belonged to the north and spoke some kind of 'Zaban-e-Delhi'. In the Deccan they found themselves in a totally alien linguistic environment,—Marathi in the west, Telugu in the east and Kannada in the south-west. With the break-up of the Bahmani Empire by the end of the fifteenth century, Bijapur in the Kannada area and Golkunda in the Telugu region emerged as the great centres of the Hindi/Hindavi, later on Dakhani Urdu.

A linguistic analysis of the written Dakhani Urdu between 1455 and 1700, provides interesting insight into the nature of the language carried over to Deccan from Delhi and preserved in the alien linguistic environment of the three languages mentioned above, including Kannada and Telugu of the Dravidian stock.

Dakhani differs from modern Urdu in many linguistic features. These are the features which must have been current in and around Delhi during the times of Amir Khusrau, but have been lost since then in the onward march of Urdu. The literary growth of Urdu in the north remained stunted as Persian remained the dominating language of the court, administration, learning and literature. We can, however, reconstruct the type of language spoken in the bazaar of Delhi by piecing together the remanent of Dakhani as preserved in its literature.

On the phonological level, Dakhani Urdu has the following peculiarities:

- (1) Shortening of vowels: in linguistic terminology, replacement of long vowels by short vowels.

asmaan	for	aasman	sky
hath	for	haath	hand
sunna	for,	sona	gold

- (2) Over-nasalization of vowels:

bolnan	bolna	speaking
bunti	buti	shrub
munj	muj(h)	me
kuncha	kucha	lane

LANGUAGE-URDU

(3) Loss of aspirates and aspiration:

charna	charhna	to climb
suka	sookha	dry
aguti	anguthi	ring

(4) Change of retroflex consonants into dental:

dhundna	dhundhna	to search
tutna	tutna	to break

(5) Change of (q) to (x)

axal	aq(a)l	wisdom
qabar	xabar	news

Morphological features:

1. Gender is sometimes reverse of that of standard Urdu:

(a) Masculine instead of feminine dua (prayer), raah (path), daulat (wealth), izzat (honour), muhabbat (love), bhaun (eye-brow), namaaz (prayer), masjid (mosque)

(b) Feminine instead of masculine:

adab (respect), naau (name), khwaab (dream)

2. Number:

The standard plural suffix in Dakhni Urdu is (-an) instead of modern (-on) hathan	hathon	hands

aurtaan	aurton	women
motiaan	motion	pearls
logaan	logon	people

3. Dakhani Urdu pronouns also differ from modern Urdu

(a) haun ('I' along with 'main'), haman and hamna ('we' along with 'ham'), muj, munj ('me' along with 'muj').

(b) tain ('thou' along with 'tun'), tuman, tumna ('you' along with 'tuman', 'tumna')

(c) une ('he/she' along with 'o' 'vo'), uno ('they' along with 'un' and 've') yeh ('this' is 'yo', 'e'), its plural is 'ye'.

4. Verbs:

The principal features of the Dakhani Urdu verbs are:

(a) It sometimes uses (-n) instead of usual (-na) for infinitive dhundan (to search), autan (to boil), rahan (to live)

(b) Along with usual forms of incomplete verbs ahe (for hai=is), atha (for tha=was) and its different forms are also used.

(c) The past tense, in contrast to modern Urdu, is formed by adding (-ya) instead of (-a), uthya for utha (raised) rahya for raha (remained) etc. This is a peculiar form of Haryanavi.

(d) A very important, although rare feature, is Dakhani's future tense formation by adding se, sen, sun, si. These forms are usually preceded by a negative 'na'.

5. The key words of Dakhani are 'nako' (for nahin) and (-ch) for hi=also.

Dakhani also differs from Urdu in its syntactic structure, wherein feminine plural dominates the formation of the sentence. The absence of nominative particle 'ne' changes the composition of the whole sentence. The Dakhani Urdu draws heavily on the Prakrit vocabulary which led some Hindi scholars to assume that under the name of Hindavi, it could be assimilated into the mainstream of Hindi literature, although it is an oversimplification of the linguistic facts. In fact Dakhani literature, with all its significant features, is the oldest form of Urdu.

The earliest specimens of northern Urdu do not go beyond the later part of the 16th century, the most authentic being the language recorded in Afzal's (d. 1625) Bikat kahani. The specimens of the language during the 17th century, as found in the north, show the continuity of certain features of Dakhani Urdu, such as shortening of vowels, their over-nasalization, de-aspirisation, etc. The gender of some of the nouns is still unstable; for example, 'bahar' (spring), 'jan' (life) 'rah' (path) sham (evening) were used as masculine. By the end of 17th century, the (-on) plural was well established. But (-an) plural still lingered on, especially due to the influence of the Persian language. Regionalism interfered in the process of standardization. However standardization of the language continued throughout the 18th century. Mazhar Jan Janan (1699-1781) led the movement culminating in the writings of the great masters like Sauda (1706-1781) and Mir Taqi Mir (1722-1810).

The change of the capital from Delhi to Agra in 1504 and back by Shahjahan in 1648, played a very important part in the development of Urdu. One hundred and fifty years' stay in Agra brought all the linguistic influences of Braj Bhasha that Urdu could assimilate. It softened the tone by adopting long vowels, and discarded overgemination of consonants like baddal (cloud) chaddar (sheet), gaddi (carriage), etc. It rejected outright retroflex (n) common in Khadi Boli area. At grammatical level, Braj (-t) was fully established in Urdu as (-ta) for aorist tense, e.g. chalta for chalay, etc.

The process of standardization continued in a new centre at Lucknow during the 18th century. By this time further rejection of vocables of Prakrit origin was completed. These were replaced by Perso-Arabic words the number of which increased as Urdu developed into a strong vehicle for political, scientific and journalistic literature under the inspiration of Syed Ahmad Khan and other stalwarts of the period like Shibli, Hali, Abul Kalam Azad and Muhammad Iqbal.

In 1917, a University with Urdu medium was established in the erstwhile dominion of the Nizam. Overnight a mass of scientific literature was translated from English to Urdu by its Translation Bureau. Terminology Boards for various disciplines were set up. The supra-structure that was fabricated for this purpose was totally based on Arabic and Persian sources. It seemed that the manifold growth of the language was now complete.

It was at this point of time that the 'Great Divide' came. The growth of Urdu as a medium of higher learning has, since then, stunted in India. It, however, continues in Pakistan on the lines finalised in the corridors of the late Jamia Osmania of Hyderabad. The standardization of Urdu was hampered by the unnatural division of the country. Delhi, Lucknow and Hyderabad are no more the centres of Urdu. Lahore and Karachi cannot be, situated as they are in the midst of the Punjabi and the Sindhi languages. Urdu is now a linguistic minority, with no region of its own. The only state which has honoured it as official language is the state of Jammu and Kashmir, where it is the mother tongue of not more than a few thousand people.

Urdu is significant for its unique scripts also, which is an adaptation of Perso-Arabic system of writing. It shares this common feature with Kashmiri and Sindhi. This script was employed for Urdu from the very beginning and is a part and parcel of the language.

LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE (Austic-Khasi). The Khasi Language, with its many dialects, is on present evidence, the only representative of the Mon-Khmer Language Family on the Indian sub-Continent, its nearest relatives being the speech forms spoken over a wide area of South Asia, stretching from Northern Burma to what used to be known as Indo-China.

Its affinity to these languages has been marked by philologists since the mid-19th century. For a fuller description of the works of these men, notably Professor Ernst Kuhn of Munich, Pater Schmidt of Vienna and others, reference may be made to the Chapter on language in P.R.T. Gurdon's monograph on the Khasis (Gurdon: 1914). Common features in Khasi and the other Mon-Khmer languages, as pointed out by Pater Schmidt include the phonetic systems, the widely extended agreement in vocabulary, agreement in important points of grammar as well as in the system of affixation, including infixation, of which Khasi has many examples; e.g., snad (comb) and sad (to comb), shnong (village) and shong (to dwell); shlur (brave) and shur (to venture) and others. In point of vocabulary, one needs only to consider a few basic words—words relating to items of food and drink, parts of the body, aspects of nature and to accept the proposition advanced by these scholars. A few of these may be cited as examples:

day	Khasi 'sngi'; 'tngoi' (Mon) and 'sengei' (Palaung)
year	Khasi 'snem'; 'snam' (Mon) and 'sanam' (Bahnar) water	Khasi 'um' (cp. 'am' in the Khasi dialect of Amwi); 'em' (Palaung), 'um' 'to bathe' in Stieng.
bird	Khasi 'sim'; 'hsim' (Palaung and Wa)
eye	Khasi 'khmat'; 'mat' (Mon, Stieng, Bahnar, Annam) to weep	Khasi 'iām' (pron. yām); yam '(Mon, Khmer, Palaung) one	Khasi 'wei' ('mi' in the Khasi dialect of Amwi); 'mwoi' (Mon), 'muoi' (Stieng) six	Khasi 'hynriew' ('thrao' in the Amwi dialect); 'trou' (Bahnar); 't'rou' (Mon)

This theory must hold even when it is argued, as some Khasi scholars have done, that the large number of Indo-Aryan words in Khasi suggest a different origin.

Radhon Singh Lyngdoh, who holds a different view, has pointed out that the total number of Indo-Aryan words in U Nissor Singh's Khasi-English Dictionary is about 400 out of a total of over 6800 entries, surely a very small percentage. Even if the proportion were greater, one would hesitate to urge the second view as even in English the proportion of borrowed words to native words would be at least 7:3 Even more important than the number of words is the grammatical system. The order of words in the Khasi syntax is Subject—Verb—Object. In does not also take long to realize that the Khasi verb very often performs the function of an adjective, whence it is often specified as an attributive verb as distinct from a verb of action. For example,

'U briew u ba iong' may be loosely translated as 'a dark man' and 'iong' has been described in many of the earlier grammars as an adjective. However, an almost identical constuction 'u briew u ba shong' means 'a man who sits'. Further, the word iong can like any verb take the tense affixes "yn" or "n" (future) and "la" (past) e.g.,

'Phi'n (phi=you + 'n) iong lada phi shah sngi=You will be dark if you expose yourself to the sun.

'U la iong ba u shah sngi=He has become dark because of exposure to the sun.

Borrowings there have been, and are still taking place, and these have served to enrich and invigorate the Khasi language. Those of an earlier period, i.e., prior to the 19th century, will reveal that in the process they were reshaped to conform to the requirements of the Khasi phonetic system, which does not possess several sounds found in Indo-Aryan; e.g., /g/ or final aspirates or final consonant clusters. A few examples will show how these foreign elements were adapted into Khasi.

The first descriptive grammar of Khasi appeared in 1855. This was Rev. W. Pryse's Introduction to the Khasi Language based to some extent on the material collected by Thomas Jones. In some ways this is more satisfactory than the later grammar prepared by the Rev. Hugh Roberts. The first one, however, to be prepared on the basis of modern linguistic principles was Lili Rabel's Khasi, A Language of Assam. A German scholar, Dr Alfons Weidert, made an intensive study of a southern dialect, that of Amwi and published his findings in I T caong Amwi (i.e. the Amwi Speech). A few more have come out in recent years, including a descriptive grammar brought out by Dr. Nagaraj of the Deccan College.

The first Khasi books, written in the Bengali script, were the New Testament (1824) later rewritten by Alexander Lish, and this same missionary's translation of Dr Watt's Catechism. The earlier Testament had been prepared on the basis of material collected in the field by the Bengali convert to Christianity, Krishnachandra Paul, who was chosen by the great William Carey of Serampore to work among the Khasis. Because of the then unsettled conditions in the hills, Krishnachandra Paul had to confine his activities to the area around Pandua in the foothills to the south of the Khasi Hills. To prepare a book on the basis of word lists and on the pattern of the Indo-Aryan grammars was, to say the least, an extremely hazardous venture. Moreover, it is highly probable that in his collection gleaned from informants from various parts of the Khasi-speaking area, Krishnachandra Paul unwittingly included words from a number of dialects, some of them obscure. It is understandable, therefore, that this publication should now be regarded as at best a literary curiosity. It was only when the situation in the hills was made secure by the advent of the British who established their station at Cherrapunji that it was possible for outsiders to work in the hills in security. A young missionary named Alexander Lish, was deputed by Carey to continue the work so faithfully started by Krishnachandra Paul and in 1832, Lish took up his residence at Cherrapunji and opened three schools at Sohra, Mawsmal and Mawmluh. Residing in a single dialect area, Lish started with an advantage that Krishnachandra Paul never had and his translations and writings, also produced in the Bengali script, are acceptable renderings of the Khasi speech.

The emphasis then was on Christian work, and perhaps because the results were not encouraging, the London Missionary Society (to which Lish belonged) closed down its work at Cherrapunji in 1838.

In 1841, however, another missionary, Thomas Jones I and his wife, of what in time became known as the Welsh Presbyterian Mission, arrived at Cherrapunji. The choice of Cherrapunji as a base for mission work was a very happy one, as the local dialect called 'ka ktien Sohra' (the Sohra, i.e., Cherra, dialect) is admittedly the most euphonious of all Khasi dialects and possessed of an ancient rhetorical tradition. Cherra being also an old entrepot in the trade between the Khasi hinterland and the outside world, it is conceivable that many of the words borrowed from other languages, words which have made the Khasi language so facile, came in through Cherrapunji.

Coming direct from Wales, and with no knowledge of Bengali, Thomas Jones who was keen to get the Mission's work started, decided to work with the alphabet best known to him—the Welsh form of the Roman alphabet—using 'c' initially to represent, as in Welsh, the phoneme /k/. It did not take him long to realize that this alphabet was inadequate for Khasi. The word for 'to bless' was initially rendered as 'cyrchhoo', an obviously uncouth form. Finally, Jones devised a 21-letter alphabet which continued to be used in Khasi writing till 1896. These letters were:

A B K D E G* N G H I J L M N O P R S T U W Y $
(*'g' is actually non-existent in Khasi; 'y' is a semi-vowel as in Welsh)

In 1896, two other letters were added—i and ñ—to represent respectively two common Khasi phones, what may be called 'consonantal y' as in English "young", and the palatal nasal as in Spanish "señor". Credit for the innovation must go to Khasi intellectuals who had for some time been airing their views on the state of Khasi literature in the first Khasi periodical, U Khasi mynta (The Khasi today). There is ground to suppose that the man directly responsible for this desirable innovation was U Radhon Singh Berry Kharwanlang (1854-1904).

In a brief appraisal of the development of Khasi literature one can see important influences at work. The period from 1824 to 1880 was a period when Missionary influence was extremely powerful. Scriptures and religious tracts were brought out in a steady stream and even the primers and readers that were used in schools had a very strong doctrinal content. To cite an instance, till 1852 seven books had been published in Khasi five of them being religious publications.

With 1881, we enter a new period, a period of re-awakening, when the Khasis began to look more closely into their own heritage and, farther afield, to the rich resources of Indian literature. This was also a period when the Khasi society produced several eminent personalities like U Jeebon Roy Mairom (1838-1903) U Rabon Singh Kharsuka (1840-1910) U Radhon Singh Berry Kharwanlang (1850-1904) and others whose contribution to Khasi literature have been outstanding. U Jeebon Roy deserves special mention as a writer who, with limited formal education, was yet eminently scholarly. Familiar not only with English but also with Bengali and Sanskrit, he translated into Khasi such classics as the Hitopodesha in four parts (1898-99), the Ramayana (1900), Chaitanya (1900), and Buddhadeva charita (1901) as well as a history of India in Khasi.

Strange as it may appear, it needed the voice of a non-Khasi to awaken the Khasi people to the folly of discarding their own rich heritage. In 1881, Amjad Ali, an expatriate from Murshidabad brought out a collection of short poems under the title Ka myntoi (Benefit, blessing or advantage), two pieces of which were 'Ieng riw Khasi' (Stand up, ye Khasis) and 'Synshar riw Khasi', an exhortation to look to the traditional democratic principles of the community, rather than to others, for good Government.

Over the years, Khasi writers have put their hand to the various genres of literature—poetry, prose and drama.

Apart from Lish's few contributions, mention may be made of Thomas Jones's translations of the Welsh book of catechism, 'Rhodd mam' or "Mother's Gift" (1842) containing the basic tenets of the Christian faith; a Scriptural Catechism (1845); a translation of the Gospel of St Matthew (1846) and a Primer in Khasi (1846) entitled Ca Citab Nyngcong" (i.e. first book). The Rev. William Lewis who followed Thomas Jones to the field prepared a small Scriptural Catechism in 1848. School readers which played an important part in shaping the minds of generations of Khasis were brought out from time to time by the Welsh Mission. U Jeebon Roy himself brought out three such books, Kitab Khasi I-III, in 1899 feeling as he did as a staunch follower of the ancient Khasi faith that such readers were necessary. The coming of Rev. John Roberts to the Khasi & Jaintia Hills in 1871 introduced a breath of fresh air into education. The readers that he prepared and brought out in his capacity as the second Principal of the Normal School for teachers at Cherrapunji included many pieces of general interest likely to catch the mind of growing children, short pieces on Natural History, sections on Khasi grammar, idioms, proverbs and the like as well as stories like 'U Jak Jyntang bin (Jack and the Beanstalk), Ka Jingithuhpaw u Mirsa (from Addison's Vision of Mirza) and telling lessons regarding habits. For his lead, John Roberts has often been called the Father of Khasi literature. His last work Ka Jingiaid u Pilgrim (The Pilgrim's Progress) was published posthumously in 1910.

Among the Khasis, a new generation of intellectuals had come up who realized that the rich folk traditions of the Khasi people and their cultural heritage contained much that they could be proud of. U Rabon Singh Kharsuka brought out two books—Ka kitab niam khein ki Khasi (about rituals of the Khasi faith) and a collection of folk-tales, Ka Jingithuhkhana Puriskam.

Other publications with a cultural motif include

Homiwell Lyngdoh Nonglati's Ka Niam Khasi (1938), an authoritative book on the Khasi religion. His smaller books on the cremation of the Syiems of the Cherra State (Ka Thang Syiem Sohra, 1926) and on the annual goat sacrifice of the Khyrim State (Ka Pomblang mongkrem, 1927). U Primrose Gathphoh published a collection of folk stories—Sawdong Ka Lyngwiar Dpei (Around the hearth) in 1933 and four years later brought out a miscellaneous collection of stories and verses—Ki Khanatang Bad U Sier Lapalang, literally, "legends and the story of a stag". In the same year Father Hopwell Elias Sohlia introduced his own collection of legends, Ki Khantang U Ba Rim. In 1936 and 1937, the Roman Catholic Mission in shillong authorized the publication of two volumes—Ka Riti Jong Ka Ri Laiphew Syiem (the heritage of the land of the thirty kings) i.e., the land of the Khasi people. The collections were edited by an erudite Italian priest, Father Giulio Costa (1901-1970).

In a separate category may be placed U Soso Tham's Ki Phawar U Aesop (Aesop's Fables), U Mondon Barch's miscellany published by his son, U Denzile Barch, in 1956. U Mondon Barch (1878-1932), as a Deputy Inspector of Schools, was quite clear in his mind about the need to expose school-going children to the literatures of other peoples. The collection included translations of Roman and Greek legends but provided a place for local legends. He also brought out his translation of Aladin's lamp (U Aladdin Lame Ka Sharak Jadu separately in 1926).

In the 10th Chapter of his history of Khasi literature R.S. Lyngdoh speaks of the 20 years between 1941 and 1960 as the 'years of lethargy': very little creative work was written during these years. The War with the Japanese, next door in the Naga Hills-Manipur Front, pre-occupation with political pamphleteering but, perhaps, even more than these, the craze for English fiction to the neglect of Khasi literature, were responsible for the decay.

This, happily, was a temporary phase and since 1960 we have seen a steady spurt in the writing of Khasi books. The time that has elapsed since then is too short for a fair assessment of the quality of many of these writings, and, for this reason, mention can only be made of books published up to 1970. Original experiments in fiction writing include Simon Jenkins Duncan's Phuit: Ka Sabuit (1968), a novelette by U Harding Pde, Ka Bih (Poison), dealing with social problems. U.S. Quotient Sumer's Ka Hima Ka Jingieit (The Kingdom of Love) touching on problems that are inherent in inter-racial marriages and the first full-length novel in Khasi, U Dewi Singh Khongdup's U Don Putit in two parts, which shows the writer's consummate skill in the use of the Khasi language.

To close this Section, it is well to remember the contributions of such eminent Khasis as U Jeebon Roy Mairrom and the ideals that lived on in his sons. U Sib Charan Roy (1862-1952), in spite of his pre-occupation with sectarian polemics, completed the translation of Chanakya-niti-darpana (1902) and the Bhagavad Gita (1903). U Rash Mohan Roy, (1872-1962), one of the founder-members of the Seng Khasi, also contributed with his translation of the story of Damayanti, Ka Damayanti Bad U Nol; but the date of its publication is not clear. He also compiled a collection of stories intimately connected with the life of the Khasi people under the title of U Khasi Hyndai (the Khasi in olden times).

Plays, including skits, have been a favourite form of entertainment with Khasi audiences all over the hills for a very long time. Many of the earlier plays, commissioned perhaps for particular occasions, were little more than improvisations, albeit skilful ones.

One of the earliest fragmentary compositions was a translation of part of Julius Caesar by Rev. John Roberts and included by him in his Fourth Reader (1895). We have to wait many years longer to see original Khasi compositions. The first translations worthy of mention were those of Jeebon Roy's sons—U Hari Charan Roy Dkhar's Savitri (1910) and U Dinonath Roy Dkhar's Sromotimail, U Arbnai and U Tipsngi (1924).

U Peace Roy Pariat was a prolific writer whose plays were sponsored by the Khasi Native Club and later by the Panora Club. Many of his plays were written to convey some message to the audience. Many of his plays have been lost, only their names are remembered. Among his best were Ka Jingrhah (Malice, spite), Ka Bor Ksuid Pyrshah Bor Blei (Devilish power against divine power), Na Kyndong Sha Sor (From village to town), and Ka Shang Khawiah Ki Rang (A snare for men). These dealt with social problems, the last being a ruthless exposure of the moral decay during the war years.

U Mondon Bareh had written a play, U Mihsngi, which he, however, could not complete. His son, U Hamlet Bareh Ngapkynta, put the finishing touch to it and published the play in 1965. Another son, U Victor Bareh wrote a play, Ka Drama U Tirot Sing (1956), on the life of the Khasi hero who made a desperate bid to drive out the British from the Khasi Hills but was captured and sent to Dacca as an exile there to die.

U Frank M. Pugh in 1967 brought out two tragedies: Ka Sawangka Ia Ki Sawngut Ba Iah, dealing with the problem of drunkenness and Ka Sawangka La Ki Sawngut Ba Iap Mynsaw, which deals with the insidious effects of incestuous relationships and the inevitability of divine retribution. He also translated Shakespeare's As You Like It though by sticking too closely to the original text, without making allowances for differences in idiom, he failed to produce the effect of the original play.

In 1968, S.J. Duncan brought out his Ka Tiew Larun based on a Khasi story.

A new generation of playwrights is coming up but their works will have to wait for an objective appraisal of their quality and merit. These include U H. Wamphaign

Sten, U Webster Davies Jyrwa, U Hamarbabiang Myllemngap, U.D.S. Khongdup, U Antony Jalla, U Donbok T. Laloo, U Remy Phankon and U Reginald Nongkynrih.

Poetry has been a favourite form of literary expression with Khasi writers since the last century. Even before Khasi was reduced to writing, minstrelsy had for long been very much a part of the Khasi folk tradition, with minstrels captivating their audience while they sang ballads of events, joyous and sad, to the accompaniment of stringed instruments like the 'marynthing' or the 'duitara'. This race of natural poets is sadly fast dwindling, only a few remaining in remote parts of the hills.

One class of composition, the 'phawar', forms an essential part of community celebrations, as after a successful hunt or victory in archery contests. The phawars may be termed rhymed catches, usually in the form of couplets, each line of which is divided into two parts. The first line serves as a rhyme-setter for the corresponding part of the second line and appears as a meaningless string of words, the whole purpose of the chant being expressed in the second line. For example,

U kyndeh ka jalyngkhan, u sohbrap ho ia ka skei;
Wat leit leh kam bymman, ioh tim-pap ho ka blei.
Literally:

He pants for curry-leaf, the passion fruit ho! for the deer,

Do not commit evil, or the goddess will curse.

The couplet was used consistently by U Radhon Singh Berry Kharwanlang as in his collection of maxims, Ka Jingsneng Tymmen (Precepts of the elders) and Ki Akor Khasi (Khasi manners).

Khasi poets have generally shown a preference for the standard forms popular in English poetry, particularly of the Welsh variety as the Welsh missionaries had given a lead with their translations of hymns. It is not possible now to say how many of these hymns were written by the Khasis, but we are on surer ground when we consider anthologies that have been published during the last six decades. Among the pioneers in poetry writing was the Rev. Morkha Joseph Chyne (?-1921) who seems to have written primarily for his own amusement because poems that he had begun to write since the 1890's were only published by his son, U Hilkaiah Tham, in 1967. The first poem was probably 'U Siriapaang' which appeared in the periodical U Nongkit Khubor in the issue of December, 1891. U Morkha Joseph translated many English poems, including Macaulay's "Lays of Ancient Rome" and "Virginia" and others, but these lack the spontaneity of his original compositions on Khasi themes.

Foremost among the Khasi poets to this day is U Soso Tham, a relation of U Morkha Joseph. Discouraged by the lack of Khasi poems that he could use as a model, he decided to write them himself, beginning with his translation of "Drive the Nail Aright" (Sah Beit Ia U Prek). U

Soso Tham's genius lay in his telling use of Khasi idioms which imparted even to translations a new look. The boldness of approach is clearly seen in his translation of Cowper's "John Gilpin". He never allowed himself to be restricted by the language of the original. Consider the following verse:

So 'Fair and Softly', John he cried,
But John he cried in vain,
That trot became a gallop soon,
In spite of curb and rein.

U Soso Tham rendered this as:

'Aste kariwan!' ong u John;
Shano yn 'aste' pat!
Wat la u khun—u kodom phrak,
Ba'n sied syndon arkjat.
This may freely be translated as:
'Aste gadiwaan!' cried John,
But how to 'aste' now!
Pull as he would, it bolted fast
Galloping, feet together.

He did not even hesitate to use a non-Khasi phrase if that served his purpose and conveyed, as he wished, a sense of desperate urgency.

U Soso Tham's output exceeds that of any other Khasi writer both in variety, and interest. His humanity reveals itself in short poems like 'U Sib' in which he has immortalized a blind Khasi street-singer, a natural-born poet like himself, who was very much a part of the Shillong scene in the 1920's. The collection, Ki Poetry Khasi, was first published in 1925.

U Soso Tham's major work is Ki Sngi Barim U Hynniem Trep, literally, 'the olden days of the seven huts' (i.e. the Khasi race), a total of 175 verses under ten main heads, a composition depicting, at times in sombre tones, the career of the race from the Age of Innocence to the present, its lapses into error and consequent alienation from God. The poem, however, ends on a note of encouragement, and the poet's final message is that, whatever its mistakes, the race should learn from experience and realize that its salvation lies in its ability to see, and its strength to pursue, the path of righteousness.

U Soso Tham's son, U Primrose Gatphoh, was also a prolific writer whose contributions to Khasi poetry started with a collection of nursery rhymes and short poems, Ki Phawar Sara Bad Ki Poetry Rit, published in 1928.

Among the more serious poets of the years 1930-1970 mention may be made of U Father Hopewell Elias Sohlia whose Ka Pansngiat Ksiar Ki Saw Aiom (The golden crown of the four seasons) includes many poetical compositions of great merit. U Victor Bareh's Ki Poetry Khasi was first published in 1957. U Dewi Singh Khongdup's Na Lum Khasi and S.J. Duncan's collection of poems included in the Ka Tiew Larun and Kiwei Pat Ki Syntiew both came out in 1968. Here we see lyrical compositions, many of them in the sonnet form, that reveal great depth of thought and feeling.

Since then several writers have come up like U H. Wamphaing Sten, U Weston Dkhar, U Chedrach Jyrwa, U Hamarbabing Mylliengnap, all of whom are regularly bringing out collections of poems which are yet to be fully assessed.

LANGUAGES (Pan Indian). It is a commonplace that India is a subcontinent. Actually the newly-invented name, South Asia, is a convenience in that it covers India, Pakistan, Bangla Desh, Sri Lanka, Nepal and Bhutan, which together constitute a single world region with a geographical, historical, demographic, and to some extent, cultural unity. South Asia also constitutes a linguistic area. The languages of India in spite of their great and complicated variety have to be viewed against this backdrop.

The migration history of the Indian population is still something of an unsolved mystery. However, the study of the various existing and extinct speech varieties of India has made it possible to think of four distinct series of migrations into this subcontinent. The speakers of ancient Dravidian languages came probably through the north-western frontier with the starting base somewhere in the Uralic mountains. Although Dravidian language speakers are today concentrated largely in the far south (Karnatak, Kerala, Tamil Nadu, Andhra Pradesh), it is significant that there are Dravidian language groups scattered in central India and even in distant Baluchistan and Nepal. The speakers of Austro-Asiatic languages must have come through the eastern corner of India from a base in South-East Asia, a world region to the east of South Asia. The speakers of Tibeto-Burman languages are currently found along the north-eastern border of India and probably came in a series of migrations along that border from Tibet and Burma. Even the relative chronology of these three movements is uncertain. Finally, the country saw a major upheaval in its population and linguistic stock as a result of the migrations of Indo-Aryan language speakers from the north-west. There is no scholarly consensus as to the place of the Indus-valley civilization in the linguistic history of this area.

It must be emphasized that the speakers of each group (whether at the time of immigration or at the present time) do not constitute a racially homogenous group, not even a stable collection of racially determinate groups. It is also likely that the biological ancestors, say, of present-day Indo-Aryan or Dravidian speakers may have been speakers of languages of a language family different from their present speech from. We simply must not speak, for example, of the Dravidian race.

Later invaders—one cannot quite call them immigrants—have left only a limited trace on the language map of India. Persian (A.D.1200-1820) and English (A.D.1820) have competed in their time for the status of an all-India link language with homegrown candidates like Sanskrit (500 B.C-1400), Prakrit (600 B.C.-A.D.1000), Apabhramsha (A.D.900-1250), Middle Braj (A.D.1540-1740), and Hindi-Urdu (A.D.1400-more insistently A.D.1920). (Hindi-Urdu is rather like Serbo-Croatian, essentially a single language divided by two scripts partially through their association with different religious denominations).

It will have been noticed that we have spoken of language families. A language family (or subfamily) is a group of languages known to have descended from a common ancestral speech-variety: the similarities they exhibit are too systematic and detailed to be attributed to mere chance or mutual influence. In other words, as we go back in history linguistic diversity gives place to relatively greater linguistic homogeneity. Apart from these family affiliations and cutting across them, there may be linguistic influences. Thus, the languages of India have borrowed from each other and from classical languages like Sanskrit and from foreign rulers' languages like Persian, Portuguese and English. (Borrowings from classical Arabic and from Turkish have been largely channelled through Persian). When speakers of one language gradually adopt some other language, they leave the stamp of the earlier language on the new one. (One is thinking here not so much of classical Persian and English as spoken or written in India as of the Dravidianisms in Marathi, Tibeto-Burman traits in Asamiya, or the like).

Some of the speech-varieties also have a script and a written literature. India exhibits a variety of scripts. Most of these scripts are traceable to the Brahmi script of the inscriptions of Asoka (3rd c. B.C) which in turn represents a phonetic systematization of some early west Asian script. Variants of the Arabic and the Roman scripts are also in use.

The 1961 Census of India records a total of 1852 language names returned as mother tongue. (The language data from the 1971 Census is very imperfectly available). It must be borne in mind, however, that this figure also reflects the difficulties of census enumerations in a large country with poorly equipped staff and low literacy (some 28 per cent) in the population; and that some 633 of these languages are spoken by foreigners or by very small groups. Not counting classical Sanskrit (which some 2212 Indian citizens have insisted in 1971 to be their mother tongue), only 13 languages needed to be recognized in the Eighth Schedule of the Constitution of India when it was promulgated in 1950. (Sindhi, spoken by the refugees coming from Sindh in Pakistan at the time of 1947 Partition, has been added since as the fifteenth.) Population figures to the nearest million according to the 1961 Census (and parenthetically of the 1971 Census

While none of the Indian languages is recognized as an international language, one would do well to keep in mind that population-wise Hindi-Urdu, Bengali, and Telugu have the status of world languages.

The classical languages that have been studied in India as part of a living tradition are the following: Sanskrit (especially among Hindus, Jains, Buddhists), Pali (among Buddhists), Ardha-Magadhi (among Jains), Classical Tamil (among Tamil speakers), Classical Latin, Classical Greek and Syriac (among Christians), Classical Hebrew (among Christians, Jews), Classical Arabic (among Muslims), Classical Persian (among Muslims, Zoroastrians, and some Hindus in the North), and Avesta-Pahlavi (among Zoroastrians). All of these other than Persian and Classical Tamil have also figured as scriptural and liturgical languages as also Tamil (Tamil Shaivas), Kannada (Virashaivas) and Marathi (Mahanubhavas). English and, in very small numbers, other modern foreign languages like German, French, Portuguese, Russian, Japanese and Chinese are being studied. Reliable figures, however, are not available.

As one can only expect, bilingualism is not the occasional necessity but almost a way of life in India. Informal bilingualism is seen in border areas among migrant artisan groups, plantation and industrial concentrations of migrant labour, and larger urban and semi-urban centres of trade, pilgrimage, learning and government. This has led to similarities that cut across the family groupings and that in turn make bilingualism even more easy. Not only do words, idioms and proverbs reflect common modes of classifying things, events and feelings, but relatively deep-seated habits of grammatical ordering (e.g., verb last, postpositions instead of prepositions, formal or semantic reduplication as seen in Hindi 'ghar-ghar' or 'gharbar' or 'dhandaulat' and of sounds in connected speech (e.g., having two t-sounds, sentential emphasis and tone) are such as facilitate the learning of languages. There are no sharp language boundaries in the Indo-Gangetic plain. This informal bilingualism has sometimes been extended to literary creation (e.g., Braj and Avadhi verse by Avadhi-speaking Tulsidas in the 16th-17th centuries, Marathi and Gujarati prose by Marathi-speaking Kalelkar in the 20th century). Surprisingly, however, the formal study at school and college levels of a modern Indian language other than the speaker's own and Hindi-Urdu has not found favour except sporadically in the recent past. Even translations of literary texts from one modern Indian language to another do not find a wide readership except sporadically (e.g., Khandekar's Marathi novels in Gujarati and Tamil, Bankim and Sharachchandra's Bengali novels in Hindi and Marathi). Literary creation in classical languages like Sanskrit, Prakrit and link languages like Hindi-Urdu, Persian and English has played an important role. Non-Indians like Persian courtiers and European Christians, too, have written in some of the Indian languages.

The literary heritage of India could be divided into Proto-Historic, Ancient, Medieval, and Modern periods.

The Proto-Historic period yields known texts that were written down much later. The beginnings have been dated variously from 3000 B.C. to 1400 B.C.; the close comes around 600 B.C. It covers Vedic Sanskrit verse and prose (the hymns compiled in 4 collections 3 of which overlap to 1200 B.C.; prose stories and ritual descriptions; philosophical-mystical dialogues, 1200-600 B.C.), the two epics the Mahabharata and Ramayana (composed in early popular Sanskrit over a long period and receiving their present shape in the next period). These proto-historic texts are in varieties of old Indo-Aryan not quite identical with classical Sanskrit. The Mahabharata received its present expanded shape in 900-500 B.C. and the Ramayana in 600-300 B.C.

The Ancient Period (600 B.C.—1200 A.D.) covers classical Sanskrit verse and prose, (400 B.C.—1700 A.D.) longer verse narratives, plays using prose and song, prose romances, shorter lyrics, and moral fables (of secular, Brahmanical, late Buddhist, late Jain inspiration), popular Sanskrit (the epics, the puranas, Buddhist, Jain, and Tantric writings), Pali verse and prose, (500-200 B.C.) early Buddhist canon translated from a lost Old Magadhi version, lyrics, fables, dialogues); Prakrits (verse and prose, (300 B.C.—800 A.D.) Asoka's didactic inscriptions Prakrit prose and song embedded in classical Sanskrit plays, narratives and shorter lyrics of secular, Jain inspiration, Old (classical) Tamil verse and prose, (300 B.C.—1350 A.D.) longer verse narratives, shorter lyrics and aphorisms, of secular (pre-Brahmanic), Shaiva, Vaishnava, Buddhist, Jain inspiration.

The Medieval period (A.D. 1200-1820) covers later classical Sanskrit verse and prose; later popular Sanskrit verse and prose (technical writings); Apabhramsha verse (800-1450, secular, Jain, Buddhist, Shaiva inspiration); New Old (classical) Tamil verse and prose (300 B.C.—1350 A.D.); longer verse narratives, shorter lyrics and aphorisms of pre-Brahmanic secular, Shaiva, Vaishnava, Buddhist, Jain inspiration). Indo-Aryan languages of Northern, Western, Central, and Eastern India (verse and prose of secular, Vaishnava, Shaiva, Nirguna Bhakti, Sikh, Sufi, orthodox Islamic, Christian inspiration; long verse narratives, shorter lyrics, prose chronicles; Old Maithili, Old Gujarati-Rajasthani, Middle Gujarati, Middle Rajasthani, Old and Middle Braj, Middle Avadhi, Old and Middle Bangla, Old Asamiya and Old Oriya, Old and Middle Marathi, Old Urdu, Old Kashmiri, Old Panjabi); Indo-Persian verse and prose (1100-1700, including translations from Sanskrit); Middle Tamil (1350-1820), Old and Middle Kannada (respectively 800-1150, 1150-1820, Middle Telugu (1100-1820, Old Telugu being exclusively inscriptional), Middle Malayalam (1350-1820, the older texts being indistinguishable from Old Tamil), the Dravidian literatures of southern India verse and prose, of secular, Brahmanical, Shaiva, Virashaiva, Vaishnava, Jain inspiration). 'Old' and 'Middle' divide roughly around 1300-1400 (except for Kannada and Telugu).

The Modern period (1820) covers New Indo-Aryan languages (Modern Kashmiri, Punjabi, Sindhi, Urdu, Marathi, Gujarati, Bengali, Assamese, Oriya literatures; also literature in Rajasthani, Maithili, Konkani; representing Indian Enlightenment and Hindu, Muslim, Sikh renaissance; shorter lyric, prose fiction, fiction, discursive prose and, in the case of Marathi, Bengali, Gujarati, Urdu, the stage play); Dravidian languages (Tamil, Telugu, Kannada, Malayalam; representing Indian Enlightenment and Hindu, Tamil renaissance; shorter lyric, prose fiction, discursive prose); Modern Sanskrit; Indo-English verse and prose (1870-; shorter lyric, verse narrative, prose fiction, discursive essay).

Reviewing the four periods, one may notice the following: (1) Religion is a dominant theme and source of inspiration throughout (2) The secular literature is governed by Sanskrit, Perso-Arabic, and modern Western poetics; Old Tamil seems to have had its own poetics (3) The literature is largely in verse, except in the modern period (4) Leaving aside folk theatre blending improvised dialogue with music, dance and song, there is no literary stage except the classical Sanskrit courtly theatre and the modern theatre either reviving that or imitating the western theatre of Shakespeare, Molière, or Ibsen (5) The absence of a strong tradition of discursive prose, scholarly interpretations and disputations (except in Classical Sanskrit Periods) has seriously hampered the growth of intellectual content in pre-modern and modern literatures in Indian languages other than classical Sanskrit.

The diversity of scripts was less of a handicap in the oral culture of memorized texts among the cultivated and memorized-improvised texts among the peasants and artisans in the ancient and medieval periods than it is in the modern period. There were classes or castes of bards and minstrels, religious singer-mendicants, mimes, preachers, scribes and so on who served as disseminators of texts at various levels. In the Modern period, the dissemination is taken over by the printed word (newspapers, popular and cultivated periodicals and books), the sound-recorded word (phonograph records of songs and lately of poems, cassette tapes of poetry and lighter prose forms), the theatre and the song concert, the sound-film, the radio (songs, poems, plays, stories, lighter prose), and, lately, the television.

A writing system consists of a script, i.e., a system of using visual shapes in a row, and an orthography, i.e., a system of spelling language forms as sounds, syllables, words, or meanings.

In present-day India, most of the languages use scripts of the Brahmi origin and orthographies are more or less modelled after the Sanskrit orthography. The script is from left to right; the alphabetic order is rationalized phonetically according to the Sanskrit plan. It is fairly easy to predict pronunciation from spelling but somewhat less easy to predict spelling from pronunciation. Vowels are attached to preceding consonants if any and consonants to following consonants if any—giving a syllabic look to an essentially alphabetic script. The numerals are decimal and employ a zero. Word spacing and punctuation are largely borrowed from the West. In this family are—

Devanagari (used for Sanskrit, Hindi, Marathi, Konkani, Nepali, Sindhi with minor calligraphic differences; letters hang from a clothesline).

Assamese, Bengali, Bodo (practically the same script).

Mahajan script (used for Gujarati).

Gurumukhi script (used for Punjabi and the multilingual Sikh scriptures, has fewer vowel letters).

Kannada, Telugu (practically the same script, but with quite different calligraphic styles; Telugu prefers international numerals).

Malayalam (prefers international numerals)

Tamil (has fewer stop consonant letters, prefers international numerals).

Some languages use the Arabic script—Urdu, Kashmiri with Persian style calligraphy and Sindhi with Arabic-style calligraphy. This script is written from the right to the left; diacritics mark short vowels and distinguish long vowels, diphthongs, and semi-vowels from each other making it difficult to predict pronunciation from spelling (especially since full marking is confined to children's books) Etymological spellings for borrowings from classical Arabic and Persian make it difficult to predict spelling from pronunciation. Successive letters are linked in complicated ways. Word spacing and punctuation are largely borrowed from the West. Decimal numerals are borrowed from India and subsequently passed on to the West as the so-called Arabic numerals. With Kashmiri and Sindhi the phonetic adaptation is more systematic.

The Roman script is used for Khasi of Meghalaya and for the Naga dialects of Nagaland whose official language is English. It is also used for Konkani—some Christians use it with Portuguese orthographic conventions, like 'x' rather than 'sh'.

It will be noticed that Sindhi and Konkani have used at least two scripts; Kashmiri was also earlier written in the Sharada script of the Brahmi script family.

The use of adaptations of Devanagari and Roman scripts as link scripts has been advocated for meeting certain everyday needs like display signs, telephone directories, maps, and the like. The existing calligraphies are not always suited to the needs of quick and cheap printing, typewriting, map-making, display, rapid alphabetization and scanning, data-processing, or speed-writing. The existing orthographies are not always suited to rapid spread of literacy. Proposals for auxiliary scripts, script-reforms, and spelling reform come up not only against human inertia and practical problems (such as maintaining accessibility of material printed earlier or printed outside India in the same language), but also against emotional charges positive and negative (Devanagari, Gurumukhi, Arabic are sacred to some Hindus, Sikhs, Muslims; Sikhs and Tamil-speakers are prejudiced against Devanagari; Roman is associated with orientation to the West and thus subject to the resulting likes and dislikes).

But the problems connected with the languages as such are far more important and more formidable than the problems connected with writing systems.

A certain utilitarian trend of thinking is gaining ground; one looks upon this linguistic diversity as a costly charge on a developing economy (seen as cost of multiple versions, limited mobility in matters of employment, research, information transfer, and higher education) and as a political liability for a developing polity (seen as lurking fissiparous tendencies and nursing of grievances about unfair advantages for one language group over another). Countering this trend of thinking stands a more romantically slanted notion of national resources and political equality: one would like to see a hundred flowers of regional and popular expression bloom within a less monolithic conception of nationhood, any imposition of a single language at all levels will only weaken the democratic unity. In any case, India scores for better on linguistic understanding than Western Europe with comparable size and linguistic diversity. Two trends of thinking do not always stand opposed: the linguistic reorganization of states mooted during the 1920s and completed in the 1950s was defended as much on grounds of administrative expediency, economic interests as on grounds of regional identity and the need of making government actually more responsive to the people. In any case there need be no two opinions that the Indian society faces certain pressing language problems and has to solve them in a determined and planned manner. Emotional charges (positive and negative) stupidity and inertia, vested interests and intransigence may complicate the issues, but the issues themselves are genuine enough.

The issues are inherent in the transition from an agricultural, religion-oriented, conservative, custom-bound, stratified, largely illiterate, slow-paced society to an industry-oriented, secular, innovative, contract-and-law-bound, egalitarian, literate, fast-paced society, the transition from an India that was a self-contained world to an India acutely conscious of the outside world. Pre-modern India of course recognized linguistic diversity (consider the oft-quoted proverb char kos par pani badle aur barah kos par bani; this Hindi version of the proverb means the (taste of) water changes every 8 miles, the speech changes every 24 miles), and tackled it in its own way so that the traders, travellers, pilgrims, rulers, and scholars could go about their business. Modern India cannot tackle language problems by slogan-montering (angrezi hatao; English ever, Hindi never), violence and vandalism, and speechifying without action. Whatever solution is ultimately adopted, India will need, like any developed country, to expand, improve, and diversify languagelearning facilities.

The need for link-languages has to be gauged at three levels, regional, national, and international. At the international level, India needs English but must not lose sight of other windows to the world like French, Spanish, Russian, Chinese to name only the other official languages of the United Nations. At the national level, India can exploit Hindi, English, Urdu, even Sanskrit and Classical Arabic and Persian—each in its appropriate niche. (Thus, Sanskrit is spoken among traditional physicians and pandits, used ceremonially, and drawn upon in coining technical and other expressions). If the regional languages like Telugu, Tamil, Bengali feel jealous of the link languages or apprehensive of their own positions, the regional languages in their turn are link languages or apprehensive of their own positions, the regional languages in their turn are link language of the regions concerned and it is best to bear in mind that minority languages like the tribal language Santali, other regional languages present in the region, and above all minor languages like Urdu, Sindhi, Nepali, Konkani, Tulu, and English as-mother-tongue fell equally jealous and apprehensive about the regional link language.

Finally, language diversity is not the only language problem faced by India. The languages of India nurtured in a traditional society and lacking a sustained and strong tradition of prose are now being called upon, rather suddenly, to face certain modern needs. Centuries of adaptation seen in the languages of the West have to be compressed here into decades. These modern needs are—

- (a) the need of an impersonal, standardized expression for scientific, legal, administrative, routine communication in a manner accessible to the person who needs them;
- (b) the need for the innovative, creative, richly distinctive expression of novel ideas and personal feelings in literature and thought so that the individual is not submerged in a mass society;
- (c) the need of a mode of expression for sharing and celebrating common ideas and feelings in public life, popular literature, and journalism without degenerating into cliché, bombast, or pseudotechnicalities.

Even a linguistically homogeneous developing country needs to make its younger generation articulate in these different ways.

LANKESH, P. (Kannada; b. 1935) is a short story writer, playwright, poet, novelist, film director and editor. An M.A. in English (1959) from Mysore University, he taught English at several colleges and resigned in 1978 to continue his career as a Film Director. He started Lankesh Patrike (Weekly) in 1980. The first collection of his short stories is Kereya niranu kerege chelli (Return the pond water to the pond, 1964). In his first collection of poems, Bitcchu (Open/peel off, 1967), one can discern the influence of Whitman, Sylvia Plath and Ezra Pound. His second collection of stories, Nanalla (Not me, 1970) contains stories which have been praised for their subtle lyricism and intensity. Umapatiya scholarship yatre (Umapaty's trip for a scholarship, 1973) is his third collection of stories. He has written a number of short plays like 'T. Prasannana gruhastashrama', (T. Prasanna's married life, 1964) and 'Nana tangigondur gandu kodi' (Find a husband for my sister) which are 'angry' plays. 'Teregalu' (The waves, 1967) has been highly praised by Gopalakrishna Adiga for its poetic power. This is an 'absurd' play. These plays along with 'Giliyu panjara dolilla' (The parrot is not in the cage), 'Kranti bantu kranti' (Rebellion o rebellion come), 'Siddate' (Preparation), 'Polisariddare eccharike' (Beware, the police are there) were published in a collection called Elu natakalu (Seven plays, 1971). He made an excellent translation of Oedipus and Antigone (1973). His only full-length play Sankranti (1973) is based on the life of Basavanna, the 19th century mystic poet and leader of the revolutionary religious movement, who questioned the social values of the orthodox Brahminism. He also dramatised his novel Biruku in 1973.

In the sixties he was an admirer of Gopalakrishna Adiga, the leader of the modern movement whom he hailed as 'an eye-opener of a generation'. This he recanted later when he supported the anti-brahmin movements like Okkuta, Shudra etc. He has published two novels. Biruku (Breach) in its narrative method and incidents relies on Kingsley Amis's Lucky Jim and J.D. Salinger's Catcher in the Rye. The other novel, Mussanjeya katha prasanga (The incident in an evening, 1978) contains episodes of village life. Prastuta (The present) and Kandaddu kanda hage (As it is seen, 1975) are his collections of essays. The latter contains two controversial essays, one on B.V. Karanth and the other on Gopalakrishna Adiga. He edited a collection of modern poems in Akshara hosa kavya (1970). His second collection of poems Talemaru (Generation, 1973) contains some of his poems from the early collection and there is no new development. He has also translated Baudelaire's poems in his Papada hugalu (Flowers of evil, 1974).

In his writings, man's cruelty, meanness and pretension are exposed.

LAST LABYRINTH, THE (English) is the fourth novel of Arun Joshi. It won him the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1983. The hero is Som Bhasker, a successful industrialist, not yet forty, and happily married to Geeta. He is possessive and relentlessly driven by an insatiable hunger. He is like a hare "chased by an unseen hound". He is, in fact, a neurotic, obsessed with a love for power and money.

He meets Anuradha with her sensuous manners, with the tracery of mehndi on her pink palms, with "the delicate curlicues, golden arabesques, road signs of fate wound and unwound". He is instantly driven by a lust of feverish intensity to possess her as well as the shares of the Company of Aftab who he thinks is her husband. This takes him from the sky-scrapers of Bombay to the narrow, dusty lanes of Benaras and the 'Lal Haveli' of Aftab with its Last Labyrinth—a metaphor reflecting the working of Som's complex feelings and desires. He is also introduced here to Gargi, a deaf and mute priestess and Azisum, a dancing girl, with a voice "husky, a little nasal" reminding one "of the core of loneliness around which all of us are built". But Anuradha is still the centre of his passions. Subsequently he suffers a heart attack and accompanied by his doctor, who is his super ego, he journeys to the mountains and to a leper colony. He retrieves the remaining shares of Aftab's Company but fails to possess Anuradha.

It is a tale superbly told as it blends concepts and ideas with reality in a language at once striking and beautiful.

LATA ANE BIJI VATO (Gujarati), a collection of sixteen short stories by Gulabdas Broker, was first published in 1938. The stories 'Lata shun bole?' and 'Ba' of this collection have been translated into English, Spanish, Hindi, Marathi, Punjabi, Malayalam, Kannada, Tamil and Sindhi. The theme of the most of the stories is relationship between man and woman in the light of psychological awareness of the human mind. Human weakness and superficiality in matters of love are revealed in the stories of this collection. In 'Jivanani moj', Navin, Shanta and their young friends take life very easily. They associate with each other freely. They believe that marriage is not necessary for having sexual relations. Shanta becomes pregnant because of her association with Navin, who rejects her proposal for marriage by saying that there is no proof of his being the father of the child. Shanta is shocked. Her mother manages to take her far away from the scene to find a solution of the problem. But Shanta cannot compromise with what has happened and commits suicide. Navin, however, does not even feel sorry for what he did to the girl. He laughs and murmurs: 'What a fool! Sentimental idiot.' Through the story, the author satirises the trend of the modern society in regard to sex, though he sympathises with Shanta. 'Juna samaskar' reveals that sometimes a man cannot be blamed for taking liberties in sexual relations. Chunilal, a wanton fellow in his early life, decides to be faithful to his wife. But when his wife fails to satisfy his desire, he goes back to his girl-friend. 'Gadi-man' draws a romantic picture of infatuated love. Two unknown youth Vijay and Jaya meet frequently in the train. The process of the conversion of their attraction into love provokes curiosity and makes the story interesting. 'Beguna' and 'Dhor jevi' also depict the relationship between a man and a woman, but from a different angle. The heroes of these stories consider themselves to be the masters of their wives and treat them very cruelly. The author's statement 'Many muktas move before my eyes', in 'Dhor jevi', points out that this situation is not rated high in our society. 'Janun ane navun' and 'Ba' show the writer's neutral outlook on two generations. In the former, generation-gap is exposed with necessary aesthetic distance. Ramkor Dosi does not like the mixing of her daughter-in-law with her husband's friends. She cannot adjust herself with them and yet loves them. Inability of two generations to understand each other is shown in 'Ba'. Nobility of Ba is expressed effectively. Tragic element behind the situation makes the stories so touching. The writer tackles the situation so skilfully that nobody seems to be at fault.

'Maneklal', 'Juni maitri' and 'Mitho ratalo' delineate socio-economic aspects of life. The complexity of commercial world is well exposed in the stories. Broker has fully exploited his personal experience in the world of commerce. The human touch saves the stories from being mere documentation.

'Agali rate' and 'Pila pradeshman' deal with the political background. The former narrates the emotional picture of the Independence movement, the latter depicts the realistic picture of the native states.

Though the stories of this collection are chiefly written in simple style of narration and do not depend much on incidents, the situations develop with the exposition of deep and surprising inner workings of human mind of the simple day-to-day life of higher middle class of the society. In 1930 when most of the Gujarati short story writers, influenced by Marxism, preferred socio-economic problems as the themes, it was Broker who, under the influence of Freud, tried to probe the dark recesses of human mind and did the psycho-analysis of his characters. It was because of this that 'Lata' was accepted as an ultra-modern story as soon as it was published.

LATIFA (Sindhi) is a novel by Ram Panjwani, first published in 1945.

Latifa is a story of Latifa, an innocent and beautiful woman, daughter of a farmer, who is made to suffer because of lascivious advances of a young zamindar, who gets his good natured and pious uncle, the owner of the land holdings, killed in order to misappropriate the property, and entangle her father, a faithful farmer and worker of his uncle. The police also assumes the role of an accomplice and tortures the poor farmer to the extent of forcing him to confess the crime which he had never committed. After the farmer is sent to life-imprisonment, the aunt of Latifa tries to deprive her of her rightful property left behind by her father in the custody of her uncle. In the process the old lady whips up a situation that leaves no other alternative to Latifa but to abandon her home and commit suicide. But she is saved by a Maulvi who gives her shelter.

The young zamindar indulges in wine and women and spends his wealth on fast living. He indulges in repressing his farmers and refuses to help them when they meet a disaster because of natural calamity in the form of a hurricane which damages their crops. The uprising of the farmers angers him more and he tries to get their leader killed.

When he sees Latifa, he gets her kidnapped to fulfil his lust, but a miraculous event saves Latifa from his clutches. The young zamindar is bitten by a cobra and confesses his crimes before he dies. The end is a happy one, for the heroine meets her father and her betrothed lover.

The novel describes in detail the misdeeds of the police authorities. The diction is simple but dreary at some places, especially where the author tries to load the description with his statements about fate, the inability of human beings to free themselves from such situations, the advice to remain contented with the doings of the fate, etc. However, the novel tells us of the real condition of the society in pre-Independence days, which compels us to compare it with the present day situation and to see if there is any change between the two.

LATTER DAY PSALMS (English) is a collection of poems by Nissim Ezekiel which won him the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1984. It contains, besides 'Nudes 1978', and the 'Latter day Psalms', from which the collection takes its name, about thirty poems from his earlier collections viz., Very Indian Poems in Indian English, Songs for Nandu Bhende, Postcard Poems, The Exact Name, and The Unfinished Man. Some of these poems are: 'Counsel', 'Healers', 'Jewish Wedding in Bombay', 'Minority Poems', 'The Professor', 'Dilemma', 'The Night of the Scorpion' and 'The Visitor'. The 'Latter day Psalms' is a group of ten poems corresponding to numbers 1, 3, 8, 23, 60, 78, 95, 102 and 127 which the poet takes as representative of the 150 psalms.

Nissim Ezekiel offers in these poems complex and absorbing insights into the variegated patterns of life, thus effecting a harmonious synthesis between abstruse intellectualisation and concrete experience. He voices the disenchantment, irony, aversion to pretension and false values against a background of urban squalor and intellectual decay. His setting is, however, the inevitably paradoxical Indian milieu: the retired Professor Sheth with "children well-settled in life" offering the generous invitation: "Visit please my humble residence also"; the orthodox Jewish Wedding with a touch of the 'progressive': "The Sabbath was for betting and swearing and drinking"; The Nude: "Sensuality—a word that stands by itself"; and the scenario:

The wives of India sit apart
They do not drink,
They do not talk,
Of course, they do not kiss.
The men are quite at home
Among the foreign styles

(What fun the flirting is!)

The poet achieves a very high degree of precision and conveys the distilled meaning reminiscent of Eliot and Auden: "Home is where we have to gather grace" and "What have we done with the dominion thou hast given us?" In the depiction of complex incongruities, Nissim Ezekiel carefully preserves the poetic unity by welding a cultivated craft into an integrated symmetry.

LAVA TA PRAVA (Kashmiri) is the second collection of poems of Muhammad Amin Kamil, published in 1965. The book comprises 58 'nazms' and 'ghazals'. The book established its author as one of the three major contemporary Kashmiri poets, the other two being Dinanath 'Nadim' and Abdul Rahman 'Rahi'. The first lines of its foreword are: "Abdul Rahman 'Rahi's' ghazals and Dinanath 'Nadim's' poems contribute two distinct poetic manners to our poetry. But change is the essence of life. Time flies on fast and makes ever new demands. As a result of these demands, I also experimented in a poetic manner. This experiment is showing success and several of my friends have begun to adopt this very colour and tone." It is not very easy to define Kamil's individual talent which, of course, is amply present in his Lava ta prava (Dew and shine), particularly in its ghazals. Although no ostensible innovation is seen here, nor any exciting departure, yet his individual manner of dealing with things is perceptible even to a cursory reading. Some of the features of Lava ta prava, which distinguish it from the poetry of the sixties, are the conversational tone producing intimacy, blending of Persian and Kashmiri words and expressions, aphoristic comments on life, intermingling of satire and pathos, use of musically potent metres, masterly use of simile and image, oblique but exoteric expression, and finally the use of Persian and Indian mythological allusions. Lava ta prava displays Kamil's power of sensuous suggestion which, however, does not remain under the control of his mind when there is a tendency towards profusion and musicality. The concreteness of images is retained only in his ghazals and some short poems like 'Jangul' (The forest), 'Nethanan mane' (The naked meanings) and 'Yad kariyamakh' (I remembered you) in which two lines make a separate unit. Here are a few examples: 'Ak jalan nesf rats kod pakhi vash/zon zaredeyi thanthrey yadash' (In the silence of midnight, a bird moved its wings. The moon turned pale and memory shivered); 'Kikara lanji aki manz khats soon/thachmats thachmats hish zaman' (The moon rose through a branch of acacia tree like a very tired yawn); 'Zal vahrith chhu door tan janjul/chashma losam vuchhan vuchhan jangul' (The forest has spread its snare as far as I can see. My eyes have grown weary of seeing the forest). The best poems of Lava ta prava are 'Jangul' (The forest), 'Shilij bon' (The soothing chinar tree), 'Pren shahrah' (The white road), 'Zero bridge' (Name of a bridge in Srinagar) and 'Nila naag' (Name of a spring). In all these poems, the poet seems to be preoccupied with themes of transitoriness of life and its dichotomy of construction and destruction. Whether the mood is melancholic, serene or exalting, it is highly personal. Comparing Lava ta prava with Kamil's earlier collection of poems, Mas malar (Flask of wine, 1955), it is visible that the poet has given up his revolutionary messages and reformative zeal. He seems to have dedicated himself to the exercise of imagination and expression of his personal experience. He has assimilated the varied influence of some Urdu poets, especially Allama Iqbal and Mirza Ghalib. He has also borrowed from contemporary Urdu poets, but he has very skilfully tinged these borrowings with his individual style. The style established in Lava ta prava gets further expansion and refinement in Kamil's later collections of poetry, namely, Beyi suy pan (Again the same self, 1967) and Padis pod t'shay (One foot shadowing the other, 1972). Lava ta prava got the Sahitya Akademi award in 1967.

LAVANI (Marathi). About the etymology of this folk form of poetry, there are several opinions. A.B. Kolhat-kar thinks that 'it is Lavani' because it touches the heart. Durga Bhagavat opines that it is a farmer's song, based on the sowing and transplanting of saplings (lavani). G.K. Modak gives the etymology of lavani from 'lavan' (salt), which is the root of 'lavanya' (beauty). B.S. Pandit's theory is that this verse-form and many words used in it are from Hindi or Urdu. So it is not an indigenous Marathi form of folk-poetry. Dhond refutes the theory of its being an agricultural song, and interprets the verb 'lavane' as 'arrangement of words', a kind of composition.

Generally lavani is of two types, the erotic and the mystic. Different kinds of lavanis are described, according to the style of their rendering and the mannerisms which have become traditional. 'Shahiri lavani' is sung to the accompaniment of the small drum, 'daf', and one stringed instrument, 'tuntune'. 'Baithakichi lavani', generally sung by dancing girls with the accompaniment of tabla and harmonium, is sung in the style of 'Thumari'. 'Tamashatil lavani' is sung along with a 'vag', or a song-dance-play, with other actors like the clown (songadya) and a dancing girl (nachhi).

Namdev Vatkar has given different divisions of lavani according to subjects and renderings: some like 'Vagachi lavani' have a story-base; the 'Baleghati' is generally tragic and the separation of lovers is the motif; 'Chhak-ke'd' is full of eroticism; Junnari lavani is almost like prose read in haste; 'Handyachi lavani' has long musical dialogues.

Lavani attained its zenith in the regime of the Peshwas. Ramjoshi, Honaji Bala, Anantafandi, Parashram, Saganbhau, Prabhakar and others excelled in this form. The first three belonged to upper Brahmin caste, while others were not so well-educated. Some were Muslims and the caste of some is not known. Mostly the Mahar community kept up the traditional purity of this musical form of the folk-poem.

Most of the compositions are concerned with woman's physical form, detailed description of her beauty and her various moods, coyness and coquettish expressions, suggestive dialogues and highly provocative scenes and situations. But there are other lavanis narrating the festive pilgrimages to Tuljapur and Pandharpur; descriptions of cities like Bombay, Pune, Kolhapur, Sholapur; documentation of famine, or the way the Peshwas enjoyed themselves on Ramgapanchami; or reflections on philosophical subjects full of advice, and commentary on the vanity of all things mundane, and so on.

Shahir Haibatrai, Dagadu Baba Mali, Patthe Bapurao, Lahri Hyder were some of the lavani composers of the Peshwa period. Madhvamunishwar, Amritrai, Devanath, Dayalnath, Vishnudas Mahurkar and other saints wrote spiritual lavanis. In modern period, G.D. Madgulkar, Raja Badhe, P. Savataram, Kavi Sanjiva, Jagdish Khebudkar and others have composed many lavanis for the films and the stage. Many popular records and cassettes are also available.

In Marathi poetry, this musical form of writing has been very popular and is always remembered along with the heroic ballad, the 'Powada'. Many poets wrote both to commemorate the heroic deeds and exploits of the warriors as well as such erotic poems to entertain the common soldier. Not all lavanis are printed or published, as this form belongs to the oral tradition of folk literature. This form of poetry was for a long time not considered very cultured or moral, and was spurned by the prudish high-brows.

P.M.

LAVANI (Rajasthani). The word 'lavani' means harvesting, a kind of 'tatanka' metre observing no rule in endings of even feet, and a particular 'raga'. All these meanings are not co-related. In fact lavani is 'upa-raga' (sub-melody) named as 'lavani jogi', 'jangi', 'ahanga', 'suhana', 'kollika'. It is 'desi' raga which has different classification due to the local influences, the names of which being 'lavani Bhupali', 'lavani Jangala', 'lavani Kalanagada', 'lavani Rekhta'. It is a popular raga of Marathi. It originated in Lavanak (Lavani region), which was near Magdha and took its name after it. It was a popular folk melody there and was used in many folk-songs. Tansen gave it a classical form Sa, Re, Ga, Ma, Pa, Da, Ni notes are used in it in their pure forms. From Lavanak it came to Braj region, where it became very popular. Later, it travelled to south-east Rajasthan with Krishnabhakti. It was so popular in Uttar Pradesh that in Bhartendu period lavani singers used to gather for competition. Bhartendu himself composed so many lavanis. It reached the temples and also registered its entry in the folk devotion-poetry. Later, it was adopted in folk-ballads and in folk-songs. In Gopichand lila—'Raja Singa ne mat chedo karun mhun binati'—and it has also been used in folk devotion-poetry—'Mhare darsan ki abhilasa sari Brajnath ki'. It is often sung at the end of the folk-dramas. This raga has no 'antara', but it contains a story. In folk-songs sung by women, the 'sthai' covers all the succeeding dohas. It connotes pathos, devotion and separation in love.

LAVANYASAMAYA (Gujarati; b. 1465, d. 1534), a disciple of Lakshmisagarsuri and Samayaratna, is one of the major Jain poets of fifteenth/sixteenth century. He has written several 'rasas' such as Siddhanta chatuspadi (1487), Gautamprichchha chaupai (1516), etc. His Vimala prabandha (1512) is an outstanding work of 1356 stanzas

He wrote Surapriya Kevallno rasa in 1489 and Devaraj Vachcharaj chopai in 1511. Lavanyasamaya has written several other poems of the type of 'samvad', 'stavana', 'sajjhaya' 'chhand', etc. His chhand of Gautamswami is still recited every day in the morning by the Jain community.

LEELAVATHY, M. (Malayalam; b. 1929), the daughter of Kunchunni Nampiti and Mankayya Mantal, is perhaps the only well-known woman critic in Malayalam literature. She took her M.A. degree in Malayalam with distinction and qualified for Ph.D. and worked as Lecturer and Professor in many colleges in Kerala from 1949 to 1983. Though a profound scholar in all fields of literature, poetry is her pet subject of study. Leelavathy has a pronounced predilection for the psychological approach as is shown by her studies of modern poets. She does not go by fixed standards to adjudge poetry. Varnaraji (Spectrum, 1977) is her best contribution in criticism. It is a collection of lengthy appreciations of prominent modern poets like G. Sankara Kurup, P. Kunjiraman Nair and Idassery Govindan Nair. She received the Kerala Sahitya Academy award, Otakkuzhal award and Sahitya Pravarthaka Benefit Fund award for the book.

Kavitayum shastravum (Poetry and science, 1969), Kannecerum mazhavillum (Tears and the rainbow, 1972), Navatarangam (New wave, 1976), Giyute kavya jivitam (Life and poetry of G. Sankara Kurup, 1980), Malayala kavita sahitya charitram (History of Malayalam poetry 1980), Amritamashnute (They eat the ambrosia, 1984) and Kavitadhvani (Resonance in poetry, 1986) are the major contributions of Leelavathy to literary criticism. Kavita sahitya charitram combines both the historical and critical aspects of Malayalam poetry. It is not a mere chronological description of the evolution of poetry, but a systematic evaluation of the contributions of notable poets. Narrow conceptions of persons, religion, faith and ideas have not coloured her appreciations and interpretations. Kavitadhvani is a collection of forty essays first published in periodicals from 1978 to 1984. It helps us to acquaint ourselves with the mile-stones and guiding lights in Malayalam poetry in the modern period. The second part of the book deals with western and oriental thoughts on resonance. The book received the Sahitya Akademi award in 1986.

Leelavathy received the Soviet Land Nehru award in 1976 for her book Vishvottaramaya viplavctihasam (The great epic of revolution, 1975). She has translated two books into Malayalam: Mahatma Gandhi (of Vincent Shean, 1957) and Vijnanattinte mahaprakaram (The citadel of Learning of James Bryant Connant, 1958). She LEGEND (Tamil) is a tale of past exploits. Whether a legend is fact or fiction is not very important; if it is set in the past and centres on remarkable incidents and enjoys a certain measure of popularity, it is a legend. While many legends rose on the heroic exploits of valiant men in the field of battle, legends have been composed on great saints, great poets and even great patrons of art and literature.

Certain episodes from the Mahabharata constitute popular material for legends. In Tamil, one of the most popular legends is of Arjuna, but the chief interest curiously lies elsewhere; the heroine whom Arjuna, the eternal beau weds is given the local name Alli, better known as Alli Arasani, who is an extraordinary character. She is the princess of the Pandya kingdom who has been trained in the arts of warfare and who carves out a kingdom for herself, peopled entirely by women as she hates the very sight of man. She seems to be the south Indian version of Chitrangada, balladized in an immortal play by Tagore. Arjuna succeeds in breaking down the terrific mental barriers in Alli's psyche, but not without near-catastrophes which test even his matchless skills. Alli's tempestuous romance has been put in the form of songs, and plays have been composed on it; a poem called 'Alli Arasani malai' is wrongly ascribed to the classical poet, Pugazhendi.

There are other legends based on the Mahabharata one of which relates the story of the love between Abhimanyu and Sundari in popular, colloquial diction. Murugan's elopement with Valli, the girl from the clan of hunters, is a celebrated theme of many songs and plays, very much produced on the stage and filmed.

There are some legends based on puranic personalities which enjoy a certain amount of popularity among rural folk. One such is the legend relating to Chitrugupta, the accountant of Yama, god of death. His career as a recorder of good and bad deeds comes in for comment towards the end of the poem, but most of the earlier part concerns itself, in puranic fashion, with spells of penance and curses, and deliverance from them. This, too, is ascribed to Pugazhendi, but from the style and the method of presentation and the total lack of any poetic beauty, one can be sure it was composed by a much lesser person.

In an intensely religious country like India many of the heroes are bound to be men of religion. Men who have lived noble, purposeful lives of service to God and man, have become legends; they are worshipped as godly men or gods. In a country where polytheism is the popular faith, it is not surprising that men of sublime thought are worshipped as gods—an idea that may be considered repulsive in strictly monotheistic societies. Madurai-veeran is one such legendary hero whom village people worship as a god. He was born in the palace as the prince of Kashi, but had to be cast out on the basis of the terrible prediction of astrologers. The baby is discovered by a childless cobbler family who gratefully brings him up to be a mighty warrior. Strange and unusual are his qualities and stranger are the adventures he goes through. He elopes with a princess and marries her; his wonderful compassion and heroic exploits on behalf of those in duress earn for him the everlasting reverence of a grateful people.

Similarly, there were two heroic brothers in the Kongu mandalam who have been deified as Annamar Swami (godly elder brothers). There was a simpleton called Kunrudaiyan who was duped by his cousins and brothers into losing all his property. Kunrudaiyan and his wife Tamarai propitiated the gods and got three children, two sons called Ponnar and Sankar and a daughter, younger to them, called Tangam. The two elder brothers grow into valiant warriors of a noble mien and the younger sister becomes a noted 'pattini', a paragon of chastity. The boys execute a terrible vengeance on the relatives who cheated their father and then proceed to perform a number of noble deeds to succour the oppressed and the afflicted; during the course of these warlike activities, the two brothers die. They become living legends on account of their selfless heroism, and after their heroic death, they were deified by an admiring people; temples have been erected for their worship in a number of places in Kongu mandalam. The chaste sister too is revered; she is reputed to have performed a number of miracles with the power of her chastity.

Valiant heroes have become legendary in all parts of the world, particularly on account of the much greater dramatic impact of the power of arms than of quieter virtues like nobility and piety. Even during Sangam times, it was the practice to raise stones called 'nadukal' to commemorate the martial valour of warriors; there are a number of verses in the celebrated Sangam anthology, the Purananuru, which refers to this custom; one of these verses is addressed to a wayfarer, calling upon him to worship the nadukal, right on his path, remembering the heroic act of the young man whom it commemorates; for he took on a mighty army alone, as his colleagues had all run away in fear and he died gloriously after decimating a number of foes.

One of the most popular of legends is that concerning Desingu Raja, the hero of many battles, the most loyal of friends. There are a number of ballads and even stage-plays on this valiant warrior and many old villagers can be found who can recite lines from one of them. The earlier part of the story centres round a supernatural horse, intractable to all, in the possession of the Nawab of Delhi, and Desingu, a boy in a hurry (indeed he did not live beyond 22), goes up to the imperial capital with an impetuous offer to control and ride the horse. The Nawab had announced glittering prizes for the one who would tame the beast, and the death penalty for those who failed in the attempt. He is unable to believe his ears at the offer of the stripling before him and permits himself some disparaging observations; the vic of Desingu is roused and he lets fly a torrent of brave words fired with anger at the astounded Nawab.

Desingu is permitted to ride the beast; its pride hurt, it tries its best to throw him down; but Desingu grittily holds on to the horse. Then, we are told, the animal started flying through the skies over hill, valley, ocean, lake and river. Desingu held on and brought it down eventually and rode it in great triumph through the capital streets. He secured the prizes, cornered all the glory and was presented the horse as a bonus. The Nawab offered his daughter in marriage to the brave lad who, however, said he would marry her later, when he would come of age.

On the attainment of 18 years of age, Desingu marries the Delhi princess and assumes the reins of government of his principality with Chengi as his headquarters. He rules wisely and well, always remembering that a king's highest happiness is but in the contentment of his subjects.

But soon trouble shoots up in the shape of a quarrel between him and the Nawab of Arcot on account of non-payment of tribute; a series of battles is fought during which Desingu's divine horse dies and his greatest friend Moattukaran (Mahabhat Khan?) is cut down in a fierce struggle. Desingu, the most loyal friend loses all interest in life and commits suicide and his wife enters the funeral pyre as a suttee. The ballad reports that a divine vehicle came down and took the royal dead to heaven.

There are stirring passages in the ballad like the heroic attempt of the boyish Desingu to quell the tempestuous horse, the way Moattukaran reports for battle straight from his wedding ceremony, Desingu raja's magnanimous attitude towards his enemies, his disenchantment and death by his own hands and the suttee ceremony in which the queen immolates herself.

Another great warrior who has become a legend is Kattabomman, the rebel who took on the might of the East India Company and who sent tremors through the hearts of the whitemen despite their resources and superior technology. There has been a controversy, unfortunately, around Kattabomman, some scholars denigrating him as a pretender and a dacoit. But he continued to inspire the common people of Tamilnadu prompting composition of ballads and songs and plays on him for two hundred years. Public memory is notoriously short and against this background, the consistency of Kattabomman's appeal must be put down to some solid qualities of nobility and bravery not ordinarily met with.

Kattabomman had considerable abilities of military organisation; he was most ably and loyally supported by his brother, Kumaraswamy, better known as Oomaiturai; he was recklessly brave himself and had the dedicated support of similarly courageous warriors who thought nothing of self. That a more than ordinary display of chicanery and deceit was needed from the whites and a major exercise in betrayal called for from Indians themselves before he could be caught and killed, go to prove how high was the standard of revolt raised by Kattabomman.

There are some legends which are certainly very popular, but the factual basis is either scrappy or non-existent. One example is the legend of king Vikramaditya; whoever is the king referred to by this appellation (which is more a title than a name), one can be sure he did not possess a tenth of the qualities attributed by the legend to him. It must simply be a case of a good story-teller grasping hold of a popular historical personality and weaving a lot of fantasy around it. The stories of Vikramaditya and the goblin (vetala) each involving a puzzle are justly popular and constitute some of the finest examples of the Hindu story teller's art. When we read them or hear them told, we are content to enjoy them; it will be a self-defeating exercise to attempt to identify the hero of the legend with Chandragupta II or any historical personage. There could indeed be no human king in any country of the world with the combination of those manifold qualities of the mind and heart and muscle with a supernatural fringe, attributed to the legendary Vikramaditya.

The story of Madanakamarajan is a fascinating story and is interesting alike to children and grown-ups. It is structured in the typical manner of many stories of the East; there is a title story which is quite interesting in itself; but as many as twelve independent narratives are attached to it.

The hero, the young prince Madanakamarajan falls in love with the painted picture of a girl and determinedly pursues the idea of locating her and marrying her. His friend, the son of the minister, is fortunately a very resourceful person; by means of a combination of dour steadfastness, intelligent strategy and force of personality, he overcomes all obstacles and locates the girls (as a matter of fact there are two girls whose likeness is painted), and again by means of a clever trick, he avoids actually marrying them, but creates the feeling in the father that the wedding ceremony has been gone through. He has to spend some days and nights there as the son-in-law of the king and the girls naturally expect sex satisfaction from him. He keeps them (who come to him on alternate nights) deeply absorbed in the stories he spins out to them and on the thirteenth day he takes them to Madanakamarajan who marries the elder of the two, and the younger weds the minister's son.

The twelve stories narrated by the minister's son are beautifully rounded masterpieces of the story-teller's art. There is, too, a special common feature in all of them that their hero is a young man of ideal qualities; in some stories another young man is thrown in, for contrast. And, lest the point be missed, the narrator himself, in winding up each of his stories, takes the opportunity to admonish his listener to choose a good husband, rather like the hero of his story. These stories have been extremely popular in Tamil land, not without reason, for generations.

There is a remarkable series of episodes extolling the sense of justice and the piercing intellectual ability of an unknown young man called Raman who impresses the king of the realm with his special qualities which earn for him the post of judge and the honorific title of Mariyadai Raman. The title story is followed by a number of episodes where the new judge solves complex-looking cases with ease, rendering justice. Most of Raman's judgements are based on an intuitive knowledge of psychology; some remind us of the decisions of the wise king Solomon. The suspense element, the surprise turn and the genuine intellectual exercise involved in unravelling the mystery invest these stories with an unusual interest, often associated with the modern murder thrillers. These legends certainly deserve wider public acclaim.

Another set of legends is woven around the personalities of the famous emperor of Vijayanagar, Krishnadevaraya and his wise minister Appaji. Appaji was minister to one of the vassals of Krishnadevaraya, and the mighty emperor is said to have been impressed so highly with his sagacity and wisdom that he appointed him his chief minister. The stories all emphasise the qualities of the minister more than those of the emperor; they are interesting and if true, bespeak the calibre of the minister.

There is yet another series of stories clustering around a personality connected with the Vijayanagar empire. The court jester of the emperor was one Tenali Raman and he has become legendary as a practical joker and wit. Though his stories are popular, a sophisticated critic would find them to be often naive and not of high calibre. The high currency of these stories is partly at least due to the paucity of humor in old Tamil works leading to the acceptance of mediocrity by a humour-hungry public.

LEI PARENG (Manipuri) is a collection of eighteen poems by L. Kamal Singh. It has run into many editions by now.

LEIRON-LEITHAK LEIKHARON

Lei pareng (Garland 1929), one of the earliest collections in Manipuri, contains some of the finest poems in this language. Some of them were published earlier in journals. These are romantic poems with the warmth of sincere and honest feelings. The description of Nature in many of the poems is romantically realistic and one could feel the presence of an immanent spirit while reading the poems. In many of the poems, the poet has described the beauty and glory of Manipur. What strikes one most is the wonderful magical power of the language. Kamal Singh employs the common everyday language to convey his feelings, but it becomes surcharged with evocative meanings and poetic undertones in the context in which it is used. This kind of effective use of Manipuri is very rare.

Lei pareng is a landmark in the development of modern Manipuri literature. It heralds the dawn of modern Manipuri literature and is the most significant poetical work of this century.

I.R.B.S.

LEIRON (Manipuri) is a poetical work by king Charairongba (1697-1709) describing a variety of flowers, one hundred in number. The work is unique of its kind and amply testifies to the love the people of this land have for nature. King Charairongba reigned over ten tributary kings and was regarded as an incarnation of Nangda Lairen Pakhangba, the progenitor of the Meitei kings. Leiron is the first work in old Manipuri literature bearing the name of the writer. With the usual prayer and the paean to the Almighty, the poet portrays the onset of spring:

It is the height of spring and the first rumbling of the approaching monsoon is heard in the distance. Before long the river will flow with swirling waters and it is the time of the year when Poireiton accompanied by Leinaotabi made his sojourn to earth. The hill glades look lush green with young plants growing in thick clusters and entwined with one another. The full-blossomed orchids on the trees have begun to play with the gentle breeze and the fowls have flown out in search of new fruits. The youth, eager to meet his love, has put on his best. When one looks toward the hills they become invitingly attractive and no less charming is the valley. The rolling fields and stretching roads seem to offer both delicious sweets to eat and a pleasant spectacle to look at. Last winter's barren trees have grown new tender shoots. The foot of the hills and the trails by the pasture are covered with new, red blossoms. Indeed the flowers all around present a riot of colour.

After this the poet dwells on individual flowers, some of indigenous variety, others transplanted on this soil. At times he tells us at length the story associated with a flower. This is followed by a description of the flower in vivid detail. Here is an example:

Lei kabok is a local flower that remains ever fresh, nor is it eaten by worms. It is a flower that is fondly sought in the four corners of the world, eight directions, sixteen sub-directions and sixty-one minor directions. The flower is distinct for its beautiful shape, tender stalk and pure white colour. It is a flower once fondly nurtured by king Khagemba, who did not part with it even in his last journey. It is a flower used by both girls and boys as a present of love.

This flower has blossomed forth in an array of extensive white and definitely this is the season of Lei kabok.

C.M.S.

LEITHAK LEIKHARON (Manipuri). It is a book of genesis for the Meitei community. Written in an archaic diction, the work begins with a prayer to the Almighty Lord and the writer begs forgiveness for any sins of omission and commission in preparing it. He then emphatically adds that it should be read only by virtuous, honest and learned persons.

When there was no water or air, the Lord, levitated on His breath, sat meditating on how to create the world. He brought forth his eldest son, Ashiba, from the right nostril and the younger son, Konjin Tuthokpa, from the left. The Lord then ordered Ashiba to create the earth and the living beings and asked Konjin Tuthokpa to be by the side of Him. When Ashiba took up in right earnest the task assigned to him, the younger brother caused a great hindrance to its progress. Thereupon he appealed to the Lord who, being moved, endowed the eldest son with more strength. For the second time Konjin Tuthokpa interfered with his brother's toil. Realising the destructive attitude of His younger son, the Lord at last produced Nongthang-Laïema, a goddess of immaculate beauty, from His own self and placed her, bright and clear, high above in the sky. Konjin Tuthokpa was for sometime intensely captivated by the blazing beauty and thus he was drawn away from further thwarting his brother's endeavour. The creation of the earth being thus complete, the Lord finally asked Ashiba to create human beings after His own likeness. This too being performed to His satisfaction, the Lord wanted to test the intelligence of the two brothers. He bade them to circumambulate the earth with the promise that the one who arrived first should be the master of it. While the elder brother slogged all the way to win the coveted prize, the younger made seven rounds of the pedestal of the Lord's throne. Pleased with this the Almighty bestowed the reward on His younger son, but lest Ashiba might feel mortified, He granted him the highest seat in the echelon of the divine beings. On another occasion the Lord floated down a river in the guise of a dead ox which Ashiba could not recognise, while Konjin Tuthokpa easily did. This further proved the younger brother's superior intelligence.

The rest of the work is devoted to the rejoicing of the gods and the goddesses and a description of the genealogies of the different clans.

Though the stories enshrined in the text might have been in the form of an oral tradition, from the point of view of diction the work itself cannot be placed earlier than the seventeenth century.

LETTERS (Assamese). Like the tradition of autobiography, the tradition of the publication of letters too was absent in Assam before the British period. But whereas autobiography developed as a full-fledged branch of literature during the British rule, publication of letters in book-form is a post-Independence development in Assamese literature. Even so, there has been only one volume of letters published so far in Assamese; and thus a tradition cannot yet be said to have been formed. The letters in this lone volume are from and to Lakshminath Bezbarua published posthumously under the title Pat-ralekha (1968), edited by Maheshwar Neog.

Go.S.

LETTERS (Bengali). Letter-writing, as a literary form, is closely related to biography. Authors write letters not only for private communication, but also for expressing opinions and ideas on different aspects of life and art. Many authors write letters in the form of diaries.

Three of the earliest Bengali writers whose letters have been preserved were Iswarchandra Vidyasagar (1820-1891), Michael Madhusudan Dutt (1824-1873) and Debendranath Tagore (1817-1905). Vidyasagar wrote numerous letters to his relatives and friends in his exquisite prose. A good number of them have been published in Karunasagar Vidyasagar of Indra Mitra. Madhusudan's letters are mainly in English, but they are a poignant record of a restless and distressed mind and also of his revolutionary literary ideas. Devendranath Tagore's letters, though not of much literary worth, contain a lot of relevant socio-economic information of the period.

Swami Vivekananda (1862-1902) was a prolific writer of letters. He wrote as many as 552 letters in Bengali between 1888-1902. He travelled widely and wrote down the travel diaries in the form of letters to his friends and disciples. Many of his letters were addressed to the editor of Udbodhan, in which they were serialized. His Paribrajaker daeri (A traveller's diary) was entirely written in the form of letters. Vivekananda's letters are unique in that they reveal a style of writing at once vigorous and colloquial. They also contain his seminal ideas on various aspects of life and his world-view expressed in a variety of moods in a singularly appropriate style.

Nabinchandra Sen (1846-1909), who was a poet, wrote Prabaser patra (Letters from abroad). The letters compiled in the book reveal the inner self of the poet.

Dwijendralal Roy (1863-1913) wrote Bilater patra in which he tells us about his experiences as a student in England. His letters are in a jovial, informal style.

Rabindranath Tagore (1861-1941) has left the rich legacy of his inimitable letters which now form a part of his magnificent output in all branches of literature. Rabindranath's autobiography is brief. He has not revealed much of himself in its pages. But he was an indefatigable writer of letters. Written to individuals all over the world they have now been collected and published in several volumes. Tagore answered every letter he received in his own handwriting until the last phase of his life when he became too feeble to hold a pen. A perusal of Tagore's letters leaves a reader wondering about the energy and versatility of the man who could untiringly express himself in such graceful style on so many diverse issues.

Tagore's Chhinnapatra (Torn letters), is a class apart in Bengali literature. These were written in the last decades of the 19th century when the young Tagore was spending his days in a houseboat on the river Padma looking after his family estate in Shilaidaha, now in Bangladesh. These letters offer an insight into the poet's mind against the background of nature and the people of rural Bengal. Written in an exquisite prose, the book's lyrical quality is unexcelled. His other book of letters is Bhanusinher patrabali (Letters of Bhanusinha). This also reveals rare sensitivity of mind and enriched intimate style of letter writing addressed to a fourteen years old girl student. Tagore had a wanderlust. All his life he travelled far and wide. He utilised every occasion of his travel to write literary pieces in diary form. He published those diaries and letters in a number of books, e.g., Yurop prabasir patra (Letters from a person travelling in Europe), Bilat jatrir patra (Letters from a person travelling to England), Jatri (Traveller), Parasya bhraman (Travel in Persia), Japan jatri (A traveller to Japan). His famous book, Rashier chithi (Letters from Russia), as the name suggests, was written as letters when he was visiting the Soviet Union in 1930. Rabindranath's letters written to his friends and relatives containing his personal feelings and opinions on family matters have been published by Visva Bharati under the title Chithipatra. He made this form of literature informal, candid and direct, shorn of any artificiality in style. Even in letters written to unknown individuals in response to some queries, Rabindranath expressed himself as an artist unfolding his ideas in a simple graceful language distinctively his own.

Pramathanath Chaudhuri (1868-1946), poet, essayist and editor of the Sabujpatra, was an elegant writer. He lent a polish to the colloquial Bengali as he used it in serious creative literature. He also left a number of letters rich in literary flavour and revealing his creative mind. Saratchandra Chatterjee (1876-1938) often explained his stand on literary and other matters through letters.

Dilipkumar Roy's Tirthankar (A pilgrim) is a notable contribution to this form of literature. Dhurjatiprasad Mukherjee's Sur o sangati (Melody and harmony) is an important book on music which was the result of exchange of letters between the author and Rabindranath Tagore. Parimal Goswami's Patra smriti (Letters and memories) is a collection of letters by eminent writers. Letter-writing has always been a pastime as well as a compulsion of writers in Bengali literature.

LETTERS (Gujarati). Kalapi's two volumes of letters, Kalapini patradhara (Letters of Kalapi, 1931) and Kalapina 144 patro (One hundred and forty letters of Kalapi, 1925), are the letters written by the poet to his friends, wives and elderly men of letters, which reveal his internal conflict, his mental agony and his emotions in a very powerful language. Gandhiji's letters to his followers in his 'Ashram', Jamnalal Bajaj, Sardar Vallabhabhai Patel, Kaka Kalelkar, Ashramni bahinone (To the ladies of the Ashram, 1951), Panchma putrane Bapuna ashirvad (Bapu's blessings to his fifth son), Premaben Kawtakne, Gangaswarup Gangabhenne (To the widow Gangaben), Chhaganlal Joshi ne (To Chhaganlal Joshi), Narandas Gandhine (To Narandas Gandhi), Parbhavati bahenne (To Parbhavati bahen), Viralsahavas patrodwara (Rave Company through letters) are some important collections of his letters. The letters depict Gandhiji as a teacher and visionary. In one of his letters to women of the ashram, giving his new year's message, he says, 'Let me see what decisions you take on new year's day. Go to those who do not visit you, speak to those who are not on speaking terms with you; befriend those who are averse to you. Do all this not for their good, but for your own good. World is creditor and we are debtors'. Kaka Kalelkar's three books of letters, Chi Netramani Bhaine (To Netramanibhai, 1947), Chi Chandanne (To Chandan, 1962) Vidyarthinine patro (Letters to a pupil, 1964) depict Kaka Saheb as thinker, loving head of a family and teacher. Ambhalal Purani, who was an inmate of Sri Aurobindo's Ashram, has two publications to his credit, viz. Bandhu Puranina patro (Letters of friend Purani, 1939) and Pathiknan puspo (Flowers of a traveller, 1940). Letters present his views on various topics which are based on Shri Aurobindo's philosophy of life. Narahari Parikh's Kanyane patro (Letters to a girl, 1947) inform a girl reaching the age of puberty of the problems ahead and how to get out of them. Jhaverchand Meghani's Li snehadhin Jhaverchand (Your lovingly Jhaverchand), letters written to the members of his family and friends, are remarkable for their frankness. Kishsinha Chavda's Himalayani patra yatra (Journey to Himalayas in letters, 1970) is a combination of two genres, i.e. letters and travelogue. Thirty-five collections of letters have been published upto 1978.

LETTERS (Hindi). Letter writing has been an integral part of human communication and contact ever since man succeeded in evolving the art of writing. In Hindi, we find numerous references to letters and letter-writing in medieval poets like Jayasi, Kabir, Sur, Tulsi and Mirabai. Uninhibited personal letters express true, intense and intimate feelings of man. In personal letters, if the addressee is intimately related to the writer, one would express oneself unreservedly and unhesitatingly in a letter even if one would find it difficult to express the same feelings to the same person in his presence. We have a glimpse of the real man in such personal letters. It is such letters that may form part of the rich literary heritage of the person and candidly reveal his essential character much more than his other literary compositions. They are a direct pouring out of one's heart. Rightly does James Hovel characterize this role of personal letters "as keys to open hearts". Letter-writing is an art in itself and its essence—truth unmixed and unadulterated—makes it interesting, and often fascinating to the later generation, delinking the author from all his idealistic protestations and pretensions.

Collecting, collating and publishing epistolary literature of great and outstanding litterateurs is a trend of recent origin that filtered into Hindi and other Indian languages from the West. Recognising letter as part and parcel of literary activity and utilising it as an infallible medium of a direct and deeper understanding of the literary, aesthetic, moral and philosophic values of the author is now an established practice and they are cited as corroborative evidence in his appraisals. Sometimes the creative writer himself articulates and interprets the contentwise and stylewise ingredients of his writings in his personal letters. Sumitranandan Pant's numerous letters to Bachchan are a case in point. No other evidence can authenticate a writer's intention better than his own direct epistolary reference. Harishanker Sharma appropriately points out: "All letters, be they artistic or otherwise, speak the language of heart and inasmuch as they do that they are important and useful. They undoubtedly are a great help in knowing one's sentiments, nature, disposition, effect and personality."

We do find evidence of the customary practice of preserving letters of important people right from the medieval times. Literary correspondence or epistolary literature in Hindi is as rich and vast a genre as the Hindi region itself, but tremendous efforts are needed to resurrect and publish the enormous treasure of this type that lies buried and neglected at numerous places. A number of boxes containing letters addressed to the great Hindi editor, Padmasingh Sharma, has recently been handed over to the Nagari Pracharini Sabha for safe custody. Some of them have since been published, but thousands await publication. At this juncture what we need is systematic publication of letters addressed to or by significant Hindi writers of yester-years like Bharatendu, Prasad, Pant, Nirala, Mahadevi Varma, Navin, Rahul, Makhanlal Chaturvedi, Paradkar, Vidyarthi, Ramchandra Shukla and others.

When we trace the history of literary correspondence or epistolary literature in Hindi, we find that the credit to bring forth the first ever collection of letters in published form goes to Mahatma Munshi Ram (who later acquired renown as Swami Shraddhanand). In the year 1904, more than eight decades ago, he published a collection of letters on Maharshi Dayanand. A large bulk of these letters were those addressed to Swamiji, those written by him forming a much smaller number. A much larger volume on the same pattern was published five years later by Bhagwat Dutt under the title Rishi Dayanand ka patravavyavahar. These letters throw pointed light on the total personality of the stalwart of the renaissance in Northern India. His patriotic fervour is all too eloquent in the few lines he addressed to his disciple and leading revolutionary of his times, viz., Shyamji Krishna Varma, while commissioning him for a visit abroad: "Look, always present yourself in a foreign land as an ordinary student of India and utter no word that would bring bad name to your motherland. Think well before you speak."

Letters written by Swami Vivekananda under the title Vivekananda patravali and those written by Subhashchandra Bose (153 in number) captioned Patravali were later published by Ramkrishna Ashram, Dehradun and Meerut respectively. Swami Vivekananda's letters, apart from voicing his spirituality, throw adequate light on his intense desire to resurrect long lost prestige of India. Subhashchandra's letters cover the period between 1912 and 1930 when he was still studying in London. After he plunged into the freedom struggle on return to his homeland, he wrote some letters during his incarceration in the Mandalay jail. They reflect the steady evolution of a firm self-confidence and unshakeable faith in the ultimate victory of his cause, absolute lack of craving for position, missionary patriotic zeal and an intense desire to inspire the youth in the front line of freedom movement.

Jawaharlal Nehru's celebrated collection of letters addressed to his only child, Indira Gandhi, were published in 1931 from Prayag under the title Pita ke patra putri ke nam. They were translated from English into Hindi by no less a person than Premchand. These letters from a fond father to a forlorn daughter impart information on various themes of Indian history, geography, culture, etc. in a style that is at once spontaneous and fascinating. The appearance of these letters gave a tremendous impetus to the publication of collections of letters on various subjects. From Baroda came a collection of historical letters in 1931 under the title Alamgir ke patra by Shantipriya Atma Ram. Many a collection followed, the important ones being Dharendra Varma's Europe ke patra, Chandrashekhar's Stree ke patra, Bhadanta Ananda Kausalyayana's Bhikshu ke patra (2 vols., 1940), Premchandji ke patra, (1948), Vivekananda ke patra (Nagpur, 1949), Brajmohanlal Varma's London ke patra (Bombay, 1954) and Kishoridas Vajpeyi's Sahityikon ke patra (Kankhal, 1958).

The father of modern Hindi literature, Bharatendu, was a very sensitive letter-writer. The colour of the paper on which he wrote on any particular day of the week tallied with the conventional colour of the day. He infused his letters with his spontaneous sensitivity and artistic temperament. Amongst his other contemporaries, Pratap Narayan Mishra and Balmukund Gupta were unique as letter-writers. Balmukund Gupta's letters, Shiv Shambhu ka chittha, contain satirical pieces inimitable for their deep and biting sarcasm and were nothing but open defiance of the Viceroy, Lord Curzon, published in the Bharatmitra. Each word of these letters speaks volumes for his patriotic zeal.

Mahavirprasad Dwivedi's era is the most important from the point of view of literary correspondence. Dwivediji himself as editor of the most significant journal of his age viz., the Saraswati, wrote and received thousands of letters and it is perhaps the literary correspondence of the age that saw systematic publication. Padma Singh Sharma's letters, systematically organised, were published under the editorship of Banarsidas Chaturvedi and Harishanker Sharma in 1956. His letters reflect a dignified though low-key personality and profound yet unassuming scholar. His letters are evidence of the difficult circumstances that beset Hindi and the numberless problem that faced the Indian society at large. The names of Banarsidas Chaturvedi, Harishanker Sharma, Baijnath Singh Vinod and Kishoridas Vajpeyi deserve special mention for their untiring efforts to bring to light letters of many outstanding literary personalities which would have otherwise perished. They not only devoted themselves, but also inspired others to undertake the resurrection of such letters. Baijnath Singh Vinod did yeoman's service by editing two collections of important letters, viz. Dwivedi patravali (1954) and Dwivedi yug ke sahityakaron ke kuchh patra (1958). Dwivedi's letters are important from the point of view of literary activity of the age as also for his social standpoint. Except for some personal letters, they are mostly concerned with some linguistic or journalistic or interlinguistic problems of the age. They introduce us to an elderly, affectionate, benevolent personality concerned with the problems of his country, his language, his people, with total devotion to these causes. Says Dharendra Varma about the collection: "We know Dwivediji and his contemporaries only through their works, but this knowledge is incomplete in itself. Their personal letters complement this imperfect knowledge. We know through these letters what mettle our literary stalwarts were made of and what irrepressible spirit, fortitude, unshakable faith and courage they displayed in selflessly serving the cause of the Hindi language and literature. These letters represent authentic documents of the historical circumstances of the age.

Two other epistolary collections are the significant contributions of Kishoridas Vajpeyi's long life of service to the cause of Hindi. Though not voluminous, the collections are important because of profuse material evidence they contain. The first is Sahityikon ke patra (1950), more importantly, in their own handwriting, and the other titled Acharya Dwivedi aur unke sangi-sathi (1965). The first one contains letters by twenty-four pre-eminent Hindi litterateurs, viz. Mahavirprasad Dwivedi, Ramchandra Shukla, Hariaudh, Misrabandhu, Amarnath Jha, Kanhaiyalal Poddar, Ramdas Gaur, Ambikaprasad Vajpeyi, Mahamahopadhyaya Girdhar Sharma Chaturvedi, Maithilisharan Gupta, Ugra, Rahul, Hazariprasad Dwivedi, Jainendra Kumar, Devidutt Shukla, Jagannathprasad Chaturvedi, Shukul Narayan Sharma, Siddhanath Madhav Agarkar, Sampurnanand, Shrinarayan Chaturvedi, Banarasidas Chaturvedi, S.K.D. Paliwal, Ramagya Dwivedi and Harishanker Sharma. The editor, Kishoridas Vajpeyi, throws ample light on the personality and literary attainments of each of them in his inimitably interesting style. The editor aptly describes the self-revealing importance of literary correspondence in a couplet of his own: 'Ati duruh vistrut jiwan jo granthon mein hi nahin samata, vahi kisi ke ek patra mein jyon ka tyon pura bandh jata' (the most obscure and long life that cannot be contained in voluminous works does get summed up most succinctly in just a single letter by someone). These letters were written between 1933 and 1956. The other collection contains 34 letters by Mahavirprasad Dwivedi in the first half and contains reminiscences of some of his contemporary stalwarts along with the letters of some of them. These letters, studied thoroughly, may prove immensely helpful in comprehending the course of development of modern Hindi.

Like Acharya Dwivedi and Padma Singh Sharma, Munshi Premchand also occupies an important position as a literary epistolarian during his long struggle as an editor and a creative writer of eminence. The number of his letters many cross a couple of thousand mark. The most important and significant ones have been compiled by his younger son, Amrit Rai, under the caption Chitthi patri (2 vols.). Some letters dwelling on Premchand's personality and literary creativity have been reproduced in his biographical work on Premchand, viz. Qalam ka sipahi. These collections are a veritable museum of literary styles ranging from letters in suave and standard Hindi style to typically Persiannized Urdu and vary according to the addressee's linguistic limitations and taste. They show Premchand's equal felicity in the two distinct styles. Some of the letters are really inspiring and give us a glimpse of the selfless patriot and litterateur infused with a genuine desire to serve the cause of his language and literature without any ambition for reward, material gains, comfortable life style or fame.

In 1960, Viyogi Hari published a small volume of some of the letters from his collection under the title Baron ke preranadayak kuchh patra. These letters were written to him, during the period 1932-1955, by Gandhiji, Mahadevbhai Desai, Kishorlal Mashruwala, Thakkar Bapa, Vinoba Bhave and Purushottamdas Tandon.

In the same year was published a collection of 126 letters of poet Sumitranandan Pant, which appeared as an index to Bachchan's essay collection penned during the period 1947-1960, on Pantji's personality and poetic achievements under the title Kaviyon mein saumya Pant. Some of the obscure references have been briefly commented upon by the editor to make them more explicit and intelligible. The letters are of exclusively personal nature which brightly mirror Pant's simple and affectionate disposition. They cover a wide range of subjects and are unique in their very personal nature. The personality reflected in these letters is vastly different from the one we know through his literary creativity. Letters no. 118 to 126 are significant from the point of view of the poet's own interpretation of the rather vague and unintelligible parts of his own poetry.

The 'Muktibodh smriti' number of the Rashtravani (1965) published letters by numerous writers to Muktibodh as also his replies to them. These letters throw adequate light on his economic plight, his wrath directed towards unbalanced contemporary life, his family circumstances and the agony of the creative process of the poet.

In nos. 52 and 53 of the Sammelan patrika, Banarasidas Chaturvedi published 27 and 29 letters respectively addressed to him by Vasudevasharan Agrawal, which are significant and moving and have been described as genuinely spontaneous. They represent his biography in a nutshell in a perspicuous style. They are immensely valuable from the literary standpoint.

Shivprasad Singh edited a commemoration volume on the happy occasion of Hazariprasad Dwivedi's sixtieth birthday under the title Shantiniketan se Shivalik (1962) and appended some letters written by various litterateurs to Dwivedi. They are significant inasmuch as they provide an insight into his life and struggles, his carefree nature, his likes and dislikes, trials and tribulations, economic status, vicissitudes of life and his literary attainments.

During the recent past, some well-known literary institutions and literary enthusiasts have made efforts to unearth and bring to light letters of some remarkable literary men. It is a welcome development and augurs well for making significant material available to the historian of Hindi literature as well as to appraisers of individual literary achievements. This will impart authenticity to many a critic of outstanding works. Some more collections of letters may be made special mention of: Anmol Patra

Epistolary literature is a powerful genre that has yet to mould itself into a systematic genre with the rising consciousness amongst educated men to preserve letters of historical and literary significance. It holds immense potentialities for the study of the mental processes of the epistoler and his literary creativity as also the circumstances that moulded his age, its thought processes and literary activity in general.

Ma.C.

LETTERS (Maithili). In this genre Maithili is very poor. The art does not seem to have been cultivated early, though we have Vidyapati's Likhanavali of the first quarter of the 15th century. It is said to have been written under the patronage of Dronawara Puraditya. It is written in a Sanskrit-Maithili mixed language in the form of letters. There are in all eighty-four letters addressed to persons of all classes. The modes of addressing students are also indicated. The style has the stamp of Vidyapati's originality, and can be easily understood by a man with little education. Maithili words have been freely used in the text. In his Purusapariksha Vidyapati has referred to the correspondence between the kings of Mithila and the Yadava kings of Devagiri, but no letters have so far been found.

During the medieval period, administrative and business letters were written in highly dignified Persianised Maithili prose. Some such documents of the time of Maharaja Chhatrasimha are in highly Persianised Maithili. The official letters have hardly any literary value. They serve the purpose of conveying brief messages. They are dry and matter-of-fact. Their importance lies in filling a gap in the development of prose. On the mode of letter writing, depending on earlier models, Lal Das (author of the Rameshwaracharita) wrote on a model letter-writing in Persian. In this field names of Chanda Jha and Subhadra Jha also deserve mention. They have developed this genre through their writings. In recent years Subhadra Jha has adopted this method and has enriched the literary value of letter-writing. This has also enriched the prose style.

Though there is a total dearth of material on this genre, Upndranath Jha's Dui patra, which won the Sahitya Akademi Award (1969), is of course a new innovation in Maithili. While Chanda Jha and Subhadra Jha added grace to this genre, Upndranath Jha's way of letter-writing is an example of unique prose style. It is a novel in the form of letters and its importance in the field of letter-writing is unique. It has created a new way of writing novel and has left its impact on the contemporary literary art in Maithili.

LETTERS (Malayalam). Though letter, or 'Kattu' as it is called in Malayalam, as a means of communication is as old in Malayalam as in most other Indian languages, letters with a cultural or literary significance and appeal were written for the first time only towards the close of the 19th century, when some periodicals were started. Buried in the back issues of Malayalam Manorama, Bhasha poshini, Rasikaranjini and Kavana kaumudi are hundreds of letters, in both prose and verse, contributed by the literary celebrities of those days. But they have not been collected and published so far.

Rantu kattukal (Two letters, 1917) supposedly written by a mother to two freedom fighters serving their term in jail is the first publication of the kind in book form. It is of unknown authorship. Konniyoor Minakshi Amma's Ninda nizhal (The long shadow) is a novel written in the form of a series of letters, which reminds us of Samuel Richardson's novels of that kind. Patradhiparude kattukal (The editor's letters, 1939) by T.K. Parameswara Panikker and Sir C. P.kku oru turanna kattu (An open letter to Sir C.P. Ramaswamy Iyer, the Dewan of the erstwhile state of Travancore, 1946) by P.T. Chacko are concerned with the political situation of that state at that time. In his London kattukal (Letters from London, 1950), C.B. Kumar has described his impressions of and views on western life to his niece in Kerala. Anne Joseph's letters addressed to children have been published under the title Ee kattukal ninakkullatanu (These letters are for you, 1954). Ninta kattukal (Long letters, 1955) by Joseph Mundassery and Ushakkulla kattukal (Letters to Usha, 1956) by C.R. Krishna Pillai deal with the authors' experiences during their travels in Russia.

German kattukal (Letters from Germany, 1957) is the collection of the letters written by E.R. Srikrishna Sarma when he was in West Germany and serialised in the Mathrubhumi Weekly. The collection gives beautiful sketches of the social and cultural life in that country.

LETTERS-MARATHI

M.V. Pylee's Videshattu ninnu kure kattukal (Some letters from foreign countries, 1963) contains his experiences during his tour to some European countries. Achchhan Valsalakku ayacha kattukal (Letters sent by father to Valsala, 1966) is a collection of fifteen letters written by C. Damodara Menon.

Perhaps more remarkable than any of the foregoing collections are the following two. Of these the first, Vallattol kattukal (1978), contains the letters written by Vallattol Narayana Menon to Sardar K.M. Paniker. These letters, edited and published by Kavalam Narayana Paniker, reveal Vallattol's enthusiasm in building up the Kerala Kalamandalam and rejuvenating the art of Kathakali. The second, Mararute kattukal (Letters of Marar, 1981), published by the Marar Sahitya Prakasam, is a collection of letters of the veteran critic Kuttikrishna Marar sent by him to his several friends on a number of social and literary themes.

The latest in the series is Hridayathinte vatayanangal (Doors of the heart, 1988), a collection of 131 letters sent by poet G. Sankara Kurup to N.V. Krishna Warrior from 1954 to 1977. The selection and editing of the letters have been done by N.V. himself. As the title implies, the letters reveal the poet's reactions to the bitter experiences he had in his professional and literary careers.

This genre of literature has been enriched by a few translations also. Ambadi Karthyayani Amma's translation (1950) of Nehru's Letters from a Father to his Daughter, Kerala Gandhi Smaraka Nidhi's publication (1962) of the Malayalam version of some letters selected from Mahatmaji's writings and Changarapilly Narayan Potti's rendering (1984) of Morarji Desai's letters are particularly worth mentioning in this regard.

T.R.R.N.

LETTERS (Marathi). The history of Marathi letters begins with the 13th century. It is said that Changa Vateshwar sent a blank paper as a letter to Jnaneshwara on which the well-known Changadev Pashasti was written later.

Correspondence in Marathi of the past is very valuable as it throws light on historical facts. These letters give us a clear knowledge of the social and cultural values cherished by the people of those times and also depict a true picture of Maharashtrian society. Correspondence on wars, on political strategies, on property and estate divisions, news-letters, letters of judgement over land disputes, religious disputes, letters declaring charities, government commands, etc. of those times can be included in the category of letters in Marathi literature. Of course, no correspondence on literature between two literary personalities or between two literary institutions is available. Even the correspondence mentioned above was preserved and published only after the advent of the British rule when the art of printing came to stay.

The letters of that period were published in Kavyetihasa sangraha (ed. Sane, Modak and Chiplunkar), Shahu and Peshwa Rajkirdas (published in nine volumes by Deccan Vernacular Translation Society), Marathyanchyi itihasatil sadhane (22 Volumes, edited and published by V.K. Rajwade from 1898 to 1917), Aitihāsik lekhasangraha (ed. by Vasudeoshastri Khare and his son Yashwantrao, 15 Volumes published from 1897 to 1930), Peshwe daftar (ed. G.S. Sardesai, pub. from 1930-1934), Aitihāsik patravyavahar (ed. G.S. Sardesai, K.P. Kulkarni and Y.M. Kale, 1933), Aitihāsik Sankirna sahitya (14 volumes, pub. by Bharat Itihasa Samshodhak Mandal, Pune), Shiva charitra sahitya (13 volumes pub. by Bharat Itihasa Samshodhak Mandal, Pune).

It seems that about 60,000 letters have been published in book form from such correspondence in Marathi of past times.

Letters having a social and cultural significance were first published in periodicals. These letters were full of literary qualities. Among some of the notable letters was the one by Balshastri Jambhekar written to C.A. Muirhead, the then Secretary to the Board of Education, Public Instruction in 1840-41. Other such letters were those of Jhambhekar to the Chairman of the Bombay Royal Asiatic Society regarding a copperplate inscription in Brahmi found at Kharepatan (1842), correspondence between Jambhekar and Brahmins from Poona regarding 'Shripat Affair' (1844), Lokahitwadi's 'Shatapatre' published in Bhau Mahajan's Prabhakar (1848-50), letter of Baba Padmanji to the editor of the Jnanaprakash regarding the fruitfulness of the British rule; letter from 'one of those forty-two' in connection with 'Pancha Howd Mission Affair' (1892).

The most valuable contribution in this particular branch of literature has been made by Haribhau Mote who compiled and edited a number of letters and published them in two volumes of Vishrabddha Sharda. These letters have been written between 1817 to 1972 by different persons—social reformers, politicians, historians, research scholars, literary personalities, editors, artists, dramatists, musicians, sculptors, academicians, etc. These volumes unfold a large canvas of Maharashtrian mind and show the innumerable peculiarities, characteristics, instincts of the Maharashtrian society. Both the volumes draw with accuracy a vivid picture of Marathi community. D.K. Bedekar wrote a very well-studied introduction to the first volume, and P.L. Deshpande wrote a foreword to the second volume. G.D. Khanolkar wrote the comments and foot-notes. In the first volume, there are letters of

LETTERS-PUNJABI-LETTERS-RAJASTHANI

M.G. Ranade, Pandita Ramabai, Vishnushastri Chiplunkar, Gopal Ganesh Agarkar, Jotirao Phule, Lokamanya Tilak, Sayajirao Gaikwad, Shahu Chhatrapati, Vitthal Ramji Shinde, Babasaheb Ambedkar, N.C. Kelkar, Senapati Bapat, Raghunath Dhondo, Karve, etc. The first volume is devoted to the social and political reformers of Maharashtra as well as to its literary activities.

The second volume devotes itself to the Marathi theatre and music. It contains letters regarding Marathi theatre groups, their activities and their daily routine, actors and their life, the decline of Marathi theatre, the arrival of cinema, etc. and these letters are written by Vishnudas Bhawe, Bhaurao Kolhatkar, Shankarrao Majumdar, Ram Ganesh Gadkari, Krishnaji Prabhakar Khadilkar, Balgandharva, etc. In connection with music, letters of V.D. Paluskar, Govindrao Tembe, Abdul Karim Khan, Vilayat Hussain Khan, Mogubai Kurdikar, Hirabai Badodekar, etc. are published. These letters draw a graph of the rich tradition of Indian classical music.

Another peculiar feature of letters in Marathi literature is the publication of the letters of two lovers in the book entitled Kusumanil (1972). The letters were exchanged between the poet, Anil and Kusum Jaiwant. These are not merely love letters, but they depict the lovers' deep attachment to each other, their mental tensions, their hobby of reading books and their discussion of love of poetry, opposition in their own families regarding their decision to marry. In Marathi literature, this is a unique publication. Prasada diksha, a collection of letters sent by Gandhiji and Kaka Kalelkar to Prema Kantak, an Ashramite, created much controversy in the forties.

One more remarkable example of literary discussions through letters is the correspondence between a literary critic and a publisher regarding the development of Marathi fiction (novel) which was included as an Appendix in the book entitled Dhar ani Kath, by Narahar Kurundkar and published by R.J. Deshmukh. Letters published in the book were exchanged by Kurundkar and Deshmukh. Correspondence between the poet, Tambe, and editor, Mayadeva, forms a large portion of the Appendix in Tambe: Samagra kavita.

The novels, Indu Kale and Sarla Bhole, by Waman Malhar Joshi, Akulina by Purushottam Bhaskar Bhawe and Savitri by Purushottam Shivram Rege were written in a letter form. However this genre did not flourish for a long time.

LETTERS (Punjabi). The genre of letters, as a distinct form of prose writing, has yet to establish itself, although a few attempts have been made by writers here and there. The earliest such attempt is found in the book of travels, Pardes yatra (Travels abroad, 1939) by Sher Singh, which in fact is a collection of the author's letters from abroad to his wife in Punjab, who printed them after arranging them in a sequence. Another such attempt was made by Gurbaksh Singh when he reproduced as an appendix to the second part of his autobiography, Manzil dis pai, a few letters he had written to his wife from America where he had gone for higher studies. After his death, a complete set of such letters written from different places and at different times, has appeared under the title Chithian Jitan de nan (Letters to Jitan, 1978). Another such attempt is being made by a celebrated critic of Punjabi, Harbhajan Singh, who has published nearly a dozen such letters in different monthly journals like Arsi, Sedh, addressed to various writers, evaluating their different writings. He has tried to develop this letter-writing as a mode of criticism. This was tried earlier also by Surjit Singh Sethi in 1952, when he wrote 8 letters in English to his friend Nalani from Bombay about the theoretical and other aspects of Punjabi drama. These letters were later translated and published in Punjabi in the form of a book, Punjabi natak kala (1957). Harbhajan Singh has also translated into Punjabi 9 letters of G. Plakanov (1966) which delineate the Marxist view of literature and its relation with society. Similarly Jawaharlal Nehru's letters from a Father to His Daughter (Pita valon dhi nu chitthian) have also been translated and published in Punjabi.

LETTERS (Rajasthani). The letters written in Rajasthani not only articulate their writers' thoughts and feelings, but also offer information of considerable importance on the familial, social, religious, political and economic conditions of the times in which they were written. They also bring into focus the places and the events with which their writers were associated and involved. In them are also to be found specimens of the language popular among the masses at particular periods and places. From the point of view of form, these letters are of three types, viz. prose, combination of prose and verse and verse. Most of them are found to belong to the first two types. Letters which are written in verse are either highly personal or love-letters. In the work Khummana rasa by a Jain Poet, Dalpat Vijay, there is a verse-letter written from Chittor to his female friends at Delhi, and sent via Calcutta (or Cancutta as it was then called). The replies and counter-replies exchanged between a husband and his wife are also found in verse.

There are three types of letters from the point of view of the social relations and importance of the writer. The first type is associated with the kings and the rulers, the second with ascetics, saints and monks and the third with the common people. A usual feature common to all the three types is that at the beginning there is an auspicious formula of address, followed by the names of the addressee and the writer, the name of the place where the letter has been written; the mention of major news items constitutes the middle portion, and at the end a mention is made of the year and the date as per Indian calendar. There may be variations in the content of the auspicious formula of address, depending upon the personal, social, religious and official relationship between the writer and the addressee. It is on the basis of these relations that appropriate words expressive of respect are mentioned to the addressee, but the words 'Siddhashri' or 'Swastishri' are normally written at the beginning of every type of letter. The name of the place of writing is usually mentioned after the auspicious formula of address, but when a letter is addressed from a temporary address, the name of the place is mentioned after the date of writing. There are also certain conceptions as regards the use of the word 'Shri'. As to the number of 'shris' to be prefixed to the name of each person, the following 'doha' is current in Rajasthan:

Shri likhiye shat gurun ko, panch svami ripu chari
Teen mitra dvay bhritya ko, ekshishya sut nari.

(Write 100 'Shris' for the preceptor, 5 for the master, 4 for the enemy, 3 for a friend, 2 for a son and 1 for a disciple and a woman).

This rule is, however, not always followed. The figure 108 as following the word 'Shri', is used for the preceptor, or for a person who is to be revered. The numeral 1 is used for a particular individual, while the numeral 5 is used for a particular city. In the letters written by kings, there are mentions of the names of the chief gods and goddesses worshipped by their families in their respective empires; thereafter, there are the stamp of the empire and the signature of the ruler by way of 'Sahi' (meaning signed). Instead of signing their names, most of the kings either drew a symbol of their major weapon above or below the stamp of their empire, or at the back of the letter, or they simply wrote the word 'Sahi'. In many letters, one finds a simultaneous use of both of these techniques. From the point of view of subject-matter, the letters associated with kings and administration were briefly of the following types:-

1. State-letter, which is called 'Parwana', the document of the order of the State is known as 'Farman'.
2. Private letters were termed 'Khas Rukke'.
3. 'Kharita' or 'Khalita' also belongs to the group 'Khas Rukke'. Very important State-letters were enumerated among 'Kharitas'.
4. 'Muchalka'—it was a sort of acknowledgement letter which was written in the form of an undertaking or a bond.
5. 'Tajvij'—A document recording a compromise on any matter was called 'tajvij' or 'likhawat'.
6. 'Arji' or application letter—In this type of letter, the writer, besides expressing respect through the auspicious formula of address, presented his application.
7. 'Ishtihar' or letter of command. By this letter royal orders intended for the common people were put across.

Letters associated with ascetics and saints are of three types: The first is the one in which the subjects like exposition of moral principles, knowledge and religious message are explained in popular style, and the subject to be dealt with is explained in the form of commands and prohibitions. Letters of exposition of moral principles are usually found written in the technique of a story apparently meant for some other person. For instance, the work Shrikayanagar ko kagad by Sadhu Jugatramji deserves a mention. In this type of letter which is an intermingling of the verse and prose forms, the 'body' is comparable to a city, and the depiction of the various psychic tendencies to the actor; and, on the basis of this analogy, there is an attempted philosophical exposition while describing the activities of the city represented by the 'body' of the letter.

There has not emerged upto this day any study worth noting as to the style of letters belonging to modern Rajasthan language.

LETTERS (Sindhi). Khata, the Sindhi word for letters, is not a new form in any language for communication, for it has been in vogue ever since the languages developed their own scripts for writing. Letters are generally addressed to some one, but these days the addressee can be imaginary. Letters, no doubt, are an important mode of revealing one's thoughts and ideas, or airing one's views on any topic under the sun—hatred, love, literature, politics, personalities and so on. Some letters are strictly confidential and private, which are not to be and should not be edited and published.

Sindhi cannot boast of many collections of letters since its Arabic-Sindhi script was standardised in 1853. However, there do exist letters preserved in private collections. One could only think of the translation of Jawaharlal Nehru's Letters from father to his daughter written in 1928, which appeared soon after. Its second edition appeared in 1966, under the title Shri Jawaharlal ja Indra d'e khata or Piu ja dhiu d'e khata (Jawaharlal's letters to Indira or letters from father to his daughter), translated by Arjandas Tharwani.

In 1945, D'ipchand Tilokchand Balani (b. 1909) translated Gandhiji's letters into Sindhi under the title B'apua ja khata (Bapu's letters).

Being inspired by Nehru's book, there appeared for the first time a book originally written in Sindhi, Piu ja puta d'e khata (Letters from father to son) by Tirthdas Pessumal.

LETTERS-TAMIL

In the similar vein, two more collections of letters have seen the light of the day. The first one, originally in English, entitled Dhiu ja piu d'anhan khata (1973), is a collection of letters by Kamla Mariwalla addressed to her father from New York. The book contains 30 letters from 11th September 1966 to 24th September 1971 (span of five years), translated and published by Chetan Mariwalla. These letters throw light on Kamla's experiences mostly in New York, where she had gone for higher studies and research in the medical discipline.

The second collections, Jail maan patnia d'anhan khata (Letters to wife from the prison) by Salamat Purswani (b. 1926), contains thirteen letters written from November 1962 to October 1963, while the author was in detention in Thane jail. Its third edition was brought out in 1978, but the book was first published soon after 1963. These letters explain Marxism in simple and direct style. One cannot, however, expect any literary flavour in the style of the author. The book was awarded Nehru Peace Prize by Soviet Land in 1977.

An important collection of letters written between 1929 and 1966 by Allama Imdad Ali Qazi (1886-1968) addressed to Sayyed Ghulam Murtza Shah, affectionately known as G.M. Sayyed, appeared in 1969 under the title Sahar ja singara (Decorations of Sahar). They were mostly written in English, excepting a few in Sindhi, which were translated and edited by G.M. Sayyed. Total number of letters is 82 which throw light on Qazi's character, thought and philosophy. The style is graceful and yet forceful, and the letters are replete with quotations from Persian poetry as well as Shah jo Risalo. It is an outstanding contribution to Sindhi literature.

Yet another collection entitled Aj'u pini chikyami chaaka (Today, too, my wounds are sore) containing letters from the persons of different walks of life, addressed to G.M. Sayyed, was published in 1977.

Letters that are literary and contain food for thought, can be found in Je kaki kakoriya kapri by Shaikh Mubarak Ayaz (b. 1923). They were originally meant for publication in the magazine Mehran. In all there are twenty-two letters written in 1955, but published in a book form in 1963. This is, perhaps, the first book of its kind in Sindhi literature and is almost poetic and aesthetic in expression. The book brings into focus the romantic character of Ayaz, who is considered to be an outstanding, and at the same time, a much controversial poet of the post-partition period in Sindhi literature. In the book are his views on art and his own poetry, and his comments on Sindhi classical poets are expressed boldly, without any inhibitions, along with many varied topics.

Mention may be made of a collection of a bunch of letters compiled in Khafti khatani jo khaako (Erratic letters, 1965). These letters from different writers, professors, judges etc., addressed to an elderly writer, Manohar-das Kauromal Khilani (1897-1984), deal with Sindhi language and literature; but some of them refer to the matters that are of little interest to the readers. However, this form of literature has yet to stretch itself to the fullest to justify a place of a separate, powerful genre of literary expression in Sindhi.

D.K.M.

LETTERS (Tamil). Letter writing as a literary genre probably had its beginning in Tamil in the form of brief poetic letters called 'chittukkavi' written by poets to local kings, chieftains and wealthy persons seeking their patronage. These letters were written in verse. In Silappadikaram we come across Madhavi's letter to Kovalan, in Chivaka chintamani, Kunamalai's letter to Chivakan. In the eleventh volume of Shaiva tirumurai, a letter in akavarpa finds a place in Tirumuruga Pasnram.

Books written in the form of letters, which can be accepted as works of literary merit, made their first appearance in Tamil in the 19th century. The genre has gained a following among prolific writers of the post-Independence era. In particular, politicians like C. N. Annadurai (who was Chief Minister of Tamilnadu from 1967 to 1969) have exploited the letter medium successfully to make a direct appeal to and lasting impact on the reader and also to educate the masses.

Among the letters of politicians, the regular letters to 'thambi' (younger brother) in the columns of the Dravida nadu by Annadurai over a period of years claim priority. They were published in book-form after his death, under the title Tambikku anna ezhutiya kaditankal. Among others, the letters written by S. Satyamurthy to his daughter, by Karumuthu Thiagarajan to Rajaji and by V.S. Manickam are significant.

Among literary men of the 19th century, Vedanayakam Pillai, Ramalinga Swamikal and Maraimalai Adikal have employed the letter-form. Vedanayakam Pillai's letters are in verse and they have been included in some of the anthologies of poems like Tanippadal tirattu. The letters of Ramalinga Swamikal have been collected and published by Tuvur Velayuta Mudaliar. One of the 12 volumes (the bulk of them consist of 'tiru arupta' poems) of Ramalinga Swamikal's works published by Balakrishna Pillai is devoted to a collection of Swamikal's letters.

V.V.S. Iyer's series of Rajagopalan kaditankal in the issues of Bala bharati are essays on Tamil art and culture. Another work of literary merit is Roy Chockalingam's Kathar kaditankal (Love-letters).

Maraimalai Adikal's Kumidavalli or Naga nattu arasi is a fiction of importance, which was written using the technique of letter-writing. This great scholar is also known for the puritan style in which he expressed his thoughts on every-day affairs in his personal letters to ordinary folks as well as to others. A bunch of such letters was published under the title Maraimalai Adikal kaditankal by Anbu Pacham ni alias C.R. Palaniandi. First published in 1957, this book of 64 pages containing 30 letters in Tamil and four in English was reprinted in 1960 and again in 1979. Another work by Maraimalai Adikal is Kokilambal kaditankal.

Anbu Pacham Ni and K.V. Veeraraghavan have jointly written Tamilaridaiye anbuppor, a piece of literary criticism in lighter vein in the form of a letter written to the author whose literary achievements and shortcomings are assessed. 47 letters are included in the book, mostly to writers.

Putumaippittan, the well-known fiction writer, has written several remarkable letters. A few of his intimate letters to his wife, written amidst great sorrow and financial difficulties, make interesting though pathetic reading in the biography written by Chidambara Raghunathan. Equally interesting are another eight letters of Putumaippittan published by Somu (M.P. Somasundaram) in Kalaimakal; they are impersonal letters in which he expresses his views on literary trends.

The most important group of collected letters in Tamil is from the pen of T.K. Chidambaranatha Mudaliar, popularly known as 'Rasikamani' and referred to by his initial alphabets as TKC. The letters written by him dealt with literature, art, music, Tamil heritage, poetry, literary criticism and University education. He employed a person to person technique, gave several quotations from English and Tamil works and used spoken Tamil style. Words flowed out of his pen with remarkable ease. Thus his letters bring out his personality in its entirety. Two volumes of his letters have been published. The first is Rasikamani T.K.C. yin kaditankal compiled by T.M. Baskara Tondaiman and published in 1961 by Pothikaimalai Pathippu. It consists of letters addressed to National leaders like Rajaji, poets like Kavimani, friends like Thiruppukalmani, judge Krishnasamy Iyer, journalists like Kalki and disciples like Justice Maharajan and Somu. This volume opens with the editor's preface and an admirable introduction by Maharajan. Its 304 pages are classified into 26 sections one each for the 26 persons to whom these letters were addressed. Some of them got one letter only and others received several letters. There is an editorial note for each section.

The second volume is called Rasikamaniyam kaditankal. It was compiled by Justice Maharajan and published in Sept. 1979. This volume of 300 pages consists of letters written to two persons only, Maharajan and his sister. Both the volumes were reprinted on the occasion of TKC's Birth Centenary (1981).

TKC's son Thitharappan (who pre-deceased his father) was also a prodigious letter-writer. Some letters written by him to Somu were published by Vasantam, a literary monthly issued from Coimbatore. His letters to others are now being serialised in the monthly Itaya oli.

Virattamilarukku avesakkaditankal is the title of a book of letters written by Swami Suddhanathan Bharathi to Pazham Ni published by the latter in 1947 and reprinted in 1952. The letters are a clarion call to Tamils to realise their rich heritage, to arise and to awake. These were not intended for publication when they were written.

A book of imaginary letters recently written (as a commercial proposition) by Swami Suddhanatha Bharathi has been published by him under the title Suddhanathan Bharathiyin kaditankal.

Another prolific writer M. Varadarajan has written several books in this genre; Nanbarkku Tangaikku, Tambikku, Annaikku are the titles of such outputs. These books reveal his views on economic, political and social problems of the day.

Unlike these, Varadarajan wrote hundreds of brief and business like letters to his friends, students and colleagues in the normal course without any suspicion that one day they may all be printed. A critical edition of a collection of his letters to various individuals has been published by the School of Tamil Studies of the Madurai Kamaraj University in 1979 under the title Mu Va Vin kaditankal. These are selected letters from among the many; they have been duly edited and published with a foreword note on the methodology adopted. An index also is provided.

K.D. Thirunavukkarasu and E.S. Visvanathan were associated with Varadarajan for quite a number of years and were the recipients of several letters from him. They have chosen to publish them; so these collections are small and are not representative letters.

A.M. Paramasivanandam has written a travelogue on his tour to Malaysia in the form of letters.

LETTERS (Telugu). One cannot claim the same quality for letters in Telugu that one finds in the correspondence between some western writers. One can, however, still find a few having a literary appeal.

As in every other aspect of modern Telugu literature so also in respect of this form we have to turn to Kandukuri Veeresalingam for the initiation of epistolary art. Sixty-four letters of Kandukuri are published in his diary. The next largest number of letters by him are addressed to Vanguri Venkata Subba Rao, a writer who was also engaged in writing about the lives of Telugu poets, for clarification of certain facts and figures. In one of the letters, Kandukuri welcomes constructive criticism; in another, he complains about the non-cooperation of Manavalli and Veturi, even though the latter had agreed to help him in making his history of Telugu poets more authoritative.

LIBRARY MOVEMENT IN KERALA

Of literary interest are only two letters. Each of them is written to the editor of Purushartha pradayini, clarifying his stand against the criticism of his usage of 'sandhi' (coalescence of words) and his translation of a shloka from Kalidasa's Abhijnana Shakuntalam..

The romantic turned mystic, Sudipati Venkatachalam has also published some letters on literary problems. Other important letter writers are Kodavatiganti Kutumba Rao and Madhunapantula Satyanarayana Sastri.

R.M.C.

LIBRARY MOVEMENT IN KERALA (Malayalam) has a special significance and had its origin in the first half of the nineteenth century when libraries were established in the former states of Travancore and Cochin and in the Malabar district of Madras presidency. These libraries were organised by local people motivated by the spirit of social service. The reading rooms attached to them were open to all while only members paying the subscription were allowed to borrow books for home reading.

Available records show that the Trivandrum Public Library was the first of its kind, which started functioning in 1834. In 1898 the library was handed over to the Travancore Government on the condition that it would be run as a free public library in a building of its own. During the third five year plan period it was designated as the State Central Library. The public libraries at Kottayam (1858), Ernakulam (1861) and Trichur (1873); and the municipal libraries at Tellicherry (1901), Calicut (1924) and Cannanore (1927) are the other early ones started in the town areas. During the same period, rural libraries were established at Vanchiyoore, Neyyattinkara, Chengannoor, Keezhkara, Oachira, Kandiyoore and Thodupuzha.

There were several social forces that directly or indirectly contributed to the spread and development of libraries in the state. The governments of the former princely states of Travancore and Cochin entered directly into the field of education by running schools under the state sector, which resulted in the spread of literacy. Libraries were also utilised as centres of adult education movement. The heightened political consciousness and freedom struggle also helped the growth of small libraries throughout the state.

The Madras Library Association, founded in 1928, extended some of its activities to the Malabar area. Some of the political leaders, who participated in the 42nd annual session of AICC at Madras, also attended the fourth All India Library conference and that provided an opportunity to work more closely with the association. In 1931, the Samasta Kerala Pustakalaya Samiti was founded at Trichur under the leadership of Chengalath Kunjirama Menon; but it could do nothing except publishing the first issue of a quarterly named Granthaviharam. The All Travancore Library Association (formed in 1933) which existed only for three years, also could not do much. In 1937, the first Malabar Library Conference was held at Calicut which resulted in the founding of the Malabar Vayanasala Sangham. On the invitation of the Sangham S.R. Ranganathan, the famous library scientist, visited Malabar and delivered lectures on library movement in some important towns. In order to spread adult education, the Government of Cochin established several rural libraries, and later, the library service was brought under a separate Directorate. September 14, 1945 is a memorable day in the history of library movement in Kerala when the All Travancore Granthasala Sangham was founded with a membership of fortyseven libraries. On the reorganisation of the states it was renamed as Kerala Ganthasala Sangham. The work done by the Sangham in developing the existing libraries and establishing new ones is commendable. All the libraries affiliated to the Sangham and receiving grant should be kept open to the public without any discrimination on the basis of caste or creed. Any library with a stock of 600 books and getting eight periodicals including three dailies is eligible for affiliation. The grant is disbursed according to the grade of the library, classified on the basis of the book stock, which ranges from Rs. 450 for F grade to Rs. 2200 for A grade. Each of the district libraries would get a special grant of Rs. 8500. Apart from this, the libraries are eligible for building grant not exceeding one third of the total estimated cost of the approved plan. The Sangham is getting an annual grant of Rs. 35 lakhs for distribution among the affiliated libraries.

The establishment of libraries all over the state by local initiative and support, making the library movement a people's programme and founding the organisation on a democratic structure, all these go to the credit of the Sangham. The 4200 libraries affiliated to the Sangham have twelve lakhs registered members and a total stock of 20 million books. About 2500 libraries have their own buildings. Each library affiliated to the Sangham is an autonomous institution governed by an elected committee. The state, district and taluk committees of the Sangham are constituted by the members elected from the individual libraries. This system worked till the taking over of the administration of the Sangham by the government and entrusting it to a control board in 1977. In appreciation Kerala Granthasala Sangham received the Krupskaya Literacy Award for the year 1975 from UNESCO.

There was a popular demand for library legislation in the state from the time of the organisation of the Sangham. S.R. Ranganathan drafted a library bill for the state in 1958 under the initiation of Joseph Mundassery, the then Minister of Education. But it was not enacted. Kerala Public Libraries Bills were again prepared by the government in 1971 and by the Sangham in 1973, which also met the fate of earlier one. Recently the government has circulated a bill to constitute a state library board for the overall development of libraries. It is hoped that this would accelerate public support and ensure the responsibility of the government to provide free book service to all.

LIGADE, JAYADEVITAI (Kannada; b. 1912, d. 1986) was a bilingual poet of considerable merit who tried to bridge the cultures of the Kannada and Marathi speaking people. She came of a rich family of Sollapur, now in Maharashtra. She got married at the age of 12. The many hours Jayadevi spent in her childhood listening to the renderings of kirtanas and puranas which filled her mind and heart with overwhelming devotion for the Shivasharanas of 12th century Karnataka. Born and brought up in a highly cultured and religious family, she could only complete her primary education in Marathi.

Jayadevi's literary career began with the publication of Jayagita, an anthology of 40 poems published in 1952. The poems are highly devotional in character. In 1959, the second poetic collection Taiyya padagalu was published. It contained one thousand triplets (tripadis) touching a variety of themes. In these triplets we get biographies of 63 Puratans (apostles of Shaivism). 1968 marks the publication of her third poetic collection of 39 poems called Taraka tamboori.

Siddharama purana is a monumental epic poem on which Jayadevi's fame rests. This great poem runs in print into 600 pages, containing 4,100 triplets. The poet has enriched the triplet form of poetry and the effective traditional Janapada style. The work depicts the life of Siddharama, one of the greatest sharanas of twelfth century Karnataka. This ambitious work expresses Jayadevi's immaculate love for Siddharama, the most beloved of her deities.

Her six works in Marathi have given her a name in Marathi literature also. They are Siddhavani, Basavadarshana, Mahayogini, Siddharamache tripadi and Samrudha Karnatakachi rooparesha.

Jayadevi was twice elected President of the All India Virashaiva Mahila Parishad held at Hubli and Tumkur. She had also the honour of presiding over the Mahilagoshthi of the Vishwa Hindu Parishad at Udipi. She also presided over the Mahilagoshthi of the 32nd Sahitya Sammelana held in Bombay in 1950. The Mysore State Sahitya Academy honoured her. In recognition of her meritorious contribution to literature and achievements, she was honoured with the Presidentship of the 48th Sahitya Sammelan held at Mandya in 1974.

LILA (Oriya) is a form of folk-drama which has come down from early times. Two principal forms are Ramlila and Krishnalila. The first is popular mainly in the coastal region, while the other is popular throughout the state. Two other forms, Bharatlila and Gopalila, are mere variations of the Krishnalila. They are popular in the south and the west coasts respectively. Minor though, there is yet another form called Radhapremalila, also popular in the south coast. Krishnalila, otherwise known as the Rasalila, centres round the legends connected with Krishna. Ramlila centres on the legends of Rama. These lilas are unique in that they seek to dramatize the experiences of bhakti.

The bhakti movement which held its sway over the whole of India from the 12th century through the 17th, inspired ritualistic art forms and it was from these that the lila grew. Jayadeva's Gita Govinda was actually a form of lila. Subsequently poets like Chandidas, Vidyapati and Shankaradeva created a rich tradition of Krishna legend. In Orissa the pancha sakhas (Balaram, Jagannath, Ananta, Achyuta and Yashavanta), Dinakrishna, Abhimanyu, Baladev and Gopalkrishna with their works created a powerful lila tradition. Jagannath Das (16th century) wrote Rasalila as part of his Bhagavata. Narsingha Sena, another poet of the 16th century wrote Gopakeli, which is an early written specimen of the lila. Ramananada, a disciple of Chaitanya, wrote Jagannatha ballabha nataka which was actually a lila written in Sanskrit. Vipra Sadashiva, who probably belonged to the 16th-17th century, wrote Gopalila. As folk-literature was mostly oral, no written evidence of lila prior to these works exists. Dwija Chaitanya (late 18th century) wrote Krishnalila, Deolatola and Kanchi Kaveri and Dukhishyam Das (18th century) wrote Brindavatiharanlila and Kaliyadalanalila which were very popular. Sisu Banamali Das's Rasalila in 3 parts, Dasarathi Das's Brajaviharlila, Gangadhar Pradhan's Bharatlila and Radha-Krishna premalila, Ramchandra Bhramarbar Ray's Durjayamanalila and Patia Divyasingha Dev's Dwarakalila were based on the Krishna theme and were very popular.

In his Sharat rasa, and Basanta rasa Pindika Srichandan used Bengali with Oriya. Bishwambhar Rajendra Dev, the Chief of Chikiti, wrote, Sharat rasa (19th century). He used a Sanskrit shloka in the 'mangala charan' and introduced a character called 'Gahaka' (Gayak). Kishorchandra Rajendra Dev, another princely poet of the royal house of Chikiti, wrote Basanta rahasa. He substituted the Gahaka with a Sutradhara, conforming to the Sanskrit drama tradition. Besides using many tunes of popular Oriya, Bengali and Telugu songs, the poet also used an English tune 'You come here, Sir' for the first and perhaps the last time in Oriya lila.

One may note a number of lilas written during the first three decades of the 20th century. Govinda Surdeo of Nayagarh, a princely state of Orissa, actually modernised the traditional lila. He used prose dialogue and the proscenium for its performance. He wrote Manabhanjan, Suval milan and Rasalila in a simple style, which became very popular within a short period and helped to create a healthy theatrical tradition in Orissa. Mohansundar Dev Goswami wrote Radhakrishna premalila, Manabhanjan and Manamilan. Babaji Vaishnavcharan Das, a member of Goswami's troupe, also contributed profusely towards the lila tradition. Kanta Kavi Lakshmikanta in the 20's wrote Sharat rasa, Basant vilas, Braja barjan, Kaliya dalana, etc. which became very popular in the coastal regions. He was an eminent lyricist and had a drama troupe called 'Gopinath Sangit Samaj'. He had a modern mind, though he loved the traditional lila. Kavi Chandra Kalicharan Patnaik was the last member of the lila tradition. He was an actor, director, poet and dramatist. He started his career with writing and staging lilas. He wrote nearly twelve lilas of which Kautuka chintamani (1927), Banavihar (1929), Vidyavali (1932) and Gita Govinda (1936) were popular. He had a theatre troupe of his own called 'Sakhi Gopal Natya Sangha' where all these lilas were staged. His ceaseless effort brought lila almost close to modern drama.

Radha premalila was written by Pitamber Rajendra (19th century) who was the chief of Chikiti. This lila exhibits the rich musical tradition of south Orissa. Bharatlila is another popular form of entertainment in south Orissa. As 'Dwari' (gatekeeper) is its main actor, so it is called Dwari nata. This is also musical and dance-oriented, like the other lilas.

The lilas are mainly performed on an open stage though Govinda Surdeo, Laxmikant Mahapatra and Kalicharan Patnaik preferred the proscenium stage. The audience sit round the open stage. Its melodies are mostly drawn from local tunes and folk forms, though there is a touch of classical Odissi form. The instruments comprise of the drum (mridanga), cymbals (manjira), the flute (banshi) and recently the harmonium. Boys under sixteen are selected to play the roles of Krishna, Radha and the gopis. Elderly persons sometimes play the roles of Nanda, Yoshoda, Udhhav and Kansa. Ordinarily no woman takes part in the performance. The costume and make-ups are splendid and typically Orissan. The performance is altogether simple.

The contents of Ramalila, can be traced back to Valmiki's Ramayana, although the composition leans heavily on the regional Ramayana. Some critics think that Ramalila was a gift of the North. It is probably not true because with the Oriya Ramayana that preceded Tulsidas's Ramcharitmanas by about half a century, Orissa had its own tradition of Rama legend.

Bishwanath Khuntia wrote Bisi Ramayan perhaps in 1710, which is read widely till today. Its music and dramatic quality lend it a special distinction. Its language is simple. There are at least 225 songs in it. Raghunath Das (18th century) wrote his Ramlila containing 319 songs. He utilised Sanskrit shlokas and dialogues in some places. Baisya Sadasiva from south Orissa wrote his Ramalila sometime in the third decade of the 18th century. Krishnachandra Rajendra (1760-1790), the Chief of Chikiti, wrote his Chitkiti Ramlila consisting of 507 songs. Its language is simple and musical. Pitambar Rajendra's Janaki vilap, and Keshab Harichandan's Ramlila are also popular in Orissa. Brajabandhu Samant Sinhari, Keshab Patnaik, Raghunath Parichha and Iswar Das also wrote Ramalilas which are popular. Eighteenth century was actually the golden age of the lila literature in Orissa. A large number of Ramlila was written during this period.

Ram lila performances take place during the Ramnavami on an open stage, though, today, proscenium stage is also used. In the past the priest would sit on one side of the stage with his book placed upon a wooden stool called 'vyasasana' and read it loudly. This would be followed by theatrical enactments. The place of action was not limited to the acting arena only. Sometimes actors moved out of it to the vicinity and then the audience would follow them. Lilas were performed for months continuously as a cycle of plays and it was incumbent upon the actors to lead a strict, disciplined life during this period abstaining from fish and meat, and observing rituals.

In the past no woman was allowed to participate in the performance. But this restriction is not rigidly followed now. The actors are all amateurs. Costumes and make-ups are colourful. Sometimes masks are used particularly for the roles of Hanuman, Jatayu and Ravana. Musical instruments used previously were mostly traditional. Today new instruments are also used.

Lila is the folk version of the traditional Sanskrit plays. Sutradhara of the Sanskrit play is present here as 'Gahaka'. Invocatory verse, mangala charan, is also present. Lilas are the products of a rich devotional tradition and the devotional atmosphere is generally created by its sweet music. It also heightens the aesthetic appeal. Hence music is the vital part of this theatrical performance. The role of dance in these plays is also equally important. Rasalila is subtle, delicate and lyrical. Ramalila is broad, robust and spectacular. It is mainly a devotional form of folk theatre which developed for entertainment and mass-education. Especially in Orissa, lila has totally wiped out the differences between the two types of audiences (i.e. sophisticated people and the general masses) and brought them very close to each other. Thus as the predecessor of modern Oriya drama, and also as a powerful source of mass entertainment, its role will never be forgotten

LILACHARITRA (Marathi) is the earliest hagiographical prose work in Marathi, written four years before Jnaneshvari, i.e. earlier than 1286. It is a biographical account, containing many tales and philosophical discourses. It is a veritable source-book or a reference book for information regarding the geographical, social and religious conditions of the contemporary Maharashtra. A definitive edition of this work, edited meticulously by Vishnu Bhikaji Kolte, was published by the Maharashtra State Literature and Cultural Council (Maharashtra Rajya Sahitya Sanskriti Mandal) in 1978.

This work is in the form of reminiscences of Sri Chakradhar, as told by his chief disciple Nagadevacharya to Mhaimbhatta at Riddhipur after the master's death. The disciples stayed with Sri Govindaprabhu and remembered their 'guru' everyday. The work is in two volumes: the earlier contains the stories collected from the female disciple Ausa and the latter has many stories collected at different places and noted down by the author. The mahanubhava sect has seven holy books in verse and seven in prose. The work Lilacharitra compiled by Mhaimbhatta ranks as the first and the most important of the prose works. This work, originally written in 1286, was destroyed in 1308 when Malik Kafoor invaded the holy place. Upadhye Hirasa rewrote it from memory and the followers of the sect accepted the text as authentic. Now it contains 144 incidents. In the learned introduction to this work, its literary importance is described in detail. Mhaimbhatta, the author of the work, was a Sanskrit scholar, but he notes down every biographical sketch, in colloquial Marathi. He records all the simple but deeply significant and philosophical conversations and dialogues between the master and the disciples. Some of the stories and fables narrated in this work are very remarkable.

LILATILAKAM (Malayalam) is a Sanskrit manual belonging to the 14th century, on the poetics of Manipravala. The discovery of the palm-leaf manuscript of this work at the beginning of the 20th century created a stir among the Malayalam scholars. It was P.V. Krishna Variyar who found the manuscript in 1902 among the collection of palm-leaf manuscripts kept in his ancestral home. A translation of the first shilpa (section) was serialized (translator unknown) in the monthly magazine Mangalodayam during 1907-10. The full translation by Attur Krishna Pisharodi was published from Trivandrum in 1917. Pisharodi brought out another edition with an introduction containing both the original in Sanskrit and his translation. Others who published independent editions are K. Vasudevan Moossat (1940), Suranatu Kunjan Pillai (1946), Ilamkulam Kunjan Pillai (1955) and P. V. Krishnan Nayar (only the first three sections, 1974). An English translation of the first three sections by John Brough came out in London (XII. Pt. 1, 1947-48). Another English version (first three sections only) by K.N. Ezhuttacchan was serialized in Annals of Oriental Research (Madras) during 1964-68. M. Elayaperumal translated the work into Tamil and published it in 1961.

No direct evidence is available regarding Lilatilakam's authorship and period. The only internal clue regarding the period of its composition is the inclusion of a verse from Unnunilisandesham (in the fourth section to exemplify an instance of 'padodoshā' ('discrepancy in the usage of word' in verse) the date of which has been approximately calculated as between 1350 and 1375. Hence Lilatilakam could have been composed during the close of the fourteenth century, if not later. In the last verse quoted in Lilatilakam, the following words occur: 'Kalam kanayi chittame' ('ayi chittame, kalam kan=Find out the time, oh, mind). If 'chittame' indicates the time of the composition of the work, the year is 1391. K. Goda Varma, on the basis of Lilatilakam's indebtedness to the Sanskrit work Rasagangadhara, places it in the seventeenth century. A recent dissertation, however, attempts to fix the period as the nineteenth century (K. Unni Kitav; Chila Lilatilakaprashnangal, Ph.D. thesis, University of Madras, 1980, unpublished). The authorship is still uncertain.

Lilatilakam which is written in the classical system of aphorisms and commentaries, consists of eight shilpas (sections) and the topics dealt with in them are the following: (1) General discussion on the manipravala style, (2) classification of the native language forms, discussion on the sound structure, cases, gender, number, and verb conjugations (all these in a perfunctory manner), (3) sandhi (more elaborately than the topics discussed in the previous sections), (4) kavyadoshas, (5) gunas, (6) alamkara, (7) alamkara continued, (8) rasa. It can be seen that the selection and arrangement of topics are very crude. Many scholars at the time of publication and for many years after, described the work as 'the earliest grammar of Malayalam'. This, as could be seen from the list of topics, is an incorrect description of the work. Lilatilakam is mainly a work of poetics, though some discussion on the status of Kerala language (in the first two shilpas) and also on grammar of the hybrid language used for manipravala poems (in the second and third shilpas) are included in the text.

Lilatilakam remains a controversial treatise, scholars differing in their evaluations of the work, their qualifications ranging from 'monumental' to 'insignificant'. Despite its weak points, it should be admitted that the discussions in Lilatilakam, especially in the first three shilpas throw much light on the linguistic situation of Kerala at the time of its composition. The author ostensibly puts on the garb of a logician in the commentaries to the aphorism which to the present day judgement appears ridiculous. Some of his remarks are far from truth, thus forcing us to approach the work with extreme caution. Nonetheless, because of its historical and linguistic importance, the book cannot be dismissed lightly. Any historical discussion on the language of Kerala must necessarily have to refer to Lilatilakam.

The major argument of Lilatilakam centres around the independence of the Kerala language. The lengthy discussion in the first shilpa vehemently argues that the language of the westcoast is distinct from that of its eastern counterpart. Most of the later references to Lilatilakam were to this discussion. That the discovery of the book at the beginning of this century has changed the linguistic researches in Kerala is an indication of the work's popularity in scholarly circles.

LILAVATI (Kannada) is a champu work by Nemichandra (12th century). It is a love poem inspired by the Sanskrit work, Vasavadatta by Subandhu. Lilavati, a lovely princess, and Kandarapadeva, a handsome prince, are the idealized lovers whose story is narrated here. The poet was a great scholar, and was evidently influenced by several Sanskrit poets, including Kalidasa. The poet regards 'shringara' as the only sentiment which should engage the attention of a poet. The work reads like the self-conscious composition of a youthful poet, and it pleases by its vivid description and happy similes and metaphors. It is important as one of the few secular poems in old Kannada literature.

LIMERICK (Bengali) is an innovation of light verse consisting of five uneven lines. The structure of the verse stands on the first, second and fifth lines rhyming. The third and the fourth, usually a foot shorter also end in rhyming. It is a special kind of verse first introduced in English literature by Thomas Moore (1779-1852). But this claim is now disputed by some scholars.

The name of this special type of verse is said to have been derived from the chorus sung at parties in Limerick, a small town in Ireland, by veterans of the Irish Brigade returning from France in the 18th century. It was a rhyme-making fun game where each guest used to compose a line each and at the end was the refrain of the chorus—"Will you come up to Limerick?"

Edward Lear (1822-1888) is considered to be the first craftsman of this form. Bengali literature now contains hundreds of limericks written by old and new generations of poets. Limericks in Bengali, like their English counterparts, often play with words and place-names and there is also an ingenuity in end-rhyming making them appear funny and amusing. Some of the verses in Tagore's Chharar chhabi (1937) are very close to limericks both in mood and structure with a slight variation. Annadashankar Ray (b.1904) wrote many children's rhymes. Some of them are excellent limericks enlivened with sparkling wit. He plays with words and ends with the dramatic suggestion of some absurdity which children immensely enjoy. Other major poets like Premendra Mitra (1904-1988), Buddhadev Bose (1908-1974), Ajit Datta (1907-1979) have contributed to this genre of children's verse. Most successful in limericks is Satyajit Ray (b.1922) who is fascinated by Edward Lear's compositions. His Torai bandha ghorar dim (A bouquet of horse's eggs) is an adaptation from Lear. But though based on Lear, these are essentially Bengali in character. In the children's magazine like Sandesh, Anandamela, Shuktara and also in the children's page of well-known dailies, modern poets often write limericks for child readers. It must be said at the end that in Bengali limerick has remained a casual attraction for the writers of children's literature. Debiprasad Banerjee has compiled and edited a book of limericks containing representative contributions from noted Bengali writers.

LIMERICK (Hindi) The genre 'limerick' was designated as 'tuktak' in Hindi on the analogy of the word 'muktak' by Bharatbhushan Agarawal (1919-1975). Agarawal initially used the word 'limerick' itself, but after his naming of it as 'tuktak', it has come to stay so.

Limerick a new prosodic genre has been in vogue for the last forty years. There is however, no mention of any metre of this name. Alliteration in the form of repetition of a word twice or thrice is, nevertheless, part of its framework. The rhyme is the alliteration of the ending syllables of two or more feet of a verse. There is a detailed discussion of alliteration in all prosodic works. The rhyme is a repetition of a sound generated by a vowel in conjunction with a consonant of the ending words of a line of verse. If, for example, the word in the end of a line is 'hota', it will then have similar sounding words like 'lota',

LIMERICK-KANNADA-LIMERICK-RAJASTHANI

'rota', 'sota', 'khota', etc, for manipulating its rhyme at the end of other lines in the same composition. This may be called the sameness of rhyme. For 'tuktak' the first condition is this scheme of similarity in sound on the lexicon level. The first, the second, and the fifth lines are longer whereas the third and the fourth are shorter. It is also essential that the two consecutive lines rhyme together. Such a composition is called 'limerick' in English. 'Haiku' of the Japanese stanza is also somewhat similar to it, though the uniformity of rhyme is not a binding condition for it.

In the annals of Hindi literature the late Maithilisharan Gupta was well known for his rhyming lines, yet he never tried this type. Limerick is used for comic or satirical purposes. Since it produces a light effect, it does not have much significance. Kagaz ke phul (1963) by Bharatbhushan Agarwal is one of the important examples of limerick. Many poets followed it. Jagdishchandra 'Jeet's (b. 1934) Afsanama (1981) is another well-known book in this genre, containing one hundred and one limericks. These limericks present various moods, and patterns of official behaviour in a comic and satirical style. When limericks are illustrated with pictures or drawings they become more impressive. Both Agarwal and Jeet have illustrated their verses with drawings. A collection of rhyming words is a difficult task. Agarwal has presented many difficult rhymes: 'daya karo' is rhymed with 'baya karo'; 'mahanga' and 'lahanga' with 'naihang'. Such rhymes are difficult to find. With 'karnal' goes 'eternal'; for 'titali' and 'mitali', we have 'sahitli'. The rhyming of 'rona tum plutse' with 'sutse', 'jugutse' is another instance. Jeet has also matched 'phone' with 'non' (salt) and 'ton'. Though rhyme needs a comic and satiric treatment, yet it is not always essential. It has, however, not yet earned wide recognition or practice in the prosodic order of Hindi literature.

LIMERICK (Kannada). The limerick, as we know it in English has not been adopted into Kannada. G.P. Rajaratnam was the first exponent of the 'chutuka, the short stanza with a punch. Koravanji, a monthly devoted humour, encouraged the epigrammatists and writers of verse. Later, weeklies and monthlies started using the pointed stanzas as fillers. But none of them specialized in the limerick. We have just a few examples of the limerick proper, written by G.P. Rajaratnam, R. Shivaram, and Dhavalakeshi. Most poets have written epigrams. The name of Dinakara Desai stands out here. He used the rhymed quatrain with a satirical punch. A number of poets like Biligir, Lakshmana Rao, Dundiraj, Vidamberi Idagarnji and Sukanya Maruthi have written epigrams. In Kannada the limerick has been confused with the epigram, the haiku and other types of such verses.

Su.N.

LIMERICK (Malayalam). The term 'limerick' is usually applied to a type of light verse form consisting of five lines with the rhyme scheme aa bb a; The third and fourth lines are often written as a single line with internal rhyme. Such limericks are not found in Malayalam but something similar to that could be traced in the anonymous folk-poetry that has come down to us from the hoary past. Here and there in Kunchan Nampyar's numerous 'tullals' one could see examples of a sort of limerick. But they are couplets, often in sequences. The only modern poet who revels in composing limericks, again of a kind, is Kunjuni.

P.N.K.

LIMERICK (Marathi). In Marathi there are sonnets and odes, the dramatic lyric and blank verse forms borrowed from English; the rubai and ghazal borrowed from Persian and Urdu, but the Western limerick is not very popular. There were parodies introduced by Keshavakumar (P.K. Atre) and also meaningless nursery rhymes, but the strict form of a five-line limerick is not much adhered to, based on strange rhyming of proper names. The books of modern poets, Vatratika by Mangesh Padgaonkar and Virupika by Vinda Karandikar, do come very near such semi-humorous semi-satirical verse-compositions. Sadanand Rege did start a funny new form 'kinchit kavita'. In Hindi, a limerick is tuktak, popularised by the late Bharatbhushan Agarwal, and in Bengali chhara there was this limerick like fun. But somehow punning and making rhyming riots out of proper names is not in our literary vein. Probably we attach more sanctity to names, both place-names as well as personal nomenclature and surnames.

P.M.

LIMERICK (Rajasthani), in its five-line form, came to Rajasthani literature in the third quarter of the twentieth century. However, its ingredients like mirth, playfulness, satire, lively banter, wit, ingeniousness, etc. are noticed in the medieval literature of Rajasthan. The court poets as well as the wandering ones did compose poems, occasionally though, mainly in couplet form, on the subjects which are trivial and commonplace. These couplets have polish and finish of their own. In the folk-tradition, too, Rajasthani literature has a number of short poems where the tone is not pitched very high. A popular version of such poems is found in Bhungar ra ghisala, literally meaning the heavy, rough-hewn sticks of Bhungar. We have no evidence to confirm whether Bhungar was a pseudonym or the first name of the poet. Nonetheless, one point seems certain that 'ghisala' was the unrefined way of making an observation of secular subjects. The style appears fanciful, yet it is less soothing.

From Ghisala to Dankhala is a long journey. The credit of introducing limerick in its tight five-line form goes to Mohan Alok through his Dankhala (Offshoots, 1983). These 'dankhalas', each one complete in itself, were initially serialized in the Rajasthan patrika, a premier daily of the state. Their regular appearance created a new wave of humour, gentle satire and fanciful treatment of a subject. In them Mohan Alok effortlessly yokes a variety of queer characters like mythical gods, conservative pandits, orthodox women, fashion conscious girls, educated cheats, country cousins, high-profile bridegrooms, love-mania, etc., and fits them well in the structure and rhyme scheme of the limerick. An illustration (in translation) should do:

One Badridan 'Bodiya' (weaking) was thin, thin as a straw, looked as if hidden in clothes
Yesterday his wife Dhapi happily came with a 'thapi (wooden clothes beater) and beat him clean in clothes, high as Himalaya.

I.K.S.

LIMERICK (Sindhi) is a form of facetious jingle. The limericks in Sindhi, which for the first time appeared in 1978 in the literary journal Sangita, contain the largest amount of improbable incidents, subtle humour and satire. These pithily sum up the intellectual quandaries of the day. The limericks in Sindhi are also called the 'nonsense verse'.

Twentyfive limericks composed by Hari Dilgir appeared in the Sangita, a Sindhi literary monthly, in 1978. Sindhi literature, especially poetry, perceptibly lacks humour. In fact, there is hardly any humour in Sindhi poetry. The Sindhi limericks may, perhaps, fill this gap to an extent, but this kind of poetry has yet to gain acceptance by the readers.

Dilgir's limericks are a mixture of humour, sarcasm and, maybe, a bit of vulgarity.

The translations of a few limericks by Hari Dilgir are given below:

A poem was by a 'new' poet made,
Before some friends when he read,
A friend spake
What sense does it make?
I forget, I forget, with a blush the poet said

A man was sipping wine,
With a small spoon fine,
There's prohibition on drinking
But permitted is eating
So he eats wine which is no crime.

This form of poetry, with the content as it is, is yet to gain momentum in Sindhi, though sometimes the poems in this form appear in the literary journals.

LIMERICK (Tamil) is a type of lyric of specified form and content that has attained a certain degree of popularity in the West. It has a fixed form, having 5 lines with the rhyme scheme aa bb a, with the same restrictions regarding the length of the lines. The contents are light, with sarcasm or parody on contemporary institutions as the dominant mood.

In Tamil there has been no tradition of a limerick similar to that in the West in the matter of form. But the spirit of the limerick has been very much in evidence in Tamil from very early days and these stanzas sung by Tamil poets on the spur of the moment in a mood of anger, derision or sarcasm can rank as good examples of this genre.

There are some stanzas attributed to Kamban, which can be classified under limericks. In one of them, wishing to praise the craftsmanship of a launder called Seeraman, he says. "Looking at the whiteness of the wash, Lord Shiva checked to see if the frothy white Ganga was still in his head or had gone over to the wash. Brahma investigated to check if his spouse Sarasvati's white colour had gone over to the clothes. Lord Tirumal examined his hand to see if his conch had gone over to produce that dazzling colour".

Kalameghappulavar is the best remembered votary of this type of literature in Tamil. He had the scholarship and the alertness of faculty to be able to compose verses on the spot.

Kalamegham belonged to the 15th century. His real name has been forgotten and the name Kalamegham, by which he is known, was conferred on him to commemorate his ability to produce verses like a cloud sending down torrential rains. Like other poets of his times, he was also impecunious and he wandered throughout the land encountering admirers and adversaries, the latter provoking him to produce most of his work by which he is remembered today.

Many of the stanzas of Kalamegham depend for their effect on pun and they cannot be easily translated for that reason

Recently an attempt was made to devise a piece with a special rhyme scheme and line structure, with parody, sarcasm or sheer fun as the prevailing sentiment, to correspond more approximately to the Western concept of a limerick. The poet appears to have been a government official of Sri Lanka; he died a few years ago. His work of about 100 pages entitled Kurumpa is a collection of limericks.

In one of the pieces, Lord Shiva is admonished not to appear in the vicinity of Chillalai, a place near Jaffna in Sri Lanka; the reason is that Shiva is likely to rouse the fierce passions of the thousands of mad dogs which wander about the place. The piece depends for its effect on the facts that Lord Shiva usually appears as a beggar and mad dogs get madder when they notice a beggar. The limericks

LIMERICK-TELUGU-LINGUISTIC STUDIES-BENGALI

in this work are based on local situations, probably well-known to Jaffna Tamils, to whom they can certainly bring a measure of enjoyment

A.V.S.

LIMERICK (Telugu) is a poem in a humorous vein consisting of five anapaestic lines, usually with the rhyme scheme aa bb a; the first, second and fifth lines having three stresses, the third and the fourth, two. The origin of this very popular type of nonsense verse is lost in obscurity. Nor is it known for what reason the name limerick is attached to it. Limerick is a kind of ribald epigram, passed on by word of mouth, more often whispered than sung

In Telugu few tried their hands at this form. Arudra was the first to do so, but soon gave it up. The only other successful writer of limericks is Sri Sri. He too, it must be mentioned here, tried it more by way of experiment than with any serious intent. He wrote some fifty verses which find a place in Sri Sri sahityam (Vol. III) brought out by Sri Sri Shastri Poorthi Sanmana Sangham in 1970. It is in their very nature that the poet doesn't bother to preserve them, nor do his admirers care to bring them in a book form. Hence we cannot say how many other literary figures in Andhra dabbled with this form. It is possible that many have rather 'whispered' them occasionally, but there is no record of most of them.

Sound, rather than sense, is the life of a limerick. The assonance of words in one language can hardly be translated into another language, much less appreciated by others. Further, to bring out the magic effect of sound, Sri Sri broke Telugu words to suit the end-rhyming of lines. This, too, is well nigh impossible to translate. A transliteration may at best be a mere apology for the verse. These are the insurmountable hurdles for a translator attempting to convey to a foreign reader the success or otherwise of a poet in adapting this novel, yet enchanting, form.

In one of the limericks of Sri Sri, the poet is concerned with the age-old literary dispute whether poetry is greater or prose. He answers that he would vote for both as he had tasted and assimilated both.

Money is any day a strange, dirty malady. Is not there a medicinal soap to wash it off, or cannot the nib of the poet's pen eradicate this?—says another.

Under the title 'Self-portrait' he writes that he has the temperament of a clown, a divine discontent that drives him to experiment with life; and the giant Sri Sri has found the solution to contain torrential emotions in patent vocabulary.

In a famous limerick he says: "Dogs that bark do not bite; dogs that bite do not bark; those that do not bite but barking do not chase you; those that bite without bark do not turn back; we do not find dogs that neither bite nor bark." This seemingly simple poem is not a mere verbal jugglery but it is also an observation on life. Here we find the simplicity and profundity that he is known for.

Lastly we cannot but mention that this titillating verse form has its Achilles' heel. To all intents a witty, satirical and humorous verse-form fails to enjoy longevity. Nor, perhaps, can we place it along side the other forms of serious literature which have the chance of permanence. Limerick suffers from the inherent canker of being a 'work-of-the-hour'.

LINGUISTIC STUDIES (Bengali) were neglected throughout the nineteenth century. One cause of this was that comparative philology was built chiefly on the study of ancient languages. Furthermore, scholars had little idea about the old form of Bengali; manuscripts of the Charyapada and Shrikrishnakirtana were yet to be discovered. The earliest linguistic studies in Bengali were short treatises published during the later half of the century. Though the prefaces to certain dictionaries and grammars written still earlier indicate the presence of a kind of philological interest but the discussions are too brief and perfunctory to be taken into account. In 1856, Rajendralal Mitra, an Indologist who was acquainted with contemporary linguistic studies, wrote a brief treatise, 'Bangabhashar utpatti' in the journal Bibidhartha sangraha. This paper gives an account of proto-Indo-European languages and discusses the emergence of Bengali rather than the consequent evolution. For a long time after this, all discussion regarding Bengali centred round the question of its origin and the scholars were busy tracing the actual course of its emergence and evolution. The more frequent pattern of the general statement was that Sanskrit, which has relations with other languages of the Indo-European family, gave birth to Bengali, though there was a minor tradition of emphasising the importance of the non-Aryan elements in the language. This view emerged from the suggestions found, for example, in Ramkamal Sen's Preface to his Dictionary in English and Bengali (1834) that there were important 'Kol' elements in Bengali.

In 1872 Saradacharan Mitra published a paper on the 'Philology of the Bengali Language'. In the same year the first volume of John Beames's famous Comparative Grammar of the Modern Aryan Languages of India came out. Beames's was a comparative grammar; and the study of individual languages, Bengali among them, was not very deep or exhaustive. The book rather told the future scholars how the languages might be studied.

Srinath Sen wrote a book entitled Bhasha tattwa (Vol. I, 1900 and Vol. II, 1909). He asserted that Bengali was a corrupt form of Sanskrit. In 1920, Bijaychandra Majumdar published The History of the Bengali Language, which is the first significant book on the topic.

Beames had once emphasized the importance of consulting dialects in linguistic study; Majumdar, analysing the Bengali vocabulary, especially its dialects, emphasized the non-Aryan elements in Bengali. He tried to demonstrate that the affinities with non-Aryan speeches, both Dravidian and Austric, indicate a very deep 'influence' extending beyond the level of lexical items. The 'minor tradition' referred to earlier found a major exponent in Majumdar. This book, whatever its limitations, was an important and necessary corrective to the idea that Bengali is completely a Sanskrit language. About the same time in 1908, Rabindranath wrote his Shabda tattwa.

The Origin and Development of the Bengali Language, the most famous work in Bengali linguistics, by Sunitikumar Chatterjee was published in 1926. This book is unequalled till date because of the amount of data it handles. The book utilized the historical advantage of being written at a time when the earliest-known Bengali manuscripts—those of the Charyapada and Shrikrishnakirtana—had been discovered. It is difficult to list in brief the merits of the book. It is a veritable mine of information and linguistic data. It is certainly a milestone in Bengali linguistic study, though it has also to be noted that in the light of the outcome of modern researches, scholars have voiced criticism regarding what are considered some major shortcomings of the book.

Not much of significance on the history of Bengali language was written after 1926. In 1953 Sukumar Sen wrote Bhashar itibritta. Muhammad Sahidullah wrote his Bangla bhashar itibritta (1968) which, though pedagogical in approach like Sen's, has a greater unity of design. This book examines critically the various theories regarding the origin of Bengali. Though a few other books have also been written on the subject to satisfy pedagogical needs, Sen's book is generally considered and found to be of more use to university students studying Bengali at the graduate and post-graduate level.

At the international level, linguistic study has made great advance in course of this century. In particular, Noam Chomsky's Syntactic Structures (1957) revolutionised linguistic study. Internationally, the emphasis today is on not the synchronic, but the diachronic study of the language. After Chomsky the emphasis has been on the syntax. But the study of Bengali does not seem to have benefited enough from all this development and advance. A few students of Bengali studied linguistics and did research in European and American universities, but few have published their work, especially in book form. In Bangladesh, Muhammad Abdul Hai wrote his Dhwani bijnan o Bangla dhwaniattwa (1964) and in India Punyashlok Ray wrote The Bengali Language Handbook (1966). The essays unpublished or scattered in various journals written by those who have employed current sophisticated linguistic tools in the study of Bengali require anthologisation and further development.

Attempts to study Bengali in a more modern manner in the universities of Annamalai, Delhi, Jadavpur or in Pune are yet to make any serious impact.

LINGUISTIC STUDIES (Dogri) The earliest forays in the field of Dogri linguistic studies were made by the European scholars. Frederic Drew and George Grierson. Frederic Drew, in an appendix to his work, The Jammu and Kashmir Territories (London, 1875), presents a brief structure of Dogri grammar. Though this study is mostly of grammatical nature, yet it is a useful contribution of Dogri morphology.

Grierson, in The Linguistic Survey of India, (Vol. IX, Part I, 1916), has presented a sketch of Dogri grammar on the basis of some specimens got translated into Dogri. The study contains a glimpse of Dogri grammatical as well as inflection-categories in the light of declension of nouns, pronouns, adjective, etc. Conjugation of auxiliary as well as substantive verbs is also described. The authenticity of the data on which Grierson's study is based is, however, doubted.

The first study on Dogri language and linguistics by a native speaker appeared in 1931, when 'A short account of Dogri dialect' by Gaurishanker was published in Indian Linguistics a Vol. (1931-1935). It contains a description of Dogri phonetic observations with vocabulary (27 pages) as well as four pages of connected text in phonetic transcriptions. The main object of this monograph is to note linguistic phenomena in which Dogri differs from Punjabi. The other contribution of Gaurishanker in this field is his monograph entitled, Dogras: Their Language and Literature (1980).

Siddheshwar Verma was the first linguist, however, who declared Dogri as an independent frontier language of north India. In a text given to justify his opinion, he has discussed philological characteristics of Dogri on the basis of which Dogri can be differentiated from Punjabi. He says, "Being a member of the Indo-Aryan family, Dogri has assumed very peculiar and complicated characteristics, some of Pahari, some of Punjabi, and some of its own." Dogri is also included in his work entitled Indian Dialects in Phonetic Transcription. His paper on 'Some problems of Dogri semantics' describes three major problems in this field.

In 1965 Dogri bhasha aur vyakaran (Dogri language & grammar) by Bansilal Gupta was published by J & K Academy of Art, Culture & Languages. This book deals basically with the grammatical structure of the language and also a description of Dogri sounds and pronunciation.

approaches to the articulatory phonetics. A more detailed description of Dogri phonetics has been given by Ujjal Singh. Bahri in his paper 'Phonology of Dogri'. It contains articulatory, auditory as well as phonological description of Dogri sounds. But it has its shortcomings. Bahri has established 26 consonant phonemes; he has not expressed the phonemic value of palatal nasal consonant and retroflex nasal consonant, while both these have their phonemic status in the language. A notable contribution in the field of Dogri phonetics and phonology has been made by Vedkumari Ghai. Besides, some of her papers entitled 'Word tones in Dogri' and 'Problems of stress vowel quantity in Dogri', 'Nasal sounds in Dogri', and her detailed monograph Contribution to Dogri phonetics and Phonology (1982) present problems of Dogri phonetics and phonology more thoroughly. The subjects treated in more details are the system of oral vowels, the problems of quantity and stress, consonant germination and consonant weakening.

In the field of comparative linguistics, Dogri has been studied in comparison with Sanskrit, Hindi, Punjabi, etc. 'Semantic study of Sanskrit words in Dogri', a thesis in Hindi by Champa Sharma, was awarded Ph.D. degree by the University of Jammu. This work shows semantic treatment of Sanskrit words used by Dogri speakers. Hindi-Dogri Suffixes (1974), a Ph.D. work in Hindi by Om Prakash Gupta presents comparative study of Dogri and Hindi derivational suffixes, grammatical suffixes, post-position and participles. A thesis entitled Phonology & Morphology of Dogri and Punjabi: A Comparative Study by Updesh Kaur shows similarities and dissimilarities between the two languages in respect of phonology and morphology. Baldevraj Gupta has also contributed some papers on linguistic aspects of Dogri and Punjabi.

Dogri Research Centre (as present Post-graduate Department of Dogri) of Jammu University has done a lot of work in this regard. 'Dogri vikas te nikas', (Origion and development of Dogri), an exhaustive study on Dogri language and linguistics, was done by Balkrishan Shastri during his senior fellowship (1975-1980) in the centre. It consists of two big volumes of 409 and 319 pages respectively and covers all aspects of Dogri linguistics in a comprehensive manner. The work has not yet been published. The other notabla contribution of this institution is Bhasha vigyan te Dogri (Linguistics and Dogri, 1982), a compilation of sixteen research articles on different aspects of the Dogri language. The book was edited by Champa Sharma. It presents three articles on Dogri phonemes: vowel phonemes of Dogri (Ved Ghai), consonant phonemes of Dogri (Champa Sharma) and suprasegmental phonemes of Dogri (Veena Gupta). On Dogri morphology five detailed articles are included: 'Morphological study of Dogri: case, noun and pronoun' (Veena Gupta), 'Dogri verb' (Shyamlal Raina), 'Dogri adjective and adverb' (Champa Sharma), 'Dogri affixes'

Dogri Syntax, a research work by Veena Gupta, published in 1984, is a detailed study which describes syntactic structure of Dogri in respect of transformational analysis and structural analysis. The 2nd chapter of this study shows interaction between grammar and linguistics, as they are complementary to each other. The analysis of Dogri sentences in the light of T. Rules is a special feature of this work. Another work of Veena Gupta Dogri Language: Origin and Development was published in 1986 by J & K. Academy of Arts, Culture and Language.

Dogri Research Institute, a private organisation established in 1964, published four volumes of its Nibandhaval (1965, 1966-67, 1968-69 & 1970). They contain research papers on different aspects of the Dogri language and linguistics, especially the Siddheshwar Varma felicitation volume has its great importance in this study. Shyamlal Sharma and Tejram Khajuria, the two scholars who learnt linguistics from Siddheshwar Varma, have also contributed some papers on the Dogri language. 'Standardization of Dogri words', 'Tones of Dogri', 'Position of 'h' in Dogri', 'Insertion of 'r' into Dogri' by Sharma and 'The conjunctive participle in Dogri' and 'The occurrence of perfective in Dogri' by Tejram Khajuria are useful contributions to Dogri linguistics.

J & K Academy of Art, Culture & Languages is also contributing towards regional languages. Sheeraza (Dogri bhasha-ank is worth mentioning here. Out of its eleven articles, ten present linguistic picture of the Dogri language. 'Problem of 'h' and fourth letters in Dogri', 'Insertion of 'r' in Dogri', 'Dogri language and script: some opinion and suggestions', 'Problem of Dogri phonology: the final vowel', 'A glimpse of Dogri language', 'A wilfulness in Dogri spellings', are directly concerned with phonetical and phonological aspects of the language. 'Dialects of Duggar' and 'Dogri and Bhaderwahi' are interesting articles showing speech variations and varieties in this region.

LINGUISTIC STUDIES (Gujarati). Gujarati belongs to Indo-Aryan family of languages. The first Gujarati grammar was published in 1892 by Tisdell and the second one was published by Tailor in 1893. Both the scholars were British. Besides these, thoughts on peculiarities of the Gujarati language were published in the middle of the 19th century by Narmadashankar. He drew attention to the quality of vowels in the language and gave Narmakosha, the first dictionary of Gujarati.

Vrajlal Shastri wrote History of Gujarati Language, (1866) and Utsargamala (1870). He discussed etymology of some Gujarati words. Navalram and Mahipatram, his contemporaries also talked about etymology of some Gujarati words.

The first extensive study in the form of grammar of Gujarati was published in 1919 when Kamalashankar Trivedi wrote Brihad Gujarati Grammar. Trivedi was a Sanskrit scholar and his work was a pioneering one in Gujarati.

Narsinhrao Divetia was a profound scholar of the Gujarati language. In his famous Wilson Philological Lectures (1915-1916), he has discussed principles of general linguistics and gave etymology of Gujarati words with detailed discussion of various aspects. He gave rules of phonological changes. His contribution is the first important land-mark in Gujarati linguistics.

Ralph Turner, Divetia's contemporary, examined the phonological changes in Gujarati. His first study The IA nasals in Gujarati (1915) and subsequent articles on 'Gujarati Phonology' (1921) and 'E and O vowels in Gujarati' (1985) are the inspiring works. Tessitori's work (1914-1916) is also in the area of historical linguistics.

George Grierson gave detailed study of varieties of Gujarati in his well-known work, Linguistic Survey of India.

Keshav Harshad Druv wrote Vag-vyapar in early thirties and his work mainly discussed the phonological changes. Becharadas Doshi's work in the field of the evolution of the Gujarati language, and particularly about the latter's relationship with Prakrit, is commendable.

K.K. Shastri started writing on the Gujarati language in the late thirties and has continued till today. He has covered wide range of topics in historical linguistics and written many books on the old Gujarati language. His notable work is Bhashashatra ane Gujarati bhasha (1969).

T.N. Dave was the first scholar trained in western tradition. He surveyed some of the dialects of Gujarati and contributed to the study of Gujarati phonology.

Trained in traditional system, a scholar of Prakrit and Apabhramsha, Harivallabh Bhayani worked in the field of Historical Linguistics. His major contribution, Vyutpatti vichar, examines rules of phonological changes. He wrote Historical Grammar of Gujarati, which contains some thoughts on descriptive aspects of Gujarati grammar. His contemporaries, Bhogilal Sandesara and Kantilal Vyas, also worked in this field with the traditional method.

The major turn in Gujarati linguistics came when Prabodh Pandit, an internationally famed linguist, wrote about the Gujarati language in International journals like the Language (USA) and Indian Linguistics. He was a scholar of Sanskrit grammar. Among his well-known studies are Indo-Aryan Sibilants in Gujarati (1954), Historical Phonology of Gujarati Vowels (1961), Phonology and Phonological Changes in Gujarati Language (1966), Vyakaran—arth and akar (1976) and Language in A Plural Society (1976). His fields of interest were dialectology, socio-linguistics and historical linguistics. He taught linguistics in some of the American and Indian Universities like Gujarat, Pune and Delhi. He was primarily responsible for establishing linguistics as a subject of studies in higher education in different Indian universities. He trained groups of young scholars in linguistics, who at present are working in the different areas of the linguistics. Among those trained by Prabodh Pandit, Mridula Adenwala Durby, D.M. Joshi, Shantibhai Acharya, Yogendra Vyas and Radhekant Dave are working in different universities in India and abroad. The main field of interest of Mridula Durby is ethno-linguistics that of Radhekant Dave is phonetics. He has worked on breathy vowels in Gujarati. D.M. Joshi worked on Gujarati verbs and was one of the editors of the Indian Linguistics. He reviewed some books on Gujarati linguistics extensively and translated and edited some of the Pandit's studies. At present Joshi is engaged in spelling reforms in Gujarati script. Shantibhai Acharya is engaged in dialectological studies and preparing glossaries of different dialects like Bhili, Chaudhari, Kachchi, etc., and a part of his work is published. Yogendra Vyas wrote books and study papers covering various topics of Gujarati grammar, dialectology and dialects of Gujarati, socio-linguistics and language skills. He worked in the field of language skills. He is one of the scholars responsible for the change in the curricula of the Gujarati language at the school level.

P.J. Mistry, Bharati Modi, Usha Nair and Arvind Bhandari are the other scholars working in different areas of linguistics. P.J. Mistry's Gujarati Verbal Constructions (1969), Bharati Modi's Western Grammatical Traditions (1981), Usha Nair's Phonetic Reader of Gujarati (1982) and Arvind Bhandari's Gujarati vibhakti vichar (1986) attract attention.

Besides these scholars, George Cardona's studies in Gujarati grammar and Ellifisher Jorgenson's studies in the distinct quality of Gujarati vowels may be mentioned. Cardona published his Gujarati Reference Grammar in 1962.

Being the language of four crores of Gujaratis settled in all parts of the world, and the language of Mahatma Gandhi, Gujarati attracts attention of many linguists. However, much challenging work in the field is still awaited particularly in Gujarati as most of the books written so far are done in English.

LINGUISTIC STUDIES (Hindi). During the last two decades there has been a marked growth of published studies in Hindi linguistics. This growth is due on the one hand, in response to the need for introducing the language component in literature departments and on the other, to the increase in theoretical approaches to the linguistic investigation and description.

For the most part of works published in response to the need for teaching Hindi language in literature departments are primarily philological in orientation. They seem to be merely 'shadow' of the classical works produced by great scholars of Hindi as T.G. Bailey, G.A. Grierson, K.P. Guru, R. Hoernley, S.H. Kellog, B.R. Saxena and Dharendra Verma. The only exception to this is the work of Kishoridas Vajpeyi which is marked for both tendencies—continuation as well as break in traditional approach to Hindi grammar.

Before the sixties, a large body of work relating to Hindi was confined either to the area of descriptive linguistics or to the application of different linguistic theories and models to different aspects of Hindi grammar. In fact, it contributed to widening of the gap between phonetics and phonology, morphology and syntax, semantics and pragmatics, etc. The positive aspect of this phase has been that it served the purpose of initiating vital discussions on different aspects of Hindi language and linguistics. Works that motivated discussion are those of A.R. Kelkar (1968) on Hindi phonetics and phonology, Y. Kachru (1966) on Hindi syntax, and C.A. Ferguson and J.J. Gumperz (1960) on socio-linguistics of Hindi.

Kelkar's model of autonomous phonology for studying Hindi sound system was challenged by Srivastava (1969) by showing that such substantive assumptions as separation of levels, linearity, invariance and biuniqueness conditions invariably lead to anomalous and self-contradictory results. Based on this review an interesting discussion appeared through the reply of Kelkar (1970) and its rejoinder by Srivastava (1970). This controversy indirectly motivated phonologists to deal with other problems of Hindi phonology: problem of schwa-deletion (Narang and Becker, 1971; O'hala, 1974; Pandit, 1976; Kalra, 1978; Srivastava, 1978); problem of semivowel (Srivastava, 1970); problems of aspiration and nasalization (Narang and Becker, 1971; O'hala and O'hala, 1972; Bhatia and Kenstowicz, 1972 and Srivastava, 1972); problem of retroflex sonorants (Becker and Narang, 1974; Prakash, 1981); Dixit, 1979).

The problem of speech perception with an ultimate goal of establishing the significant features was first explored by S. Singh (1966). This was followed by Ahmed and Agrawal (1969) and Gupta, Agrawal and Ahmed (1969). A new dimension to the problem has been added by O'hala (1972), Jaggi and Gandhi (1971) and Garg (1973).

There are some general books on phonetics and phonology (R.C. Mehrotra, 1970, 1981; B.N. Tiwari, 1973; Kostic et al., 1973). However, problems that drew attention of descriptivists as well as scholars working in generative phonology are: (a) nature of syllable and syllabification (Rudin, 1958; Mehrotra, 1959; Elizarenkova, 1961; K.C. Bhatia, 1962, 1970; Srivastava, 1968; Kapur, 1969; Kelkar, 1968; A. Sharma, 1969; D.D.

Sharma, 1971); (b) segmental sequences (K.C. Bhatia, 1959); (c) vowel sequences (Ucida, 1977, 1978); (d) stress (Mehrotra, 1965; K.C. Bhatia, 1967; Upraiti, 1965; Ray, 1966; Jones, 1971; R.S. Gupta, 1973; O'hala, 1977); (e) speech melody and intonation (Mathews, 1954; Ray, 1964; Upraiti, 1967 and Moore, 1965).

In the area of experimental phonetics, the work done in India for Hindi has been extremely insignificant. The main reason for this sad state of affairs is that laboratories in the linguistic departments in India are poorly equipped and inadequately manned. However, some significant works were completed in the phonetic research laboratories abroad by Benguerel and Bhatia (1980) at Vancouver (Canada), Dixit (1979) at Texas (USA), Jha (1970) at Dijon (France), Kostic (1972) at Belgrade (Yugoslavia), O'hala (1977, 1979) and O'hala and O'hala (1972) at Berkeley (USA) and Tokyo (Japan) and Srivastava (1968) at Leningrad (USSR).

Apart from a number of grammar books, morphological facts of Hindi have been mentioned independently by Barxudarov (1963), Beskrovny (1960), Cherunyshev (1957, 1962), M. Jain (1978), Lienhard (1968), Liperovsky (1964), Mahesh Chandra (1978) and J.D. Singh (1971, 1973). Similarly, description of sentence structure is to be found in the writings of Allen (1950), Chernyshev (1965), Gaefcke (1967), Miltner (1962, 1965) and C. Sahai (1978). However, it was in the works of Bahl, Kachru and Miltner that we get an overall grammatical structure of the Hindi language.

The overall structure of the noun-phrase construction has been worked out by Sahai and Narain (1964) in the structural model and by M.K. Verma (1971) and Subbarao (1974) in the transformational model of description. Similarly, while A.B. Singh (1965) and J.D. Singh (1971) have given a sketch of verb-phrase construction in the structural model, it is Kachru (1968, 1980) who provides its analysis on transformational model. Recently the problematic notion of 'subject' and 'agent' in Hindi has been discussed in illuminating papers by Hook (1976), Kachru, Kachru and Bhatia (1976), A.K. Sinha (1976) and A. Saxena (1980). Similarly, the work on the semantics of Hindi reduplicatives by Abbi (1980) and the semantics of the verb chahiye and chahna by S.K. Verma (1974) and Pandhari Pande (1975) respectively deserve special mention.

In the field of applied linguistics, a beginning has been made by scholars working on the Hindi language. We have now some significant works available in the area of socio-linguistics study of Hindi language and the multilingual behaviour of its speech community: Apte (1970, 1974); Gumperz (1958, 1964), Gumperz and Naim (1969); D.K. Jain (1969, 1975), Kelly (1966), Khubchandani (1969, 1978), R.C. Mehrotra (1981), R.R. Mehrotra (1977), K.S. Mishra (1977), Srivastava (1965, 1967, 1973, 1974, 1977, 1978). The book edited by Srivastava and Sahai (1976) contains a number of papers which concern the different aspects of socio-linguistic study of the Hindi language.

The fact that different scholars have produced a large number of studies in the field of linguistic studies of Hindi, should by no means be considered as illuminating and self-satisfying. Most of the works of the last two decades are due to an attempt to grasp the fast developing linguistic theories and models rather than an analysis of the structural specifications of Hindi as such. It is for this reason that almost all aspects of the Hindi language mentioned above need further in-depth analysis. Secondly, research work carried on by different scholars have to be brought into one composite whole in the form of a central core and calculus of Hindi grammar. Hindi linguistics is still awaiting its own Kellogg and Guru.

LINGUISTIC STUDIES (Konkani). Konkani is a language of the minority linguistic community in Kerala, Karnataka and Maharashtra states and is the principal language of the people of Goa. Since Konkani is a living and growing language, many dialects and idiolects of it are present. Konkani spoken in different states appears to be different due to sociological, cultural and regional variations. Similarly, each individual or different community has its own particular way of speech.

With reference to the survey made regarding Konkani in Kerala, the Census of India 1971 in its book The Survey of Konkani in Kerala mentions Konkani as consisting of 52 phonemes of which 50 are segmental and 2 suprasegmental. Of the 50 segmental phonemes 7 are vowel phonemes and 43 consonant. The suprasegmental phonemes occur with the vowel phonemes. Of the 7 vowels, 3 are front vowels, 2 central and 2 back. All vowels occur with length as well as nasalisation. Thus, there are long and short vowels and nasalised and oral vowels. Consonant clusters occur initially and medially and finally in words. Initial consonant clusters consist of 2 consonants while in the medial cluster the number of consonants may go up to 3. Only non-identical clusters occur initially. For example: Initial clusters Mraga (animal) bya ru (business). Medial clusters -Bappa (father).

Words in Konkani can be divided according to the number of syllables they contain. The number of syllables is the same as the number of vowels present in a word, for the presence of vowel(s) is a must in a Konkani word. There are mono-syllabic, di-syllabic and tri-syllabic words of which di-syllabic are the most frequent. Syllabic system of Konkani is of peak type, and the peak is always a vowel. In addition to peak type, there are onset-peak type and onset-peak-coda type. For example: Peak type U:—louse. Onset-peak type Tu—you. Onset-peak-coda type vis—twenty.

A considerable number of ordinary words (without which no language could arise as an independent entity) appear to be peculiar to Konkani and are not found in other recognised languages of the Aryan family or non-Aryan languages. For example Nouns—Uddak-water, Hantooln-bed, Dimbee-knee, mhantu-father's elder brother, Verbs—Aponvchen-to call, Umlochen-to wash, Niddonvchen-to sleep, Adjectives—Deegu-long, tall, Thoru-fat or short, Adverbs—Badda-truly, Hanga-here, Preposition Bhittare (Antum)-inside.

Konkani nouns denoting animate or inanimate beings belong to one of the three genders, masculine, feminine and neuter. A special feature of the Konkani language is that the animate and inanimate objects are differentiated from each other by the affixes added to their names. For examples: Ramalo ghodo-Rama's horse, Jhadacho khando-branch of a plant, Gaiche baal-cow's tail.

While forming plurals all three classes of nouns ending in vowels lose the final vowel before the plural suffix. Example, Va.t—Vatt, Ku.kk—kukk.

From a linguistic study of the language one may notice the peculiarity of the language and also its structural richness.

LINGUISTIC STUDIES (Maithili). Maithili has linguistically been studied in three phases. In the first phase, a host of European scholars, in course of exploring the modern Indian languages prior to the present century, noticed Maithili along with its sister languages. Prominent among them are H. T. Colebrook, William Carey, Erskina Perry, John Beames, George Campbell, Hoernle, Kellogg, Turner, etc. But it is G. A. Grierson who started the linguistic study of Maithili in the proper way, wrote a comprehensive grammar and carried on some lexicographical work in collaboration with Turner and others.

The second phase starts with Sunitikumar Chatterjee's Origin and Development of the Bengali Language. It is yet a landmark in the linguistic study of early and medieval Maithili which is hardly separable from the Bengali of the early-medieval age. Next comes Subhadra

LINGUISTIC STUDIES—MARATHI

Jha who, following the footsteps of his guru Sunitikumar, described in his voluminous work the formation of his mother tongue Maithili exclusively, deeply and widely covering all periods, all dialects, and all aspects of descriptive linguistics. Mithila bhasa vidyotana of Dina-bandhu Jha is a unique attempt to see the most complex mechanism of Maithili through the microscope of indigenous Paninian system. Govinda Jha in his Maithili udgam o vikas and Maithili ka vikas has presented in short a clear picture of the historical development of modern standard form of Maithili.

In the third phase, the study of Maithili was started on modern lines of linguistic investigation pioneered by Bloomfield and Chomsky. Maithili Phonetics and Phonology of Ramavatar Yadav deserves specific mention. Contribution of Udayanarayan Singh 'Nachiketa' on this line is also appreciable.

In course of their studies a few Hindi scholars have brought to light some important socio-linguistic feature of this language. Ram Vilas Sharma is the most eloquent among them in his work Bhasa aur samaj.

LINGUISTIC STUDIES (Marathi). The medieval Marathi literature, though rich in both quality and quantity, shows lack of interest in the most important aspect of human culture, viz. language. There are many patriotic expressions about the Marathi language in the works of Jnaneshvara, Dasopant, Eknath, Father Stephens, etc., but the language proper was seldom made the object of inquiry. There are only two works on grammar, viz. Panchavartika and Namavibhakti written by Pandit Bhis-macharya in about 15th century, left behind throughout the long period of 600 years.

It was only after the advent of the British rule that this branch of knowledge received some attention.

Besides the grammatical literature, another type of literature dealing with the historical aspects of Marathi also was produced both in English and Marathi. In general, that may be labelled as the literature on historical linguistics of Marathi. Marathi being a New Indo-Aryan language, all the researches done in this field, especially those which dealt with the origin, development and interrelations of New Indo-Aryan languages, had to take cognizance of Marathi. Thus, the famous works like John Beame's A Comparative Grammar of the Modern Aryan Languages of India (1872-79), R.G. Bhandarkar's Wilson Philological Lectures (1877), Hoernle's A Comparative Grammar of the Gaudian Languages (1880), P.D. Gune's An Introduction to the Comparative Philology have discussed the status of Marathi in the development of New Indo-Aryan languages. Among these passing references and partial treatment of Marathi, the contribution of Jules Block to Marathi linguistics is conspicuous by its uniqueness. He published his Formation de la langue Marathi (in French) in 1914, which could be said to be the first historical grammar of Marathi. It served as the starting point of the modern scientific study of Marathi as an Indo-Aryan language. Later on, in 1941, this work was translated into Marathi by V.G. Paranjape under the title Marathi bhashecha vikas.

The Marathi writings in earlier periods, i.e. in the last quarter of the 19th century, were in the form of stray articles giving expression to the patriotic feelings for Marathi, warning the readers against its pollution, glorifying its literature and culture, insisting on its inclusion in the University curriculum, etc. The first Marathi work devoted to the problems of linguistics (of course historical) was Bhashashastra (1901) of N.B. Pavgi. Though he shows his acquaintance with the writings of western scholars like Bopp, Schletcher, Whitney, Max Müller, Beames, etc., he is very orthodox in his thoughts. Another important writer on theoretical and historical linguistics is K.P. Kulkarni who has written Bhashashastra ani Marathi bhasha (1925), Marathi bhasha: Udgam ani vikas (1933), Shabda: Udgam ani vikas (1952). He has leaned heavily on the English works of the scholars like Brugmann, Paul, P.D. Gune, etc. and the Marathi works of V.K. Rajawade. But while trying to bring about a co-ordination among all their views, he could not observe the strict discipline of the scientific work. However, during his lifetime he was well recognised as an author on linguistics and has been read as an authority for the last 50 years. Y.R. Date's Maharashtra bhashabhyasa is also a good compilation of facts about historical linguistics, but it has nothing to add to the contemporary knowledge of the subject.

Though there is not a single historical grammar of Marathi (originally written in Marathi), there are a number of works which will be useful for writing its historical grammar. Various scholars have analysed Marathi of different periods separately. S.G. Tulpule has analysed the language of inscriptions in his work Prachin Marathi koriv lekh (1963). His another work, Yadvakalin Marathi bhasha (1973) deals with medieval Marathi. Yet his another work An old Marathi reader (1960) more or less treats the same subject as covered in these two works. Tulpule is a meticulous writer on this subject, but scholars hesitate to accept his authority because of his shaky base in linguistics; K.S. Mardikar has analysed Shivakalin Marathichi bhashik pahani; G.B. Gramopadhye has written Peshva daptaratil marathi bhasheche svarup and S.G. Malshe has pointed out the peculiarities of this language of the 19th century. K.P. Kulkarni in his Marathi Bhasha: Udgam and vikas has given the outline sketches of Marathi at different periods. Language of the different texts has also been analysed, suggesting thereby the nature of the language of that period. The language of the Jnaneshvari has been described by V.K. Rajawade, M.G. Panse, Y.G. Kanetkar, H.N. Nene, V.H. Nijasure, etc.

The language of Dasbodha (by Saint Ramdas, 17th century) has been the subject of research of scholars like G.K. Modak, H.H. Nene, M.S. Kanade, V.B. Kolate, etc. S.G. Malshe has described the language of Kristapurana (by Father Stephens). All this literature can serve as the raw material for preparing a well-defined historical grammar of Marathi.

Certain controversial issues also surfaced in Marathi linguistics. The first is of course the origin and development of Marathi. The debates on the date of the origin of Marathi, the source language of Marathi, the causes which led to the origin of Marathi are still going on. The famous Vaidya-Gune controversy was centred mainly around the causes of the origin of Marathi.

Another controversial issue was the purification movement of Marathi. V.D. Savarkar and M.T. Patwardhan started this movement from different angles with the sole purpose of checking the encroachment of foreign languages on Marathi. Savarkar's thoughts on this subject are collected in his essays in Marathi bhashache shuddhikaran and those of M.T. Patwardhan in his Bhashashuddhivivek. Savarkar objected to the growing use of English and Persian words in Marathi and therefore propagated for their replacement by the newly coined Sanskrit-based words. M.T. Patwardhan was also against such words, but he preferred indigenous Marathi words to Sanskrit words. Both of them met with strong opposition for their puritan stands. Though this controversy is now over, the cry against foreign encroachment is heard on occasions even today.

Another controversy which has been kept burning for the last hundred years is about the spelling reforms in Marathi. Both the groups of the traditionalists and the reformists have strong points in their defence. The issues involved were whether the orthography of Marathi should maintain the distinctions made by grammar, etymology, tradition, or should be adopted to the spoken norm. It was centred around the writing of 'i' and 'u', in 'tatsama' words and the dot indicating nasalization in certain words. Though these reforms were suggested quite earlier, one publication by Sane, Hatawalne and Godbole (1904) created a great furore, and many giant scholars stepped into the arena. This controversy passed through various phases and is almost over since the Marathi Mahamandal and the government of Maharashtra state adopted those reforms in 1962. But even now the traditionalists are restless and are always found criticising the reforms.

The year 1954 was an epoch-making year in the history of Indian linguistics, when Deccan college undertook its big language project with the help of Rockefeller foundation and started a series of summer and winter schools in linguistics, which trained a number of scholars from all over India in modern linguistics. Some of these scholars went abroad also for advanced training. These linguists in turn, gave the benefit of their newly acquired knowledge to the study of native languages of India, which created a new atmosphere in linguistics. The first Marathi work describing Marathi with this new approach was published in 1955. It was Dhvanivichar by N.G. Kalelkar, which describes the phonology of Marathi. It also covers topics like phonetics, phonetic change, script and writing system of Marathi. This work is written in lucid Marathi and is very well received. Since then, a number of descriptive studies of Marathi have appeared. Ashok Kelkar wrote his Ph. D. dissertation of 'Phonology and Morphology of Marathi' in 1958. This thesis, though unpublished, has guided many students in its mimeographed form. N.G. Kalelkar has written one monograph on Marathi which was published by Indian Council for Cultural Relations (1965). C.D. Indapurkar has written Marathi bhasha: Vyavastha ani adhyapan which is a descriptive grammar of Marathi. It is not published as yet. D.K. Sonar has written his two theses, viz. 1. Synchronic Descriptive Analysis of Noun Phrase in Marathi and (2) Synchronic Descriptive Analysis of Verbal Phrase in Marathi (both in English) wherein he tries to describe the distribution of NPs and VPs in Marathi. Both these theses are unpublished so far.

Besides these, there are a number of works, theoretical in nature but incorporating outline sketches of Marathi grammar in them in the way of illustrations. They are Bhasha ani bhashashastra by S.N. Gajendragadkar, Marathicha bhashik abhyas, edited by M.S. Kanade, Bhashavijnan: varnanatmak ani itihāsik, edited by S.G. Malshe, H.V. Inamdar and Anjali Soman, and Varnanatmak bhashavijnan: Svarup ani paddhati, edited by Kalyan Kale and Anjali Soman. These are actually text-books written according to the University curriculum. Gajendragadkar's book is written independently according to structuralistic design. Other three books are written co-operatively distributing various topics among different co-authors.

In material production for teaching Marathi, there seems to be a remarkable progress, since the books on the subject are now being written in the light of the new researches in language teaching. Southworth and Kavdi have adopted situational approach in their Spoken Marathi (1965) which keeps grammar in the background. On the other hand Suhasini Laddu in Beginning Marathi (1978) and Vijaya Chitnis in An Intensive Course in Marathi (1979), have stuck strictly to the structural approach which presents grammar in a graded form. The work of Vijaya Chitnis is a voluminous work treating all the aspects of a language text-book exhaustively. Bernstein and Jai Nimbkar's books Intermediate and Advanced Marathi Readers (1975) are for advanced students emphasizing the socio-cultural aspects of Marathi.

Another very important branch of Marathi linguistics is its dialectology. In this, Grierson's Linguistic Survey of India has already established a landmark. In his seventh volume Grierson has presented Marathi and its 70 dialects. He has, however, failed to include three very important dialects, viz. Dangi, Ahirani and Bhilli. N.G. Kalelkar has written on the theoretical aspects of dialect study in his various essays collected in Bhasha ani sanskriti (1962), Bhasha Itihas ani bhugol (1964).

Since the inclusion of linguistics in the University curricula, the students of linguistics have been applying their field-work techniques to the study of various dialects. As a result we have a number of dialect studies both in published and unpublished forms. Moreover, the Board of Literature and Culture of the Maharashtra State had undertaken an ambitious project of dialect survey. A.M. Ghatage being its General Editor. This project was later on given up due to financial reasons. But under that project, eight dialect studies have been published. Some of the important published dialect studies are 1. S.M. Katre's Formation of Konkani (1966), 2. S.B. Kulkarni's Powari Boli (1974) and Bhilli of Dangs (1976), 3. V.K. Varhadpande's Nagpuri Boli (1972), 4. Aparna Jha's Descriptive Analysis of Koshti (1980). The monographs on Konkani, Cochin, Warli, Gawdi, Kunabi, etc. are published by the Board of Literature and Culture of Maharashtra State under dialect survey project. Recently attempts have been made to relate linguistics with the study of literature. Ashok Kelkar, Mahulkar, Gangadhar Patil, Milind Malshe, R.V. Dhongade, etc. have written some articles on the subject. But this branch of study has yet to attract the attention of the literary critics.

Linguistics is an evergrowing branch of knowledge and is in the process of development. Marathi linguistics is far too behind the linguistics in the world at large. It could catch up with its structuralistic phase, but it has to go many miles to reach the stage where the global linguistics stands today.

LINGUISTIC STUDIES (Nepali). The first need to make a linguistic study of Nepali arose with the question of the standardisation of the written form of the language. Till then words when written were spelled as they were actually pronounced and there were local variations of pronunciation too. The halanta sign was used to mark every consonantal pronunciation, that is, to show that no vowel followed the consonant so marked. Rammani Acharya Dikshit, who edited the Madhavi from Banaras (1908), then, launched the 'halanta bahishkar' movement to totally dispense with the use of the halanta sign in Nepali writing. Obviously this was a swing to the other extreme. The great Pandit Hemraj Sharma followed a middle path in his grammar, Chandrika, which restricted the use of the halanta sign to the verbs only. And this usage is now followed in writing Nepali. The same grammar, to a great extent, laid down rules of spellings of words of other parts of speech too.

The next phase which can be called the phase of a proper linguistic study of Nepali, began when trained Nepali linguists directed their efforts to make in-depth studies of the distinctive nature and traits of the language. Mahananda Sapkota, Balkrishna Pokhrel, Chudamani Bandhu, Taranath Sharma, Ballavmani Dahal and Madhav Prasad Pokhrel are the leading linguists in the field.

LINGUISTIC STUDIES (Oriya). The earliest specimen of Oriya language is dated 1051. It is in the stone inscription discovered in the village Urajam in the district of Srikakolam of Andhra Pradesh. This inscription is now preserved in Madras Museum. Besides this inscription, which is engraved with horizontal top strokes, there is another inscription with the same kind of engraving with top strokes found in the village Gandibeda in the district of Balasore. It is undated, but it appears to have come down from quite an early period. These specimens indicate that the Oriya language existed in pretty early times. But in spite of the existence of the language for centuries there has been no attempt at writing Oriya grammar until as late as the beginning of the British period in 1803. The linguistic study of Oriya started much later. Of the works done on this aspect of the language, most are written in English and mainly as academic dissertations for University degrees. Gopmath Nanda's Bhashatattva, a voluminous and monumental work is perhaps the first in this direction. Nanda was a great scholar in Oriya, Sanskrit, Prakrit and Telugu. Bhashatattva is the collection of his essays on various topics of Oriya grammar he had written for various periodicals. It is a historical grammar in which he quotes examples from the written texts as well as from the spoken language. Other important works, though written in English, are The Verb Piece in Oriya by B.P. Mahapatra and A Controlled Historical Reconstruction of Oriya, Assamese, Bengali and Hindi (1966) by D.P. Pattanayak. The following works prepared as academic dissertations also deserve mention: Desia, a Tribal Oriya Dialect of Koraput (1970) by Khageswar Mahapatra, Ashcharya Charyachaya by K. Kar, Descriptive Oriya Verbs (1976) by G.N. Das, Historical Semantics of Oriya by S. Dash, Descriptive Analysis of Oriya Spoken in Puri District by Upendranath Dalai, A Comparative Study of Hindi and Oriya Verb Roots and Vocables (1976) by A. Pradhan, Phonological Study of Sambalpur Dialects by Surendranath Dwivedi.

LINGUISTIC STUDIES-PUNJABI

and A Historical Phonology of Oriya (1970) by P.C. Mazumdar. Books on the linguistic aspects of Oriya written in Oriya are comparatively few but they also contain comparative analysis of various Indian languages. Some of these significant works are: Sarala Mahabharata bhashatattvika adhyayana by Dhaneswar Mahapatra, Ashtadasha shatabdira Oriya eka bhashatattvika adhyayana (1981) by C.S. Mahapatra, Oriya Bhashar Ripatattva by B.M. Padhi, Oriya Bhashatattvara bhumika by Banshidhar Mahanty, Oriya bhashara unmesh o bikash by Basudev Sahu, Oriya bhashatattvalipira kramabikasha by K.B. Tripathy and Oriya shabdabhandara by Deben-dranath Mahanty.

LINGUISTIC STUDY (Punjabi) Historically, the Punjabi language belongs to the Indo-Aryan group of Indo-European family of languages. Structurally, it is the only Indo-Aryan language in which the presence of 'tone' is phonemic. Phonologically, it has twenty-nine consonants, ten vowels, two semivowels and three tones. There is a well developed tonal system. It has a distinctive morphological, syntactic and semantic form. There is an eight hundred year old literary tradition of this language. The writings are available in Gurmukhi script. During this long association of Punjabi language and Gurmukhi script, a set of orthographic rules in standard form has developed.

The regional variations of Punjabi are available in the form of 'majhi', 'malawai', 'doabi', 'pothohari', 'dogri' and 'multani' dialects. The standard form used in literature and in formal writings is based on majhi dialect. At present this norm is being shifted in favour of malawai.

Linguistic studies of a language are directly related to the socio-linguistic needs of the area of its users or/and its administrators. This is true of Punjabi also. Before the beginning of the grammatical studies of Punjabi in the early nineteenth century, we find a tradition of Punjabi lexicography. The lexicographic works are mostly in the shape of glossaries of names, animals, birds and literary or difficult words with their meaning. These were the product of the need to understand classical literature. Then, with the advent of the British empire in the Punjabi speaking areas in early nineteenth century, the process of writing grammars, primers and dictionaries started. The purpose of this was to fulfil the linguistic needs of the officers posted in Punjab. This process continued till the freedom of India. After getting the constitutional status of a regional language, Punjabi became a language in which courses from school to university level were planned. This brought in the need to prepare books for the linguistic study of Punjabi. Then the linguistic study of the Punjabi was synonymous with writing the history of the language, especially its origin and stages of development. As a result, the history of Punjabi 'boli' (speech) or 'bhasa' (language) was attempted in a number of works by Punjabi scholars. The developments in the field of general linguistics all over the world influenced the students of Punjabi language to describe the structure of their own language. As a result, some serious attempts were made at describing the structure of the regional dialects of Punjabi. This was followed by degree-oriented research work (for Ph.D. and M.Phil) on the specific problems of Punjabi phonology, morphology, syntax, semantics and Gurmukhi orthography. These efforts now form a base for a further scientific investigation of the problems of Punjabi language. An illustration of this is the publication of Punjabi shabdarup and shabada jorh kosh (dictionary of Punjabi word forms and spellings) in seven volumes by Punjabi University, Patiala. Therefore, linguistic studies in Punjabi vary from lexicographic work, historical studies, grammatical, semantic and orthographic studies to reforms and standardization of speech and writings. Their quality and character have to be viewed and discussed in the context of their socio-cultural needs and in their historical perspective.

There is a good number of linguistic studies concentrating on the origin, development and history of Punjabi language. But most of them have been written for meeting the pedagogical needs of the students. As a result of this, a sizeable portion of them is devoted to the introduction of concepts of philology or linguistics. We can divide the 'histories' of Punjabi into two stages. One is represented by P.S. Padam, S.S. Sekhon and Prem Parkash Singh. The second is represented by V.B. Arun and Duni Chander. The first attempt was made by Piara Singh Padam (1953). The whole presentation (total pages 300) has four sections.

Practically a portion each of the first and the second section is devoted to the description of the history of the Punjabi language. Even in that part, the stress is not on tracing the different developmental stages of the language as available in solid data. Instead, the socio-linguistic information about the area called Punjab has been used to prove that Punjabi has developed from some developmental stage of the Indo-Aryan group of languages. The works of Indian philologists like Sunitkumar Chatterjee, Madan Gopal, P.D. Gune, etc. have been used to build up the thesis. The most significant contribution of Piara Singh Padam's pioneer and basic work is that it inspired a number of scholars to think and explore the virgin field of the history of Punjabi language. One such example was the attempt made by Sant Singh Sekhon (1970), who wrote History of Punjabi boli (total pages 346). He started doing his work on the history of the Punjabi language almost at the same time when Piara Singh Padam was working on his book. Though both completed their work simultaneously, Sekhon's work could appear only in 1970.

In Sekhon's History of Punjabi boli, the most relevant part is the second section. In this section Punjabi vocabulary has been compared with the vocabulary of the different development stages of Indo-Aryan languages. The aim is to establish the correspondence between Punjabi and the various stages of Indo-Aryan languages.

Another attempt resembling in its global character to that of Padam's and Sekhon's was made by Prem Parkash Singh (1955). He wrote his Origin and development of Punjabi boli in three volumes (316 + 54 + 236 = total 612 pages). It is simultaneously an introduction to general linguistics and a significant document on the history of Punjabi language.

Prem Parkash's work on the history of Punjabi language is perhaps the peak of one stage of the histories of Punjabi. These scholars tried to reconstruct the history of Punjabi with socio-linguistic information and also by comparing the grammatical forms.

The second stage of work on the history of Punjabi began with the arrival of V.B. Arun's book (1956). The characteristic feature of this stage is that the quantum of socio-linguistic information is minimum and the stress is on comparison of linguistic forms. One of the most objective attempts on the history of Punjabi language was made by Vidya Bhaskar Arun (1956). For the first time the development of phonological and morphological units from the older linguistic forms was traced. Written in Gurmukhi, most of this work was completed up to October, 1953. The approach of the author to analyse the available data follows the comparative method of philology. The whole description has been presented in two major parts.

V.B. Arun's work was a break from the tradition of available books on the history of Punjabi. He tries to reconstruct the language with the help of comparative method. For him the change in language is a change in its phonological and morphological structure. That is why instead of describing the socio-linguistic history of Punjabi, he discusses the development of phonological and morphological structure of Punjabi.

At the second stage of writing histories of Punjabi, V.B. Arun's attempt is followed by Duni Chander's (1968) significant contribution in the form of Development of Punjabi language. This presentation is unique in its form. It consists of 440 statements. These have been divided into four sections consisting of the introduction to the history and development of Indo-European languages, development of Punjabi phonological, morphological and syntactic units. In the 'introduction', Duni Chander gives fifty-five statements about the linguistic and socio-linguistic characteristics of Indo-European, Indo-Iranian, Dard, Indo-Aryan, classical Sanskrit, Pali, Prakrit, Apabhramsha, modern Indo-Aryan languages, language of Adigranth, old Punjabi, literary data for the history and development of Punjabi language, vocabulary, dialects, Gurmukhi script, lists of phonemes of Punjabi, Sanskrit, Pali and Prakrit.

The tradition of linguistic studies in Punjabi begins in the real sense of the term with the writing of grammars of Punjabi. Initially, the need was created by the arrival of the British rule in Punjab. Therefore, early Punjabi grammars were written by the British authors.

Along with the studies in history, grammars and dialectology of Punjabi, we can find a tradition of semantic studies also. It has two types of works; one type includes lexicographic works and the other works on 'cultural semantics'. The lexicographic works date back to the eighteenth century. Since then we can make three divisions of lexicographic works in Punjabi: First comes the dictionaries of names and difficult words of classical literature available in manuscript form only. The second stage of lexicographic works begins with the advent of the British rule in Punjab. At the third stage comes the lexicographic work undertaken after the Independence of India.

The writing medium of the Punjabi language has also drawn the attention of the students of language. Gurmukhi is the script in which the Punjabi language has been written for the last five hundred years. Along with the Punjabi language, the Gurmukhi script and its orthographic rules have been studied. Gurmukhi has been discussed with reference to its origin, development and history along with the description of its orthographic rules and also in the context of standardization of spellings. The most significant attempt in tracing the origin and development of Gurmukhi characters ('akkhar' and 'laganmat-ran') was made by G.B. Singh (1972). Before him all the scholars had tried to make statements on the basis of the available information, about the development of Indian scripts, for illustrating the history of Gurmukhi characters. They included Piara Singh Padam (1952), Gurdev Singh (1971), K.S. Bedi (1971), etc. It was for the first time that archaeological data was used by G.B. Singh to reconstruct the original forms of Gurmukhi characters. His findings were that Gurmukhi developed as a regional variation of writing in the north-western part of India. Like all other Indian scripts, its origin goes back to Brahmi. It developed from some stage of Brahmi and some regional writing characters like 'lande', 'takre' and 'Bhat akhr'. His emphasis was that the Gurmukhi characters were not coined by Sikh Gurus alone. His view was confronted by Harkirt Singh (1973). With G.B. Singh's data he tried to conclude that no standard form of Gurmukhi writing was there before the advent of Sikh Gurus. The forms of Gurmukhi symbols cited in the archaeological data of G.B. Singh are irregular and inconsistent. Therefore, he thinks that though some Gurmukhi characters were available in inconsistent form, the Sikh Gurus gave the available symbols a standard form, made use of them, and tried to cultivate and popularise the tradition. Harkirt Singh's point of view is supported by the available literary data.

LINGUISTIC STUDIES—RAJASTHANI

There is another group of linguistic studies of Gurmukhi in which attempts were made to describe the nature, use and orthographic rules of Gurmukhi characters. The form, function and occurrence of Gurmukhi characters were discussed. The first detailed description of Gurmukhi orthography was made by H.S. Gill and H.A. Gleason (1969). They described the writing and reading rules of Gurmukhi. This inspired a number of studies in which attempts were made to further explain and clarify the nature and function of Gurmukhi orthography.

With the spread of formal education and degree oriented research studies, the Punjabi language got new directions and dimensions. Initially, the need of the students of Punjabi language was synonymous with that of the Punjabi literature. Later on, the need to study the language as such was felt. In the beginning, only the knowledge of philology and philological studies was considered sufficient. Later on, the consciousness of studying Punjabi as a communication medium began to grow. As a result, two types of works in and on Punjabi language appeared. One type of work concentrated its efforts to explain and interpret the principles, theories and methods of general linguistics and their application to Punjabi language. These included the works of Prem Parkash Singh (1955), Kala Singh Bedi (1971), Harkirt Singh (1973), Ved Agnihotri (1981), Atam Singh (1985), Paramjit Singh Sidhu (1988), J.S. Puar (1988), etc. The second type of works were specialized studies in which specific problems of Punjabi phonology, morphology, syntax or semantics were treated, e.g. Smirnov (1966), Sethi (1971), Sandhu (1974), Gupta (1975), Joshi (1978), Aggarwal (1979), Puar (1979), Kanwaljit Kaur (1988), etc.

At present the Universities and the Government departments in and outside Punjab are doing work in and on Punjabi, but their efforts are more concentrated on literature and less on language.

LINGUISTIC STUDIES (Rajasthani) is comparatively a new subject for Rajasthani. All emphasis was laid on the prosody, rhetorics and lexicography of the language till the end of the pre-modern period. It was with the advent of the western scholars, wandering in search of new fields of knowledge and probe in oriental studies, that the subjects like grammar and linguistics were taken up. The initial lead given by the westerners was followed by Indian scholars which resulted in some survey-cum-studies and independent grammars of various dialects. George Grierson, G. Macaliester (1898), Ramakarna Asopa (1917) and N.D. Swami (1968) are the scholars who gave us such works. Even prior to these attempts, H.S. Kellogg had expressed himself on the grammar of the language in his A Grammar of the Hindi Language (1893). Authors of the history and literature of Rajasthani also discussed in brief some broad outlines of grammar, pioneers among them being M.L. Menariya and H.L. Maheshwari. Studies in various aspects of grammar, as related to certain dialects, were done by K.L. Sharma (for Harauti), Chintamani Upadhyaya (for Malavi), K.C. Agrawala (for Shekhawati), L.D. Joshi (for Vagari), W.S. Allen (on phonological characteristics) and K.C. Bahala (on the present state of Rajasthani grammar). But the real guidelines for a linguistic study were provided by S.K. Chatterjee in his Rajasthani Bhasa (1949) and L.P. Tessitori in his Notes on the Grammar of the Old Western Rajasthani with Special Reference to Apabhramsha and Gujarati and Marwadi (1914-1915). Tessitori also worked on some other aspects of the Old Western Rajasthani, the common predecessor of modern Rajasthani and Gujarati. He has taken much pains in finding out the missing links between Apabhramsha and modern Rajasthani and Gujarati. For this he has based his study on twenty-two old texts belonging mostly to the period from 1394 to 1514. Thus, his is a pioneering attempt to give a historical development of the language. His observations on phonetic changes in the post-Apabhramsha period have been very highly spoken of by S.K. Chatterji, who has termed this attempt as the very base of all further linguistic studies. Tessitori has explained how the double consonants of Apabhramsha have undergone simplification by lending a long sound to the preceding vowel. Another speciality noted by him is the transformation of 'ai' and 'au' into 'e' and 'an' or 'o' respectively. A number of other tendencies in phonetic changes have been pointed out as supported by exhaustive examples from contemporary texts.

It was S.K. Chatterji who tried to explain the historical development of Rajasthani as related to the culture and history of the region. The traces of impact left by the Dravidians of Mohen-Jo-Daro and Harappa, the Nishadas of the Austric group, and finally by several ethnic identities of the invading tribes from the Middle East, have been dealt with in an indepth study. He has also explained how certain phonetic changes have occurred in other regional languages, thus presenting a comparative study in philology. Over and above all this, the linguistic peculiarities of Rajasthani are listed with proper enunciation.

A linguistic study of Shekhawati dialect comes from K.C. Agrawala. It contains substantial information on the morphology and phonology of the dialect. The area known as Shekhawati (Jhunjhunu and Sikar districts), which is covered by an almost standard form of Rajasthani, linguistically extends to the neighbouring districts of Nagaura, Churu, Bikaner and Gangagnagar, thus forming about one fifth of the entire population of Rajasthan.

K.L. Sharma, in a comprehensive study of Harauti dialect, has tried to improve upon a number of observations made by W.S. Allen on aspiration, implosion, retroflexion and nasalsisation in Harauti. At the same time, his study (Harauti boli aur sahitya, 1965) is indebted to Allen's paper on 'Phonological characteristics' which also contains his minute observations on the vowel disharmony.

Another competent linguistic analysis of Vagari dialect is available in Vagari boli ka swarup aur usaka tulanatamak adhyayan (1977) by L.D. Joshi. The chapter on phonological aspect of the dialect has been made exceptionally rich by giving vowel charts and copious examples. While acknowledging its kinship with Gujarati, Joshi has taken sufficient pains in establishing its identity and fraternity with Rajasthani, besides making a comparison with Bhili and Mewari dialects.

Chintamani Upadhyaya is the first scholar to present a complete and comprehensive linguistic study of Malavi, a prominent dialect of Rajasthani. His is a historical, comparative and descriptive study (Malavi, eka bhasha shastriya adhyayan, 1960). Discussing the origin and development of the dialect, he has shown its traces in the old 'Avanti' Prakrit, 'Paishachi' and Apabhramsha. His observations have been well supported by quotations from old texts. In the philological study are given the geographical boundaries and details of sub-dialects. A comparative study of the impacts on or from neighbouring languages, inclusive of Rajasthani which is not treated by the author as the mother language of Malavi, sorts out the dissimilarities and likeness with Gujarati, Marathi, Bundeli and Rajasthani. The last chapter deals with the phonological and grammatical parts and describes all prevalent forms. Thus, this book may be taken as the first thorough study of dialect.

Attempts in extensive comparative and intensive dialectal studies were earlier made by Grierson and G. Macalister (for Jaipuri dialects). The latter has listed fifteen sub-dialects of Dhundhari and amply illustrated the grammatical forms of each of them by full length specimens in the form of folk-tales.

There has been an increased tendency among scholars preparing for their doctoral theses and post-graduate dissertations to take up such studies of various modern dialects. Studies on this very pattern have been done on Bikaneri, Barmeri, Harauti (Bundi) and other sub-dialects or localised dialects of cities and towns or communities.

Kalicharan Bahala of the University of Chicago, has engaged himself in the study of Rajasthani grammar and linguistics for quite a few years. His article on the present state of modern Rajasthani grammar amply speaks of his labour in this respect. Though he has emphasized the grammatical variations, his observations on the phonological and other aspects are much helpful to those working for a linguistic study.

Despite all these attempts, it should not be denied that linguistic studies in Rajasthani are still in infancy. The monumental work on the historical development of the language, left incomplete by L.P. Tessitori, needs to be taken up again by competent linguists. Unless threads of the language are picked up and proper links established with its mother language, Apabhramsha, it may be difficult to understand and appreciate the structural forms variously seen in modern Rajasthani. The joint family-house of the 'Old Western Rajasthani' or 'Maru Gurjara' has not seen any towering personality of a linguist like Hemachandra Suri during the last millennium. Rajendra Suri has, of course, explained most brilliantly the etymological derivations of hundreds of Rajasthani words in his Abhidhana Rajendra kosha (1957), consisting of seven parts. It has been highly commended by eminent scholars of international repute. Though it is essentially a lexicon, or at best an encyclopaedia, being full of information on cultural and religious topics, its importance is no less in the linguistic sphere. As for the dialectal and comparative studies, there is enormous scope and dozens of sub-dialects, especially those of the Kalabelias (Snake-charmers), Gadialuhars (Blacksmiths on carts), Banjaras (petty merchants on bullock-backs) and a number of scheduled castes and tribes are waiting to be explored and enquired into by competent scholars with a flair for and acumen in comparative linguistics.

LINGUISTIC STUDIES (Sindhi) of Sindhi have a tradition set way back in the middle of the nineteenth century which produced great scholars like Stack (1853) and Trumpp (1872) in the fields of lexicography and grammar.

Prior to the British conquest of Sindh in 1843, Sindhi was the language of common life but Persian was the language of administration and learning. The use of the Sindhi language, written in several varieties of Devanagari, Gurumukhi, Arabic and Persian scripts, was restricted to trade, literature and religious writings. The British policy to run the administration in the native language was instrumental in standardising one modified Perso-Arabic script for Sindhi out of the diverse usages among different sections and in preparing teaching materials, grammars and dictionaries of Sindhi for European officials during the later half of the nineteenth century.

During the present century, linguistic studies in Sindhi have been developing along more-or-less the same lines as Indian linguistics in general. Grierson's Linguistic Survey of India (1903-28), presenting brief accounts of different dialects of all modern Indian languages, is an achievement unparalleled in this country even today. In the Volume VIII (1919), he surveys all dialects of Sindhi and presents a brief account of standard Sindhi.

Most of the works of the classical sufi poet, Shah Abdul Latif (1689-1752) are written in the Lari dialect. Hence the linguistic peculiarities of Lari received the attention of literary critics editing Shah's works: Trumpp (1866), Lilaram Vatanmal (1890), Gurbuxani (1923-31), Kalyan Advani (1958), Shahvani (1960), and others. In the recent years, Baloch in B'elayun ja b'ola (1951) and Sandilo in Vinhara (1951) and Sindhua jo singaru (1956) discuss Lasi and Thari folklore respectively along with their dialectal peculiarities.

A few works on Kachhi folklore, idioms and proverbs and religious writings of Ismaili Muslims are available in Gujarati or Sindhi-Khojki characters. A few attempts have been made to devise a new Kachhi-Hindi script and to give a grammatical description of the dialect. In this respect a bilingual Kachhi-Gujarati lexicon of Pandya (1885) is noteworthy.

Although, linguistically, Kachhi is a dialect of Sindhi and the standard dialect 'Vicholi' is intelligible to a Kachhi speaker, yet he does not make an effort to imitate the prestige dialect of Sindhi, because of the political and social separation of Sindh and Kutch regions, and considers himself closer to a Gujarati speaker. Now with the partition of the Indian subcontinent, the Sindh-Kutch border forms the international boundary demarcating Pakistan and India on the western side, and Sindh forms a part of West Pakistan and Kutch part of the Gujarat state in India.

In writing the history of the Sindhi language and literature, the accounts of Memon (1937), Sehvani (1940), Bherumal Mehrchand (1941), Jetley (1957), Baloch (1962) and Siraj (1964) may prove valuable.

Folklore studies in Sindhi are concentrated on the accumulation of data. After Hart-Davis' Sindh Ballads (1881) and Kincaid's two works, Tales of Old Sindh (1922) and Folktales of Sindh and Guzerat (1925), it is only during the last decade that some long-term projects on the publication of folklore have been initiated in both Pakistan and India. Of great importance for literature as well as for the history of the language is Baloch's compilation of Sindhi folktales, sponsored by the Sindhi Adabi Board. In India Narayan Bharati (1963) has laid emphasis on the collection of folk-songs related to different rituals and cultural events among Sindhi speaking Hindus.

The partition of India in 1947 affected the study of the Sindhi language in a significant manner. Educational and scholarly activity in Sindhi, in which Hindus had a major role to play, was disrupted due to a large-scale migration from Sindh. After the turmoil of partition subsided, a number of young Sindhi scholars in Pakistan and in India have demonstrated their ability in the field and are looking at the linguistic tasks in a new perspective. Past two decades have seen considerable increase in linguistic activities in Sindhi in both Pakistan and India. Hitherto publications on language have been mostly due to the private initiative of literary-minded researchers and the pastime of administrators.

In post-Independence South Asia, language consciousness has come very much to the fore on the social and political scene which has given rise to a mushroom growth of works on language. The quality of such materials, however, in most cases, does not stand up to the requirements of the time. A few researchers of the old philological school, who are mostly literary writers and historians rather than linguists, remain true to their training, tracing the origin and development of the language. Some of them, on the basis of a few seals obtained by the excavation of the pre-historic sites at Mohen-jo-daro in Sindh, have indulged in fanciful claims tracing Sindhi as the fountain source of at least all Indian languages. In India a sustained movement for the inclusion of Sindhi as one of the major literary languages of India first drew the attention of a number of political leaders and literary writers in Sindhi towards the lexical and grammatical characteristics (claimed to be rich treasures) of the language. But most of these works touch only the fringe of the problems.

The Department of Sindhi Linguistics at the Deccan College Post-graduate and Research Institute provides opportunities for training in modern techniques to research scholars. It has sponsored studies on contemporary Sindhi particularly concerning the problems of dynamic change in the language under the laboratory conditions of post-partition India, in which Sindhi is being cultivated in multilingual surrounding (Khubchandani 1963). In this connection a pilot survey of Indian Sindhi reveals a remarkable shift in the profiles of language use (Daswani and Parchani, 1978). Among others the studies of Samtani

LINGUISTIC STUDIES—URDU

(1957), Rohra (1971), Thakwani (1978), Gidwani (1981), Wadhvani (1981) have made significant contribution in the field. The Central Institute of Indian languages of its Western Regional Language Centre in Poona has undertaken the programmes of teaching Sindhi to non-Sindhi teachers and is engaged in the task of preparing teaching materials on the language based on the theories of applied linguistics (Varyani 1970, Lekhwani 1977). The Sahitya Akademi and other public organisations like Sindhi Sahitya Sammelan, Sindhu Khojina Kendra, Sindhu Research Society, have conducted seminars on the various issues dealing with Sindhi languages, literature, culture, and education in an effort to mobilise the energies of scholars interested in the advancement of Sindhi studies in India.

Research gains in the field of Sindhi linguistics have been only initial. The merit of linguistic research in Sindhi during the past three decades is in the collection of new facts. And, in this, the materials gathered and classified are indispensable. Much work in this field often appears in short-lived Sindhi journals which are not easily available. The following works on the subject have so far been published in India:

1. G. Shiri, Akhara dhatun (Etymological vocabulary, 1866).
2. Lilaram Vatanmal, Abd-al-Latif Shah (Two vols., 1890).

LINGUISTIC STUDIES (Urdu). The first literary personality in Urdu who showed insight into comparative philology before the discovery made by William Jones (1746-1794) in 1786, suggesting the common parenthood of Sanskrit, Greek, Latin, Gothic, Celtic and old Persian, was Siraj-ud-Din Ali Khan-e-Arzu (1689-1756), the distant relative of the famous Urdu poet, Mir Taqi Mir. Though not a regular poet of Urdu, Khan-e-Arzu took keen interest in the linguistic aspects of Urdu language. It was he who detected, before William Jones, the linguistic relationship between Sanskrit and pre-Islamic Persian. The notable feature of his Persian dictionary, Farhang-e-Chiragh-e-Hidayat (edited by Dabir Siyazi and published by Kanun-e-Ma'rifat, Tehran), is that Arzu suggested kinship between Sanskrit and the pre-Islamic Persian on the basis of phonetic and semantic similarities between certain Persian and Sanskrit words, instead of attributing these similarities to mutual borrowings. He coined the term, 'Tawafuq-ul-Lisanain' (Harmony between two languages) for such words of common origin. Arzu compiled a dictionary, Navadir-ul-Alfaz—Tasaheeh-e-Gharaib-ul-Lughat (edited by Syed Abdulla), making corrections in the first Urdu dictionary written in Persian by Abdul Wase Hansvi under the name, Gharaib-ul-Lughat. Arzu's attempt in his dictionary was to bring Urdu in line with its standard form: as spoken then in Agra and Delhi, and to discard the rural usage of certain Urdu words as obtaining in Haryana, the region to which the author of Gharaib-ul-Lughat belonged.

Another person, who showed remarkable linguistic insight before linguistics became a scientific branch of study in Europe, was a renowned Urdu poet, Insha Allah Khan 'Insha' (died 1817). He wrote the first part of the book, Darya-e-Latafat (originally named Irshad-e-Nazimi Bahr-e-Sa'adat), in Persian dealing with Urdu grammar. The other part of the book dealing with prosody, rhetorics and logic was written by Qateel. Long before the very concept of descriptive linguistics was born in Europe, Insha dealt in Darya-e-Latafat with various spoken forms of Urdu in vogue at his time in different localities of Delhi which was then a confluence of many Indian languages. Insha proclaimed in Darya-e-Latafat for the first time the independent status of Urdu by declaring, 'Let it not remain unknown that every (loan) word, whether it be Arabic, Persian, Turkish, Syriac, Punjabi or Purbi (Eastern Hindi), which has gained currency in Urdu, is Urdu irrespective of the fact whether it is wrong or right according to its usage in the donor language. The correctness or otherwise of such a (loan) word is to be determined on the basis of its usage in Urdu'. Insha was the first man to give importance to accent ('Lahja') in the spoken form of Urdu. He determined as many as fifty Urdu phonemes, giving Urdu aspirates the status of independent phonemes and classifying certain phonemes on the basis of nasalisation and onset clusters.

However, the first Urdu writer of renown, who took keen interest consciously in linguistics, then known as philology, as a science of language, was Mohammad Husain Azad. It was he who discussed the origin and development of Urdu language in the preface to his famous book on the history of Urdu poetry, Ab-e-Hayat, for the first time scientifically in the light of whatever information he could get during his period. His theory borrowed from Heornle that Urdu is derived from Braja as propounded by him in the preface to Ab-e-Hayat, does not however stand the test of modern linguistic analysis. His magnum opus, however, is Sukhandan-e-Fars, for which he will ever be remembered as the first linguist in Urdu. It is a thesis attempted on a large scale seeking to establish phonetic and semantic kinship between Sanskrit and pre-Islamic Persian. Azad, in fact, took up the hint from Khan-e-Arzu, more particularly from Jones, who had suggested in his third memorable address before the Asiatic Society, Calcutta, that "the old Persian might be added to the same family (of languages to which Sanskrit, Greek and Latin belong)," and elaborated on it with the help of his linguistic knowledge.

Worth mentioning among the Europeans, who took interest in the study of Indian languages and discussed inter alia the linguistic features of Hindustani (Hindi/Urdu), are Grierson (Linguistic Survey of India), John Beams, John Gilchrist, Kellog, Hoernle and George Hadley.

During the first quarter of the twentieth century, chief among the persons who took interest in the study of the philological aspects of Urdu, were (i) Syed Sulaiman Nadvi who occupied himself with tracing the etymology of certain loan words borrowed from Arabic and Persian, (ii) Pandit Dattatriya Kaifi (author of Manshoorat and Kaifia), who specialised in the grammatical aspects of language study and their importance in literary composition, (iii) Moulvi Abdul Haq, who was interested in various aspects of language study like lexicography, grammar, the distinctive features of the ancient Dakni, the impact of Persian on Marathi, etc., (iv) Waheed-ud-Din Salim, who specialised in the coinage of technical terms in Urdu Waz'-e-Istilahat and (v) Abd-us-Sattar Siddiqui, who insisted on correct spelling of many words which, according to him, were mis-spelt generally. In the same period, keen interest was shown by Hafiz Mahmood Sheerani (1880-1946) in the origin of Urdu language. His book, Punjab me Urdu (1928) seeks to establish the original homeland of Urdu in Punjab, an opinion shared by Muhiuddin Zore and Sunitikumar Chatterjee.

Muhiuddin Zore of Hyderabad was the first Urdu scholar to take up the phonetic analysis of Urdu sounds in his treatise in English entitled, Hindustani Phonetics (Paris, 1930). It was followed by another treatise in English by Mas'ud Husain Khan under the title, A Phonetic and Phonological Study of Word in Urdu. Zore also wrote a book on linguistics for the first time in Urdu entitled, Hindustani Lisaniyat (1933). Lively interest in descriptive linguistics in Urdu was aroused by the summer schools of linguistics started in Pune in 1954. Abdul Qadir Sarwari's book Zaban-o-Ilm-e-Zaban on synchronic studies appeared in 1958. A number of substantial articles on various aspects of Urdu language and general linguistics were contributed by Mas'ud Husain Khan (author of Sher-o-Zaban), Gyanchand Jain (author of Lisani Mutalef), Gopi Chand Narang, author of Karkhandari Dialect of Delhi Urdu, in English, and Urdu ki Taleem ke Lisaniyati pehelu and Ismat Javid (author of Fikr Paima and Lisaniyati Jaize). A.S. Dalvi edited a collection of articles on linguistic studies in Urdu under the title Lisaniyati Tah'qiq (1971). Besides, Mas'ud Husain Khan and Gopi Chand Narang have written articles on stylistics and established a new school of literary criticism with quite a few followers. Ehtisham Husain translated into Urdu An Outline of Indian Philology by John Beams, under the name, Hindustani lisaniyat ka khaka (1948). Presently many younger scholars are attending to linguistic studies in Urdu.

LITERATURE (Apabhramsha). The earliest recognition of Apabhramsha as a literary language is by Bhamaha (6th century) and on its basis we can safely place the beginning of Apabhramsha literature in the fifth century. Literature in Apabhramsha thereafter was produced for more than a thousand years and the area covered almost the whole of ancient India—from Valabhi in the West to Nalanda in the East and from Kashmir in the North to Manyakheta in the South.

Apabhramsha works earlier to ninth century are not available; we have only a few name of authors, still fewer names of works and a handful of stray citations, mostly from unspecified works. The available works onwards from the ninth century, with very few exceptions, were written by the Jains on Vedic-Brahmanic models. In the matter of the choice of themes and the manner of handling them by means of various modes of narration and description, Apabhramsha poetry was considerably influenced by Sanskrit and Prakrit models. But there were a number of metrical types and structures, as also genre introduced by Apabhramsha.

Apabhramsha had a great variety of metres based on matra (mora) as a basic unit and it used several Sanskrit and Prakrit metres also for variation. All this forced writers on Prakrit prosody to set up special section on Apabhramsha metres (e.g. Svayambhuchchhandas Ch. IV-VIII, i.e. IX-XIII, Chhandonushasana Ch. V). The Apabhramsha epic Sandhibandha and the narrative lyric Rasabandha had their own choice of metrical types. The minor form including festive songs and hymns had also specific metrical conventions.

The bulk of Apabhramsha poetry is considerably sophisticated and calling it popular would be a misconception of its real nature and character. No doubt, Apabhramsha poetry has a popular stratum also, but much of it, like Prakrit poetry, is 'high' or 'artistic' literature.

Apabhramsha work prior to the ninth century is not well preserved. On the basis of the few citations from ten Apabhramsha poets given in the Svayambhuchchhandas of Svayambhu, and still fewer allusions made by Svayambhu's son Tribhuvane, it appears that there had been notable contributions by a large number of poets in various forms of literature. Apabhramsha epic was fully developed. Chaturmukha's efforts in this form were not only pioneering but counted also as high water-mark of achievement. A few other names were also famous. Similarly in the middle range poems, represented by the Rasabandha, there must have been significant contributions. Although we have no names of authors or works preserved, the definition and description of two types of Rasakas given in the Svayambhuchchhandas presuppose the existence of several examples. A similar inference is to be made regarding the short lyrics and songs from the information we get from Svayambhu and from stray Apabhramsha verses occurring in several Prakrit works like the Kuvalayamala (779). Many of these Charitas are practically indistinguishable in form (Sandhibandha) and content from the Katha type of works. Some of these works are also intended to illustrate the merits of observing religious vows (vratas) like Srutapanchami and Sripanchami.

Another type of be distinguished in the middle-range poems in Sandhibandha is a collection of tales illustrative of some religious topics. Works like the Dhammaparikkha of Harisena (988), Damsanakaharayanakarandaya of Srichandra (1066) and Chakkammuvaesa of Amarakirti (1218) fall within this class.

One more type, distinct in theme, form and structure from all others, and corresponding to the Khandakavya of Sanskrit (e.g. the Meghaduta), was the Rasaka or Rasabandha. Svayambhu has already defined it. Considering the vigour of its continuation in old Gujarati we can assume that it was cultivated throughout the Apabhramsha period. But excepting two specimens of a considerably late date all the Rasakas are lost.

We have a reference to Ambadevīrasaya or Devadatta (11th century). It was a religious poem by a Jaina author. A number of citations occurring in Bhoja's Shringaraprakasha seem to suggest that Bhoja was quoting from the same Apabhramsha Rasakas. In the twelfth century, Jinadatta Suri, composed a didactic Rasaka, the Upadesharasaymarasa in 80 Vadanka stanzas. It rather represents the later development in the form. The only preserved genuine representative of the earlier Rasabandha is the Samdesarasaka of the muslim poet Abdala Rahamana belonging to the thirteenth century. It gives us some idea of sensitive delineation of emotions (especially of love), intense lyricism and the richness of metrical forms that characterized the Rasabandha. A shorter variety of Rasaka, a lyrical song accompanied by a circular group dance is also described by the prosodists, and this has continued with periodical changes in its form and function down to the present day in certain western and central regions.

Poems having less than ten Sandhis or a comparable extent came under a category, which has almost all the types that have been distinguished within the poems of the middle Vanga tales, biographies, tale-groups and didactic compositions. For this category of poems either the Sandhibandha is used or there is some one metre like Doha, Vadanka, etc., for all the verses which are self-contained units (muktakas), loosely connected by a common theme.

To note a few instances, we have Paumasirichariya of Dhahila (c. 11th century), Sukumalachariya of Sridhara (1152), Dhannakumarachariya of Raidhu (15th century) and Mayanaparajayachariya of Harideva (between the 12th and 15th century). Among the vratakathas are to be noted works like the Suyandhadāsāmikāha of Udayachandra (1150 and some poems relating to Nirjharapanchami, Chandanasasthi, etc. There are religious didactic tracts like the Vairagyāsara of Suprabha, Samjamamanjari of Maheshvara, etc.

From about the 13th century we get short poems called Sandhi, consisting of only one Sandhi divided into a number of Kadavakas and having some religious or didactic topic or the life of a mythological or legendary character as its theme. Antaramgasamdhi of Ratnaprabha, Bhavanasamdhi of Jayadeva, Mayanarehasamdhi and Namaysunderisamdhi of Jinaprabha, all belonging to the thirteenth century, are some of the instances.

Another class of shorter works, composed in the Doha metre had semi-philosophical and mystical subject matter. Yogīndudeva's Paramappapayasa and Yogasara (possibly about the 10th century), Ramasimha's Dohapahuda (11th century) and a few other works (including one in which the form of Kakka or Varnamala is adopted i.e. the verses begin with syllables in alphabetical and vocalic order belong here. So also a part of the literature of the Buddhist Vajrayana Siddhas in Apabhramsa. The Doha- koshas and charyas of the poets like Kanha and Saraha are the instances of the latter.

. Apabhramsha epic was fully developed. The Sandhibandha was an elaborate structure using a rich variety of metres for its different structural parts. The range of the theme was very wide. The Ramayana, the Mahabharata and the Harivamsha, any major, Upakhyana or episode from these, mythological and legendary biographies of great men, like the Jaina Tirthankaras and universal monarchs, aggregation of tales illustrating a group of religious moral topics (Kathakosha)—such were the subjects of these epics. The prominent epic poets are Chaturmukha (9th century), Svayambhu (9th century) and Pushpadanta (10th century). Others are Dhavala (before 11th century), Raidhu (15th century), Yasahkirti (16th century) and Shrutakirti (16th century). The other epic-long works are of Nayanandi (11th century), Srichandra (11th century) and Haribhadra (12th century).

The middle range poems of several types, poems with narrative content predominating can be roughly classified thus:

- 1) Secular and religious tales (katha);
- 2) Religious and legendary biographies (charita);
- 3) Collection of tales connected with a group of religious topics. Besides these, there were poems with lyrical element predominating over the narrative, thus corresponding to the Sanskrit Khandakavya. They may have a secular or religious subject.

Bhoja has given in his Shringaraprakashsa (p. 908) a citation from a work called Shudrakakatha. From the language of the citation we can infer that Sudrakakatha was a Apabhramsa work. Vira tells us in his Jambusamichariya (1020) that his father Devadatta had four works to his credit including the Suddayavirakaha (Skt. Shudrakavirakatha). All the works of Devadatta were most probably in Apabhramsa. Svayambhu also had one Suddayachariya to his credit. All these appear to have been romantic tales. On the authority of Bhamaha (6th century) we know that there were Katha works in Apabhramsha prior to him. Unfortunately no secular work of story of Apabhramsha is preserved.

In the case of religious tales we are somewhat fortunate, thanks are due to the Jainas. Even though no earlier models are preserved, we have a number of works onwards from the tenth century. The Dharmakatha and Charita types of works cannot be always distinguished and many a time the difference does not extend beyond the nomenclature. Most of the Kathas and Charitas are in the Sandhibandha. The Vilasavaikaha of Siddhasenasuri alias Sadharana (completed in 1067) has eleven Sandhis. The story is based on the tale of Sanatkumara and Vilasavati occurring as an embedded tale in the main plot of Haribhadra's Samaraichchakaha (8th century) in Prakrit. Usually the Jaina tale has a thin religious frame within which is set a story of love, adventure, calamities and miraculous escapes, with the divine and semi-divine beings also playing intrusive roles in human affairs. Bhavisattakaha of Dhanapala (11th century), Jinayattakaha of Lakhu (13th century) and Siripalakaha of Raidhu (15th century) are few other illustrations.

There is a large class of Apabhramsha poems called Chariya (Skt. Charita). They narrate in the Kavya style, the life of some famous character of mythology or legend. We have works on the lives of several Jaina Tirthankaras, pontiffs, kings and legendary or fictional heroes or heroines like Karakandu, Yashodhara, Nagakumara, Sudarshana and Jinadatta:

Stray Apabhramsha verses, groups of verses or longer verse passages occur in numerous narrative and religious didactic works in Prakrit written by the Jainas. Kumarapalapratibodha of Somprabha (13th century), Akhyanakamanikoshavritti of (1133), Mallinathacharita of Haribhadra (12th century), Ratnaprabha's commentary on the Upadeshamala (13th century) and Kumarapalacharita of Hemachandra are only a few of such works. From the eighth century there is hardly any Prakrit narrative by a Jaina author in which a few Apabhramsha verses do not occur. Several Sanskrit works also by the Jainas, of a narrative and religious and didactic nature contain casual Apabhramsha verses.

Moreover, the works on prosody, rhetorics and grammar, like the Svayambhuchchandasa of Svayambhu, the Chhandonushasana of Hemachandra, the anonymous Kavidarpana and Prakritapaingala, the Sarasvatikantabharana and Shringaraprakasa of Bhoja, the Siddhahema of Hemachandra and the Prakritasarvasva of Markandeya contain numerous Apabhramsha passages cited or composed by their authors as illustrations. In some Sanskrit texts of the Kashmiri Shaivism, e.g. in Abhinavagupta's Tantrasara and Paratrimshikavritti discussions of various topics are in Apabhramsha. This fact suggests that religious sect might have a portion of its literature in Apabhramsha.

From the works of Apabhramsha metres we learn about various types of popular songs that were composed in Apabhramsha. There were Dhavala songs praising some hero. There were Mangala songs (in various metres) for festive occasions, like marriage, child-birth, etc. There were Phulladakas for praising deities. There were lullabies, riddles, epigrams and proverbs. Besides we have numerous hymns, prayers and songs to celebrate religious observances and ceremonial worship composed by the Jaina poets.

Some of the uparupakas like the Dombika, Rasaka, Charchari and Natyarasaka seem to have used Apabhramsha. Similarly some of the Dhruva songs in the Sanskrit drama and songs accompanied by some types of dances were composed in Apabhramsha. The disputed Apabhramsha verses, found in some Mss. Kalidasa's Vikramovarshiya support this.

LITERATURE-ASSAMESE

As observed earlier the bulk of the preserved Apabhramsa literature consists of Jaina works. Most of the non-Jaina works and many Jaina works also are lost. Thus in view of its abundance, excellence and formal richness, the Apabhramsa poetry has been deservedly given in the classical tradition a place of honour by the side of Sanskrit and Prakrit poetry.

LITERATURE (Assamese). Scholars have tried to trace back the history of Assamese literature to the mystic songs known as 'charyapada' or 'doha' composed by the Buddhist Siddhacharyas affiliated to Sahajayana. These songs were composed between the 10th and 12th centuries A.D. The contents of these poems are of a highly mystic nature centering round the esoteric doctrines, beliefs and practices of Sahajayana. Some of the Siddhas who composed these songs are definitely known to have hailed from Kamarupa, i.e., modern Assam. The names of Luipa (Lauhityapada), Sarahapa and Minanatha may be mentioned in this connection. The language of these poems represents the latest phase of Magadhi Apabhramsha and, therefore, bears certain affinities with Assamese also. Some of the vocables, idioms and expressions of these lyrical songs are still prevalent in Assamese in slightly different forms. The literary value of these compositions lies in the charming manner of expressing arid doctrines, tenets and beliefs, in the homeliness of diction and the allegorical way of revealing abstract ideas through the medium of every-day experience. Thus, these mystic songs may be called the first layer of bricks on which the foundation of Assamese literature is based.

The real history of Assamese literature, however, begins from the fourteenth century when King Durlabhanarayana was reigning over Kamata kingdom. From this time till the advent of Shankaradeva, the great poet, musician and social reformer of the fifteenth-sixteenth century (1449-1568), Assamese literature made a very promising start with translations of and adaptations from the two great epics. Harivara Vipra and Hem Saraswati, two of the earliest poets, received patronage from Durlabhanarayana who has been glorified in the panegyric verses of their work Lava-Kusharyuddha and Vabruvahanar yuddha. The two full-length kavyas of Harivara Vipra amply bear testimony to his scholarship, poetic ability and thorough acquaintance with Assamese life and manners. Hema Saraswati's Prahladacharitra and Haragauri samvada are also works of considerable merit. Two other poets whose works are available to us are Kaviratna Saraswati and Rudra Kandali.

All these poets drew their materials mainly from the Mahabharata and occasionally from the puranas. The entire Ramayana was left untouched to be dealt with by a master poet in the person of Madhava Kandali who flourished in the middle of the 14th century. He translated the entire Ramayana of Valmiki into smooth Assamese verses without materially deviating from the original. While translating the Ramayana he constantly kept two things before him, viz., literary beauty and popular taste. These two qualities have greatly enhanced the appeal and value of his work.

All these works are written in the usual narrative style of a kavya. There is another mode of literary expression in the works of poets who have glorified the exploits of the gods and goddesses, specially the snake goddess, Manasa, in their 'pachali-kavyas.' These pachali-kavyas consisting of narrative descriptions, frequently punctuated by lyrical songs, were meant to be sung and recited by chorus parties known as Oja-Pali.

The leader of the chorus party is called Oja who is assisted by four or five singers known as Pali. Durgavara, Mankar and Pitambara Kavi are well-known pachali poets of this period. Giti-Ramayana and Baula-akhyana by Durgavara, Usha-Parinaya, Nalopakhyana by Pitambara Kavi and Padma-purana by Mankar were composed towards the end of the fifteenth century in the same pachali style. These kavyas have a considerable number of lyrics inter-woven into the texture of the plot. These lyrics are set to melodies (ragas) of classical Indian music.

The Vaishnavite movement was initiated by Shankaradeva, a versatile genius of extra-ordinary capacity. He was a scholar, a poet, a musician of high order, a social reformer and an expert propagator. The rare combinations of these qualities enabled him to organise the Vaishnava movement which was mainly based on the devotional cult of the Bhagavata-purana. He was ably assisted by a band of selfless followers of whom Madhavadeva was the most prominent. To propagate and to popularise the new faith, the Vaishnava saints and poets translated the epics and the puranas into sweet and simple Assamese verse, composed religious kavyas and devotional lyrics in scores, wrote and staged dramas in a most spectacular way and produced hagiographies depicting the lives of the saints. Shankaradeva introduced congregational prayer-services, where recitation and exposition of devotional scriptures was a regular feature. Thus, within a short time, thousands of poems came to the fold of Vaishnavism. The movement brought about a renaissance in the field of art and infused a new significance and value in the social and cultural life of Assam. It established spiritual equality of all men and sharpened their emotional and aesthetic sensibility. Scholars and poets vied, as it were, with one another to educate and edify the masses through the medium of their writings. Shankaradeva himself set the ball rolling by translating almost the entire Bhagavata-purana into the language of the people. He composed six dramas, several devotional kavyas based on puranic themes and more than two hundred devotional songs, known as 'bargita'.

The vast mass of literature produced during the period of the Vaishnava renaissance may be classified into the following categories.

1. (a) Translations from epics and puranas (b) Adaptations from them (c) Devotional Romances (d) Dramas (e) Songs of sublime nature set to classical melodies (f) Devotional compendiums in verse.

2. (a) Prose translations and summaries of the puranas. (b) Prose biographies.

1. (a) Of all the puranas the Bhagavata-purana attracted most the attention of writers. Shankaradeva himself translated as many as nine cantos (skandha) and his followers translated the remaining cantos. Shankaradeva's translation of Dashama-skandha is not only the most poetical and successful rendering, it is also the most popular work of the saint. Keshava Kayastha, Aniruddha Kayastha, Gopal Charana Dvija and Damodara Dasa also contributed towards the completion of the translation. Next to Bhagavata-purana the two great epics received attention. Rama Saraswati is the foremost of the poets who participated in rendering the Mahabharata into Assamese. He was ably assisted by Gopinatha Pathak, Vidyapanchannana, Kamsari Kayastha and others. It should be mentioned here that the Assamese rendering of the Mahabharata is not a verbatim, literal translation of the original. Through compression, summarisation and insertion of local colour where possible, the Assamese version emerged as an epic of the soil.

The Ramayana also equally attracted the Vaishnava writers. There are several Assamese versions of the epic. Although Gopalakrishna was the most adroable deity, the hero of the Ramayana was considered no less adorable. Madhava Kandali of the 14th century rendered the entire Ramayana into Assamese verse, but unfortunately the first and the last cantos were lost irrecoverably. So Madhavadeva and Shankaradeva supplemented the lost cantos by translating the Adi and Uttarakanda respectively. Ananta Kandali, a devout follower of Shankaradeva and a staunch believer in the Vaishnavite ideals translated the Ramayana again with a view to giving it a purely Vaishnavite garb. The Bhagavadgita is considered to be one of the most sacred scriptures by all sections of the Vaishnavas. It has several Assamese renderings, both in prose and verse. The earliest and the most popular verse rendering is Padya gita by Govinda Misra who flourished during the early part of the seventeenth century. Selected episodes from Padma purana, Markandeya purana, Vishnu purana and Harivamsha were also beautifully rendered into Assamese.

(b) Besides translations, we have several adaptations from different puranas; selected episodes of the puranas were elaborated with minute details into independent kavyas. The poets only borrowed the bare outlines from the originals and shaped them with their creative imagination. Shankaradeva's Rukminiharana, Rajasuya, Ananta Kandali's Kumaraharana are prominent examples of such adaptations. In these kavyas, the heroic as well as the erotic sentiment have been interspersed with the marvellous sentiment..

(c) The most popular type of composition is the heroic romance having a devotional bias. The heroic romances are called 'badha-kavyas.' These kavyas are mainly made up of the supernatural exploits of the Pandavas mingled with myths and legends about asuras, danavas, sages and kings. Although the heroes and other important characters of these heroic romances are related to the Mahabharata, the stories are, nevertheless, the products of the poets' own imagination. Besides imparting religious education and ethical virtues, the badha-kavyas captured the imagination of the masses by their wonderful stories. Rama Saraswati, the celebrated translator of the Mahabharata is the originator of this type of composition. He alone composed no less than a dozen such heroic romances.

(d) The most notable contribution of the Vaishnava period is the 'ankiya-nata' introduced for the first time by Shankaradeva. Primarily meant to be an instrument of propagation, it exercised a tremendous influence on the national and cultural life of Assam. Lyricism is the dominant trait of this class of plays. Although dialogue and action are not neglected, emphasis is laid on the lyrical element and the prose commentaries of the Sutradhara who pilots the play from the beginning to the end. Shankaradeva and Madhavadeva each composed six one-Act plays and their followers of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries composed several scores of such devotional plays, many of which are still in existence.

(e) The next important branch of Vaishnavite literature is that of songs known as 'bargita,' i.e. songs sublime. These bargitas deal chiefly with the experiences of religious life, philosophic reflections, futility of worldliness, agony of spirit, and glory of God. In some of the songs the childish pranks and activities of Krishna, his going out in the morning to tend cattle with other cowboys, his frolics and play in the forest and return in the evening are vividly and attractively described. Each bargita is tuned to a classical raga and no deviation from the original is allowed. Shankaradeva and Madhavadeva composed about 250 bargitas and many imitations to the extent of several hundred emerged in the next two centuries. Singing of bargita became an indispensable part of daily prayer services of the Vaishnavite community.

(f) Biographies (Charitras) of religious saints and preachers glorifying their deeds and activities and recording their day-to-day practices, religious talks and sermons constitute a distinct branch of the Vaishnavite literature. There are no less than five such biographies dealing with the life and activities of Shankaradeva alone. Similarly, there are many such biographies of other prominent Vaishnavite saints and preachers. Biographies are found both in verse and in prose.

2. (a) Early Assamese literature is equally rich in prose. It has an unbroken history from the sixteenth century. Shankaradeva is the first writer who introduced regular prose in his devotional plays. Of course, the nature of the prose employed in devotional plays is different from the prose used in biographies and puranas. The prose dialogues of the plays are couched in a language having an admixture of Assamese and Maithili. But Katha-gita, Katha-bhagavata and Ramayana written by Bhattadeva and others during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, represent a type of Assamese prose which is pure, dignified and balanced, and not an admixture of Assamese and Maithili as is the case with the prose employed in the dramas of Shankaradeva. Bhattadeva is considered to be the father of Assamese prose. His works, viz., Katha-gita and Katha-bhagavata are important steps towards the great achievement of Assamese narrative prose. Bhattadeva was followed by a few more prose writers who translated parts of the Ramayana and some other Puranas into Assamese prose.

(b) Some biographies of saints (charita-puthis) are also written in a homely prose style. Katha-gurucharit (18th century), Bardowa-gurucharit (18th century), Santa-samprada and a few other biographical works in prose have minutely narrated the lives and activities, trials and tribulations of the religious reformers and proselytisers of the Vaishnavite community.

The third phase of the Assamese literary history begins with the rise of the Ahoms as the most dominant political power in Assam. This phase comes to an end with the conquest of Assam by the British in the third decade of the nineteenth century. The Ahoms became the supreme power in Assam by the middle of the seventeenth century and as a consequence the centre of literary activities shifted from Western Assam to Eastern Assam where the capital of the Ahoms was situated. The Ahoms had a special knack for recording political events, and competent persons were engaged to write down the political history of the country including that of the neighbouring states in the easily understandable language of the people.

Thus, a large number of chronicles written in the spoken language of the people came into existence. These chronicles are called 'buranji', an Ahom word of Thai origin. Commenting on this unique historical literature, G.A. Grierson observes: 'The Assamese are justly proud of their national literature. In no department have they been more successful than in a branch of study in which India, as a rule, is curiously deficient. The historical works or Buranjis are numerous and voluminous' (A Linguistic Survey of India).

Besides prose chronicles the Ahom kings and nobles encouraged and patronised scholars to write books of utilitarian value. Thus, works on astrology, medicine, dance and music, and on ethics and moral virtues were written both in prose and in verse for the use of the people. Hastividyarnava, a treatise on the elephant, Ghoranidan, a work on equestrian disease, Srihastamuktavali, a work on dance and hand-poses, Nitilatankura and Bhasvati dealing with morality and astrology respectively, are some of the important works compiled during the period of the Ahom hegemony.

Verse compositions during this period cover not only translation from the two great epics but adaptations and translations from the puranas and kavyas of the Sanskrit language.

The tradition of the Vaishnavite literature of the preceding period continued unabated in the Vaishnavite circle. Composition of one-Act plays, biographies and devotional lyrics and translations from Vaishnavite scriptures did not go out of vogue, but the momentum of production considerably slowed down during the eighteenth century A.D.

The modern phase of Assamese literature commenced with the occupation of Assam by the British in 1826. With the establishment of the British regime, the western influence began to penetrate Assam. The British system of administration and judicial procedure necessitated the appointment of a large number of English knowing assistants and clerks. Persons of such qualifications not being available in Assam, the new government brought these from Bengal. As a result, Bengali was introduced in the schools and courts of Assam. Bengali, thus introduced at the instance of the British rulers, continued for forty years as the medium of instruction and of the court proceedings. The Assamese language and literature thus received a set-back in the early stage of the British occupation.

The American Baptist missionaries came to the rescue of the Assamese language and literature. The missionaries picked up Assamese very quickly and started writing books and publishing magazines in Assamese. The entire Bible was translated into Assamese as early as 1813. John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress and similar books on Christianity were either adapted or translated in simple Assamese. But the most important achievements of the missionaries were (i) Publication of a literary magazine Arunoday in 1846 (ii) Compilation of a dictionary and grammar on the Assamese language, and (iii) Preparation of text books in Assamese.

In restoring Assamese the missionaries were greatly helped by a few educated Assamese young men. Foremost among them was Anandaram Dhekial Phookan who contributed thought-provoking articles and submitted several memoranda to the Government for the restoration of Assamese. Next to Dhekial Phookan, the laudable efforts of Hemachandra Barua and Gunabhiram Barua may be specially mentioned. Hemachandra compiled an Assamese lexicon on a scientific basis which is still regarded as an authoritative dictionary in Assamese. He also prepared grammar and text books for Assamese schools. Barua is the first social satirist in the Assamese language. Gunabhiram wrote travelogue and social plays, edited literary magazines and compiled an authentic history of Assam. Thus through the combined efforts of the missionaries and the educated Assamese young men, Bengali was replaced by Assamese in 1873. The period, approximately from 1840-1880, may be called the period of missionary literature in Assamese, because missionary writers' contributions overshadowed other writings.

Towards the end of the ninth decade of the last century the Assamese youths studying in Calcutta formed an association for the improvement of Assamese literature. This association started a literary magazine called Jonaki (1890) which ushered in a new era, the era of romanticism in Assamese literature. Jonaki produced a galaxy of writers in different fields of literature. Prominent amongst them were Lakshminath Bezbarua, Chandrakumar Agarwalla, Hemchandra Goswami, Padmanath Gohainbarua, Benudhar Rajkhowa, Rajanikanta Barodoloi and Kamalakanta Bhattacharya. Lakshminath and Padmanath were versatile writers whose contribution to different branches of literature greatly helped towards the stabilisation of modern Assamese literature. Chandrakumar and Hemachandra were essentially poets and the English romantic poets inspired them considerably. Hemchandra Goswami was the first sonnet writer in Assamese. But later on, he switched over to the field of antiquarian research where he did yeoman's service to the cause of historical and antiquarian research. Rajanikanta mainly confined himself to the field of novel. His series of historical novels beginning with Monomati (1900) conjures up an atmosphere of Assamese life and society of two hundred years back as moulded and influenced by political events and social phenomena. The personal essays of Bezbarua enlivened by pungent satire and hilarious humour not only succeeded in evoking laughter, but also made the people conscious of their individual and social follies.

While the writers produced by Jonaki and Bijuli were active in their respective literary fields, another set of writers emerged by the end of the first decade of the current century. This new set of writers consisting mainly of poets and dramatists added new flavour by introducing fresh motifs and techniques and by projecting new visions of life. Among the poets Hiteswar Barbarua, Raghunath Choudhary, Jatindranath Dowerah and Ambikagiri Roychoudhury stand out prominently, while Chandradhar Barua, Durgeswar and Mitradewa Mahanta are prominent as dramatists. Raghunath Choudhary is a poet of nature like Wordsworth; he seeks and finds solace in the midst of Nature. According to him Nature is imbued with the spirit of joy and happiness as opposed to the artificiality of human society. Hiteswar Barbarua is both a sonnet composer and a narrative poet. In his hand narrative kavyas based on historical and mythological themes attained a high watermark of perfection. Lyric poetry finds its best exponent in Jatindranath Dowerah who has sung his personal note in a sad and melodious tune. Ambikagiri, however, strikes an opposite note, the note of patriotism, hard struggle and determination. Chandradhar Barua, Durgeswar Sarma and Mitradewa Mahanta popularised the mythological plays. The dramatic and the poetic elements have been happily blended in their plays, and easy flowing blank-verse became the principal medium of expression of these mythological plays. Low comedies and farces showing social follies and individual incongruities and idiosyncrasies began to flourish side by side with serious plays.

The period between 1920-40 may be called the period of national regeneration. With the emergence of Mahatma Gandhi as the national leader and the Indian National Congress as the predominant political party, Assamese literature stepped into a new era of national resurgence and growth. Side by side with the themes of love, beauty and nature, patriotism, a feeling of national consciousness and urge for all round development found expression in the writings of those who entered the field of literature after 1920. Binandachandra Barua, Dimbeswar Neog, Atulchandra Hazarika, Anandachandra Barua, Ganeshchandra Gogoi and Davakanta Barua and a few others have not only sung of the love and beauty of nature but also sung of the glorious past, deplorable present and future greatness of the country. All these poets have made a romantic approach to life. In the field of drama, Atulchandra Hazarika, who has more than twenty plays to his credit, stands foremost among the playwrights. Most of his plays reveal the characteristics of melodrama. Other notable dramatists of this period are Daibachandra Talukdar, Nakulchandra Bhuyan, Kamalakanta Bhattacharyya and Jyotiprasad Agarwalla. The last one practically revolutionised the art of playwriting in Assamese by introducing modern techniques and devices and by handling plots and characters in a novel and original manner. His three plays, viz., Sonit-kunwari, Karengar ligiri (The maid of the palace) and Rupalim are considered outstanding literary productions of the modern period.

LITERATURE-BENGALI

The field of novel remained almost barren during the third and fourth decades. Besides Rajnikanta Bardoloi, two other novelists that deserve consideration are Daibachandra Talukdar and Dandikatha Kalita. They have written on social themes depicting love, hatred, jealousy of individuals and retrograde customs and manners of the contemporary society. But reformatory zeal has very often visited their approach to life and its artistic treatment. Short stories, personal essays like those of Lamb and Chesterton, humorous and satirical compositions and literary criticism were also receiving due attention from writers, but excepting the art of short-story and one-Act plays the other branches did not gain sufficient depth and perception in the pre-Independence period.

After the attainment of Independence the progress of Assamese literature appeared to be very rapid. A new generation of poets, dramatists and fiction writers came forward with new ideas and techniques. The technique of the old romantic poetry of the pre-War days has yielded place to modern techniques, and the approach to life of modern poets considerably differs from that of their predecessors. Modern Assamese poetry is somewhat intellectual, although emotion has not been totally divorced. Surrealism, symbolism, imagism and other techniques of modern continental poetry and also sprung rhythms of verse libre and rhythmic prose have been successfully employed to express the new poetic sensibility. Novels and short stories are being produced in large numbers, some of them have also reached the high water-mark of success. Essays, belles lettres, literary criticism, biographies and travelogues are making rapid strides, in respect of quantity and quality both. It is not possible to name all the writers of the post-Independence period, yet some names deserve mention on account of their rich contributions. Hem Barua, Navakanta Barua, Nilamani Phukan, Mahendra Bara, Nirmalprabha Bardoloi, Hiren Bhattacharya, Hari Barkakati, Bhaben Barua, Bireswar Barua in the field of poetry, Bina Barua, Syed Abdul Malik, Birendrakumar Bhattacharya, Jogesh Das, Homen Bargohain, Nirupoma Bargohain, Mamani Goswami Raicham, Mahim Bora, Silabhadra, Saurabh Chaliha, Lakshminarayan Bora, Chandraprasad Saikia, Nirod Choudhury in the field of fiction, Prabin Phukan, Satyaprasad Barua, Anil Choudhuri, Girish Choudhuri, Sarbeswar Chakravarti, Afun Sarma, Basanta Saikia, Mahendra Barthakur, Praphulla Bora and Ali Haider in the realm of drama, Trailokya Goswami, M. Neog, Satyendranath Sarma, Hiren Gohain, Bhaben Barua in literary criticism are some important names in the current literary firmament of Assam. The stream-of-consciousness, the Marxian philosophy, existentialism, Freudian psychology, the absurd technique of dramatic presentation are some of the phenomena noticed in current literature. A sense of alienation from the social order, and scepticism and dissatisfaction with the present mark the writings of some writers, but the general trend is not one of disillusionment and pessimism, but of firm faith and hope in future.

S.S.

LITERATURE (Bengali). The seed of literature in Bengal was cast by the Old Indic speaking people who had come to occupy the territory comprising the Damodar, the Ganga and the Brahmaputra basins sometime c. 1000 B.C. But for about a millennium there is no evidence of the existence of the Indic language in this land except a very short and mutilated stone plaque inscription carrying an instruction in a Middle Indic tongue. Epigraphical evidence indicates that the inscription belongs to c. 300 B.C. This precious bit of evidence is a pointer to that in Bengal as elsewhere in India, Old Indic had passed on to the middle stage in course of time. But no other composition in Middle Indic, epigraphic or literary, survived in Bengal before about the end of the fourth millennium A.D., when the local Middle Indic had reached its latest stage, Avahattha.

Evidences of the existence of Sanskrit composition of the epigraphic category are available from c. 400 A.D. The copper-plate inscriptions from c. 800 A.D. onward however, shows a developed and distinctive literary quality. The first literary composition of some length, a narrative poem (mahakavya) about Rama and Sita was written by Abhinanda, a court poet of Devapala (ninth century). It is entitled Ramacharita, and it contains features that do not occur in Valmiki's Ramayana. These features appear to be the local contribution to the ramification of the great story. A few centuries later, another distinctive literary work, also a narrative poem and named Ramacharita, first treats of the contemporary history after Bana's Harshacharita. The author was Sandhyakara Nandi, son of Prajapati Nandi, a councillor of Ramapala. The poem narrates Ramapala's victory over his overwhelming enemies for the possession of his native land. The author shows a great deal of cleverness in narrating at the same time the story of Rama's victory over Ravana.

The poets in Bengal did not at this stage seem to write long narrative poems. They wrote mainly isolated verses and couplets on various topics. These topics are narrative subjects but they are treated with a lyrical flavour. The following poem is a good illustration of the sincerity of emotions and terseness of expression. It is in double entendre.

(waters) just as the Bengali speech is packed with joy, delightful in twists and nourishing to the poets.

From the ninth century downward Bengal took a lead in producing good poetry in Sanskrit. The two earliest and best anthologies of such poetry are Subhashitaratnakosha of Vidyakara, a Buddhist (prior to c. 1200), and Saduktikarnamrita by Vatudasa, son of Shridharadasa, a trusted councillor of Lakshmanasena. Compilation of the latter was completed in about 1207. From the context and from some of the names mentioned in it, it may be said that it belonged to Bengal.

Poets and other intellectuals in Bengal loved Sanskrit and so, neglected the vernacular and popular literary vehicle, the Middle Indic (or Prakrit). Rajashekhara of Malwa (c.1100) has a curious verse where he earnestly prays to the goddess of speech not to allow the poets from Gauda to write in the Prakrit speech as they are not fluent in it. Prakrit in Bengal, on the contrary, seems to have been much more developed than elsewhere. It can be presumed that the Middle Indic in Bengal was Apabhramsha from the very start. This may be the reason for the preference for Sanskrit.

The Prakrit poetry in Bengal has been lost but not without leaving some trail, a trail that led to the making of a remarkable poem containing the first and the best lyric songs in Sanskrit: Jayadeva's Gitagovinda. It is the last landmark in the history of Sanskrit literature. The songs of Gitagovinda (c.1200) started the vernacular lyrics on the Krishna legend not only in Bengal but in many other parts of India as well, the lyrics which stimulated literary activities in Bengal during the subsequent centuries till the second half of the nineteenth century.

Jayadeva found the model of his lyrics in contemporary vernacular (or Avahattha) songs. Although neglected in the learned and high administrative circle, the vernacular (or Avahattha) was not despised by the common people. Songs, puzzles and conundrums, which the common people enjoyed, were written in this language. So also were the dramatic pieces. Fortunately in 1909 Haraprasad Shastri discovered in Nepal Darbar Library an old Bengali manuscript which contained some fifty vernacular songs with their commentary in Sanskrit. The commentary was necessary for breaking up the inner meanings of the songs. These songs were composed by yogi mendicants for a dual purpose: to entertain the people and thereby obtain alms and to hand down their message to the future generation of yogis for their edification and guidance.

There is a perfect structural similarity between the Sanskrit songs of Jayadeva and the vernacular Charya (actor's role) songs of the Buddhist, Shaiva and Natha yogis. There is the signature of the poet, but it may only be the nom de plume or a disciple's forgery. Charya songs have a double meaning, one for the public and the other for the initiated. Here is an example from an unsigned Charya song, a description of a current musical contraption:

suja lau sasi lageli tanti/
anaha dandi chaki kiata avadhuti// bajai alo sahi herua bina/suna tanti-dhami bilasai runa//..

- (i) The sun is the gourd-shell; the moon the string attached;
Unbeaten is the pole; the bottom is made the disk.
Dear girl, Haruka is playing on his bina, The notes of the strings are echoing faintly..."
- (ii) 'The nerve Pingala functions as the shell and the nerve Ira is tied (with it).
The central nerve is their support and the nerve Avadhuti acts as the disc.
My girl, my body is poised for meditation (the process of deep meditation has started);
The void is responding: I notice it faintly.

The vogue of the Charya lyrics did not end with the arrival of the Turks as is generally supposed. No doubt it disappeared at least for a couple of centuries. But it was revived in the sixteenth century nourished by the religious movement of Chaitanya. As baul songs such poetry was first brought to the forefront by Rabindranath Tagore, who may be deemed to be the last writer of the genre in Bengali.

Lyric plays and mimic performances including puppet shows seem to have been rather popular during the Proto and Old period of the Bengali language. It is true that no specimen of it has come down to us but we can guess from the long list of names in such works as Sagara Nandi's Nataka-lakshana-ratnakosha (c. 1300) that the Rama story was quite popular in mimic shows and musical performances. In poetry, however, the theme does not appear before the second half of the fifteenth century.

Since there are no authentic specimens except for a few quotations in Sekashubhodaya, there is a blank in the history of Bengali literature for about two centuries and a half. Nonetheless this period was not entirely unproductive. Middle Bengali language and literature were quietly developing with an unexpected speed and luxuriance. In the last decade of the fifteenth century, Bengali literature appeared fully developed in its most distinctive literary form, viz., that of narration by chanting and singing along with a puppet show representing the characters in the tale. An alternative to the puppet show was the unrolling of a scroll containing the episodes in the tale. This musical and poetic narration, therefore, came to be known as panchali (panchalika, 'doll, puppet'). This unrolling of the scroll continued even up to the nineteenth century in a very muted form. The puppet show was shorn of its musical appendage in the seventeenth century but the mode of musical narration remained popular and survived till the very end of the eighteenth century.

In the last decade of the fifteenth century we come across the first two of the panchali poems: Srikrishnabijay by Maladhar Basu, better known by his official name, Guniraja Khan (literally, Lord Virtuoso), and Brahman Bipradas's Manasabijay. The former was written between 1473 and 1480, and the latter was completed in 1495. Basu's work is an adaptation of the story of Krishna from the Bhagavata-purana, but it also incorporated into it the story of the Ramayana.

Beside the popular panchali poetry which was recited on religious and festive occasions before large gatherings, there was the literary genre for the elites: the lyric songs on the Krishna story, written either in Bengali proper or in the kuntsprache Brajabuli. It came down from the Gitagovinda and was cultivated in the courts of princes and chiefs in Bengal and its surrounding regions.

Chaitanya's movement gave a tremendous fillip to both the narrative and the lyric. Many of his direct followers wrote excellent songs in Bengali and Brajabuli and the theme of some of them was the life and activities of the Master himself. Of these poets mention may be made of Murari Gupta, Basudeb Ghosh, Ramananda Basu, Mukunda Datta and others. The subsequent generations of the Vaishnava poets wrote songs in dozens and hundreds. Chaitanya liked these songs, and some fifty years later, when Narottam Das, himself a writer of such lyrics, made their singing a part of the devotional duties of the Vaishnavites, kirtana became not only a prominent feature of Vaishnava devotional conduct but also a very delightful cultural exercise. Chaitanya's influence did not leave panchali poetry unaffected. A great thing happened all of a sudden: Chaitanya's life became the theme of a great panchali poem, and thus a contemporary man became the hero of what may be called the epic poetry in any New Indic language. Sometime between 1545 and 1550, Vrindavanadas wrote in panchali style a biography of the Master, entitled Chaitanyamangala (later called Chaitanya-bhagavata). The poem is an inspired work. It is, in fact, the first Bengali work of outstanding merit both for the content and the treatment.

Vrindavanadas was followed by a few others but excelled only by Krishnadas Kabiraj. Krishnadas went to Vrindavana at an early age and was occupied in various constructive and useful work there, not neglecting literary activity, under the direction of Sanatana and Rupa. Krishnadas first wrote a narrative poem (mahakavya) in Sanskrit on the Krishna theme. This won him the title of 'Kaviraja' (Master Poet). Krishnadas's Bengali poem, Chaitanya-charitamrita, was written some twenty-five or thirty years after Vrindavanadas's poem. It is the most outstanding book as well as the most authentic work on the life and teachings of Chaitanya and also one of the most erudite works in Bengali literature. It does not belong to the panchali type but is for reading and study.

The popular panchali works dealt with the following themes: the story of Krishna (it was promoted to the elite literature class from the middle of the sixteenth century), the story of the serpent goddess, Manasa, the story of the great goddess Chandi, and from the seventeenth century onward, the story of Dharma and Lausena, and the story of the Ramayana. It is generally held by some scholars that Krittibas wrote a panchali poem in the fifteenth century. But the work which became popular only from the last half of the seventeenth century does not carry any evidence of antiquity. Nor is there any really historical evidence for placing its supposed author in the fifteenth century. If we rely on historical evidence, the credit of putting the story of Rama and Sita for the first time in Bengali verse belongs to Guniraja Khan who had incorporated it into his panchali poem, Srikrishnabijay.

The best specimen of panchali poems and as a matter of fact, the most outstanding work in Bengali poetry in the pre-modern period, is Mukunda Kavikankana's poem, Chandimangal (written between 1544 and 1555). The poet's family had some connection with the Sultan's court at Gaur as is indicated by his father's title, 'Guniraja Mishra'. Mukunda was an educated person and probably knew Persian well. His genius had the rare combination of poetic feeling and romantic observation. Mukunda was a poet as well as a story-teller. The overwhelming success of Mukunda's Chandimangal deterred the poets of the next centuries from writing on the theme.

The Dharamangal panchali poems appeared in the seventeenth century and they were very prolific from the start to the very end of the eighteenth century. But this poetry and its performance belonged to an old cult which was not favoured by the people of the upper class as a whole and it was restricted to that strip of West Bengal which is bordered by the Ajay, the Ganga, and the Damodar and its tributaries and branches. The story of Dharamangal poems are a group of folk-tales with Lausen as the hero born to establish the worship of Dharma among the elite. The earliest and best Dharamangal poem is that by the Brahman Ruparama who had left home and family for the love of a girl of another caste. He belonged to the mid-seventeenth century. The auto-biographical sketch of Ruparama is the nearest to a short story in pre-modern Bengali literature.

popular of the panchali poems on the goddess Manasa. It was written by Ketakadas who was also known as Kshemananda. In North-East Bengal, the poem of Narayanadeva was very popular. The first work in the genre was by the Brahman Bipradas (completed in 1945). On the whole, Bipradas's work is the most comprehensive of the type.

The story of Manasa was not popular with the upper class of the society as it derived from the tradition of the old yogi community. But the story of the merchant, Chand, is of an epic stature. There were other stories from their stock which were popular among the masses for centuries but could not find a poet to up-grade them. Such poems, which normally were short ballads sung by itinerant yogis and beggars, were known from the late eighteenth century. They tell the gripping tale of Gobindachandra and Maynamati and the funny tale of Matsyendranatha and his disciple Goraksha. Short plays on these themes were produced in Nepal in the seventeenth century and earlier. One such play carries the name of Vidyapati as the author.

The last important poem of the panchali type in a rather extended form was produced in the mid-eighteenth century by Bharatchandra Ray. It is entitled Annapurna-mangal and was completed in 1752. It is really a trilogy, comprising a puranic tale on Shiva and Durga (subtitled Annadamangal), a popular romantic story (entitled Vidyasundar) and a historical episode,—Pratapaditya's conflict with the Mughal army and his defeat (entitled Mansingha). Lyric song, not of the traditional Vaishnava variety which was quite vigorously cultivated in the century, came into vogue in this century and Bharatchandra produced some of its best specimens. He knew Sanskrit, Persian and Urdu well and wrote some verses of topical interest in a style mixed with Persian and Urdu. Bharatchandra's works remained the best, standard poetry in Bengali until the emergence of Michael Madhusudan Dutt at the end of the sixth decade of the nineteenth century. A younger contemporary of Bharatchandra was Ramprasad. He also wrote a Vidyasundar poem and some devotional songs on the mother goddess, Kali. These songs are still popular for their simplicity and musical appeal.

Literature in the Middle Ages was predominantly religious. Religion fostered a spirit of submission and a surface tranquility of the mind. But deep beneath this surface a kind of humanism flowed that stirred new questionings and bred new convictions. These were not so much articulated in literature as in the utterances of a number of break-away sects and non-conformist preachers of new cults. In literature they surfaced sometimes in popular songs (as distinct from the court literature patronized by kings and princes) written in the praise of man and his life on earth. But sometimes they surfaced almost violently as in the myth of Chand Saodagar and his obstinate defiance of a spiteful goddess.

When in the 19th century the educated Bengali came in contact with the Western philosophy and literature, it awakened the hidden sceptic and rebel in him. Tom Paine's Rights of Man became his Bible. Comte and Mill enthralled him. Shelley entranced him and he declaimed from Shakespeare on the streets.

But this new exhilaration could not be expressed at first because the vernacular had fallen far behind the new ideas and passions. So it was necessary to set out forthwith to refashion the language. This was done with a rapidity that is astonishing. First came the making of the prose.

In mediaeval times, even narratives were versified and the common form was the payara couplet. The earliest prose document which is extant dates back to as late as 1555. In the 17th century, prose, which was used only in deeds, documents and letters, came to be heavily laden with Persian words and consequently came to lose its native character. The trend continued through the 18th century. The late 18th century prose was frigid, coarse and unanimated.

The task was begun at the dawn of the new century by the Serampore Mission and continued by the Sanskrit scholars of the Fort William College. William Carey translated the Bible into Bengali and wrote a conversational piece called Kathopakathan. He was followed by Gopinath Sarma, (Hitopadesh, 1802), Chandicharan Munsii (Tota itihās, 1805), Haraprasad Ray (Purushaparīksha, 1915), Ramram Basu (Pratapaditya charitra, 1801 and Lipimala, 1802) and Mrityunjay Tatkalanakar (Batirish singhasan, 1802; Hitopadesh, 1808 and Rajabali, 1808). They shored the language of its extraneous elements and enriched it with liberal borrowings from Sanskrit. But these early efforts were confined to writing narratives or at best, conversational pieces. The prose was still stunted, still a trifle coarse and still unsure of itself. Raja Rammohun Ray took it up for more solemn purposes—as a medium of discursive articles, dissertations and debates. Journals and newspapers, which began to appear endlessly from 1818, added to it new words and made it acceptable to the public as a medium for expressing diverse thoughts and ideas.

But prose was yet to become fit for literary forms which the new age and its sensibility demanded and it was for this end that Iswarchandra Vidyasagar worked. He wrote a number of books where he purged the language of its vulgarity and coarseness and endowed it with a chastity it had never known before. It became sleek and lithe and acquired a glitter. Akshaykumar Datta, writing about the same time, gave it further polish.

In 1858, Pearychand Mitra, who called himself Tekchand Thakur, wrote the first Bengali novel, Alaler gharer dulal. It was a picaresque novel where Pearychand dispensed with the polished Sanskritized language which Bengali had become with the works of Vidyasagar and liberally used colloquial words with a coarse humour. His style was not immediately approved or emulated, but this work opened up doors of new possibilities.

Bharatchandra, the last great poet of the mediaeval times, died in 1760. For about a hundred years after that date, poetry degenerated into vulgar rhymes and coarse doggerels. Iswarchandra Gupta (1812-1859) and Madanmohan Tarkalanakar (1817-1858), two poets of some merit dealt with some new themes as patriotism and national glory. Rangalal Banerjee (1827-1887) also wrote patriotic verses but the poet who completely changed the course of Bengali poetry was Michael Madhusudan Dutt (1823-1873). He forged with an amazing deftness the blank verse which gave Bengali poetry a vigour it had never known before. He used this verse first in Tilottamasambhab (1860) and perfected it in Meghanadbadh (1861) and Birangana kavya (1862). He experimented with other forms as well but succeeded most in sonnet: he wrote about a hundred poems in this form. Always in the quest of novelty, Madhusudan was not, however, unaware of the stream of genuine poetry that had come down from the earlier century,—the Vaishnava lyrics—and his Bra-jangana in its altogether fresh form stands as a solid bridge between the old and the new in Bengali literature.

Madhusudan was never successfully imitated. Two poets, Hemchandra Banerjee (1838-1903) and Nabinchandra Sen (1857-1909), who followed him and wrote excellent narrative poems (kavyas) could never match him. But poetry took a new turn with Biharilal Chakravarti (1835-1894) and a few other poets who set out on an altogether different path. They were primarily lyricists. Biharilal invented a metre—a tripping trimetre with excellent rhyme,—and filled his verse with an intense personal emotion. Surendranath Majumdar (1838-1878) and Debendranath Sen (1855-1920) were less effusive. Debendranath wielded the sonnet form with the restraint that it demands and with skill. Akshaykumar Baral was more discriminating in his choice of diction and was probably a better metrist. All these poets wrote of love and idealism and wonder and beauty but their works appear nebulous and unsubstantial beside the sensuousness and the sheer physicality of the poetry of the less polished and more crass Govindachandra Das (1855-1908).

But the works of all these poets, popular and widely read though they were, went pale beside a series of poems which began to appear in the 80's. These poems were by a young poet named Rabindranath Tagore. By the 90's, with the publication of Manasi (1890) and Sonar tari (1894) readers already knew that Bengal had been gifted with a great poet.

After about seven years from the publication of the first Bengali novel, Alaler gharer dulal, appeared a remarkable book named Durgeshnandini (1865). The author was Bankimchandra Chatterjee. The book was a romantic tale of love but it was not the tale that was important. It was the freshness of the prose, the richness of the idiom, the gusto, the profundity and the deftness that amazed the readers. One after another novel followed this: Kapalkundala, Brishabriksha, Chandrashekhar, Anandamath,—to name only a few. Many contemporaries and later writers, Rameshchandra Dutt amongst them—tried to imitate him but no one equalled him.

Among the novelists who wrote in the later half of the nineteenth century were: Sanjibchandra Chatterjee, Pratapchandra Ghose and Svarnakumari Devi. Taraknath Ganguli (1843-1891) who lacked depth and whose prose is often flaccid, is remembered for two reasons. He dealt with the common people by their hearth and in so dealing, tried to be faithful and detached. Indranath Banerjee, who wrote excellent satires, is less caustic than Jogendranath Basu (1854-1905) with his almost malicious and coarse raillery. Completely refreshing in Trailkyanath Mukherjee (1851-1909) who gloats on the grotesque and has a penchant for fantasy. His strange imagination thrived on satires.

Kirtibilas (1852) by Jogeshchandra Gupta was probably the first tragedy written in Bengali. A number of plays,—Bhadrarjun (1852) by Taracharan Sikdar, Kulinkulasarbaswa (1854) by Ramnarayan Tarkaratna, Bidhababibaha natak (1856) by U.C. Mitra, Sabitri-Satyaban (1858) and Malati-Madhav (1959) by Kaliprasanna Sinha appeared after that. But it was Michael Madhusudan again who handled the form with some amount of success. He wrote the first stageworthy mythological play, Sharmishtha (1869), the first tragedy on a historical theme, Krishnakumari (1860) and two exquisite farces. Dinabandhu Mitra, a contemporary of Madhusudan, made his first début with Nildarpan (1860) which, because of the contemporaneity of the theme became very popular. It dealt with the atrocities of the indigo planters in the countryside of Bengal.

Dinabandhu wrote other plays, three farces among them, which became popular on the stage. He was intensely humane but he lacked both restraint and refinement. More urbane was Girishchandra Ghose (1844-1911) who wrote and produced a number of plays, most of them in free verse. When he employs prose as he does in his Prafulla (1889) it acquires a polish without losing its homeliness. It is this prose which, much later, Saratchandra used in his novels. Another playwright worth mentioning was Amritlal Basu (1853-1829). He wrote satirical comedies. He was adroit in handling plots and everything he wrote had the sparkle of his intelligence.

Apart from the novels and dramas, the new prose slowly unfolded in many directions in multifarious other genres. Kaliprasanna Sinha sought and achieved for it a dignity and clarity in his painstaking translation of the Mahabharata. Completely different is his colloquialism with all its pungency and humour, its crudities and obscenities, that he employs in his Hutompenchar naksha. Bankim, apart from his novels, wrote a history of Bengal, an introductory essay on the Samkhya philosophy, a treatise on Srikrishna, an essay on egalitarianism and a number of satirical essays ridiculing sham, swashbuckling and hypocrisy, a number of polemics and crowning them all, his inimitable Kamalakanter daptar. For each he forged a distinct style which completely suited the subject.

LITERATURE-BENGALI

In his lighter essays, where he lashes out at the servility, pretentiousness and affectations of his countrymen, he has a cutting edge but he sheathes it in a genial humour. He is less tolerant and far more scathing when he banters at the all-knowing Englishman commenting on the way of life of the Indians. In his more placid mood Bankim can command a directness and clarity which Bengali prose had hardly known before him. Apart from Bankim there appeared a host of other writers in the late nineteenth century who wrote history, biography, essay on social problems and politics, on patriotism and diverse other subjects. Each had his own style. Of these the most successful were Jogeshchandra Vidyabhushan, who wrote the biographies of Mazzini and Garibaldi and the once popular Birpuja (Hero-worship); Ramdas Sen, who wrote mainly histories; Chandrashekhar Mukherjee, who wrote a prose surcharged with emotion; Aksaychandra Sarkar, whose prose was succulent and yet had a crystal clarity; Thakurdas Mukherjee, who could write lightheartedly a merry hopping prose when he would; Kaliprasanna Ghose, whose sonorous prose was all but affected and involved; and finally, Dwijendranath Tagore, Bhudeb Mukherjee and Haraprasad Sastri, the unaffected simplicity, the neatness and the clarity of whose prose came to be considered at the end the standard style. Besides these there were two other major essayists who wrote mainly for edification. They were Kesabchandra Sen and Swami Vivekananda. Swami Vivekananda achieved a clarity and directness which have hardly ever been surpassed. At times when he chooses (as in his account of the killing of a shark during a voyage) he can be light-hearted and humorous to the point of hilarity. But oftener he writes an intense vibrant prose, taut and surcharged with sincere feelings.

With the beginning of the new century the genius of Rabindranath Tagore fully burgeoned enriching almost every branch of literature. During the first four decades of the century he dominates the scene. Every other writer either drew inspiration from him or wrote in reaction to him. But no one could be fully free from his influence. There were several reasons for this. In the first place, he was a versatile genius who could write with ease in almost every genre and excel. The alchemy of his genius transformed Bengali poetry investing it with all the variety and richness it could achieve; transformed Bengali prose into a many-faceted pliable medium capable of expressing every shade and type of meaning. After him to write was, to some extent, to write like him. Secondly, Rabindranath Tagore did not depart or break away from the Bengali literary tradition but subtly integrated into it all the wholesome ideas that the East and West had accumulated through the ages. He had a broad and catholic mind which could imbibe and assimilate even the most exotic. Third is the good sense that pervades through his works. He was, at bottom, a rationalist. Fourthly, he never lived in the proverbial ivory tower but was intensely aware of the forces working around him. He lived at a time when great changes were taking place in every direction: many old systems were disintegrating with new systems emerging to take their place. He lived in those turbulent times of upheavals and always played his part whenever called upon, never losing sight of and never failing to uphold the ultimate good, the honour, the dignity and the greatness of the human spirit.

The most famous work of Tagore is his Gitanjali which won him in 1913 the Nobel Prize. Besides this exquisite collection of lyrics, he wrote numerous other books of poems. They are amazing in their variety: this variety is not just the variety of form, but of mood, tone, theme and texture. As varied as his poems are his novels, in which he never repeats a theme or a form. Gora, for instance, stands apart as a saga of the new awakening in the nineteenth century, its conflicts and contradictions and its ambivalence—all resolving in the end in the one knowledge of the innate unity of all cultures. In Ghare baire he subtly analyses a few aspects of the freedom movement and their meanings within the framework of a close-knit story of complex human passions. In Jogajog he explores the depth of the crisis resulting from the disintegration of the old feudal values and the upward striving of the new order based on an emerging economy. His Shesher kabita, completely different and apparently a story of unfulfilled love told in an incredibly elegant prose, delves deep into the mind and focusses on man's passion for the unsullied beauty that manifests in many forms but chiefly in the futile striving of two souls which we call love. Love for Tagore is never a consummation; it is always an unfulfilled longing.

The importance of his numerous short stories lies in their being the first in this literature, in their formal perfection, in the sympathy, understanding and perception with which they treat of common men and women and children, and finally, in their humour and pathos. In drama, Tagore was a bold innovator. After a few successful exercises in the accepted form, he dispensed with it altogether. For each of his later plays he invented a new form—perfectly suited to the ideas he wanted to dramatize. He imbued them with the qualities of a song, the rhythm of a dance, and the suggestiveness of a metaphor. And yet they were truly drama which could keep an audience enthralled.

It is common practice in literary history to list the poets who wrote in these early decades under two groups: those who either imitated Rabindranath or were quite manifestly influenced by his style and ideas and those who had their individual mark in their works. In the first group the most important names are those of Baledranath Tagore, Priyambada Devi, Karunanidhan Banerjee, Kumudranjan Mullick and Kaildas Ray. Rajanikanta Sen and Atulprasad Sen, who are popular even today for their wonderful lyrics, were also influenced by Tagore but there is a depth in their devotion and feelings which lends their works their abiding value. D.L. Ray, who is more famous for his plays and for his lampoons against Tagore, wrote a number of exquisite lyrics and some of our best humorous verses. Jatindramohan Bagchi is still read for his down to earth realism, his humaneness, and the depth of his feelings. Satyendranath Datta (1882-1922), who lived only forty years, was a perfect artist, who experimented with diverse metrical forms and took them to perfection. His most important works, Benu o bina (1906), Kuhu o keka (1912) and Abhra o abir (1916) show the brilliance of his intellect as well as the depth of his emotions. More famous and popular was Kazi Nazrul Islam, who became famous overnight with his 'Bidrohi'. He is fondly called the rebel poet, particularly for his patriotic poems and for those where he preaches destruction of the old world with its superstitious beliefs and meanness. But his fame will endure, not for these loud poems but for some of the finest lyrics and humorous verses he wrote. Jatindranath Sengupta (1887-1954) wrote differently: as the names of his books suggest (Marichika and Marumaya, for instance, mean 'the mirage' and 'the delusion of the desert' respectively), he looked upon beauty, love and happiness as delusion and his poems are somewhat iconclastic assailing the sustaining beliefs and dreams which grow centering round nature, women, beauty and love.

Besides Rabindranath, there were only two other playwrights writing about this time who deserve mention. D.L. Ray wrote many historical and mythological plays which became popular on the stage. Of them the most famous were Chandragupta, Sirajudaulla and Shahjahan. D.L. Ray was no innovator and the influence of Shakespeare is too manifest in his works. Kshirodprasad Vidyabinod's Kinnari, Alamgir and Pratapaditya are still popular.

The new drama of the 40's is essentially experimental in character. Though Mammatha Roy wrote conventional plays, his followers adopted new forms and style. The important among these playwrights were Sachin Sengupta, Bidhayak Bhattacharya, Bijan Bhattacharya and Banaphul. Among the modern experimentalists, Badal Sarkar deserves special mention. He has been able to bring poetry back to the theatre.

Two novelists who wrote during these early decades often surpassed Tagore in popular appeal. Prabhat Mukherjee (1873-1932) wrote fourteen novels,—his locale rural Bengal—which told simple sentimental stories about simple folks. He handles plots without much skill but can tell a story with a go. More skilfully done are his short stories which are fine artistic pieces with occasional insight and frequently permeated with a quaint humour. Saratchandra Chatterjee was a far greater novelist. He was intensely humane, possessed a perspicacity, had a probing and audacious mind and could with ease and singular skill spin out a gripping tale. He was a sensitive man of varied experiences and his novels, first of all, has the stamp of the mind thus broadened and enriched. He was also, at bottom, a dreamer. Social injustice and inequality deeply distressed him and so did a hundred superstitions, old-world beliefs, illiteracy, pretensions, complacency, hypocrisy and pettiness which held back social progress. He was a votary of all sorts of freedom—particularly the freedom from dogma, the freedom to think and the freedom to express. Thus it happened that he shocked contemporary sensibility as much as he appealed to it. But above all these qualities was his singular story-telling art. He could with equal skill and understanding write an enchanting romance of love (Parinita or Datta), a winning story, with an added grace, of motherly love ('Bindur chhele', 'Ramer sumati', 'Mejidi') or of connubial relation ('Darpachurna'). Equally engaging are his polemics on dogmas and false values. His Srikanta, Denapaona, Bardidi, Charitrahin, Grihadaha and Shesh-prashna are a daring attack on conventional morality; but they are also engaging tales laying bare the hearts of men and women in both their placid and turbulent moods.

Besides these two there were a number of other popular novelists the most widely read of whom were Manilal Ganguli, Charu Banerjee, Rakhal Das Banerjee, Hemendrakumar Ray and Nirupama Devi.

During the later half of the 20's and the first half of the 30's most of the young writers more or less clustered round three periodicals: Sabujpatra of Pramatha Choudhuri, Bharati of Manilal Ganguli and Kallol of Dineshranjan Das. The writers of the Bharati group were no innovators: they wrote chiefly romances and sentimental love stories. Pramatha Choudhuri, a connoisseur of art and literature, was a sensitive literary critic. He was a humorist above everything else and wrote in elegant prose numerous essays which sparkle with wit.

The Kallol writers appeared on the scene with promise and also with a lot of fury but really achieved little. There were indeed some powerful writers attached to this group—Premendra Mitra, Shailjananda Mukherjee, Buddhadev Bose and Achintyakumar Sengupta were the most prominent—but their achievements do not come to much in comparison with the fictional works of Bibhutibhusan Banerjee, Manik Banerjee and Tarashankar Banerjee. Bibhutibhusan is best known for his Pather panchali but he wrote other novels of no less merit. He has a deep understanding of the human situations he deals with, and a profound sympathy verging on a brooding sadness and yet he can be a completely detached artist. He does not handle the fictional genre as a craft but there is a workmanship and a sense of inevitability in his novel which we can only find in life itself. He is intensely aware of the social realities and when he chooses (as in Ichhamati) he can fit his tale to the changing social scene with as much poignancy and clarity as Tarashankar. Some of his best known works, besides his short stories and that excellent story of adventure, Chander deshe, are Drishtipradip, Aranyak, Debajan and Adarsha Hindu Hotel.

What strike one most in reading the novels of Tarashankar are his intensity, his powerful imagination verging sometime on the bizarre and the grotesque, his insight into the mind of men and women, and his clear perception of the issues involved in the disintegration of the old order and the emergence of the new. He can at will conceive a well-knit plot with rich, sensuous texture but still his plots are often loosely knit, full of deviations and without a central thrust. He can create at will men and women of flesh and blood, alive and real, but still his characters are at times driven by unreal passions—devalitized creatures inhabiting a grotesque, bizarre world. Some of his best known books are Raikamal, Nilkantha, Dhatridebata, Kalindi, Ganadebata, Panchagram, Hansulibanker upakatha, Arogya niketan and Manwantar.

Manik Banerjee (1910-1956) was drawn to Marxism. He had a deep-seated yearning for beauty. This probably accounts for the frequent bitterness in his writings as he relentlessly explores the darker sides of life that shocks a placid sensibility. He had a keen intellect that lent a glitter to everything he wrote but it is the glitter of a precious balckstone. He dealt mainly with the people of the lower rung: he had a piercing insight into their mind and with a persisting skill and detachment he brought to surface the interactions of all that is elemental in men and women. His best novels are Dibaratrir kabya, Padmanadir majhi and Putulanacher itikatha.

These three last mentioned were probably the last great Bengali novelists of that generation. Satinath Bhaduri with his wonderful Dhonraicharitamanas or Jagari was one of the most powerful novelists after them. During the last three or four decades there have been a host of other novelists: Gopal Haldar, Manoj Basu, Narendranath Mitra, Buddhadev Bose, Subodh Ghose, Achintyakumar Sengupta, Banaphul, Prabodhkumar Sanyal, Bibhutibhushan Mukherjee, Ashapura Devi, Bimal Mitra, Samaresh Basu, Shankar, Atin Banerjee, Ramapada Choudhuri, Bimal Kar, Sunil Ganguli, Debesh Ray, Ashim Ray, Mati Nandi, Sandipan Chatterjee, Kamalkumar Majumdar, Debi Khan, Sanjib Chatterjee, Shirshendu Mukherjee and Samaresh Majumdar—to name only a few. Some writers occasionally reach the height, particularly Sunil Ganguli, Atin Banerjee, Samaresh Basu, Ashim Ray, Banaphul, Annadashankar Ray and Kamalkumar Majumdar, but in few of their works did novel attain the depth and range of vision which characterized the works of the earlier masters.

Almost all these writers, however, have written excellent short stories some of which will endure the test of time. It will be pertinent to mention here the names of Jagadischandra Gupta and Rajshekhar Basu (Parashuram). Rajshekhar wrote some of the most delightful stories in Bengali.

Bengali poetry started to take a new turn during the third decade of this century. The change could be seen in the last few poetical works of Tagore himself where he seemed to stand face to face with life in its nakedness, himself unarmed but with full human dignity. The change was more explicit and almost loudly articulated in the works of Buddhadev Bose, Ajit Datta, Premendra Mitra, Bishnu Dey, Jibananada Das, Samar Sen, Amiya Chakravarti, Manish Ghatak, Manindra Ray, Subhas Mukherjee and Sukanta Bhattacharya. By the forties and during the fifties, Bengali poetry had taken a new turn. It acquired terseness and became more sensuous and evocative. There was in it a brooding sadness and an anger: sometimes a bitterness arising out of intense suffering. There were new experiments in technique which took it to new untrodden roads but there is always the feeling that it was still on a quest. Till this date in the works of a host of powerful poets, in the works of Samkha Ghose, Alakranjan Dasgupta, Birendra Chatterjee, Arun Mitra, Sunil Ganguli, Nirendranath Chakravarti, Shakti Chatterjee, Nabanita Debsen, Ketaki Kushari Dyson, Mani Bhattacharya and Kabita Sinha the quest still continues.

In other regions: With the beginning of the British rule in India Bengalis were required to move to various parts of the country where many of them eventually got settled. Some of them produced in their new environment literature in Bengali which has contributed to the development of Bengali literature produced in Bengal. This literature is different from the one produced by writers living temporarily outside their native environment.

In Assam and in the other north-eastern states which once had been parts of Assam, Bengali has long been an important language spoken by a large number of people. In fact, there are vast tracts where the Bengalis constitute the major linguistic group. In the whole valley of the Barak, for instance, Bengali is the official language along with English. It appears from records that the Dimasa Kacharis used this language as early as the sixteenth century. Their kings were great patrons of Bengali language and literature. Maharaja Suradarpa Narayan wrote many poems in Bengali, including Shaktapadavali. When the Kachari kings framed the legal codes they put them down in Bengali, the work being one of the early specimes of prose that have come down to us in Bengali. Bhubaneshwar Bachaspati, the court poet of Maharaja Suradarpa Narayan, translated Naradi rasamrita into Bengali in 1730 at the behest of Rajamata Chandrababha herself. Maharaja Krishnachandra patronized Bengali literature and wrote Gitali, meaning a collection of lyrics. Chandramohan Burman who flourished in the early years of the nineteenth century was a poet of remarkable talent. Three of his poems have so far been discovered. The first deals with the story of Bhuvaneshwar Bachaspati while the others deal with the battle Krishnachandra fought and the pilgrimage he made to Kashi. Maharaja Krishnachandra and Maharaja Govindachandra, the last two kings of the Dimasa Kachari dynasty, wrote devotional songs in Bengali which are still sung by the people of the region.

While Bengali thrived in the region of Cachar under the patronage of the Dimasa kings, it was also studied elsewhere in the state of Assam. Many Manipuri writers, for instance, studied Bengali along with Sanskrit and some of them even wrote verses in Bengali. This was possibly due to the impact of Gaudiya Vaishnavism among the Manipuris.

Of the Bengali writers writing in Assam, Ramkumar Nandy was probably one of the earliest. He wrote as many as eleven operas which included Data Karna, Nimaisanyas, Sitar banabas and Raslila. Besides, he wrote many devotional songs, humorous verses and a novel. Pandit Bhuvanmohan Vidyarnava edited the region's first periodical, Surma. His successor, Chandrakumar Bhattacharya, was both a critic and a poet.

In Shillong, which is now the capital of Meghalaya, a Sahitya Sabha was founded in 1875. The Sahitya sevak, its mouthpiece, first published in 1895, amassed around it a number of reputed writers, viz., Achyutcharan Chaudhury, Abhayshankar Guha, Ambikacharan Gupta, Charuchandra Banerjee, Padmanath Bhattacharya, Hemchandra Das, Kshirodechandra Deb, Benodebehari Chakravarti, Satyabhushan Chaudhury, Saradacharan Chakravarti and Hirendranath Datta. Another scholar of very great distinction was Rajmohan Nath, one of the pioneers in the field of historical and sociological research in Assam.

The north-eastern region has indeed produced many creative writers of distinction, who later lived outside the State. The names of Gurusaday Dutta, Bipinchandra Pal, Ramnath Biswas and Syed Muztaba Ali, of course, come first. Of the rest mention should be made of Nalinikumar Bhadra, Jagadish Bhattacharya, Ashokebijay Raha, Hemanga Biswas, Manabendra Banerjee, Ramendra Deshmukhya, Bhudeb Chaudhury, Amitabha Chaudhury, Amaresh Datta, etc. Among the other writers of repute are: Jatindramohan Bhattacharya, Rasamay Das, Sudhir Sen, Ranendranath Deb, Debendrakumar Pal Chowdhury, Harendrakumar Dey Chowdhury, Ashwinikumar Sharma, Nagendrachandra Shyam and Dwaresh Sharma.

In more recent times there have been attempts to write novels but the works are stale. Ganesh Dey, Arijit Chaudhury, Mithilesh Bhattacharya, Ranabir Purkayas-tha, Prasenjit Chakravarti, Malaykanti Dey Badrujjaman Chaudhury and Abdul Khaliq Bangal have written some good short stories which deserve mention.

Shaktipada Brahmachari is now the foremost amongst the Bengali poets of Assam. Amongst the youngsters, Ranajit Das is the most promising. Besides, Karunaranjan Bhattacharya, Karunasindhu Dey, Brajendrakumar Sinha, Manojit Das, Anurupa Biswas, Bijit Bhattacharya, Janmajit Ray, Bijaykumar Bhattacharya, Atulranjan Dey, Tridibranjan Malakar, Udayan Ghose, Shankar Chakravarti, Shantanu Ghose, Piyush Routh, Urdhendu Das, Tapadhir Bhattacharya, Birendrakumar Rakshit, Manotosh Chakravarti, Malay Dey, Bimal Choudhury, Ruchira Shyam, Dipankar Nath, Bhakta Singh, Kumar Ajit Dutta, Parthapratim Maitra and others have contributed substantially to the growth and sustenance of a powerful poetic movement in Assam. These poets, without deviating much from the basic trends of the mainstream of Bengali literary movement based in Calcutta, succeeded in capturing a strong and refreshing local flavour in their creations. They derived their inspiration from their predecessors who published interesting creative works in a journal named Balaka edited by Kaliprasanna Das, which became a nucleus of a literary movement in the 40's and 50's of this century. The prominent among these writers were: Sudhir Sen, Prajesh Roy and Mrinalkanti Das. Besides Balaka, a number of literary journals were published from time to time. Most of them were short-lived but each had its value. Some of them deserve mention; they are: Utsa (edited by Arun Bhattacharya), Diganta (edited by Amaresh Datta), Sanghat (edited by Bimal Sengupta), Udarka (edited by Tapankumar Das et al), Sahitya (edited by Bijit Bhattacharya), Purbabharati, Saptaparna, Atandra, Nandimukh, Lokayata, Samskriti, Kushiara, Anwasha, Eshana, etc. Among the anthologies published mention need be made of Ei alo haoa roudre and Uttar purbanchaler bangla kabita.

Bihar is a state which is closely linked with Bengal, geographically, religiously and culturally. Many parts of modern Bihar were actually parts of Bengal. The contribution of the Bengalis in Bihar to Bengali literature is so substantial that no history of Bengali literature can be deemed complete without giving proper weightage to it.

In the nineteenth century, Baladev Palit (1835-1900) earned fame as a poet. An account of his life and works can be found in Sahitya sadhak charitmala (Bangiya Sahitya Parishad, Calcutta). Nibaranchandra Mukherjee's (Bhagalpur) discourse entitled Brahma tatva has an added attraction in his reminiscences appended to the end of the book. Prakashchandra Roy, father of late B.C. Roy, wrote his father's biography Aghar prakash. Two of the most prominent essayists and critics of the time were Chandrashekhar Basu and Thakurdas Mukherjee. Thakurdas founded the Pakshik samalochak and may be regarded as a pioneer in the field of Bengali journalism in Bihar. In his later days, he published one more literary journal named Malancha. Malancha became a forum of the young writers of both Bengal and Bihar. Jogendranath Basu, a headmaster at Deoghar, wrote Prithviraj and Shivaji, remarkable for their poetic richness. His student, Sakham Ganesh Deuskar, is remembered for his Desher katha. Nagendranath Gupta wrote about fifteen books which include Swapan sangit (poem), Tamaswini (novel), Amar Singha (historical novel), Banglar krishi (essays on agriculture in Bengal), etc. But he became more famous by editing Vidyapati Thakurer padabali.

Rasiklal Roy did a pioneer's work in the field of comparative Indian literature. But unfortunately his works have not been compiled. Bimanbihari Majumdar, noted for his erudition, was a historian and an authority on the Vaishnava literature of Bengal. Bimanbihari wrote Shorash shatabdir padabali sahitya and edited Vidyapati padabali (with Khagendranath Mitra), Chandidaser padabali, Govinda Das o tanhar jug, Jnanadas o tanhar jug and Kshanada git chintamani. Jadugopal Mukherjee, an eminent fighter for Indian freedom, wrote his autobiography which is an important document of our political history. Pramathanath Basu, an eminent geologist, is chiefly remembered for his collection of essays entitled Bibidha prabandha. He composed several poems also. Saratchandra Roy, an anthropologist, was famous for his journal, Man in India, but he also wrote noteworthy essays in Prabasi, Sahitya parishad patrika and in other journals. Krishnabihari Gupta's Gitanjalir bhabdhara and Sibendranath Bhattacharya's Vedanta darshan earned distinctive fame. Amalendu Gupta translated Kalidasa's Raghuvamsha and Ritusamhar in Bengali. Jananendramohan Dutta translated Sikh Guru Arjun's Sikhmoni from Gurumukhi. The most important contributions to creative literature, however, came from three great novelists: Balaichand Mukherjee (Banaphul), Bibhutibhusan Mukherjee and Satinath Bhaduri. A prolific writer, Banaphul wrote some of the best novels of our time and excelled in the genre of short story. He was also a good poet. Bibhutibhusan wrote some of our most delightful stories as well as novels, while Satinath Bhaduri's novels will endure for his insight and understanding of the form.

Other familiar and important names connected with Bihar are those of Manik Bhattacharya, Nabendu Ghosh, Dibyendu Palit, Jashodanandan Bhattacharya, Subodh Chakravarti, Gourchandra Chakravarti, Rangin Haider, Aruna Haider, Enakshi Chatterjee, Krishna Banerjee, Subhas Ghosh (known as Chandragupta Maurya), etc. who are widely popular as writers. Special mention should be made of Jibanmay Dutta of Patna, who is a poet of some distinction. Jayashri tomake is a collection of his excellent poems. His Saptadwipa is a quarterly journal of poetry which has continued to exist for the last eighteen years. Through its instrumentality he has brought together a group of poets whose poems appeared in two collections: Ferry ghat sammilita prarthana and Nirjane nijaswa sanglap. There were many journals in Bengali published from Bihar from time to time though they were short-lived. Some of these were: Prabhati (Patna, 1937), Basar (Patna, 1956), Samay (Patna 1959), Sanchita (Patna, 1969), Prabaha (Dhanbad, 1967), Sourabh (Samastipur 1980), Srilekha (Dhanbad, 1960): still continuing, Shashwata bani (Muzaffarpur, 1981) and Lahari (Katihar, 1977).

Uttar Pradesh as it is known today, has its links with Bengal from time immemorial. Kashi (Varanasi) which has always fascinated the Bengalis has had an impact on the Bengali mind. Bengalis like Kulluk Bhatta, Udayanacharya and others in different ages enriched Varanasi with their scholarship. It was only in the nineteenth century that literature in Bengali began to be produced, particularly when Raja Rammohun Roy came to live in Varanasi. Uttar Pradesh has given Debendranath Sen and Atulprasad Sen, two immortal poets in Bengali. Phanibhusan Tarkabagish (Varanasi) wrote Naya darshaner itihās in three volumes. Pramathnath Tarkabhushan's (Varanasi) Banglar Vaishnav darshan is a remarkable book on Vaishnava literature. Mahamohapadhyay Pandit Gopinath Kaviraj (Varanasi) also wrote a few books in Bengali. Of them mention must be made of Shri Krishna prasanga and Sadhu darshan o sat prasanga. Rajendranath Vidyabhushan edited many works of Kalidasa in Bengali. They were published by Basumati Sahitya Mandir, Calcutta. At present Paritosh Das (Sahajiya Vaishnav dharma o sahitya, Chaitanyottar sahajiya Bangla charkhani punthi), Sukdev Singha (Shri Rup o padavali sahitya), Satyanarayan Das (Banga darshan o Bangalir manan) and Amarnath Ganguly (Bangla sahitye atiprakrit) are doing valuable work in Bengali.

Kedarnath Banerjee, the famous humorist, spent the last days of his life in Varanasi. He wrote many of his humorous writings of which 'Kashir jatkinchit' may be mentioned. Manilal Banerjee also lived here in the later phase of his life when he wrote several of his novels. Under the inspiration of Atulprasad Sen of Lucknow, Suresh Chakravarti published a monthly journal named Uttara. Before the publication of Uttara he had started Prabas jyoti, which was short-lived.

Allahabad is another centre of Bengali culture and literature. Indian Press at Allahabad has contributed a great deal towards the development of Bengali language and literature. It was founded by Shrischandra Basu. Their first publication was Charitra gathan. It is worth mentioning that several books of Rabindranath were first published by this Indian Press. Asit Halder's translation of Meghadutam in Bengali with illustrations was one of its proud publications. It published Jananendramohan Das's Banger bahire Bangali in two volumes, Bangla bhashar abhidan in two volumes and many other Bengali books. Prabasi, the most famous literary journal of the time, was printed at the Indian Press. Ramananda Chatterjee created an avenue for the Bengalis living in other states to publish their literary works in Bengali through this journal, Prabasi. Ultimately Prabasi became a centre of the literary activities throughout the country. Of course, in later years, when Ramananda returned to Calcutta, Prabasi was shifted to Calcutta along with his Modern Review.

Lucknow, the capital city of Uttar Pradesh, has its place in the history of Bengali literature because many eminent writers and poets like Atulprasad Sen, Radhakamal Mukherjee (Adhunik Bangla sahitya), Durjhatiprasad Mukherjee (Amara o tanhara, Baktabya, Antwashila), Leela Vidyanta (Rabindra sahitye nari), Manasi Bhattacharya (Atul Prasad, Green room), Benoyendra Dasgupta (Atul Prasad) lived there for a long time. Chandrashekhar Sen, the eminent barrister, who travelled in many parts of the world, published his experiences under the title Bhu pradakshin (1901) from Lucknow. He had published also a Bengali newspaper named Sahas from Allahabad before he settled in Lucknow.

Vrindavan is loved by every Bengali because Mahaprabhu Shri Chaitanya added a new significance to it. Most of the works of the Goswamins of Vrindavan were in Sanskrit no doubt, but a few of them wrote also in Bengali. Raghunath Das composed a few Bengali padas apart from his works in Sanskrit. Krishnadas Kabiraj depicted the last phase of the life of Shri Chaitanya in detail in his biography of Shri Chaitanya entitled Chaitanya charitamrita, which is regarded as the most important work on Gaudiya Vaishnavism founded by the Mahaprabhu. In later years, Bishwanath Chakravarti (whose pen-name was Hariballabh) compiled Vaishnava religious songs entitled Kshanada git chintamani, which is the first anthology of Bengali Vaishnava songs.

In Agra, Gobindachandra Roy, who had migrated from Barisal in the first half of the 19th century earned poetic fame with his Jamuna lahari and Bharat bilap. Nanil Banerjee of Agra wrote Amrit pulin (a novel), Kanwamuni and Prospero. His pen-name was Paribrajak. Durgadas Banerjee of the days of the Sepoy Mutiny will be remembered for his autobiography entitled Amar jibancharit or Bidrohey Bangali, which was published in Janmabhumi at the instance of Jogendrachandra Basu. Durgadas settled in Muzaffarnagar near Meerut.

In Rajasthan, Chandranath Basu, an eminent Bengali literary critic of the later 19th century, was the Principal of Maharaja College for a short time. Meghanath, who was a lecturer in physics in that college, wrote Arya gatha in Bengali besides his many works in Hindi.

Since the days of the Mahabharata, the link between the region of Delhi and Bengal has been strong. Delhi is a new cosmopolitan city. Its culture is somewhat different from that of the other states or cities. In spite of its distinct culture it has helped Bengali writers to acquire a new dimension in their writing. Possibly the most famous of these writers is Jajabar (Benoy Mukherjee) who wrote a number of books. Drishtipat and Janantik, two of his books are remarkable for their freshness. The prose, rhythmic and sonorous, has a sophistication not seen elsewhere. Other notable figures are Chanakya Sen (Bhabani Sengupta), Darbesh (Shibdas Banerjee) and Brajamadhav Bhattacharya. Chanakya Sen's works have some distinction in that he introduces recent political activities as the subject of his novels. Darbesh uses international events as the background of his novels. He asserts the oneness of man and of the world. Critics like E.M. Forster and Herbert Read spoke highly of his works, but the problem is, Darbesh contributes rarely. Brajamadhav has written eight novels, six travelogues, five books of poems and a number of other books on different subjects. Nimai Bhattacharya lived in Delhi as a journalist. He is a prolific writer of popular novels.

In the field of translation from other languages, Indranath Choudhury has enriched Bengali literature with his translation of Dr. Nagendra's Rasa siddhanta from Hindi. Sisirkumar Das translated two dramas from original Greek into Bengali. He has compiled and edited some sonnets under the title Saptadashi. Loknath Bhattacharya has translated Moliere's dramas from French and wrote a few book of poems, novels and short stories. Devleen Banerjee Kejriwal's Bengali translation of Vishnu Prabhakar's Awara masiha from Hindi may also be mentioned.

In 1926 Delhi saw its first Bengali journal, Ballari. After that, Rajpath (1940), Indraprastha (1960), Rajdhani, Amra, Purbachaler katha, Nagare prantare, Natyakal and many other literary and news journals have appeared from time to time but most of these have been short-lived. Of those which have survived, mention may be made of Digangan (quarterly), Ajanta (annual), Udichi (annual) and Prangshu (quarterly).

In poetry, Jyotirindra Maitra is the most prominent name. Among the other poets, mention must be made of Umanath Bhattacharya, Phani Basu, Batakrisna Dey, Seababrata Chaudhury and Himadri Dutta.

Orissa was the centre of the religious movement during the time of Shri Chaitanya. It claims special mention that many Oriya poets wrote their poems in Bengali. Of them Ramananda, Jagannath Das and Ananta Das of the sixteenth century, Dwija Loknath, Dwarika Das, Madhav Das, Madhav Rath, Jadunandan Das, Purusottam Das, Kavi Prasad and Kavi Karna of the seventeenth century, Vringabar Roy, Brajabandhu Sinha, Raghuram Das, Gokul Roy, Pindika Shri Chandan, Ramchandra Dev, Dhananjay Bhanja, Shyamsundar Bhanja and Shyambandhu Pattanaik of the eighteenth century, Dwija Gaura Charan, Kavi Chandra, Jagannath and Natabar Das of the nineteenth century may be mentioned. In the mediaeval Bengali literature, Dwija Ramain was a noted poet for his Anil purana in which Jaipur is treated as the center of kavya. Most probably he was a poet of that region. This may be true also of Champati Pati or Bhupati Champati, the noted composer of Vaishnava padas, whose writings may have been mixed up with those of Vidyapati.

A new era began with the British rule. In 1812 Zamindar Bishwambhar Pani of Senhati in the district of Hughly came to live in Puri. He translated Utkal khanda in Bengali with the title Jagannathamangal. He also translated some works of Bishwanath Chakravarti from Sanskrit. His other works are Vrindavanapratyupaya, Prem samput, Bhakta ratnamala and Kandarpa koutumudi. By the middle of the nineteenth century, Bipinbehari Sarkar settled in Cuttack where he wrote Kumarikumar. He was a friend of Dinabandhu Mitra. Kamakshya Chatterjee was the Deputy Collector of Cuttack in 1864. He wrote his elder brother's biography entitled Premchandra Tarkabagish mahashayer jiban charita o kabitabali. Atma chintan and Achar Chintan are two of his other works. Rajendralal Mitra is remembered by the people of Orissa and Bengal for his valuable contribution to Bengali and English. Hemchandra Sinha of Raipur of the district of Birbhum wrote several books, some of which were Prem, Ami, Hriday o maner bhasa and Jiban. Annadashankar Roy, one of the most renowned writers of our time, also comes from Cuttack.

Satyendranath Tagore worked in Bombay and Gujarat for more than twenty years. His 'Bombai chitra', 'Bauddha dharma' and other articles were published in Bharati. He wrote a small treatise on Raja Rammohun Roy. In the beginning of this century, Brajendranath Seal served the Mysore University as its Vice-Chancellor. His contribution to Bengali literature is well-known. Sri Aurobindo lived in Baroda for twelve years and later in Pondicherry. Rameshchandra Dutta's early days were spent in Orissa. Both of them enriched Bengali literature in many ways. Mention must be made of Nishikanta, Naliniranjan Gupta and Nalinikanta Sarkar, all disciples of Aurobindo, who wrote in Bengali. Sailajananda Mukherjee, Saradindu Banerjee, Nabendu Ghosh and others who joined the film industry in Bombay have never failed to contribute to Bengali literature. Bombay saw its first Bengali literary journal in Nibedita in the thirties. In recent years Bombai bichitra has become a forum for the Bengali writers living in Bombay.

LITERATURE (Dogri). Dogri has had a long tradition of oral literature, a fairly long period of intermittent writing mingling with living folk oral tradition, and a more or less continuous span of written literature.

Oral folk literature in Dogri cannot be fixed in any time frame; it has always been there as an integral part of Dogra life, providing the community a means of self-expression and enshrining its experience, its values, beliefs, traditions and mythology. Its forms are many and its contents are rich and varied. There are innumerable love songs like wild flowers on the hillside, and songs for every occasion in a person's life—'Bihais' sung on the occasion of the birth of an infant, 'Loris' sung to put a baby to sleep, 'Thals and Naratte' sung by small girls during 'navarattras', 'Gujaris' and 'Aratis' and 'Bisanpatas' in praise of gods and goddesses, festival songs and 'Baranmah' celebrating the seasons, 'Swadis' and 'Laddis' sung while working, dance songs and 'Suhags' and 'Ghoris' and 'Sithanis' and 'Chhandas' to go with marriage, and 'Lohanis' and 'Pallas' sung on the occasion of death. Then there are three types of ballads: 'Bhetas', prayers to and praises of gods and goddesses sung at places of pilgrimage and temples, 'Karakas' narrating incidents in the lives of gods, goddesses, saints and martyrs, and 'Bars', describing in stirring lines the sacrifice, valour, and courage, and skill in battle of renowned heroes. There are idioms and proverbs and sayings and witticisms, succinct memorable pieces containing distilled experiences of life, philosophy of existence and guidelines for manners and mores of living, lighting up the nature of things and characteristics of certain castes, bringing home some points and providing a commentary on ways of life. Then there are folk tales of different types—mythological, historical and of day-to-day living—tales illustrating the play of destiny, didactic tales, tales of wit and humour pinpointing social inequalities, superstitions and tottering old values and practices, tales of adventure, parables with birds and animals as characters, tales dealing with family feuds, bickerings and quarrels, and tales of the absurd. The language of this oral literature is full of lexical richness and syntactical variety—a delectable feast for one who knows the language.

The period of intermittent writing in Dogri partly in the original script of the language called 'Takari' and partly in 'Devangari', covers a period of about 775 years. This writing is found in rock, fountain and temple inscriptions, copper plate inscriptions, rhapsodies in praise of rajas and their genealogical tables, title deeds, 'sanads' agreements, correspondence and some Christian missionary literature. The earliest specimen of Dogri writing is to be found in the Salhi Stone inscription on the Seehu Nala in Himachal Pradesh dated 1170. Notable inscriptions in Dogri are those of Raja Bhota Varman's four plates dated 1400, inscriptions at the temple of Durga Bhagwati at Mahanpur dated 1496, renovated Lakshminarayan temple of Chamba dated 1582, and the platform inscription on the outskirts of Chamba town dated 1660. Copper plates of Chamba Rajas issued between 1500 and 1700 contain many Dogri passages. Rhapsodies of Manakchand (1565) and Gambhir Rai (1650) in praise of Raja Rupchand of Kangra and Raja Jagat Singh of Nurpur respectively are in the popular style of 'Bars'. Examples of chronicles of

Rajas are Banswara (historical record of Rajas of Kalhur printed in Bilaspur in 1882) and Rajavali, a translation of a Persian work of history done at the court of Raja Dhyani Singh of Kotla around 1811-1813. A few agreements, title deeds and letters written between Dogra Rajas and preserved in the Chamba museum, are of the 2nd half of the 18th and early part of the 19th century (1782 to 1827). Some Dogri letters written by private individuals during the later half of the 19th century are also available. Dogri translation of the New Testament was published by the missionaries of Serampore in 1825 and a small amount of Christian missionary literature in Chameali (a dialect of Dogri) was printed at Ludhiana around 1900.

The extant specimens of Dogri creative writing, mainly verse, can at the moment be traced back to the second half of the 18th century in the works of poet Dattu or Devi Ditta whose Dogri verses appear to have been a sort of side diversion from his more serious work in Brajbhasha, and of Maya Das, a devotional poet who sang of Krishna's lilas and changing seasons. Also in the tradition and style of Dattu or Devi Ditta were poets Shivaram, Trilochan and Vidyanidhi. Their work shows a curious mixture of Dogri and Brajbhasha. Another 19th century Dogri poet of some significance and renown for his scholarship in Sanskrit and Brajbhasha was Gangaram whose poem on the life of a bride in the 'kandi', forms a part of collections of old Dogri poetry. Unlike Gangaram, who was a court poet, having been patronised by the Rajas of Jammu, Kangra and Mandi, there was a people's poet, carpenter Lakkhu of the same period, who wrote 'Dogri riddles' in verse for the pleasure of his wife and an illiterate instant poet, Hakam Jatt. A translation of Lilavati, a Sanskrit treatise on Mathematics, a book on land settlement by Choudhury Kanhaiyalal, Vyavahara Gita, a book commissioned by Maharaja Ranbir Singh of Jammu, a book on army drill, a newspaper named Dogra mittar were some other publications in Dogri in the latter half of the 19th century. This activity continued during the first 40 to 45 years of this century with the publication of some Dogri verse compositions by Ramdhan, Mehta Mathradas, Ramapanna Shastri, Santram Shastri, Baba Kanshiram and Hardatta, and Dogri prose translation of the Gita by Gaurishankar in 1934 which opened up a vista of literary potentialities of Dogri in Devanagiri script and proved to be the harbinger of a renaissance and regular literary movement in Dogri literature in the mid-forties.

A continuous stream of Dogri literature in Devanagiri script with an odd publication in Persian script started flowing with the birth and activities of Dogri Sanstha, Jammu, in 1943-44 and publication of Guttalun, a collection of poems by Dinu Bhai Pant, and Pehla phull, a collection of short stories by Bhagwatprasad Sathe in 1944 and 1947 respectively. The growth has been slow but steady, rising from an average of one publication a year in 1940's to three and a half in 1950's, ten in 1960's, twelve in 1970's and 1980's. Over 400 publications of Dogri literary works cover the usual literary genres of poetry, novel and short story, plays, prose, essays, biography, and travelogue.

Dogri poetry is quite rich in content and varied in form and covers a wide thematic, emotional, experimental and tonal range. There is a large variety of songs in the tradition of and akin to folksongs, romantic, sentimental, beautiful and silly; there are ballads reminiscent of folk ballads; there are ghazals patterned on the Urdu ghazal in form but instinct with sentiment and thought and the moral tone of Dogra value system; there are poems, long and short, in rhyme and in blank verse, well chiselled pieces with a delicate balance between form and content and emotional and verbal charm, and not so well made, rather puerile and mediocre compositions, and some kavyas in verse. Of the 100 odd poets in Dogri whose poetry has appeared in print during the last 35 years or so, there are at least a dozen whose works have enduring value, prominent among them being Dinu Bhai Pant, Krishan Samailpuri, Parmanand, 'Almast', Yash Sharma, Ved Pal 'Deep', Charan Singh, Padma Sachdev, Kahari Singh 'Madhukar', Om Prakash Sharma 'Sarathi', Mohanlal Sapolia, Shivram 'Deep' Ashwini Magotra, R.L. Sharma, Ramnath Shastri, N.D. Jamwal, Shambhunath, Jitendra Udhamपुरi and Gautam 'Vyathit'.

Next to poetry, the area that has been the most productive in Dogri literature, qualitatively as well as quantitatively, is that of short story. Starting with folk-culture-rooted brief vignettes of Dogra life woven into stories by Bhagwatprasad Sathe, the pioneer of Dogri short story in the 1940's, and passing through the simple one dimensional straight-line stories of Lalita Mehta and traditional legend-based 'stories' of D.C. Prashant and moralistic reformatory stories of R.K. Abrol (1950's) and Ram Nath Shastri, the genre came to a stage of maturity in the 1960's with stories of Narendra Khajuria, Madanmohan Sharma and Ved Rahi, and has spawned very good stuff during the 1970's in the stories of competent writers like Chhatrapal, Om Goswami, Om Prakash Sharma 'Sarathi', Bandhu Sharma, Kulbhushan Kayastha, Chaman Arora, Lalit, Manoj and others who have tackled the contemporary social problems with sharp insight and impeccable expression in artistic terms.

Dogri has thrown up twenty odd novels up to 1985 of which only half a dozen, including the Sahitya Akademi award winning novels, are good enough; Shivatsa Vikal's Phull bina dali deals with the rhythms of Dogra rural life; N.D. Jamwal's Sanjhi dharati grapples with the human implications of the partition of the country; Om Prakash Sharma's Nanga rukh and Resham de keere, Kafkaesque in style and movement, are terse expositions of the contemporary social reality in cities and Deshbandhu Dogra Nutan's Quidi and Pyoke bhejo present in-depth pathological studies of Dogra rural society, and powerful indictments, social inequalities and evils and inhuman police and jail administration.

The first Dogri stage play to be written was Achhut by Vishwanath Khajuria in 1935 followed by Ramnath Shastri's Bawa Jitto written around 1950, based on a popular legend enshrining the revolt of a farmer against a local feudal chief in days of yore. This was followed in 1950's by three stage plays and one radio play with social reform as the inspiration, Namagran, Dharen de atthrun, Dehri and Barobari respectively, and the second radio play based on a mythological theme, which were not considered to be very successful attempts at play writing. To these have been added nine more stage plays, three of which, Sarpanch, Mandalik and Allhal goli vi sipahi, have themes from popular Dogra folklore skilfully woven into the contemporary context. Quite a large number of one-Act plays written so far cover a wide range of motifs and themes like social tension and inequalities, exploitation, social problems like remarriage of widows, legend, valour and so on.

Dogri prose came to its own only in the 1960's. The first book of prose essays, Triveni, which was a joint venture of Shyamlal Sharma and Shakti Sharma, appeared in 1961 only. Since then quite a few essays have been published covering a wide spectrum of subjects like essays of wit and humour, on Dogri language, art, culture, customs and traditions, Dogri literature and folklore, temple sculpture and architecture, Dogra history and painting, travelogue and reportage, and personal reminiscences. Prominent among the prose writers, who have a distinctive style of their own, are Shyamlal Sharma, Shakti Sharma, Vishvanath Khajuria, Lakshminarayan, Sansarchandra, Atmaram, Kedarnath Shastri, Vidyaratnan and Champa Sharma.

Dogri literary criticism is in a nascent stage and barely half a dozen writers have contributed to this genre with no more than half a dozen books. Similar is the case with juvenile literature with just two books of one-Act plays and one book of stories.

Translations have no doubt added some volume to Dogri literature, but the sources are limited to a certain type of works in Sanskrit, Hindi, Urdu and English. There are 8 translations from the Gita, a translation of Vinoba Bhave's Gita Pravachan and translations from the Upanishads, Hitopadesha, and the works of Bhartrihari, Bhasa, Shudraka, and Kalidasa. Rabindranath Tagore's Gitanjali,²¹ short stories, 101 poems and 3 plays and a novel, Chokhar Bali, have been translated from Hindi. Three other plays translated from Hindi again are, Dharmavir Bharati's Andhayug, Mohan Rakesh's Ashad ka ek din and Shombhu Mitra's Kanchan rang. Among the novels translated are Premchand's Godan, Vrindavanlal Varma's Mriganayani, Saratchandra Chatterji's Datta, Parinita, Shrikant and Path ke davedar, Phanishwarnath Renu's Maila anchal, Tara Shankar Bandopadhyaya's Ganadevata, Rajinder Singh Bedi's Ek chadar mailisi, Hadi Ruswa's Umrao Jan Ada and Gorki's Mother and Apprenticeship. Then there are some miscellaneous works translated from English: Mahatma Gandhi's My Experiments with Truth, Jawaharlal Nehru's Letters from A Father to His Daughter and C. Rajagopalachari's Ramayana and Mahabharata. Some short stories and Lal Ded's poems have been translated from Kashmiri. Other translations available in Dogri are Shakespeare's Macbeth and Shombhu Mitra's Kanchanjanga.

Presently the Dogri literature strikes one as a comparatively underdeveloped entity in the comity of the fast developing and developed Indian literatures; its feet firmly planted in the native soil, opening out rather slowly, shyly and tentatively, it still keeps struggling to rise from its folk traditions to reach the more sophisticated forms and patterns of thought and feeling; it is limited in volume and content and range of emotional and intellectual articulation, yet it is representative of the Dogra community and its relatively puritanical, conservative values of predominantly rural and small town life. It is newly awakened to the immense possibilities of creativity in the language.

Sh.

LITERATURE (English). Indo-English literature is a Janus-faced phenomenon comprising (1) 'Anglo-Indian literature' or writing in English by Englishmen or other Westerners (whether or not resident in India) on Indian themes, or inspired by Indian motifs or the Indian spirit; and (2) 'Indo-Anglian literature' or creative and serious writings by Indians in English. Sir William Jones and John Leyden, Robert Southey and Sir Edwin Arnold, Meadows Taylor and Flora Annie Steel, Bishop Heber and Rudyard Kipling, Max Müller and H.H. Wildon, were among the writers who gave a distinctive character to Anglo-Indian literature, and F.F. Oaten's A Sketch of Anglo-Indian Literature (1908) was a first assessment of this considerable body of writing. Kipling's Kim (1901) and E.M. Forster's A Passage to India (1924) are perhaps the finest products of this literature, while F.W. Bain's quaint and wise Oriental tales have a niche of their own.

Indo-Anglian literature (or Indian Writing in English) is one of the significant results of the western impact on India; it is also part of a phenomenon with global proliferation. Since the 16th century, the European maritime powers went out to trade and presently to colonise territories in the Indian subcontinent, and in Africa, America, Australia and New Zealand. In the last three centuries, the European settlers became the dominant race, exterminating or reducing to total subservience the indigenous populations. The situation, however, was different in Africa and India. In the wake of the traders came the soldiers and empire builders, as also the

LITERATURE-ENGLISH

Christian missionaries. In the 17th and 18th centuries, India became the battle-ground of the rival European powers. The British triumphed at last, and consolidated their position in the 19th century. For a time, the trauma of the conquest brought about a swoon of the creative impulse. Presently, however, a series of religious, social and political upheavals were to follow contributing in diverse ways to the new Indian literary renaissance.

Aside from the British soldier, administrator and trader, there were other types of Englishmen too; the evangelist, the educationist and the journalist. Schools were established by missionaries and others to impart English education (the private school at Cuddalore as early as 1717), and more and more enterprising Indians wished to master English and even to attempt self-expression in English. Actually, at the time India was exposed to the British, their language and their way of life, there were other European influences also—notably Portuguese, Dutch and French—and it was thus the Western impact as a whole (political, economic, social religious, cultural) that generally conditioned early Indian writing in English. Hicky's Bengal Gazette was launched in 1780, and Cavally Venkata Boriah's Dissertation on the Jains in English appeared in 1801.

As the British hegemony extended its tentacles over the entire subcontinent, it became clear that the education of Indians under the new dispensation was a problem to be shirked no longer. There was some vigorous throwing about of brains, and Englishmen like Macaulay and Indians like Rammohun Roy took the same line, and on 7 March 1835 the die was cast at last: the British Government was to promote "European literature and science" among the natives of India, and the funds appropriated under Education should be spent on English education alone. Even earlier, English education and Indian writing in English were current in some measure, and there were a few pioneers and trend-setters. The Hindu College had been established in Calcutta in 1817, and the Serampore (Missionary) College in 1818. Among early specimens of Tract on 'Suttee' (1818) and Precepts of Jesus (1820), Cavally Venkata Ramaswami's Biographical Sketches of the Dekkan Poets (1829) and Kashiprasad Ghose's The Dekkan Poets (1829) and Kashiprasad Ghose's The Stair and other Poems (1830). As for the precocious Henry Derozio, he was a poet and teacher of English literature, and exerted a great influence on his students in Calcutta. Even so, it was only after 1835 that Indo-Anglian literature was to acquire increasing currency and gain legitimacy from the steady implementation of the new 'English education' policy of the Government of India.

The beginnings, growth and development of this literature may be seen as broadly contemporaneous with the modern Indian literary renaissance itself, the modern phase of the rich regional literatures of India, and even the literatures of the Commonwealth countries (Australia, Canada, New Zealand, and more recently, Nigeria, Kenya, the Caribbean, and the rest). In multilingual India, like Sanskrit at one time, English, too, quickly became a link-language and presently a link-literature as well. Whatever was published in English or was translated into English gained at once a select all-India circulation, with some overflow into England and other countries. Being the outcome, after all, of a cross-fertilisation of two great cultures (Indian and Western), Indo-Anglian literature, while being distinctive enough, is not essentially different from modern Indian literature with its varied and variegated expression in a score or more of India's living and flourishing languages.

There is something of a rhythm or pattern in the history of the former British territories that have, over periods long or short, effected the passage from colonial subjection to political independence. First the trauma of conquest, the sense of hurt and shame but also the desire to imitate the rulers, learn their language and adopt their way of life; then the stirrings of dissent, the rumbling salvos of revolt, culminating at last in Independence, 'swaraj', 'uhuru'; and, finally, the striving with the complex problems of post-Independence reconstruction. In India, as in the other Commonwealth countries, parallel to the march from colonialism to freedom and after, there is discernible the movement, at the cultural level, from imitation and immaturity to conscious revolt against the alien mores, and finally creative experimentation and adult achievement.

With this historical background, we may view Indo-Anglian literature in five broad spans as under:

|-----------------|--|
| 1800-1870: | The Beginnings—the Age of the Pioneers. |
| 1870-1905: | The Renaissance in the Spirit—the Age of Religious and Literary Awakening. |
| 1905-1920: | The Era of Political Awakening—The Age of 'Bande Mataram' and 'Home Rule'. |
| 1920-1947: | The Modern 'Heroic Age'—the Age of the Gandhian Revolution. |
| 1947 and after: | False starts and Frustrations—Forward to the Future. |

It is obvious that a living and growing literature transcends all attempts at compartmentalisation. Continuity and change somehow team together, and the enveloping aura of 'personality'—that of a Tagore, a Sri Aurobindo, a Mahatma Gandhi—must challengingly leap over our artificial barriers of periodisation. But these 'divisions' help to organise a vast miscellany of material into a convenient and reasonably logical sequence.

1800-1870: The morning star of the renaissance, Rammohun Roy (1774-1833), was a master of several languages, and during the last ten years of his life he achieved the work of many life-times. Educationist, controversialist, religious and social reformer, effective writer in Bengali and English, Rammohun was above all the great bridge-builder between India and Britain, the past and the future. Of the early poets, Kashiprasad Ghosh (1809-1873) and Henry Derozio (1809-1831) have been mentioned earlier. Derozio died young, but he left behind a body of sonnets and lyrics revealing the influence of the Romantics and exemplifying his own sensibility and craftsmanship. His most ambitious poem, The Fakir of Jhungheera, tells the sad story of the widow Nuleeni, rescued by a robber chief from the funeral pyre of her husband, but widowed a second time and finding in death alone an end to her miseries.

Michael Madhusudan Dutt (1824-1873), a Hindu converted to Christianity and married to a European lady, published The Captive Ladie in Madras (1849). A narrative poem obviously inspired by Byron, it is the tale of Prithiviraj and Samyukta, and is told with verve and facility. But Madhusudan's more enduring achievement is the Bengali Meghanadbadhkabya, inspired by Milton; and indeed Madhusudan is often acclaimed as the Bengali Milton. Another convert to Christianity, Sasichunder Dutt, published his Miscellaneous Poems in 1848. As for the beginnings of the Indian novel in English, Bankim Chandra Chatterjee's Rajmohan's Wife (1864) was first published in English, though his subsequent—and greater—novels were all to appear in Bengali. With English journalism gaining a firm foothold in Calcutta, Bombay and Madras, there was some prose writing too, as yet only tentative and hesitant, but after the incorporation of the three Presidency Universities in 1857, the vogue for English writing was to gain an increasing boost.

1870-1905: This period witnessed national awakening in many fields—religion, education, politics—and this was fairly reflected in literature, whether in English or in the regional languages. Some of the leaders of the Brahmo Samaj, Arya Samaj and Prarthana Samaj, and of the Theosophical Society and the Ramakrishna Mission were evangelists of distinction. The English writings and speeches of Keshub Chunder Sen (1838-84), Mahadev Govind Ranade (1842-1901), K.T. Telang (1850-93), N.G. Chandavarkar (1855-1923) and, above all, Swami Vivekananda (1863-1902), as also the political oratory of the leaders of the Indian National Congress (Dadabhai Naoroji, Pherozeshah Mehta, Bal Gangadhar Tilak, G.K. Gokhale, Surendranath Banerjee) gave a fillip to the development of prose as a fit vehicle for exposition, debate and exhortation. Vivekananda did even more, for he carried the gospel of Vedanta to the Western world as well. He essayed English verse too, and in a poem like 'Kali the Mother' he evoked the apocalyptic vision of the breaking of the worlds and the Dance of Doom.

Toru Dutt (1856-77), like Derozio one of the 'inheritors of unfulfilled renown', published her sensitive English translations of about 150 French lyrics in A Sheaf Gleaned in French Fields (1876). It included also eight of her elder sister Aru's renderings. Toru's Ancient Ballads and Legends of Hindustan was posthumously published in 1882. Besides, she left behind an unfinished English novel, Bianca, or the Young Spanish Maiden, rather in the tradition of Beckford's Vathek. Toru's re-telling in verse of the old legends of Savitri, Prahlad, Dhruva, Ekalavya and Lakshmana comes to us with a welcome freshness and force, while her original lyrics—notably 'Sita' and 'Our Casuarina Tree'—bespeak a control over form, emotion and expression, and the resulting elegiac note has a haunting quality. Romesh Chunder Dutt (1848-1909), civil servant and economic historian, turned his hand to verse translation: Lays of Ancient India (1894), Mahabharata (1898) and Ramayana (1900). He found in the 'Locksley Hall' metre a sort of equivalent to the Sanskrit 'anushtup'. So successful were his renderings that his abridged Mahabharata and Ramayana were included in Dent's World's Classics and found appreciative readers in all English-speaking countries. Among the many other translations of the time may be mentioned Ullur Parameswara Iyer's Peacock-Messenger (1905) in rhymed couplets, from the Malayalam of Kerala Verma.

Of the other poets of the period, 'Ram Sharma' (Nabokissen Ghosh), Behramji Malabari (The Indian Muse in English Garb, 1876), Ramakrishna Pillai (Tales of Ind, 1895) and Nagesh Wishwanath Pai (The Angel of Misfortune, 1904) may be mentioned. This last is a mini-epic with Vikramaditya for hero. Both Malabari (Gujarat and the Gujarathis, 1882, and The Indian eye on English Life, 1893) and Pai (Stray Sketches in Chakmak-pore, 1894) handled the light essay with a certain charm and sense of humour. In the field of historical scholarship, V. Kanakasabhai's Tamils 1800 Years Ago (1904) deserves a passing mention. Lal Behari Day's Govinda Samanta: Bengal Peasant Life (1874) and Folk-Tales of Bengal (1883) were pioneering attempts. Day was a convert to Christianity, and his sketches of peasant life are done with an observant and understanding eye, and his village astrologer, school master, match-maker and the rest are indeed prototypical of Indian life. Raj Lakshmi Devi's The Hindu Wife (1876), K.K. Lahiri's Roshinara (1881) and H. Dutt's Bijoy Chand (1895) are exercises in fiction from Bengal, while Kamala Satthianadhan's Kamala (1894) and Saguna (1895), and Ramakrishna's Padmini (1903) and The Dive for Death (1912), were from Madras. The action of Padmini is played in the background of the Battle of Talikota, which brought to an end the great Vijayanagar Empire. There was also B.R. Rajan Iyer (1872-1898), a Vedantin, precocious Yogi and a scholar steeped in Sanskrit, English and Tamil, who wrote brilliantly persuasive prose (now collected in Rambles in Vedanta, 1925) and a novel in English, Vasudeva Sastri, with idealistic overtones.

earlier period. Educated in Oxford, Manomohan's Love Songs and Elegies (1898) was of a piece with English poetry of the 1890's, but he continued to write poetry after his return to Calcutta. His was a star-crossed life; and many of his deeply moving poems are included in Songs of Love and Death (1926) and Selected Poems (1970). Fragments of his projected plays, Perseus the Dragon-Slayer and Nalha and Damayanti, and of the sequence Adam Alarmed in Paradise have now been published and reveal his original, if rather exotic, talent, but some of his shorter lyrics in the 'Immortal Eve' and 'Orphic Mysteries' series give evidence of the authenticity of his feeling and careful craftsmanship. His brother Aurobindo Ghosh (better known as Sri Aurobindo) wrote the narrative poems, 'Urvashie' and 'Love and Death', and several lyrics before he plunged into politics. His Bhavani Mandir (1905) was viewed as a packet of political dynamite. After his retirement from politics, he launched in 1914 the philosophical journal, Arya, which carried his massive prose sequence, The Life Divine, The Secret of the Veda, Essays on the Gita, Foundations of Indian Culture, The Psychology of Social Development, The Ideal of Human Unity and The Future Poetry, giving a conspectus of knowledge in its diverse dimensions, all lighted up by his vision of the future in terms of a leap in consciousness from the mental to the supramental. He wrote five full-length plays in blank verse and numerous sonnets, lyrics and poems with a mystical slant. In his later years, he indited a 24,000-line symbolistic epic, Savitri.

Rabindranath Tagore (1861-1941) belongs to Bengali literature, but it was his English Gitanjali (1912) that won the Nobel Prize for him. Many of his poems, plays and works of prose fiction were soon to appear in English and gain a national audience. One of his later poems, 'The Child' (1931), was first written in English, partly inspired by the Passion Play at Oberammergau and partly by the personality of Gandhiji. Tagore's Hibbert Lectures, The Religion of Man (1931), were also given in English. Tagore has his own place in Indo-Anglian literature, for his Gitanjali set the pace for prose-poetry, and his lyrics, dramas and novels were a moral support to a whole generation of writers in India.

Sarojini Naidu (1879-1949) was more than a poet in English; she was a patriot, freedom-fighter and a superb orator in English. After the sensational success of The Golden Threshold (1905), she strayed into politics and stayed in it. But two more of her collections followed, The Bird of Time (1912) and The Broken Wing (1917). In her poetry she excels in describing everyday experiences—temple bells, nightfall in the city, the full moon, the Coromandel fishers, the palanquin-bearers. She can insinuate the imponderables and immensities in poems like 'To a Buddha Seated on a Lotus' and 'The Flute-Player of Vrindavan'. Her lyric-sequence 'The Temple' is a trilogy recording the vicissitudes of Love's pilgrimage. The glory and the abasement, the terror and the acceptance and the transcendence, are fused into fierce and indubitable poetry.

In fiction, A. Madhaviah's Satyananda (1909), Clarinda (1915) and Thillai Govindan (1916) were commendable creative efforts. Satyananda shows how the abuses in Hindu society drive some to Christianity, and exposes also the sharp practices of certain missionaries. The hero, Satyananda, an illegitimate Hindu child brought up as 'Abraham Satya' in a Christian orphanage, ends up as a Christian Vedantin and marries another converted Christian, a 'virgin-widow'. Clarinda is a historical novel, and Madhaviah's Kustika's Stories presents a traditional society on the verge of a drastic change. His best-known novel, Thillai Govindan, portrays an Anglicised Hindu returning ultimately to the abiding values of his forefathers. Among other early novels, S.K. Ghosh's The Prince of Destiny (1909), S.M. Mitra's Hindupore: A Peep behind the Indian Unrest (1909), Jogendra Singh's Nur Jehan (1909) and Nasrin (1911) and Balkrishna's Love of Kusuma (1910) have their place in a historical survey.

1920-1947. While Tagore and Sri Aurobindo were still at the height of their powers during this age, there was also a new generation directly or indirectly inspired by Mahatma Gandhi and his political, economic, social, moral and educational idealism. Mohandas Karamchand Gandhi (1869-1948) unquestionably stamps this age with the power and halo of his personality. His seminal Hind Swaraj, or Indian Home Rule had appeared in 1909, but it was when he launched Young India ten years later that he had a means of reaching a nation-wide audience. His transparent autobiography entitled in English, My Experiments with Truth, came out in 1927-9, and his Songs from the Prison (renderings from the spiritual and hymnal literature of India from the Vedas to Kabir, Nanak, Mirabai and Tukaram) appeared in 1934. His English speeches, writings and letters were couched in a language of utter Biblical simplicity and pointed adequacy, and his example set the new style of speaking and writing, weaning people away from the conscious ornateness and heaviness of the earlier Victorian manner.

In the Gandhian Age, many a fictional hero was fashioned after him, at least in the more easily recognisable traits. K.S. Venkataramani (1891-1956) shot into fame in the twenties with his Paper Boats (Sketches), On the Sand-Dunes (prose-poetry), and the two novels, Murugan the Tiller (1927) and Kandan the Patriot (1932). If Murugan translated Gandhi's economic philosophy into action, Kandan likewise exemplified the Gandhian gospel of political action in terms of Satyagraha. Kandan is not inaptly called 'a novel of New India in the making', but the process of course remains incomplete even fifty years after. Venkataramani's other works are A Day with Sambhu, a book for children, and Jatadharan, a collection of short stories.

LITERATURE-ENGLISH

Raja Rao's first novel, Kanthapura (1938), is almost a Gandhi Purana, and Murthy, its hero is a transparently Gandhian character. The Salt Satyagraha campaign as it affected the fortunes of a village in Karnataka is the theme of the novel, and the story is presented as recalled years later by an old woman of the village. Raja Rao's The Cow of the Barricades (1947) is a collection of short stories full of poetic touches and epiphanic portraits. In one of the stories, the simple shepherd Narsiga sees Gandhi as the divine Rama, and the foreigner as Ravana. These are stories of a rare vintage, and even a cow is seen invested with potencies beyond the grasp of the mere mind. Raja Rao's later novels, The Serpent and the Rope (1960) and The Cat and Shakespeare (1965) have metaphysical dimensions without ceasing to be fascinating stories of men and women. Rama of The Serpent and the Rope is an autobiographical projection, and so is Ramakrishna Pai of the later novel.

Mulk Raj Anand's Untouchable (1933), a novel with a theme after Gandhi's heart, was followed by Coolie, Two Leaves and a Bud and a succession of other novels. The conflict between the Gandhian and the Communist stances is dramatised in The Sword and the Sickle (1942); and in The Big Heart (1945) the issue between the coppersmiths and the capitalists is highlighted with a power reminiscent of Hauptmann's The Weavers and Ernst Toller's The Machine-Wreckers. As in Untouchable, here, too, there is a terrible concentration, since the hectic events take place in the course of a single day. Anand's later fiction, Private Life of an Indian Prince (1953), and the immense autobiographical 'novel in progress' (of which the first three spans have come out: Seven Summers (1951), Morning Face (1968), Confessions of a Lover 1976) are a cross between Proustian 'remembrance of things past' and fiction charged with Andre Gidean undertones; and they afford continued proof of Anand's vitality and relevance as a novelist of the 20th century Indian scene. Anand is also one of India's best short story writers, and 'The Lost Child' is one of the world's best.

R.K. Narayan's first novel, Swami and Friends (1937), located in mythical 'Malgudi', set the pattern for its many successors, and won for him a world reputation as the subtle and sensitive portrayor of contemporary middle class life. The autobiographical and moving The English Teacher (1945) was followed by Mr. Sampath, The Financial Expert and Waiting for the Mahatma (1955), which introduces Gandhiji as a character and concludes with his tragic death on his way to prayer. Of Narayan's post-Independence novels, The Guide (1959) is the most significant. It tells the story of the scamp, Raju, whom circumstances turn into a saint, for this basically selfish man dies in the course of a fast undertaken to end a drought. Narayan continues to sustain Malgudi's credibility with fresh tales about its interesting inhabitants (the 'man-eater', the sweet-vendor, the signs-painter) and distinctive atmosphere.

Of other novels of the period, a few may be listed: V.V. Chintamani's Vedanta, a Clash of Traditions (1928), A.S.P. Ayyar's historical novels, Baladitya (1930) and Three Men of Destiny (1939), Shanker Ram's Love of Dust (1938), D.F. Karaka's Just Flesh (1940) and There Lay the City (1941), the Purushottam Tricamdas's The Living Mask (1945).

During the Gandhi Age, quite a few Indians essayed English verse with varying degrees of success (or failure). Harindranath Chattopadhyaya's Feast of Youth (1918), so full of promise, was followed by many collections of verse and plays—The Magic Tree (1922), Poems and Plays (1927), The Dark Well (1939), Spring in Winter (1948) and Virgins and Vineyards (1967). His obvious talent and fluency notwithstanding, Harindranath failed to attain the heights. Among other active poets were N.V. Thadani, Asoka and Other Poems (1922); P. Seshadri, Champak Leaves (1923) and Vanished Hours (1925); Ananda Acharya, Arctic Swallows (1927); Joseph Furtado, A Goan Fiddler (1927), Songs in Exile (1938); J. Krishnamurthi, The Search (1927); S.S.L. Chordia, Chitor and Other Poems (1928); Uma Maheswar, Among the Silences (1928); Sadhu T.L. Vaswani, The Quest (1928); V.N. Bhushan, Moonbeams (1929), Horizons (1937), The Far Ascent (1948); G.K. Chettur Gumataraya (1932); Humayun Kabir, Poems, (1932), The shadow of God: A Sonnet-Sequence (1935); Jehangir R.P. Mody, Golden Harvest (1932); Armando Menezes, Chords and Discords (1936), Chaos and Dancing Stars (1940); Brajendranath Seal, The Quest Eternal (1936); Raihana Tyabji, The Heart of a Gopi (1936); Baldoon Dhingra, Symphony of Peace (1938); P.R. Kaikini, Shanghai (1939), Selected Poems, (1946); Manjeri, S. Isvaran, Catguts (1940), Brief Orisons (1941), The Fourth Avatar (1946); D.C. Datta, Exegi Monumentum and Other Lyrics (1941); K.D. Sethna, The Secret Splendour, (1941), The Adventure of the Apocalypse (1949); Shahid Suhrawardy, Essays in Verse (1937); Sabita Devi, Phantasies, (1943); Subho Tagore, The Flames of Passion, (1944); and Fredoon Kabraji, A Minor Georgian's Swan-Song (1945).

In drama, aside from Tagore's and Harindranath's plays, V.V. Srinivasa Iyengar's Dramatic Divertissements (1921) in two volumes had a vogue at one time. T.P. Kailasam's plays, The Burden and Fulfilment (1933), Karna (1946), Keechaka (1949) are integrated pieces and successful on the stage. Fyzee Rahamin's Daughter of Ind (1940) is a moving tragedy. A.S.P. Ayyar's The Slaves of Ideas and Other Plays (1941), Balwant Gargi's The Vulture (1941) and R.K. Narayan's The Watchmen of the Lake are among the other interesting dramatic experiments.

Non-fiction prose—history, philosophy, biography and autobiography, oratory, the light essay, literary criticism, political and literary journalism—is a sort of literary suburbia with many houses. The philosophical writings of S. Radhakrishnan, Indian Philosophy (1923), (1927) and An Idealist View of Life (1932); R.D. Ranade A Constructive Survey of Upanishadic Philosophy, (1926), Philosophical Essays (1956); M. Hiriyanna, Outlines of Indian Philosophy, (1933); P.N. Srinivasachari, The Philosophy of Visishtadvaita (1943); Raghupati Venkataratnam Grace, Abiding: Messages and Ministrations, (1965); the historical writings of Jadunath Sircar, S. Krishnaswami Iyengar, K.M. Panikkar, K.T. Shah, The Splendour that was Ind, (1930), K.A. Nilakanta Sastri and R.C. Majumdar, Jawaharlal Nehru's Autobiography (1936) and The Discovery of India (1946); the light essays of S.V.V. and R. Bangaruswami, the pen portraits of K. Chandrasekharan, Iswara Dutt and Khasa Subba Rau; the critical writings of N.K. Sidhanta: The Heroic Age of India, (1929), Amarantha Jha, B.S. Mardhekar (Arts and the Man, 1937) and C.N. Menon (Shakespeare Criticism, 1938); the flights of oratory by V.S. Srinivasa Sastri: My Master Gokhale, (1946); Lectures on the 'Ramayana', (1949); R.P. Masani's biography of Dadabhai Naoroji (1939); the journalism of K. Natarajan, Pothan Joseph and N. Raghunathan; the political writings of M. Ruthnaswamy The Making of the State, (1933)—all offer evidence of the variegated richness of the literary scene during the Gandhi Age. Finally, Ananda Coomaraswamy (1877-1947), a Ceylonese born and domiciled in the USA, was quintessentially Indian in spirit and identification, and his extensive writings, An Introduction to Indian Art (1923); Hinduism and Buddhism (1943) and The Dance of Shiva, (1948) contributed not a little to the modern Indian renaissance.

1947 and after: After Independence, the earlier political idealism could not be sustained; in fact, the decline had set in even with the first taste of political power (provincial autonomy) in 1937, and the spectre of 'partition' had darkened the forties. On 15 August 1947, as a result of the partition, about half a million lost their lives, and twelve million people had to leave their homes. Instances of abduction, outrage and mutilation were numberless. The 'tryst with destiny' thus seemed no occasion for unreserved jubilation, and when on 30 January 1948, the Father of the Nation was shot down on his way to prayer, the chalice of our national agony was full to the brim indeed. Pakistan's invasion of Kashmir gave a further vicious twist to the situation. "It was midnight when freedom came, and it is not day yet!" This sigh of near-despair would seem almost to sum up the whole age. In the immediate post-partition context, the shift was from the heroic and the human to the bestial and the diabolic. No doubt, there were still deeds of heroism; for example, Anand's Death of a Hero tells the story of a Muslim who resists the Pak invaders and prefers to die rather than belie his ideals. Of the motion-pictures of the partition-horrors, Khuswant Singh's Train to Pakistan (1956), Manohar Malgonkar's A Bend in the Ganges (1964) and Chaman Nahal's Azadi (1974) are among the most excruciating and yet artistically satisfying. While these novels do not spare us the cumulative violence and the stark imbecility of those tormented and terrifying times, yet amid the darkness and the despair residual humanity flickers still, and the novelists redeem even their bleeding images of hell with the salve of love and compassion and infinite sufferance. The Indian psyche is here apparently 'fracted and corroborate', missing its soul-centre of integration. Later events like the march into Goa, the Chinese invasion, the Indo-Pak war of 1965, the Naxalite wave, the refugee influx from Bangladesh in 1971, the queering of the political pitch culminating in the Emergency, the silent revolution of March 1977—all are seen reflected in our fiction, and in the dramas of Asif Currimbhoy: Goa (1964), Inquilab (1970), The Refugee (1971), Sonar Bangla, (1972).

In poetry and prose, fiction alike, there has been a burst of activity in the post-Independence era. The major work of Sri Aurobindo's last years, Savitri: A Legend and a Symbol, came out in a single volume in 1954. The Aurobindonians and the traditionalists continue to write with varying degrees of self-confidence: K.D. Sethna, Romen, Nirodbaran, Dilip Kumar Roy, Themis Punjalal, V.K. Gokak, Nishikanto, V. Madhusudan Reddy, Krishna Srinivas, R.M. Challa, Keshav Malik and Karan Singh are among the more important names. On the other hand, a number of 'new' poets are also in the field: Dom Moraes, Nissim Ezekiel, Jayanta Mahapatra, Prithvi Nandy, Kamala Das, Keki Daruwala, A.K. Ramanujan, R. Parthasarathy, Shiv K. Kumar, Arvind Mehrotra, Gieve Patel, Adil Jussawala, Gauri Deshpande, Margaret Chatterjee and Arun Kolatkar. Some are better known than others, but their total impact is impressive enough. There is also the unique phenomenon of P. Lal whose Writers' Workshop has sponsored the publication of scores of volumes of new verse and verse translations ('transcreations' Lal calls them). Lal himself has been engaged for years in 'transcreating' the entire Mahabharata into English verse. Commendable among the English verse translations are Monika Verma's Gitagovinda, V.K. Gokak's from Bendre's Kannada lyrics, Rajaji's from Kamban's 'Ayodhya Kanda' and Prema Nandakumar's of the poems of Subramania Bharati. The poets of today affirm their faith in a vital language and in the value of concrete imagery, and often seem to have a preference for the private voice. There is a kind of fashionable mini-skirt poetry, by turns intriguing, fascinating and irritating, but generally arresting for the nonce.

It is in the novel that many writers have achieved well-merited recognition. Among the more important figures are Bhabani Bhattacharya and Manohar Malgoankar, G.V. Desani and Sudhin Ghose, Kamala Markandaya and Nayantara Sahgal, Arun Joshi and Chaman Nahal, B. Rajan and K.B. Vaid, Shanta Rama Rau and Ruth Prawar Jhabvala, Anita Desai and Attia Hosain, Khushwant Singh and Anand Lall. The 'big three'—Anand, Narayan, Raja Rao—are active still. The integration of Indian States into the Indian Union is the theme of both Anand's Private Life of an Indian Prince (1953) and Malgonkar's Princes (1963). The Chinese invasion is part of the theme of Bhabani Bhattacharya's Shadow of Ladakh (1966) as also of Curimbhoy's play, The Captives. Bhattacharya's A Goddess Named Gold (1960) is a modern fable that exposes with humour as well as humanity the collapse of moral values in post-Independence India. G.V. Desani's All About H. Hatter (1948) is stylistically the most audacious of the novels and K.B. Vaid's, Bimal in Bog (1972) is a more recent, if less successful, exhibit. Kamala Markandaya's novels range from Nectar in a Sieve (1954) and The Coffers Dams (1969), which present traditional life under the stress of modern industrial change, to A Silence of Desire (1961) and Possession (1963) in both of which a 'Swami' (god-man) appears. The East-West encounter is the theme of Some Inner Fury (1957), and the plight of the Indian immigrant in England is the theme of Markandaya's The Nowhere Man (1973), as also of Anita Desai's Bye-bye, Blackbird (1971) and Timeri Murari's The Marriage. The native-alien schizophrenia is also the theme of Curimbhoy's play This Alien ... Native Land (1975). Anita Desai's Cry, the Peacock (1958), Voices in the City (1965) and Fire on the Mountain (1977) are explorations of sensibility rather in the Virginia Woolf manner, and Nayantara Sahgal's novels This Time of Morning, (1965), Storm in Chandigarh, (1969) and A Situation in New Delhi, (1977) breathe the fouled atmosphere of contemporary Indian politics. Praver Jhabvala's essays in fiction, To Whom She will (1955), The Householder (1960), A Backward Place (1965) and Heat and Dust (1975) are lucidly observant and subtly ironic portraits of middle class life in North India, especially in the Delhi region. Arun Joshi's novels, The Foreigner (1967) and The Strange Case of Billy Biswas (1971) have an exotic and strangely disturbing quality. Inside the Haveli (1977), the first novel by Rama Mehta, gives a realistic and moving picture of life in a nobleman's house in Udaipur, and yet shows how the wind of change finds its way even into the Haveli's sheltered old world precincts.

Non-fiction prose is an omnibus term and covers a wide range of writing from merely journalistic and transient to the serious and scholarly and creatively critical. A book like The Remembered Village (1976) by M.N. Srinivas is a piece of authentic ethnography unfolding before the reader a rich tapestry; and 'Rampura' the remembered village is a microcosm of the Indian countryside. With his Autobiography of an Unknown Indian (1951), Nirad C. Chaudhuri became quite well-known at once for his mastery of English and his rather slanted view of the English-Indian cultural encounter. The Continent of Circe (1956) with its perverse and portentous interpretation of Indian history had a mixed reception. Scholar Extraordinary (1974), Nirad's biography of Max Müller, is a more seasoned work and a worthy tribute to the great Orientalist. B.R. Nanda's Gokhale (1977) is a well-researched and well-written biography of the liberal statesman and his times. Ved Mehta's portraits, including his self-portrait (Face to Face, 1957) and Portrait of India (1970) have an engaging and often a provocative quality. Rajaji's Mahabharata (1951) and Ramayana (1957) are condensed versions in a contemporary idiom, an expression as much of the translator's personality as of Vyasa or Valmiki. In his Satyameva Jayate (1961) volumes are gathered some of the finest and most thought provoking 'journalism' of our time. Indian thought and philosophy have found mature exponents in Nalinikanta Gupta, Swami Ranganathananda and others. N. Raghunathan's Sotto Voce (1959) and its successors constitute a massive, if also perceptive, indictment of the policies and programmes of the post-Independence Governments in India. M. Chalapathi Rau's Fragments of a Revolution (1965) covers the same ground, though in his own sharp and incisive manner. Several of the journalists—Frank Moraes, S. Mulgonkar, V.K. Narasimhan, B.G. Verghese, Kuldip Nayar—wield a forceful style adequate enough for purposes of news coverage, investigative reporting or acid political comment. And a personality like Jayaprakash Narayan was a humanist and thinker more than a mere politician, and Prison Diary (1975) with its lacerating opening entry—"My world lies in shambles" all round me"—is surely one of the most poignant documents of our time.

It is a sign of the continued vitality of Indian writing in English that English newspapers like the Hindu, Hindustan Times, Times of India, Indian Express, and Statesman have a growing national circulation, and quite a few of the weekly magazines seem to be doing well. Equally significant is the vogue for quarterly or half-yearly journals concentrating on Indian writing in English. The Literary Criterion, the Literary Half-Yearly, the Journal of Indian Writing in English, University Journals like the Aligarh Journal of English Studies and the Sahitya Akademi's Indian Literature,—all these try to maintain a good standard; and the Aryan Path and Triveni have completed more than half a century's meritorious service to the cause of culture and Indian letters. Altogether, the outlook is not unpromising and both the literature of power and the literature of knowledge, both creative and critical writing seem to be growing native to the soil in India. The contributions of senior teachers like V.K. Gokak, V.Y. Kantak, C.D. Narasimhaiah, M.K. Naik, Amalendu Bose, Amaresh Datta, Sisir Kumar Ghosh,

LITERATURE-GUJARATI

A.N. Kaul, A.A. Ansari, D.V.K. Raghavacharyulu, S. Nagarajan, Anniah Gowda, V.A. Shahane and G.S. Amur constitute a corpus of critical writing in English, facilitating further purposeful study of this unique literature. And the CIEFL at Hyderabad under the direction of Ramesh Mohan, is developing into a centre for the serious study of the use of the English language by Indians for functional as well as creative ends.

Although in its origin Indian writing in English was a hot-house plant, and even now it is rather self-conscious, after almost 200 years of uneasy experimentation it seems to be taking firm roots here at last, and the foliage is spreading confidently in different directions. This singular literature is characterised by its fusion of native sensibility with the English linguistic medium, and at its best it is not inferior to the best writing in UK or USA. It may therefore be hoped that the Indian writer, when he uses the English medium, will be able (as in the past) to project a total vision of India, interpreting her aspirations and hopes and recording her struggles and fulfilments; and his will be an increasingly all-India or even a global audience, for his can really be the voice of the New India, the voice of the future.

K.R. S.I.

LITERATURE (Gujarati). Gujarat has a very rich literary heritage. In the post-Sanskrit period, it shared this heritage with Rajasthan, as both had a common language, Shaurseni Apabhramsha of the Nagara variety. It was called an Apabhramsha of Gurjaras by writers like Bhoja (1010-1050), who said that Gurjaras are fully pleased with their Apabhramsha. The most acclaimed grammarian of the time, Hemchandrasuri (1088-1172) has illustrated this idea in the last chapter of his treatise on grammar, Sidhha hemashabdanushana with Apabhramsha verses which represent floating as well as written literature of the time. These verses are mythological, religious, didactic, erotic and heroic in nature and they indicate well-developed literature. This common language of Gujarat and Rajasthan was in use till at least the end of the Solanki rule, i.e. the twelfth century. The later stage of this Apabhramsha, out of which Gujarati and Rajasthani evolved as separate languages, was named by linguists as Gurjara Apabhramsha, or Prachin Apabhramsha, or Old West Rajasthani or Maru Gurjara. These two languages started to show separate identity in the second quarter of the fifteenth century.

Broadly speaking, the period 1150 to 1450 is considered the age of old Gujarati literature. The main forms of this literature are 'Rasa' and 'Phagu'. Other forms are 'Barmasi', 'Chhappaya', 'Vivahalu', 'Chhanda' and 'Prabandha'.

The available literature of this period includes such notable works as Bharateshvarbahubali Ghor (c. 1170) by Vajrasenasuri, Bharatesvarabahubali Rasa (1185) by Salibhadrasuri, Jambuswamicharita (1210) by Dharma, Revantagirirasa (c. 1232) by Vijayasenasuri, Neminathachatuspadika (c. 1269) by Vinayachandrasuri, Balsiksha (1280) by Sangramsimha, Sthulibhadraphagu (1324) by Jinapadmasuri, Rangasagaraneminathaphagu (first half of 15th century) by Somasundara Suri, and Prithvichandracharita (1422) by Manikya Chandra Suri.

Most of the works available in this period are written by Jain saint poets. They depict religious tenets, virtues of Tirthankaras and preceptors. Works of non-Jain poets are rare, not because such poets did not flourish but because their works were not preserved. Works of Jain poets were properly preserved in their 'bhandars' in the best tradition of the religion. Works of non-Jain poets, though less in number, are more noteworthy for their non-sectarian nature and high poetical value. The best among these works, Vasantvilas (beginning of the 14th century) by an unknown poet, is a typical love-poem depicting love in separation. The manuscript of this poem contained the paintings in the Ajanta style, which reflects inter-relation of arts and high tradition of pure art-forms in the cultural life of Gujarat.

Hansauli (1371), a fantastic story of the successive lives of a couple by Asait, and Sadayavatsacharita (1410) by Bhim are also indicative of the richness of pure literature, most of which is yet to be traced. Asait introduced 'Bhavai', a form of folk-drama which flourished in subsequent generations also.

Ranamallachhanda (1390) by Shridhar is a ballad with a historical subject and heroic as well as love episodes interwoven to perfection of literary marvel. Hansraj-

LITERATURE-GUJARATI

Vachhraj chaupai (1355) by Vijayabhadrasuri and Vidyavilas pavadu (1429) by Hiranand are also fictional works of merit. Prithvichandracharita by Manikyachandrasuri is an excellent prose story with literary value of high order, though religious in nature.

Medieval period from 1450 to 1850 is known as Bhakti-period also, because its prominent subject is devotion to Lord Krishna. This is due to the evolution of the Krishna cult all over India. The main forms of literature of this period are lyrics called 'Pada', 'Chhappa', 'Garabo' 'Garabi', 'Akhyana', 'Katha' and 'Padya-varta'. Most prominent poets are Narsimha Mehta, Mirabai, Akho, Premananda, Samal Bhatt and Dayaram.

Narsimha Mehta (1414-1480) is a vedantic poet in his philosophical lyrics, but as his knowledge of the Supreme transcends him to oneness with Brahma, his devotion transforms him into a 'Gopi' in absolute love with Lord Krishna. His devotional lyrics of 'Premalaksana bhakti' rank him with Surdas, Vidyapati and other devotional poets of India.

Mirabai (1499-1547), the greatest poetess of western India, has enriched Gujarati literature also, along with that of Rajasthan and Mathura region, by her melodious lyrics of devotional love and dedication towards Lord Krishna. Bhakti cult in Gujarat is most influenced by her lyrics.

Akho (1591-1656) expounded Advaita philosophy in his various works, mainly in Akhe-gita, Panchikarana, Anubhavabindu and hundreds of 'chhappas'—epigrammatic stanzas. He was a reformist also in a sense that he hated social evils and despised religious hypocrisy in his chhappas. He propagated the knowledge of the Supreme as superior to devotion.

Premanand (1636-1734) is the most popular and successful poet of the time. His Akhyanas like Nalakhyana, Okhaharan, Ranayaina, Dashama-skandha are based on mythology and some like Mamerun are based on the life of the devout poet Narasimha Mehta. Though indebted to previous poets, he has exhibited rare poetic genius in depicting sentiments and in characterization. He excels in eros, pathos and humour equally.

Samal Bhatt (1690-1769) is primarily a story-teller. His motive is to impart worldly wisdom and entertain the masses. His uniqueness lies in his matchless and wonderful power of story-telling, in presenting didactic and worldly maxims in striking parallelism, yet preserving the romantic atmosphere of early fiction. Madanmohana, Vidyavilasini, Padmavati, Sudabahoteri and Simhasanbattishi are his notable works.

Dayaram (1776-1852), the last of the minstrels of the age, was a Shudhadvaita Vaishnava by conviction and his poems profess that conviction dogmatically. But his devotional love lyrics, called 'Garabi', betray inherent poetic genius and he is still popular amongst the Krishna devotees.

New streams in poetic forms and subjects are the characteristics of this period. Bhalan (1405-1489) promoted akhyana form, which reached its zenith in Premanand. Popular fiction flourished. Maru-Dhola chaupai (1561) by Kushalalabh is most noteworthy amongst them. Heroic poems continued to be written. Kanhadde prabandha (1456) by Padmanabh deals with the historic subject, depicting the love episode of a Muslim princess and a Rajput prince. It betrays rare poetic genius in describing heroic patriotism, supernatural love and yet remaining faithful to history which was not of distant past.

Jain poets also continued to explain religious tenets and to eulogize the virtues of the Tirthankaras and Acharyas. Vimalaprabandha (1512) by Lavanyasamaya, Rupchand Kunvar rasa (1581) by Nayasundara, Kusumashriras (1652) by Gunavinaya and Nala-Damayanti rasa (1617) by Samayasundara are noteworthy.

The Saint poets of Swaminarayana sect also flourished during this period. Muktanand Swami (1761-1830), Nishkulanand Swami (1766-1848), Brahmanand Swami (1772-1849) and Premanand Swami 'Prem Sakhi' (1779-1845) are foremost amongst them.

The Saint poets of the Kabir sect also made their appearance in this period. Bhansaheb, Ravisaheb, Morarsaheb, Khimsaheb, Trikamsaheb and Dasi Jivan still continue to influence the religious thinking of a section of the masses.

With the advent of the British rule, political and social awareness achieved new dimensions. People became conscious of the evils of social misconceptions, religious dogmatism and stagnancy in education. Amongst the awakened few who led the society, were poets like Dalpatram and Narmadashanker. They heralded a new era in the modern Gujarati literature.

Dalpatram (1820-1898) as a poet was not very different from Samal Bhatt of the previous era in his style but some of his poems like 'Bapani Pimpar' exhibit the spirit of new poetry. He is a pioneer dramatist. He gave the first Gujarati drama Lakshmi (1851) which is an adaptation of Plautus written by Aristophanes. He wrote also a comedy titled Mithyabhimani (1869) which shows his insight into dramaturgy. He was a pioneer of modern Gujarati prose along with Narmad.

Narmad (1833-1886) was the true spirit of renaissance. He introduced essay in Gujarati. As a reformist he wrote numerous poems on that subject. But his greatest contribution lies in creating awareness towards the aesthetics of pure poetry. He wrote innumerable poems on love and nature. He was first in many fields of literature, such as essay, lexicography, principles of literary criticism, historical drama, editing medieval literature on scientific principles, etc.

Navalram Pandya (1836-1888) is a pioneer critic who wrote on most of the literary aspects, while reviewing books. He is also foremost in writing on educational subjects. Nandshanker Mehta (1835-1905) wrote the first historical novel Karanghelo (1866) and Mahipatram Nilkanth (1829-1891) contributed the first social novel Sasu vahuni ladai (1866).

With the publication of the grand novel Sarasvati-chandra by Govardhanram Tripathi (1855-1907) in 1887 and Kusumamla by Narasimharao Divetia in the same year, a new era, a period of scholarly writings commenced. As against the period of renaissance, this was the period of conciliation and rethinking about ancient culture and knowledge of India. Manilal Nabhubhai Dwivedi (1858-1898) started this process and its culmination is found in the grand novel of the scholar writer Govardhanram in which the author has transfused three generations and conciliated the three civilizations—the ancient Indian, the modern Indian and the modern western. 'Snehmudra', an elegy on the death of his wife, is an allegorical poem depicting his concept of love and duty towards society from the philosophical point of view. Kusumamala, though influenced by English poetry, set a new trend in lyrical poetry in Gujarati. He experimented with verse also, for finding suitable diction for Gujarati poetry. He was an alert critic with deep insight into literary principles and a linguist of high repute, with a sound study of Prakrit and Apabhramsha languages. Caricatures of his contemporaries drawn by him in Smaranmukur are unique in that genre.

Manilal Nabhubhai Dwivedi was a profound scholar of Sanskrit literature and Indian philosophy. His contribution to the genre of essay in Sidhhantsar, Sudarshan gadyavali and Balvilas is a consolidation of faith in Indian culture and religion which were at stake during the period of renaissance. His drama Kanta (1882) follows the western concept of conflict in content and Sanskrit dramaturgy in outer form. Ramanbhai Nilkanth (1868-1918), a social reformer, was a critic, a dramatist and a poet, but his contribution as a humorist, especially for his parody novel Bhadrambhadr is most remarkable. His drama Raino parvat is an assimilation of western and Sanskrit dramaturgy. As a critic, his principles are influenced by Wordsworth though some of his essays in Kavita ane sahitya betray his intimate understanding of Sanskrit poetics.

Anandshanker Dhruva (1869-1942) was a great scholar of Indian and western philosophy and literature. He contributed to stabilize the forces of assimilation of two cultures on the basis of perfect understanding of Indian philosophy. His essays compiled in Apno dharma, Hindu Ved dharma, Hindu dharmani bal-pothi, etc. have gone a long way in this direction. His essays on literary criticism compiled in Kavya-tatva-vichar, Sahitya-vichar, etc. are appreciative in nature.

'Kant' (Manishanker Ratnaji Bhatt, 1867-1923) was an agnostic poet. His search for true religion guided him to embrace Christianity, but then, he was torn between faith and affection towards relatives. His agony out of this tension found expression in his poetry. He introduced a new form of poetry, 'khandkavya', which, though story-oriented, is a perfect medium to express internal conflict of the poet. He excels in the depiction of pathos and the perfection of metres.

'Kalapi' (Surasinghaji Takhtesinghaji Gohil, 1874-1900), a prince-poet, is more loved for his ghazals than for his royalty. He, torn between love and duty, expressed his emotions in ghazals and khandkavyas. His travelogue Kashmirno pravas is noteworthy for its prose-style.

Nanalal Kavi (1877-1946) was a great lyricist and lyrical dramatist. He experimented with vers libres in his new found 'Apadyagadya' deployed first in his Vasantotsav (1905), and then in his lyrical dramas such as Jaya-Jayant (1914), Indukumar (in three parts 1909, 1927 and 1932), etc. He was an ardent scholar of Indian history and culture. His dramas are enriched in content by both these aspects. His ideology of platonic love and marriage had profound impact on the young masses of the time.

Balvantrai Thakor (1869-1952) influenced Gujarati poetry to the core, in both diction and content. He propounded the theory that 'the best poetry is that which is thought-oriented'. He introduced 'run on line' diction in Sanskrit metres, by placing rhythms in tune with the thought of the poem and not as per fixed places required by the structure of the metre. This had a strong impact on the diction of the poets of the next generation. He was honoured by the poets of the young generation as a guide to poetry.

Other noteworthy poets of the age were Khabardar, Botadkar, Lalitji, Hari Harshad Dhruv, Balashanker Kantharia, Mastkavi, Sanchit, Jatil, Sagar, Gajendra Buch, Manikant, Dolatram Pandya and Bhimrao Divetia.

Notable prose-writers were Narayana Hemchandra, Bhogindrarao Divetia, Ranjitram Vavabhai Mehta, Shrimad Rajchandra, Chhotalal Master, Vadilal Motilal, Kamalashanker Trivedi, Mohanlal Dave, Vyomeshchandra Pathakji, Chhaganlal Pandya, Atisukhshanker Trivedi, Hiralal Parekh, Ambalal Jani, and Amrit Keshav Nayak. Dahyabhai Dehrasari and Krishnalal Mohanlal Jhaveri did pioneering work in writing literary history in their Sathinun sahitya and Milestones in Gujarati Literature as well as Further Milestones in Gujarati Literature respectively.

With the appearance of Mahatma Gandhi (1869-1948) in the arena of national theatre, the very approach to literature underwent great transformation. Gandhiji insisted on simplicity of language so that even the last of the masses may get the message. His addresses and articles on varied subjects, from religion to handicraft, as also on socio-political subjects, had a wide and far-reaching influence on the infrastructure of the life-pattern and thinking process of the entire nation. Gandhian ideology and programme became the prime subject of literature. Nationalism, realism, sympathy towards the down-trodden dominated the minds of the young poets of the age, influence of socialism was also a powerful under-current. But in spite of the purposefulness of creative activity, the aesthetic value of literature was never on decline, because of the profound impact of Rabindranath Tagore on writers of this generation. It also lifted parochial nationalism to universalism.

Apart from his essays, the most cherished contribution of Gandhi to Gujarati literature is his autobiography, Satyna prayogo which is a land-mark in biographical literature not only of Gujarat or India, but of the world, due to his unparalleled transparency of heart and serenity of style.

Kakasaheb Kalelkar (1886-1981) imbibed Gandhian ideology and aestheticism of Rabindranath Tagore. He was an aesthetician who never overlooked life, yet never sacrificed literary values also. This is evident from his essays on art, literature and education as well as from his travelogues, autobiography and other writings. His narration of nature in his several essays in Rakhadav: no anand, Jivanano anand and Jivanlila tends to be perfect poetry in prose.

Kishorelal Mashruwala, Mahadev Desai, Narhari Parikh, Jugatram Dave, Babalbhai Mehta and Maganbhai Desai are essayists in the Gandhian tradition.

Leading poets of this era are Sundaram (b. 1908), Umashankar Jethalal Joshi (b. 1911) and Snehrashmi (b. 1903). The main traits of their poetry are sympathy towards the down-trodden, intense patriotism, aspiration for freedom, humanism, realism, thought-oriented emotion and experiments with diction. Poetry of Sundaram in Kavyamangala and Vasudha is purely Gandhian in ideology, some times tending towards socialism. But it underwent a major metamorphosis under the influence of Sri Aurobindo. His poetry in Yatra tends to express the metaphysical experience of the Supramental. Poetry of Umashankar Joshi in Vishvashanti and Gangotri is in tune with the poetry of Sundaram in Kavyamangala, but takes a new stride in Nishith to a height of pure aestheticism. A poet of universality in Vishvashanti, transcends to realise the beauty of the Supreme manifested in nature. But, in spite of high imagination, he is well entrenched in the solid ground of realism. His poetry in Abhijna tends to enter the realms of surrealism and expresses frustration and alienation of the human being in industrial junk. His experimentation in drama in verse, in Prachina and Mahaprasthan is noteworthy. Snehrashmi is a steady poet who never diverted from his faith in Gandhian ideology, and in the well-being of mankind. His main contribution is introduction and acclimatization of 'Haiku' in Gujarati poetry.

Other note-worthy poets of this era are Krishnalal Shridharani, Sundarji Betai, Badarayana, Mansukhlal Jhaveri, Deshalji Parmar, Karsandas Manek, Pujalal,

Kanhaiyalal Maneklal Munshi (1887-1971) and Ramanlal Desai (1892-1954) are the leading and the most popular novelists of this era. Munshi, endowed with rare genius, wrote romances on historical and mythological subjects. Patanni prabhuta, Gujaratno nath, Jaya Somanath, Bhagvan Parshuram, Prithvivallabh and Bhagna paduka are some of his most successful novels with ideal and galant heroes and brilliant and brave heroines. His last novel Krishnavtar based on the Bhagavata-purana, is the most ambitious, and written with earnest devotion. His social novels like Verni vasulat and Kono vank had also a strong impact on society because of their reformist tone. His social novels, dramas and short stories depict the inner conflict of the characters and their struggle against adverse forces. As for his historical novels, historical and mythological dramas and one-act plays, these evince his love for idealism and for grandeur. In all his literary works, his nationalism with a bias for Aryan culture is always manifest. His work on the history of Gujarati literature, Gujarat and its literature, and the treatise on the culture of Gujarat, Glory that was Gurjaratdes are unique in that genre.

Ramanlal Desai (1892-1954) is considered to be a representative novelist of the age, as his novels like Divyachaksu, Gramlakshmi, Jayant are based on Gandhian ideology and programme. His historical novel Bharelo agni is based on the military upsurge of 1857, but is infused with the anachronic idealism of Gandhian thought.

Dhumketu (Gaurishankar Govardhanram Joshi, 1892-1965) also tried his pen on innumerable historical novels, with no less success. But his forte is the short stories, running into three figures. The short story made its humble appearance with a minor writer like Malayanil, nourished by Dhansukhlal Mehta, Kanhaiyalal Munshi and others, but it reached its zenith with the stories of Dhumketu, like 'Post-office', 'Bhaiya dada' and innumerable others. These stories have emotionality as a common trait. Dhumketu can be described as the Premchand of Gujarat.

Jhaverchand Meghani (1897-1947) was described as a national bard by Gandhiji because of intense patriotism in his poetry. Many of his patriotic poems like 'Koino ladakvayo', 'Chhelli salam', 'Chhello katoro', 'Soona samdarni pale', 'Shivajinun halardun' and 'Kasumbino rang' were sung before the masses during the independence movement. His poetry in Yugvandana bears the mark of socialism. He was a researcher in folklore and folk literature. Loksahityanun samalochan, his lecture-series at the University of Bombay is a landmark in this direction. His other noteworthy works of this nature are Charano ane charani sahitya and Dharatinun dhavan. He edited the floating folk literature, lyrics and stories. Five parts of Saurashtrani rasadhara are collections of folk-stories narrated by him in his unique bardic style. Sorathi santvani, Sorathia duha, Sorathi gitkathao and four parts of Radhiali are his notable collections of folklore. He translated many poems of Rabindranath Tagore into Gujarati. His field work in folk literature supplied him with ample subjects for novels and short stories. His novels like Tulsi kyaro, Vevishal, and Niranjan have benefitted from Saurashtrian locale and local dialect. He was, thus, a the pioneer of colloquial novel in Gujarati literature. His historical novels like Samarangan, Ra Ganga jaliyo, Gujaratno jay and Sorath taran vahetan pani have also developed from the material he gathered during his field work and research on folk literature. Hence, these novels are also colloquial in nature. He has written several short stories, out of which those based on the outlaws of Kheda district, who were brought on the right path by Ravishanker Maharaj, collected in Mansaina Diva, are the best.

Right on the toes of Meghani, Pannalal Patel (b.1912), Ishvar Petlikar (1916-1983), Chunilal Madia (1922-1968) and Pushkar Chandavarkar (1920) wrote colloquial novels, some of which were of the first grade. Manavini bhavai and Malela jiv of Pannalal Patel, Janamtip of Ishvar Petlikar are landmarks in novels, only next to those of Munshi. Both these novelists have highlighted the rural life in its realistic perspective, with its rituals, beliefs and dialects, with all the adversities created by nature and society, with characters bursting with enthusiasm and emotions, love and hate, amity and enmity, challenging the adversities, sometimes submitting to them and at others overcoming them. Bavadana bale of Pushkar Chandavarkar, Liludi dharati of Chunilal Madia also come under this category.

Bhiru sathi, Bhangyana bharu, Nachiketa are other meritorious novels of Pannalal Patel. He has written a good number of short stories also. Ishvar Petlikar has written a number of novels besides Janamtip, like Mari haiyasagadi, Pankhino melo, Tarna othe, etc. and several short stories. Of late he started discussing social problems and adopted subjects from urban life for his fiction. He has written several essays discussing social problems also. Chunilal Madia, besides writing other colloquial novels like Vyajno varas, Vela valani Chhanyadi, attempted parodic-novels in Sadhara jesangno Salo and Grahastak vatta ek. Madia was an able short story writer also. 'Vani mari koyal', 'Antah srota' and 'Kamau dikro' have been considered amongst the best short stories of Gujarati literature. He was a dramatist also. His one-act plays like Mahajanane Khorde, Samrat Shrenik, Gatuni ba, Vish-Vimochan are serious and pathetic, whereas Once more and Var padharavo savdhan and the like are farces. He had a fine sense of judgement and insight into aesthetics which is discernible in his several essays of criticism collected in Varta-vimarsha, Granthgarima, Kathalok, Shahmrig suvarnamrig and other collections.

Pitambar Patel (1918-1968) was also a notable novelist who wrote with success colloquial novels like Rasio Jive, Khetarne khole and Gharno mobh along with a couple of novels on city life like Ashabhari and Kanto kevdano.

Darshak (Manubhai Pacholi, b 1914) is the most meritorious novelist of the age, and of subsequent period. He is an earnest student of history and culture, and a Gandhian thinker. His most meritorious novel Jher to pidhan chhe jani jani aspired to reach the height of the master novel Sarasvatichandra with the publication of the third part. He has depicted social, political as well as cultural problems on a universal canvas, around its two main characters—Rohini and Satyakam. The author aspires to find out the solution to these problems in the four tenets of Buddha, viz. friendship, sympathy, joy and indifference. It is a novel of assimilation of cultures, transcending landmark parochial limits of a society and a nation. His other novel is Socrates, published in the post-Independence period, but perfect in the tradition of Gandhian era, in which the hero sacrifices his life at the altar of truth. Bandhan ane mukti, Bandighar, Dipnirvan and Prem ane puja are his other creditable novels; Paritrans is his successful drama; Apano varaso ane vaibhav and Triveni tirth are contemplations on culture; and Vagisvariman karnaphulo is a collection of his critical essays.

Other fiction writers of note are Gunvantrai Acharya, Jayanti Dalal, Umashanker Joshi, Sundaram, Bachubhai Shukla, Shivkumar Joshi, Gualabdas Broker, Kishansinh Chavada and Jayant Khatri.

In the field of drama, Nrisinha Vibhakar (1888-1925) was the first to suggest that theatres should be considered centres of education and not recreation only. He wrote and staged some dramas and edited a periodical Rangbhumi for the promotion of drama. Chandravadan Mehta (b. 1901), an authority on dramatics, wrote some original dramas like Aggadi, Dhara Gurjari, Akho, Narmad, Kapurno divo, Nagabava, Shikharini and many others. He has some adaptations like those of Bhagavadajjukiya from Sanskrit, Karolianun jalun from Sartre's Exits and Madira from a Greek tragedy. He has authored many one-act plays and farces and directed and acted innumerable dramas. As a drama-critic, he has written several critical essays and treatises on the subject. Natak Bhajavatan, Natyarang, Vakyavyapar, American Theatre, Drama World of Europe are noteworthy amongst them. Perhaps, he is the only Indian author to write an autobiography in more than a dozen parts, known as Gatharian. This autobiography, apart from giving an account of the life and works of the author, gives an account of the currents in the cultural life of Gujarat and dramatic movements the world over. He is a stylist and a humorist also. He has also written some memorable poems and a couple of novels.

Batubhai Umarwadia (1899-1950) introduced one-act plays in Gujarati on the western pattern, as compiled in Matsyagandha, Maladevi, etc. Yashavant Pandya (1906-1955) is another playwright who popularised this form with his one-act plays like Sharatna ghoda, Madan mandir and Rasjivan. Dhansukhlal Mehta, Umashanker Joshi, Shivkumar Joshi, Chunilal Madia, Krishnalal Shridharani, Jayanti Dalal, Gulabdas Broker, Pushkar Chandavarkar, Yashodhar Mehta, Nandkumar Pathak, Damubhai Shukla, Indulal Yagnik, Dhananjay Thakar, Pragji Dosa, and Paramsukh Pandya are other successful playwrights of the age.

In the field of criticism, Ramnarayan Pathak (1887-1955), Vijayarai Vaidya (1897-1974), Vishvanath Bhatt (1899-1968) and Vishnuprasad Trivedi (1899) are the most prominent. Ramnarayan Pathak is a critic with profound scholarship in Sanskrit poetics and crystal clear understanding of the fundamentals of literature as is evident from his critical essays in Kavyani Shakti, Akalan, Sahityaalok and Arvachin kavyasahityanan vaheno. Brihat pingal and Prachin Gujarati chhando are his treatises on metrics. Vijayarai Vaidya introduced impressionistic criticism. Gujarati sahityani ruprekha, a history of Gujarati literature written by him on the model of Saintsbury, is precise, appreciative and scientific. His contribution to literary journalism is unparalleled because of his dedication to the literature. Vishvanath Bhatt follows mostly the principles of western criticism. His critical essays are mostly elaborate, analytical and appreciative and at times exposing plagiarisms of the authors. His bio-critical study of the poet Narmad is most noteworthy. Criticism by Vishnuprasad Trivedi is graceful and elegant in style, marked by assimilation of western and Sanskrit poetics with stress on values of aesthetics and morality, but not subordinating the former to the latter.

Dolarrai Mankad, Rasiklal Parikh, Ramprasad Baxi and Nagindas Parekh have enriched Gujarati criticism by their discussion of literary principles on the basis of Sanskrit poetics. Mansukhlal Jhaveri, Anantrai Raval and Dhirubhai Thakar are known for their elaborate and objective evaluations of authors and their works. Umashankar Joshi and Sundaram have earned name as poet-critics, whose conception of poetics is crystal clear, reflected in their own poetry and expressed in the discourses of literary principles and reviews of the works of other writers.

Other noteworthy critics are J.A. Sanjana, Navalram Trivedi, Premshanker Bhatt, Bhailal Kothari, Ratilal Trivedi and Gulabdas Broker.

Madhusudan Modi, Muni Jinavijaya, Bhogilal Sende-sara, Manjulal Majmudar, Keshavram Shastri and Kantilal B. Vyas are noted for their research in old and medieval literature. T.N. Dave and Bechardas Doshi are philologists of repute of this period.

Special note should be taken of Sukhlal Sanghavi (1880-1978) and Jyotindra Dave (1901-1980). The former is a scholar of Indian philosophy and a religious thinker and the latter is a scholar humorist. Deliberations of Sukhlalji in his books like Darshan ane Chintan, though based on Jain philosophy, are but comparative and conciliatory, and embrace a wide field of Indian philosophy. Jyotindra Dave's humour is intellectual, subtle and never stinging. His essays and lectures on Sanskrit poetics have earned him equal repute.

Distinguished personal essayists are Dhansukhlal Mehta, Gaganvihari Mehta, Chandravadan Mehta, Vijayarai Vaidya 'Vinodkant', Ramnarayan Pathak 'Swair-vihari' and Jayendra Durkal.

The post-Independence literature flows in two streams. The first is an extension of the literature of the Gandhian era, which is devoid of the Gandhian golden touch, but lays more emphasis on individual sensibility. Literature in the previous period was committed to a cause not related to literature, and as a result it was accused of being mere essays in metres. New stream has nothing to preach, or educate or evaluate. It is committed to itself, and more to aestheticity. During the decade prior to Independence, many events, like Second World War, atom-bomb attack on Hiroshima and Nagasaki, Quit India Movement and even partition of the country, occurred, but nothing could move the poets of the new generation to rise to express the emotions of the masses, as poets of the thirties did. Hence it is surmised that the poets of the fifties were introvert and more interested in expressing their own inner experiences than their social commitment. Deep anxiety, intensity of pain, unfathomable disappointment are the prime subjects of the poetry of the new generation. Poets of this generation are more concerned with the perfectness of the form and the choice of words. They do not indulge much in experimentation of metres, but are more inclined to harmony and grace in diction. They are more subjective and subtle in expression than the previous generation poets. Nature, love and devotion to God have pushed to second place the sentiments of nationality and sympathy towards the down-trodden. New poetry has become more romantic, sensuous and musical.

The second stream emerged in the second half of the fifties. Unlike the first, it is committed, anti-traditional, and subordinates the content to the form. It does not care much for harmony and does not hesitate to depict disharmony in the world in disharmonious diction. It travels from the realism of the thirties to surrealism. It is influenced by the philosophies of Sartre, Baudelaire and Camus, as well as Ezra Pound. Existentialism and surrealism in communion with nihilism, futurism and absurdism form the essence of modern world poetry; so is the case with the new-wave Gujarati poetry. Imagism, symbolism, structuralism and formalism have affected the fabric of form and diction of the new-wave literature. It has come as a reaction to the feeling of alienation due to urbanization and industrialization where an individual has lost his identity. He is in search of his own self, his sensibility, hence his own language and expression. The stream of consciousness is the only concern of art in general and literature in particular, and Gujarati literature could not remain unaffected by its influence. Poetry tended to be without meaning, fiction tended to be devoid of plot and dramas absurd. Criticism also adopted structuralistic and formalistic approach for evaluation. The high priest of this new wave in Gujarati is Suresh Joshi.

These two streams are not totally independent of each other. The writers of the first stream have adopted some of the tools of the second. Sometimes its sensibility is also influenced by the latter, as is evident from the later poetry of Umashanker Joshi and that of Niranjan Bhagat.

The prime poets of the first stream are Rajendra Shah (b. 1913), Niranjan Bhagat (b. 1926), Priyakant Maniar (1927-1976), Hasmukh Pathak (b. 1930), Nalin Raval (b. 1933), Jayant Pathak (b. 1920), and Ushanas (b. 1920). poetry of Rajendra Shah is an extension of Balvantrai Thakor in sonnets and Nanalal Kavi in lyrics. But his distinguishing characteristics, as revealed in his poetry in Dhvani, Andolan, Shant Kolahal and numerous other collections, are splendid depiction of nature, perfect deployment of metres, and Sanskritized but graceful diction. Niranjan Bhagat started with the romanticism of Kant and Nanalal with the classicism of Balvantrai Thakor in narrating nature and depicting love in his poems in Chhandolay and other collections, but disillusionment and solitariness landed him very near to the second stream, as is evident from his poems in Pravaldivip. These poems show the influence of The Waste Land of Eliot on the one hand and Tableaux Parisiens of Baudelaire on the other. The poems depict morbidity, monotony and frustration of the people in the metropolis. Priyakant Maniar, reminding us of the lyrics of Dayaram of the medieval period and Nanalal of the modern times by his lyrics of love and devotion in Pratik, Ashabda Iatri, etc. transforms himself into a new-wave poet in the poems of Prabal gati with surrealistic sensibilities and images. The poetry of Hasmukh Pathak in Nameli Sanj and of Nalin Raval in Udgar is more inclined towards the modernism than towards traditional poetry. Both of them are experimental poets. The poems in Nameli Sanj seem to be pregnant with a kind of cynicism, but the inner force of humanism saves the poetry of Hasmukh Pathak in Sayujya from the total loss of faith in the well being of human beings. Nalin Raval is more inclined towards aestheticism, and, therefore, there is transparency of images and a grace in his diction. Love of nature, nostalgia of native village and faith in the well being of humanity are subjects dear to the poet in Jayant Pathak as is evident from his poetry in Marmar, Sanket, Vismaya, Sarga, etc. Nature, love, devotion, family-love, urban and rural pictures are the varied subjects of the poems of Ushanas; grass and sunlight are his most favourite images. His diction is Sanskritized, but his vision is perfect, thought-oriented and prone to surprise. Nature has been revealed as a perfect sensuous entity in his poems in Prasun, Nepathye, Ardra, Spanda ane chhand and other collections. In 'Vyakul Vaishnav' the poet has revealed his genius as a devotional poet and in 'Shishulok' his parental love has found expression. 'Prithvine pashchim chehre' represents the receptive faculty of his genius for the experimentation of the second stream of modernity, but his conviction in human values and faith in the well-being of mankind is totally unperturbed by its philosophy.

The poetry of Makrand Dave (b. 1922) has a mystic tone. The pseudo devotional lyrics of Harindra Dave (b. 1930) and Suresh Dalal (b. 1932) are very popular, but the forte of their poetry is an expression of pain and despair of muffled lives in metropolitan cities. In spite of this, their search for the 'beautiful' is unrelented as is manifested in their innumerable poems.

Other notable poets of this stream are Prahlad Parekh, (1912-1962), Harishchandra Bhatt, Balmukund Dave (b. 1916), Venibhai Purohit (b. 1917), Pinakin Trivedi and Hemant Desai.

The traditional 'ghazal' form attained new vitality due to the revival of the 'mushaira' activity. In the pre-Independence period, Shayada and Bekar popularized this form, and in the post-Independence period. Ghayal, Gani Dahiwal, Mariz, Shunya Palanpuri, Ratilal Anil, Shaikhadam Abuwala, Mahendra 'Samir', Jamiyat Pandya, Amin Azad, Manhar Choksi, Nazir Dekhaiya, Kismat kureshi and Asim Randeri have nursed this form in the midst of experimentation which brought revolution in the concept of the content of this form.

The second stream of poetry in particular and literature in general is influenced by Suresh Joshi (b. 1921), more by his criticism than by his own writings. He interpreted the philosophy of Sartre, Freud, Baudelaire and Camus, their influence on continental literature, and propagated the theory of modernity in literature. According to the main principle of modernity, when a poet, attains the abstraction of his sensibility, the psychic distance transforms him into an aesthetic monad and creates innumerable forms. Without the psychic distance even a mighty-theme may fail to create anything. Being honest to his own conviction, Suresh Joshi cancelled his first collection of poems Upajati for its diction being traditional. In his subsequent poetry in Pratyancha and Itara, he depicted dehumanisation, loss of identity as an individual being and disgust towards the mechanistic civilisation of the metropolis. Social life and even nature have turned hostile. This he has expressed in a non-metric diction with a non-traditional employment and juxtaposition of images and myths.

Even the grotesque and the obscene have been depicted without hesitation in the new-wave poetry as is illustrated amply in the poems of Gulam Mohammad Sheikh. Labhshanker Thakar (b. 1935) is another prominent experimentalist. His existentialist sensibility has been expressed in innumerable variants with the free association of strange images and myths. Poems in Manasni vat, Mara namne darwaje and Boom kagalman kora are illustrative of his experimentation with new poetry. Sitanshu Yashashchandra (b. 1941) gave a decisive turn of surrealism to poetry in his 'Odyaseusnun halesun' in which he has depicted diversities in the world on the level of subconscious mind with the help of the free association of images and myths. Chandrakant Sheth (1938) gives a call to discard traditional flat language and seeks self-identity in the helpless and hopeless, adverse and diverse world, in his poems in Pavan ruperi (1972) and Ughadti diwalo (1974).

Ravji Patel (1939-1968) and Manilal Desai (1939-1966) have left marks of their individuality on modern poetry. Both were possessed by agony of death. Both had rural nostalgia. Hence there are fascinating and fresh pictures of nature's beauty, along with despair in life, in their poetry. So many other poets have come up who keep experimenting in order to give something new to the Gujarati readers. Some of them are Harshad Trivedi, Dinesh Kothari, Chandrakant Topiwala, Mahesh Dave, Manhar Modi, Abdul Karim Sheikh, Prabodh Parikh, Manoj Khanderia, Yashvant Trivedi, Anil Joshi, Yosef Mackvan, Pavankumar, Radheshyam Sharma, Panna Nayak, Vipin Parikh, Mafat Oza, Harikrishna Pathak, Shrikant Shah, Vinod Joshi, Jayandra Shekhadiwala and Manilal Patel.

A new trend in experimental lyrics developed combining the colloquial and folk-rhythm with the sensibility of the new stream and in contrast with the traditional lyrics of Priyakant Maniyar, Harindra Dave and Suresh Dalal. The pioneers of this new trend are Anil Joshi, Ramesh Parekh and Jagdish Joshi.

The ghazal form also went through the process of transformation. Its concept of the content is now totally changed and any subject under the sun or any sensibility of human being is the subject of this form. Along with that, its diction also discarded traditional vocabulary, picked up new images and adopted new patterns of rhyming. Pioneers of this experimentation are Adil Mansuri, Rajendra Shukla, Chinu Modi, Ramesh Parekh and Manoj Khanderia, who were followed by Bhagvatikumar Sharma, Manhar Modi, Javahar Baxi, Shyam Sadhu, Mukul Choksi and many others.

In the field of novel, Suresh Joshi, in the midst of fifties, declared that the Gujarati novel was on the verge of death and propagated its new concept. In 1965, he published his first novel Chhinnapatra, which was altogether non-traditional. It is an anti-novel in which the stream of consciousness is the main ingredient and the plot is altogether dissolved. His second work, Maranottar, has a metaphysical dimension. He is followed by Srikant Shah with an existentialistic novel Asti, and by Madhu Rai with the experimental novels Chahera and Kamini.

Before Suresh Joshi defined the concept of novel, Chandrakant Baxi had come forward with his first experimental novel, Akar, which was not an anti-novel but its hero had an existentialistic inclination. His other novels, Ek ane Ek and Paralysis tend to be non-traditional, as they have discarded all social and moral taboos and dealt with the inner world of each character.

Mahabhinishkraman of Mukund Parikh and Phero as well as Swapnatirtha of Radheshyam Sharma are new-wave novels depicting the stream of consciousness. Nishachakra of Kishore Jadav is an attempt at producing a surrealist novel.

The novels of Raghuvir Chaudhari are plot-oriented, but there is always a conflict between 'to be' and 'to become' at the end; the faith and the harmony triumph. In this respect his novels, Amrita, Venuvatsala, Uparvas, Sahvas and Antarvas are experimentalistic, employing at times the modern techniques and sensibilities, but not going much astray from the tradition.

Similarly Ravji Patel (Ashrughar and Jhaniha), Harindra Dave (Palnun pratibimb and Sukh namno pradesh), Dhiruben Patel (Vadvanal and Vansno ankur), Saroj Pathak (Nightmare), Chinu Modi (Bhav-abhav), Pinakin Dave (Vivart and Moha-nisha), Jayant Gadit (Chas paksi) Bhagavatikumar Sharma (Samaya dvip and Urdhvamul), Dharendra Mehta (Chinh and Adrishya) are the notable novelists of modern times.

Suresh Joshi pioneered the new-wave short story with his first collection Grihapraves and its introduction. He selects one or two subtle moments of the sub-conscious mind and weaves emotional sequences around it. He is followed by Madhu Rai who transform concrete into abstract in his stories in Bansi namni chhokari and other collections. Kishore Jadav has taken the short story to the extreme end of abstraction. His stories in Pragatihasik ane shoksabha are anti-hero and surrealistic. Suman Shah, Mahesh Dave, Chinu Modi, Prabodh Parikh, Jyotish Jani, Ghanashyam Desai, Utpal Bhayani and Radheshyam Sharma are modernist in story-writing. Raghuvir Chaudhari, Bhagavatikumar Sharma, Saroj Pathak, Iva Dev, Satyajit Sharma, Shashi Shah and Sudhir Dalal are notable story-writers of the modern times.

Under the influence of experimentalism, Gujarati dramatists, on the model of Samuel Beckett, tried their hand at absurd drama. The first attempt in this direction was made by Labhshankar Thakar and Subhash Shah jointly in Ek O Onder ane Jadunath, following which,

LITERATURE PARSI-GUJARATI

Mari javavani majha, Mansukhlal Majithia and Vriksa by Labhshanker Thakar, Jhervun by Madhu Rai, Pencil kabar ane minbatti by Adil Mansuri, Choras inda ane gol kabar by Mukund Parikh, Hukum malik by Chinu Modi, Baharnan polan by Subhash Shah appeared on the modern stage. The other notable writers of absurd drama are Shrikant Shah, Indu Puer, Manhar Modi, Suvarna Rai and Ramesh Shah. Suresh Joshi has taken the personal essay to new heights of aesthetic perfection in his essays in Janantike, Idam-sarvam, and Aho bata kim ashcharyam. These essays are poetical and written in a lucid and graceful prose. In these essays we know him as a thinker and as a lover of nature. He has covered a wide range of subjects in the essays, which are free from modernistic cynicism. Another prominent essayist is Digish Mehta whose essays in Durna e sur, at some places nostalgic by nature, seek harmony in strange persons and incongruent events and are elegant in style. Other noteworthy essayists are Chandrakant Sheth, Gunvant Shah, Bholabhai Patel, Bhagavatikumār Sharma, Aniruddh Brahmhatt, Raghubir Chaudhari and Vadilal Dagli.

In humorous essays, contributions of Chinubhai Patva, Bakul Tripathi, Madhusudan Parekh, Vinod Bhatt, Raman Pathak and Ratilal Borisagar are noteworthy.

Neo-criticism was initiated by Suresh Joshi. He has mostly done macro-criticism and introduced a new concept of creative literature and modes of its criticism in his critical essays in Kinchit, Kathopkathan, Shrinvantu, Aranyarudan and Ashtamodhyaya. He has hardly given any model of macro-criticism. But the impact of his accomplishments is unparalleled in Gujarati literature. According to him, formalism is the essence of neo-criticism. The concept of formalism was contradicted by the concept of structuralism in France. Taking a hint from that, Suman Shah propagated the structuralistic approach in criticism in his monograph entitled Navya vivechan pachhi (1977). Harivallabh Bhayani also discussed structural poetics and linguistic approach in criticism. Suman Shah in Chandrakant Baxithi phero and Chandrakant Topiwala in Pratibhashanun kavach have done considerable work on the principles of structuralism. Harivallabh Bhayani is an aesthetician as well as a linguist. He disapproves impressionist criticism, but is inclined towards linguistic and structural approach, as is evident in his Rachana ane samrachana. Sitanshu Yashashchandra, in his essays in Simankan ane simollanghan, has given some exercises in comparative and structural criticism, whereas in his thesis Ramaniyatando vagvikalpa, he has given, comparative assessment of western criticism and Indian poetics. Nagindas Parikh deals with macro-criticism based on Sanskrit poetics. Ramanlal Joshi, without being committed to any particular school, evinces an equally good understanding of traditional as well as modernistic approaches of criticism in his volumes of criticism like Govardhanram: Ek adhyayana, Samantar, Pariman, Shabdasetu and Vivechanani prakriya, etc.

Other noteworthy critics of this period are Yashvant Shukla (Upalabdhi), Bholabhai Patel (Adhuna), Chandrakant Sheth (Kavyapratyaksa, Arthantar), C.N. Patel (Kathabodh, Tragedy—Jivanman ane sahityaman), Hiraben Pathak (Kavyabhavan, Paribodhana, Vidruti), Ramesh Shukla (Kalapi ane Sanchit, Narmad : Ek samalochana, Anuvak, Kuntakno vakroktivichar), Pramodkumar Patel (Shabdlok, Kathavivechan prati), Upendra Pandya (Avabodh, Pratibodh), Hemant Desai (Kavitani samaj, Kavyasangati, Arvachin Gujarati sahityaman prakritinirupan), Chandrakant Mehta (Anur-anan, Madhyakalin sahitya-prakaro), Pravin Darji (Charvana, Pratyagra), Jayant Kothari (Anukram, Upakram, Vivechannun vivechan), Ramanlal Shah (Kritika, Padileha), Mafat Oza (Udghosh, Unnatbhru, Unmiti, Swatantryottar Gujarati kavita), and Yashvant Trivedi (Kavyani paribhasha, Ishika).

In folk literature Pushkar Chandavarkar, Joravar-sinha and Khodidas Parmar are doing valuable research work. Prabodh Pandit, Harivallabh Bhayani, Shantilal Acharya, Dayashanker Joshi and Yogendra Vyas have contributed to valuable research in the field of linguistics.

LITERATURE PARSI (Gujarati). Parsis left Persia, their motherland to save their lives and religion from the Arabs. They came to India in the 10th century AD and settled in Sanjan, a small State in South Gujarat. They mixed with the people very quickly. The Parsi community had a distinguished quality namely adaptability to foreign manners and customs. They found no difficulty in picking the language, social customs, dress etc. from the Gujaratis.

Parsis are known to be kind, generous, adventurous and sociable by nature. They possess a good sense of humour and are fun-loving. They are sentimental too. But they are optimists and like to have an easy-going life. In literature they have mostly preferred to write novels with happy endings.

Parsis after their arrival in Gujarat gradually forgot their original language and culture. In the reign of Hindu kings, they adopted the Gujarati language own their as. During the Muslim rule, Parsi (Persian) was the state language. Some Parsis learnt it. During the British rule in India, English culture had a great impact on the minds of Indian people. They learnt the English language and studied their literature, but their language at home remained the same Gujarati, to which they were accustomed for many years. Of course, the Gujarati they adopted was different from the pure, Gujarati language spoken by Gujarati people. The reason was that the Parsis had some difficulty in pronouncing certain types of words.

LITERATURE PARSI-GUJARATI

So they changed the pronunciation of quite a few Gujarati words. Moreover they mixed Arabic, Persian, Urdu and English words in their adopted language. A small portion of the Parsi community did try in earnest to speak and write pure Gujarati, but most of them had a dislike for pure, and Sanskritized Gujarati. They preferred their own Parsi-Gujarati dialect for general communication and even for literature. Most of the Parsi writers have written their literary works in Parsi-Gujarati dialect.

In the second decade of the 19th century Gujarati was brought under the British rule. The people were so tired of terrors during the Muslim and the Maratha rule, that they accepted the British rule as a boon. The British rulers established schools, and introduced press, industry, machinery and new tools of communication.

The Western thought and culture inspired some enthusiastic people to equip themselves with the new learning and culture. They came in contact with the English language and literature. Western education and thought created an awareness of the social evils in them. They tried to educate people and bring them out of superstitions, the practice of child-marriages and other social evils. The same miserable social condition prevailed in the Parsi community also. They faced the same problems prevalent in Hindu society. So some elite Parsies also tried to criticise the harmful social customs through literature.

Parsis are pioneers in many fields of life. Fardoonji Marzban was the first to publish a Gujarati newspaper, Mumbai Samachar. In the field of drama, prominent Parsis took the lead. English dramas, novels and poetry caught their minds. In drama, Shakespeare attracted the young students most. Some Parsi playwrights adapted the plays of Shakespeare in their Parsi-Gujarati dialect to suit the taste of their community. Kekhusharu Kabaraji wrote plays based on not only on the ancient stories of famous persons of their mother-land, but also depicted the contemporary Parsi society and its current problems in social plays. Kekhusharu was a great dramatist. He was also a social thinker. He noticed the evil effects of western culture on young generation. Parsi youths took pride in imitating the western manners. Kekhusharu criticised sharply the prevalent mentality of the young minds in his social dramas.

Kekhusharu Kabaraji, Bamanji Kabaraji, Khurshedji Baliwala are big names in the field of Parsi drama. Some playwrights were good actors too. They established various drama associations or companies to stage plays.

Though Parsis did not publish any outstanding plays, they showed the writers the direction for dramas.

In the field of poetry, in the later part of the 19th century, some Parsi poets such as Jamshedi Petit, Mancherji Langadana 'manasukha', Rustam Irani, Dadabhai Doradi, Jabuli Rustom, Jahangeer Talyarkhan, Pahlanji Desai wrote poems on some famous persons or events from the Persian books, or on religious themes or on the customs and manners of contemporary society. Some poets wrote poems in Samal-Dalpat style.

In the 20th century Baheramji Malbari and Ardeshar Khabardar were famous names in the field of poetry. They insisted on writing in pure, literary Gujarati and became popular in Gujarati literary field as well.

Anubhavika and Sansarika are the famous books of the poet Malbari. The poet Khabardar has shown his talent not only in the field of poetry but also in the field of criticism. His poems about national pride and dignity have been widely appreciated in Gujarat. Bharata no Tankar, Rashtrika and Darshanika are his famous books of poetry showing him as a good poet and thinker.

Meenu Desai and Bejan Desai are also notable names to be mentioned as poets of the early 20th century.

In the first half of the 19th century Parsi writers had already begun to write short stories. They translated the stories mostly from Persian.

But in the later half of the 20th century, a Parsi writer, Sorabsha Dadabhai Munsafna, introduced the new form of novel for the first time in Gujarati. Of course, the first Gujarati novel was a translation of Indian Cottage, an English novel. But Munsafna was the first Parsi novelist who published the translated novel Hindustan madhye nun eka zunpadun in 1862. It was a very interesting novel putting stress on the values of ancient Indian culture. The fact that three editions were sold within five years speaks a lot about the popularity of that novel.

In the last quarter of the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th century Parsi authors published a great number of novels—mostly in Parsi-Gujarati dialect. They found the medium of novel suitable for propagation of social reforms.

At the same time Kekhusharu Kabaraji, Dadi Tara-porwala, Jahangir Talyarkhan, Jahangir Marzban, and a few others used their creative talent for original novels. Phiroz Marzaban 'Pizam', Bamanji Kabaraji, Jahangir Patel, 'Gulfam', and many other novelists wrote in Parsi-Gujarati dialect. Their novels did not reach the vast majority of readers in Hindu society. And on the other hand Kekhusharu Kabaraji, Dadi Tara-porwala and Jahangir Marzaban's novels, written in Gujarati, were widely read and appreciated by a large part of Hindu society.

From the view point of artistic quality the Parsi novels cannot be placed in a very high category. They are just readable and they acquaint the reader with the customs, manners and ways of life of the Parsi society.

On the whole Parsi literature may not be considered outstanding, but it should be appreciated that a community which settled in Gujarat and adopted the Gujarati language, customs, and manners tried its best to contribute to the field of drama, poetry and novels in Gujarati literature. No writer of the history of Gujarati literature can afford to ignore the large current of Parsi literature flowing side by side with that of Gujarati literature.

LITERATURE (Hindi). A background knowledge of the traditions of Indo-Aryan languages notably those of Sanskrit, Prakrit and Apabhramsha, is essential for an understanding of the history of Hindi literature. Hindi and its various dialects have grown out of the Shaurseni Apabhramsha and Ardha Magadhi. These dialects contribute considerably to the evolution of Hindi as a composite language. As such literatures in these dialects are part and parcel of Hindi literature. On the basis of the gradual development of these dialects from Apabhramsha, some scholars consider the eighth century A.D. as the early period of Hindi literature. But a better historical perspective can be had if the tenth century A.D. is taken as the first phase in the evolution of Hindi, for the works of Nathapanthis or Siddhas are not in Hindi but in Apabhramsha or pseudo-Prakrit. Their works, however, have preserved the early grammatical forms of certain nouns, pronouns and verbs of the later-day Hindi. The influence of local dialects (or Desh-bhasha as they were called) on these writers has been pointed out by Acharya Ramachandra Shukla in his History of Hindi Literature.

Some literary works of Jain poets who are cited by Hemachandra (12th century) in Shabdanushasana and particularly in Kumarapala-pratibodha, an epic in Sanskrit by Somaprabha Suri, provide glimpses of the lexical and syntactical forms of old Hindi in the various quotations.

Formative Period or Adikal: The poets who wrote in so-called Desh bhasha and even Apabhramsha chose their subject matter related to the contemporary social ethos, ethics, chivalry and amorous love, heroic deeds, marriages and hunting. Hence this period is called an age of heroic songs or Viragatha Kal or Kaal. In spite of prolific output in this age, the genuineness of many of the works is suspect. Prithviraj raso of Chand Baradayi, Khuman raso, Bisaldeva raso, Jaichandra prakash and Alha khand of Jagnik are some of the well-known works of this period. Vidyapati, the great Maithili poet, wrote in Avahatta of Desh bhasha. The Pahlis and Mukaris of Amir Khusrau can be said to have sown the seeds of the modern Khari boli.

Bhakti Period: After the fall of the brave Hammir Dev, the Hindi speaking area in general sank into despair due to political unrest. The religious minded people among the Hindus turned to God for inspiration and sustenance. The great saints like Kabirdas showed the path of devotion to Nirguna or Nirakar (formless or abstract) God. They denied the Saguna or Sakar (with a concrete form) God since faith in such a god was shaken badly when the devotees found themselves quite helpless before the plunder of Somanath temple by Mahmud Ghazanavi.

Kabir provided spiritual strength to the community which was then torn apart in the name of castes and creeds. He accepted Ramananda, a preacher of Advaita, as his mentor. He extolled the concept of Nirguna Brahma, deplored Hindus for their religious ceremonies, criticised the Muslims for their blind religiosity and expounded his own views in such verse forms as 'doha' 'soratha' and 'pad'. His discourses compiled by his disciples are now published under the title of Kabir granthavali. Among the followers of Kabir's mode of bhakti (known as 'Gyanashrayi' bhakti or bhakti based on knowledge) are Dadu, Raidas, Sunderdas, Malukdas. Guru Nanak Dev also preached his gospel of Akala Brahma as a mode of Nirguna bhakti.

The Nirguna school had another offshoot in the form of the path of love or Premmarg. The poets belonging to this school celebrated the union of God and soul through love. Most of the poets of this branch belong to the Sufi cult of Islam. These poets took Hindu folk-tales as the subject-matter of their books. Malik Muhammad Jayasi, the most brilliant and important among these poets, wrote his epic Padamavat by adopting the popular story of Ratansen and his consort Padmavati and adding mystical significance to the tale, written in the Doha-Chaupayi style of narrative. In his other work Akharavat he used the local Avadhi dialect. Among the other prominent poetical works of this school, Kutban's Mrigavati, Manjhan's Madhumalati and Saikh Nabi's Jnan deep are notable.

Some poets found solace and comfort in the mythical stories and epics of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata. They popularised the Saguna cult by worshipping Rama and Krishna as human incarnations.

Tulsidas, the most renowned poet of the ages based his epic Ramcharitmanas on the story of Rama bestowing all charm and glory on this character and propounding his world-view through the presentation of the ideal values of life. His Vinay-patrika with its enchanting melodious devotional poems and Kavitavali with its Kavit and Savaiyya metrical style are mature works. His works have in general the prerequisites of great poetry. Keshavdas of Orcha subjugated his treatment of the theme to that of rhyme and technique in general in his famous epic Ramachandrika; Praneshchand Chauhan and Hridayaram wrote the plays entitled Ramayana mahanatak and Bhasha Hanumannatak respectively. Madhurya Ram-bhakti fashioned after the Krishna cult could not yield any work of much significance. Among the prominent Krishna cults which found their full treatments in literary works are Nimbark cult, Vallabha cult, Chaitanya gauduja cult, Radhavallabha cult, and Sakhi cult of Swami Haridas. All these cults flourished in Brajmandala and Brajbhasha.

Vallabhacharya baptized eight poets: Surdas, Parmanandas, Nanddas, Krishnadas, Chaturbhujdas Kum-bhandas, Govindswamy, Cheetswamy and later on his own son Vitthalanath—under his 'Pushtimarg', forming what is called 'Ashtachhap'. Surdas, prominent among these, composed, as per the general belief, about one and a quarter lakh verses but now only 5500 are available under the title of Sursagar. Nanddas who is credited with the authorship of fifteen books wrote his masterpiece Rasapanchadhyayi. His Bhanwargit shows vitality and freshness of approach. Yugal shatak of Sribhatta of the Nimbark cult explains the doctrine of Madhurya bhava. Hariram Vyas, Dhruvadas and Sevak of Radhavallabha cult, Gadadhar Bhatt of Chaitanya cult and Swami Haridas of Sakhi cult—all were poets of great eminence.

Mirabai with her fine linguistic blend of Rajasthani and Brajbhasha in her padas, and Rasakhan with his extraordinary command over Brajbhasha were also poets of great repute in their own time.

This period thus is reckoned as the most fruitful period of literary output.

Riti period: Though the poets of the bhakti period put their poetic talent in the service of Lord, at some places the descriptions of erotic love and sports of gods tended to reflect the tendency of the times. The court poets took up this trend for gaining patronage and pleasure of nobles and kings. Such poets are grouped under the name of 'Ritimukta' poets or poets who are free from the compulsory writing of poetical treatises. The poets who wrote these treatises were called Acharya poets. A couple of poets adhered to heroic poetry while some composed their devotional songs in Saguna or Nirguna style. Bhushan, Sudan, Chandashekhar Bajpeyi, Lalkavi and Chhatrasal belong to the former category, whereas Rajjab, Sundardas, Palatu, Malukdas, Premnath, Charandas, Sahjobai, Dayabai, Dariyasaheb, Tulsidas of Hatharas and Nur Muhammad to the latter. Though Keshava wrote his poetic treatises Rasik priya and Kan priya long before, Chintamani set the trend of writing poetical treatises. Chintamani is believed to have been the propagator of this tradition by writing Rasa manjari, Kavikalpataru, Kavyaprakash and such other works. Those who followed him include Matiram, Kulapati Mishra, Sukhadeva Mishra, Devadatta Dev, Shripati, Rasalin, Bhikaridas, Somanath, Rasik Govind and Padmakar.

Among the Ritimukta poets mention may be made of Biharilal for his well-known work Bihari sataasai and Ghananand for his mastery over language. Some other poets belonging to this group are Rasanidhi, Senapati, Bodha, Alam, Thakur and Brajanidhi. Besides these there were also poets writing on didactic, and ethical themes. Notable among them are Vrind, Beni, Baital Ghagha and Dindyalgiri.

Modern Period: The tendency of writing poetry on the lines of conventional poetical laws and choosing amorous love as the sole theme tended to make poetry stereo-typed and trite. With the decline of the great Mughal Empire and the rise of the British power in the country, there was a new awakening or Renaissance in society. This change in outlook led the writers to choose the social, economic and political struggles of the people as their theme. This period was an age of prose with an abundance of prose writings perhaps second only to poetry. The Fort William College of Calcutta and its first teacher John Gilchrist played a crucial role in shaping the future of Hindi prose. Lalulal and Sadal Mishra, the two language munshis of this college, Insha Allah Khan and Sadasukhlal wrote and translated various texts in prose.

The Christian missionaries also contributed much to this cause by their publications and distribution of booklets and religious literature. Swami Dayanand wrote his Satyartha prakash and other half a dozen works in Hindi prose. Theosophical Society also rendered much service to spread the use of Hindi prose in propaganda literature. The publications of newspapers, periodicals and journals helped considerably to strengthen the forces engaged in spreading the cause of prose.

Bharatendu Harishchandra's attempts at writing prose in Khari boli and poetry in Braj bhasha are considered to be epoch-making. He set the ideal of middle course in choosing his language by avoiding the excessive use of Arabic and Persian or Sanskrit lexicon with that of Hindi. Pratapnarain Mishra, Balkrishan Bhatta, Badarinarain Chaudhari 'Premghan', Thakur Jagmohan Singh, Ambika Dutt, all these gave a new dimension to short stories, plays, essays and other prose forms. Among the Europeans who took keen interest in this field, the name of Frederick Pincot is foremost. This age also saw an abundance of plays being written and staged. Translations of Bengali, Urdu and English plays also set the tempo of the age.

Pariksha Guru of Lala Srinivasdas set the trend of writing fiction. Devakinandan Khatri's Chandrakanta Santati and Chandrakanta were the most popular novels of the time. Short stories in this period do not show any sign of modernity. The essay as a branch did not bloom much. Poems were still written in Braj bhasha.

After the death of Bharatendu, Braj bhasha and Khari boli were vying with each other for supremacy in literary usage. The after-effects of this are apparent in the writings of the Dwivedi period which is the age of awareness of grammatical correctness. Mahabirprasad Dwivedi, after whom the period is called the Dwivedi period, was puritanically stoic in his approach to language. He also helped considerably in promoting the writing of prose through his magazine Saraswati. Khari boli was adapted as the language of poetry also in the works of Ayodhya Singh Upadhyaya 'Harioudh', Maithilisharan Gupta, Nathuram Shankar Sharma and Ramnaresh Tripathi. The prose writings of Babu Balamukund Gupta, Madhavaprasad Mishra, Govindnarayan Mishra, Puran

LITERATURE-KANNADA

Singh, Chandradhar Sharma Guleri, Padma Singh Sharma and others showed the linguistic power of Khari boli. Thus Khari boli took the entire range of literature under its command by ousting Braj bhasha completely.

Priya pravas of Harioudh is the first epic in Khari boli. Premchand who turned to Hindi fiction after trying his hand in Urdu showed his talent by stirring the social consciousness of his avid readers through his treatment of contemporary social problems.

In the field of poetry the poetical form underwent a sea-change. The poetry called Rahsyavad and/or Chhayavad dealt with mysticism. The word 'Chhayavad' in this context signifies mysticism, fantasy or spirituality. Jaishankar 'Prasad', Suryakant Tripathi 'Nirala', Sumitranandan Pant and Mahadevi Verma are regarded as the poets of this period. Some critics also took the word Chhayavad to signify a particular style of poetry. The works of these poets are great in number. Some poets like Makhanlal Chaturvedi, Subhadrakumari Chauhan, Harivansh Rai 'Bachchan', Ramdhari Singh 'Dinkar', Bala-krishna Sharma 'Navin', Rameshwar Shukla 'Anchal', Mohanlal Mahato and Viyogi Hari showed romantic spirit in their poetry.

Meanwhile, another trend known as Pragativad took inspiration from socialism and Marxism. Anchal, Shiv-mangal Singh 'Suman', Nagarjun and others followed this tendency of so-called progressivism. Sachchidanand Hir-nand Vatsyayan 'Agyeya', through his Tarsaptak, an anthology of seven poets pleaded for Prayogvad. His subsequent publications of three 'Saptakas' are significant for noting the changing values in Hindi poetry. The lyric tradition continued through the compilation of lyrics for school and college text books.

In recent years Hindi poetry assumed many forms under the banners of Nai Kavita, Vichar Kavita and Gita Kavita. The march is still on.

Premchand's major contribution to fiction was to change the course of the novel of his time through social realism. Jainendra Kumar, undaunted by the influence of Premchand, carved his own place by his individual style and plot treatment. Vrindavanlal Verma emerged as a historical novelist of good standing. Yashpal adopted Marxist ideology in his fiction. Hazariprasad Dwivedi and Agyeya carved out their special identity by their thematic and stylistic techniques.

In the field of short story, the above mentioned writers contributed much with their hundreds of short stories. Kamleshwar, Nirmal Verma, Mohan Rakesh, Rajendra Yadav, etc. are writers of the Nai Kahani school of short story. The Hindi short story by its own strength and virtue can claim a place among the world short stories of today.

In the field of Hindi plays, after Bharatendu, Jaishankar Prasad exhibited a harmonization of history and culture. Harikrishna Premi wrote many historical plays. Lakshminarain Mishra wrote problem plays. The remarkable one-act play writers are Ramkumar Verma, Udayshankar Bhatta, Vishnu Prabhakar, Jagdishchandra Mathur, Lakshminarain Lal and others. Though the plays grow along with stage production the direct link between the stage and the literary genre was broken. It was again restored by Mohan Rakesh, Lakshminarain Lal and others. Vishnu Prabhakar also wrote radio plays. Now television has also taken up the presentation of Hindi plays.

The publication of Saraswati gave great impetus to essayists. Acharya Ramchandra Shukla seems to be one of the greatest essayists of the time. Premchand, Jainendra, Agyeya, Siyaramasharan Gupta, Nanddulare Vajapeyi, Hazariprasad Dwivedi, Ramvilas Sharma, Shantipriya Dwivedi, Nagendra, Namwar Singh and many others enriched the critical essay. Hazariprasad Dwivedi, Babu Gulab Rai and Vidyanivas Mishra have contributed much in making prose rich.

Among the new prose writing, mention is to be made of memoirs and pen-sketches of Mahadevi Verma, Banar-asidas Chaturvedi, Rambriksha Benipuri, Shivpujan Sahay, Kanhaiyalal Mishra 'Prabhakar', Vinaymohan Sharma and Prabhakar Machwe. Hindi magazines of today abound in varieties of essays.

The tradition of writing biography as well as auto-biography continued from the time of Bharatendu. Swami Dayanand wrote his autobiography. In recent years Amrit Rai wrote Kalam ka sipahi which got Sahitya Akademi award for 1963, a biography of Premchand; Vishnu Prabhakar authored a biography of Saratchandra as Awara masiha. Rajendra Prasad, Babu Gulab Rai, Viyogi Hari, Shantipriya Dwivedi, Bechan Sharma 'Ugra', Acharya Chatursen Shastri and others produced their autobiographies. The art of writing biography, memoir, etc., is still flourishing in Hindi.

In short, Hindi literature has always been marching ahead, assimilating contemporary ideologies, streams of thoughts and styles during its long course of one thousand years long journey. It is still flourishing with full vigour due to its ability to assimilate and mould itself to suit the spirit of the time.

LITERATURE (Kannada). Kannada is one of the oldest Dravidian languages, next only to Tamil. The first extant writing in Kannada with a literary flavour goes back to the Halmidi Inscription of about 450 A.D. Judging by the language, it is likely that it had behind it the literature of a century or two. The metre and the poetical quality of the Tametkal Inscription (fifth century. A.D.) strengthens this conjecture.

Old Kannada literature may be divided into two periods—the Beginning. up to 850 A.D., and the Classical Age, 850-1150.

The beginnings are to be found in the inscriptions. The most important are the Halmidi Inscription and the Tametkal Inscriptions, and the Badami Inscription of 700 A.D. which contains an interesting description of a much admired hero, Kappe-Arabhatta. He was, says the inscription, gentle to the gentle, a friend to the friendly, but a terror to the mischievous. The description is often quoted as summing up the Kannadiga's ideal of a perfect man.

The first extant work in Kannada is Kavirajamarga (9th century A.D.). Kavirajamarga is a work on poetics; such a work cannot appear without a considerable body of creative writing. The discussion of metre and grammatical questions, and the range of illustrations, and the references to the great masters of the past some of whom (like Vimala, Udaya, Nagarjuna, Jayabandhu and Durvinita) are explicitly named, make it clear that a considerable body of literary writings has indeed been lost.

Kavirajamarga is a very important work, offering both evidence of the existence of literary writing before it, and glimpses of contemporary social and religious life. The period from 850-1150 A.D. is one of plenitude. To it belongs the first prose work Vaddaradhane. Pampa, the pioneer of the literary tradition of Kannada, wrote his two epics. He was followed by another great poet, Ranna. The works of this age are, except for some stories in Vaddaradhane, concerned with the lives of the great and the mighty. In saying this, we must remember that our assessment is based only on the available writings, and also that the folk-literature of this age is not available. It is all narrative and religious literature. It was, historically, a period of many princes and frequent clashes, when life was uncertain and the call of the battle always imminent. This has been called the Vira Yuga, the Epoch of Heroism, in Kannada literature. Pampa was both a commander of his patron's army and the best poet in his court. Jainism was very powerful in Karnataka in this period. So we find epics celebrating the prowess of great heroes like Bhima and Arjuna. At the same time, valour or heroism of another kind that is celebrated (and, more highly venerated than the heroism of the warrior) is the heroism of the saint, who conquers the enemies within. The poets enjoyed royal patronage and, without being sycophants, celebrated their greatness. The heroic spirit is enshrined even in the conversations of ordinary soldiers in Pampa. This is the Champu Age. The poets were concerned with form, and deliberately made their choice. They composed epics judiciously mixing prose with verse.

Pampa is the Adi Kavi—the first poet, the poets' poet. Ranna, Nagavarma, Nagachandra and Nayasena are the other important poets of this age. The edicts themselves, not seldom, have prose with a literary flavour. The prose of Vaddaradhane is the prose of the common man. The prose of Trishashtilakshana purana (by Chavundaraya) is that of a Sanskrit scholar, compact and majestic.

The second half of the twelfth century and the thirteenth century witnessed strains of many kinds in the Deccan plateau. The dynasties of the Chalukyas and the Kalachuryas were engaged in grim conflicts. Established religious influences were on the wane. Ramanujacharya and Madhvacharya taught the power of 'bhakti'. In literature the champu tradition was waning, and one of the most powerful movements in the history of Karnataka, the Virashaiva movement, began. It was at this time that the Vachanakaras (composers of Vachanas) appeared on the literary horizon. Jedara Dasimayya (1140 A.D.) was probably the first vachanakara. Basaveshwara or Basavanna (1131-1167) made the vachana a powerful instrument of feeling and reflection.

The curious fact is that the vachanakaras did not regard themselves primarily as poets; they were not creating literature as such. They were Virashaivas. They were charged with extra-ordinary religious fervour. They were Shivsharanas, who had surrendered themselves to Lord Shiva. They would recognize no inequality among the servants of the Lord and were, therefore, sternly opposed to the caste system. They valued clean life and right conduct above rituals. Among them were men and women from all strata of society. There were scholars, men in the royal court, cobblers, tailors and labourers. It is interesting to remember that one of the Vachanakaras was a converted prostitute. Women came of their own to this movement. Moved simultaneously by their total dedication to Shiva and their indignation against social inequalities and empty rituals these men and women shared their spiritual experiences with their companions, poured out their hearts to the Master, and also denounced hypocrisy and social injustice. The medium they used was the Vachana—a prose form of indeterminate length characterized by compactness and rich imagery which we associate with poetry. Because of the power of their vision and the intensity of their feeling and the natural articulation of their spirits, what they said often became literature.

Thus Vachana literature provided a break from the narrative. It introduced the lyrical element and brought a vast range of experiences and social criticism into literature. It was utterance for the common man and, quite often, by men and women who were from the masses. Every literary movement in the twentieth century has derived inspiration from this literature in one way or another.

In the thirteenth century there appeared poets who were inspired by bhakti like the Vachanakaras but unlike them, consciously composed poetry, paying attention to form and to the mechanics of poetry. They had the moral earnestness and the desire to educate, which characterized the Vachanakaras; but they chose to do this through narrative poems and by placing examples before their readers, while the Vachanakaras had sought to introspect and share their spiritual experiences. Harihara, the first of these poets, used not champu but a new metre, 'ragale' (though his first work was in champu). He went back to mythology to display the greatness of the Lord in Girijakalyana but thereafter he chose to write about the great men of the immediate past, like Basavanna. He depicted their total surrender to the Lord and the tests devised by the Lord that the world might realize the greatness of the devotee. So a new form of heroism is celebrated in his 'ragales'. Harihara cared for the ordinary man, he revered purity of conduct and simple piety; his scale of values is implicit in his choice of subject matter, rejection of wearisome conventions and in his language. His nephew, Raghavanaka, wrote in the same spirit, but he revealed the potentiality of the 'shatpadi' (a six-line metre). The shatpadi school yielded a magnificent harvest, in the work of Virupaksha Pandita, Kumaravyasa, Chamarasa and Laksmisha. For him the earth is not, as for Harihara, a separation from the heavenly abode but an arena where man learns and ripens. While Harihara is the more exuberant poet, Raghavanka is more restrained and dramatic.

The champu tradition did not quite disappear. Rudrabhatta's Jagannatha vijaya and Janna's Yashodhara charitra continued it. Janna is a class by himself, with his interest in human nature and its strange workings, so that his work transcends his didactic purpose. The age also saw, in Anadya's Kabbigara kava, a protest against the excessive use of Sanskrit and the consequent gulf between the poet and the reader.

The signal achievement of this age is the creation of a new image of the hero. Not physical prowess, not the letting loose of rivers of blood on the battlefield, but the moral fibre makes the hero. Narrative poetry recovered its place. The poets, as their choice of metres and their experiments show, are once again concerned with form.

Kumaravyasa is one of the great poets who would bestow lustre on any age. Like all great poets, he absorbs from a tradition whatever gives him strength, and, writing within the tradition, modifies and enriches it. Bhakti is still the energizing power pervading a poem but here is a poet with genuine interest in human nature, and a central vision of his own. He is at once the voice of his age and a poet of all ages. He brings his beloved deity, Krishna, right into the action, never forgets that he is God in human form, and yet convinces us that his characters have choice and moral responsibility. He is one of the earliest poets to display a genuine sense of humour. His language draws from all sources from Sanskrit to colloquialism and he daringly coins expressions. It has range and vitality. Another bhakti poet is Chamarasa. He follows in the footsteps of Harihara and Raghavanka. Chamarasa's language has the simplicity of a master who knows restraint. The tradition of narrating the lives of saints in verse is continued by Bhimakavi and Virupaksha Pandita.

The study of the Vachanas is accepted as a serious pursuit in this age and their interpretation and preservation becomes a labour of love.

In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries there appeared a school of philosopher-saints who combined music with preaching and devotion. These singer-preachers came to be known as 'Haridasas'—the servants of Lord Hari. Most of them were followers of Madhva (Kanakadasa was a conspicuous exception) who sought to take Vedanta to the common man. They used Kannada and they composed songs; they went about seeking 'dana' from the people' and at the same time carrying the praise of Lord Hari, the teachings of Vedanta and the message of a pure life, from door to door. Like the Vachanakaras they decried mere rituals and stressed the importance of right conduct. The first of the Haridasas was probably Naraharithirtha (14th century). The greatest names here are Purandaradasa and Kanakadasa. The Haridasas also were not concerned with producing literature—they were disseminating the message of Bhakti and of right conduct. But, like the Vachanakaras, they also left behind a considerable body of good poetry. Purandaradasa is the father of Carnatic music also; the Haridasas harnessed music, too, to their chariot of devotion. It would be wrong to suggest that the compositions of the dasas were all didactic. Some of them are lovely descriptions of the Lord, particularly as the Divine Child. Most of them were great scholars, but used simple language and homely images to reach the common man.

The inspirations of the earlier phases continued to work for some more time and gradually waned. Timman-na Kavi, for example, continued the epic of Kumaravyasa and added the last parvas. Nanjundakavi is important as having chosen a hero of folk-poetry as the hero of the Ramanathacharita. He is influenced by Kumaravyasa. He chose the shatpadi. Lakshmisha has remained an immensely popular poet. He is a superb story-teller and presents a situation in intensely human terms. But he is not a major poet, for he has no vision, no individual response to life. Ratnakaravarni's Bharatesha viabhava is the reconciliation of 'bhoga' (enjoyment) with 'yoga' (spiritual perfection). The most interesting figure in this phase is Sarvajna, the people's poet, quoted even today in city and village, by the educated and the illiterate. He chose the tripadi or triplet for his writing. The court of Chokkadevaraja Wodeyar of Mysore was the home of poets like Honnamma, the first Kannada poetess whose work is extant. Outside his court was Shadaksharadeva, who continued the champu tradition. On the whole, the last phase shows a comparative decline in literary values. Except for Sarvajna, the poets are not close to common clay as the Vachanakaras and the Haridasas are.

The literature of the entire medieval period springs from religious devotion and moral earnestness. There is also, in a considerable part of it, the desire to reform society. A democratic spirit also enters literature. Dependence on patron kings disappears. The kinship of spiritual endeavour becomes important. The Classical Age is the age of Jain poets. Virashaiva and brahmin poets come to the fore in the Medieval Period. Champu loses its dominant place. The Vachana and the Shatpadi are the new vehicles. Later, the Haridasas integrated music and poetry and still later, other metres like the tripadi and the Sangatya came to be used. Vachana and Haridasa literatures have continued to influence Kannada writers and the tradition has survived right down to modern times. This is a period of experimentation. Yet, the range of literary forms was limited. The lyrical element was not yet pronounced. Drama did not appear. The prose story also did not develop in spite of the inspiration of Vaddaradhane. A fiercely honest examination of values is the gift of this literature as also the introspective spirit.

The eighteenth and the greater part of the nineteenth centuries were a comparatively barren stretch. Not that no literature appeared. The Haridasa and the Vachana traditions persisted; poems were written in Shatpadi and Sangatya metres. But by and large this period has no great literature to offer.

Although it is impossible to account for the paucity of genius some factors contributing to the decline of literature may be mentioned. These were, politically and socially, extremely troubled times. Conflicts among the princes and the domination of the British had an impact on the entire Deccan plateau. Religion was also affected. The fall of the Vijayanagara Empire was a crippling blow to Hinduism. Moreover, the regime of the East India Company and, later, of the British Government profoundly influenced social attitudes and customs. English education was steadily advancing; universities were coming up. Indians began to visit England and other European countries. All in all, this was a period of turmoil. From 1831 to 1881 the old Mysore State was directly under the British rule. In 1834 Kodagu came under the British rule. Western education spread. It profoundly influenced literature. The fact that the press could produce thousands of copies of a book and that a manuscript was no longer a prized possession brought about a revolutionary change both in the writer-reader relationship and in the very mode of reading. The period between 1870 and 1920 was the period of the impact of reformers like Vivekananda, of the Christian missionaries who, on the one hand, mauled the beliefs and customs of the people, and, on the other, brought the printing press. The missionaries studied the language systematically, and prepared grammars and dictionaries. A number of schools came up in different parts of Karnataka, and the first graduates came out of Bombay and Madras Universities. Mysore University, the first university in a princely state, was born in 1916.

The winds of change set in. Plays and poems were translated from Sanskrit into Kannada. Translations from English also appeared. Shakespeare appeared on the stage in translations and adaptations. In 1911, M. Govinda Pai took a step which later proved to be an important one—he dropped the rhyme of the second syllable. Mangesha Rao's poems breathed the new spirit. He also wrote short stories. Muddana's Ramashvamadha (1898) was a bridge between the earlier literature and the new literature, framing, as it did, mythological story in a lively dialogue between the poet and his wife. Bankimchandra's Durgeshanadini was translated (1885) and was a success. Gulvadi Venkata Rao's Indira (1899) was the first independent novel in Kannada. So new forms came from English literature to Kannada. Conscious efforts to develop the language and the literature crystallized with the birth of the Karnataka Vidyavardhaka Sangha (1890) and the Kannada Sahitya Parishad (1915).

'Navodaya' means 'rebirth'. The term has been used for the last thirty five years to describe the effervescence in Kannada literature in the period 1920-45. The new spirit manifested itself in the efforts at three centres. In old Mysore B.M. Srikantia published his English gitagalu in 1921. (Enlarged editions appeared in 1924 and '26). This collection of translations and adaptations of English poems—not all of them good poetry—opened a new world to the reader and the aspiring poet. Here was a new spirit—a spirit of interest in life here on the earth, of joy in Nature, of the recognition of the value of the life of the poor and the humble. Srikantia also experimented daringly with rhymes and rhythms. The Geleyara Balaga of Dharwad, with D.R. Bendre as the central spirit, was a group of young poets. Bendre turned to folk-poetry for rhythms and used the Dharwad dialect. In South Kannada Govinda Pai and Panje Mangesha Rao were the source of inspiration.

The resurgent spirit of Kannada burst in great splendour on the literary scene in the early years of the third decade of this century. Experimentation was in the air. Several forms—the lyric (with its subforms like the sonnet and the elegy and the ode), the one-act play, tragedy, the short story, the novel, the personal essay and biography for example were adapted from western literature.

The experimentation and the development of new forms were demanded by a new spirit, or else they would not have survived. Literature became more secular, without losing the serious commitment to life which religion brings. There was a greater awareness of man in society. The new literature was not revolutionary but liberal and was based on respect for man as man. It was democratic and was largely humanistic. Man became the measure of all things. Literature was no longer solely about gods and goddesses; it came closer to life in many senses. The influence of English romantic poets on the one hand, and of Aurbindo and Tagore on the other, led to interest in mystic experiences. Nature now came to be seen as imbued with a spirit of its own; the influence of Wordsworth was particularly marked. Literature, influenced by Chaucer, Shakespeare and others, became also interested in the richness and variety of human nature. Prose developed in many directions to meet the demands of modern life. The study of western literary criticism, and particularly the study of critics like A.C. Bradley and W.H. Hudson, influenced both the writer and the reader. (It is important to remember that in this period, most of the first line critics were also creative writers). Ancient India developed aesthetics and poetics but not applied criticism. The study of English literary criticism was, therefore, a new experience. There were conscious experiments in form, metre and diction. An important aspect of all this adventure was that the innovators did not allow a breach in tradition, that a good deal of their critical labour was devoted to their predecessors, and that the new literature seemed an expression of the same spirit.

The period from 1920 to 1945 was highly creative. All the four Kannada writers who won the Jnanapith Award belong to this epoch—K.V. Puttappa, D.R. Bendre, Shivarama Karanth and Masti Venkatesha Iyengar.

The Progressive Movement swept across the country in the thirties and the forties. In Karnataka it came to be known as the Pragatisheela Movement, and found a leader in A.N. Krishna Rao. Several young writers joined him, while some worked without acknowledging his leadership. These writers were fired by the desire to root out inequality and injustice. Some of them were influenced by Marxism. The Pragatisheelas saw the writer in the vanguard of the struggle for a just society. The approach of freedom made the task of rebuilding India both urgent and inspiring and these writers regarded literature as an instrument of social revolution. Their attitude to the past was ambivalent. Some times they praised the distant past while criticizing their immediate predecessors. Sometimes they rejected the past. They characterized Navodaya literature as the bastion of middle class morality. They widened the range of subjects which the writer dealt with, they depicted rural life on a larger scale, they brought a sharper awareness of the importance of the social and economic structure and they exercised greater freedom in their language, going to colloquialism and slang more often. The movement produced some fine novels and short stories but made no mark in poetry and drama. In criticism it compelled the re-examination of accepted criteria. Prose developed considerably during this period. It acquired power and picturesqueness.

However, the movement was shortlived. The Pragatisheelas were prolific writers and often produced mediocre work. They sometimes let revolutionary fervour outpace the literary conscience. They repeated themselves. Rhetoric often took the place of reflection. The Pragatisheelas were also unlucky in that a host of highly educated, sophisticated and assertive writers assailed them in the early fifties. The fact that the critics were teachers in colleges gave them considerable influence also.

The Navya or Modernist spirit first asserted itself in the poetry of Gopalakrishna Adiga, who had already written fine poems in the Navodaya vein. The disenchantment with the way free India had taken, the gulf between profession and practice and the feeling that the idiom of poetry could no longer express what the poet, overcome by a sense of alienation, wished to say, shaped the new poetry. The influence of T.S. Eliot was clear; but this was no imitative poetry. Poetry, which had been unidimensional, now became multidimensional. It became introspective and sought not to describe experience, but to explore it. The Navya spirit soon influenced other forms of literature. The novel and the short story came under the influence of the European Existentialist writers, notably Kafka and Sartre. The Absurd Theatre was born in Kannada. Very much influenced by Samuel Beckett, Ionesco and Camus, the Absurd Theatre was a brief phenomenon in Kannada but Navya which at first caused heated controversy soon established itself firmly. Its best harvest was in the realms of poetry, the novel and the short story. This was also the age of modern criticism, shaped by the study of the New critics. The reader-writer relationship changed, the writer was neither the teacher of the community nor the conscience and the revolutionary leader. In fact, he was engaged in the quest of his own identity, and was not writing for a reader at all. The reader was no longer to look for logical development in a work of literature but to endeavour to comprehend a total experience. The tools of criticism certainly improved; criticism came to be based on explication—a minute study of how language functioned in the composition.

Navya movement gave Kannada some of its finest poems, stories and novels. It aroused, however, a strong reaction. It was criticized for ignoring the writer's social responsibility. It was also criticized for making literature the province of a few, by rendering it incomprehensible to the lay reader.

The awakening of the down-trodden and the exploited to their plight and their right stimulated a new movement in Kannada literature. The distinction made between a Bandaya writer and a Dalita writer is that the former does not himself belong to the class of the exploited but is sympathetic while the latter gives voice to the anguish and the anger which his own class feels. In a way this movement was harking back to the Pragatisheela movement. It has demanded that the standards of evaluation in literature need to be drastically revised, and that the work should be judged by its awareness of social responsibility. The earlier works were inevitably tentative and experimental, but later works have shown a recognition of the demand of literature as such.

Within each school or movement the best writers have retained their identity. Also, in each phase there have been writers who did not strictly belong to it but yet produced works of significance. In the last few years some writers at least have consciously attempted not to write within any school or movement. Some, like H.S. Venkateshamurthy and Sumathindra Nadig, have experimented with new forms and metres.

LITERATURE (Kashmiri). Chumcharya 'padas' first assembled by Abhinavagupta (b.10th century, d. 11th century) in his famous and authoritative book on 'Kashmiri Shaiva darshana', constitute the first landmark of Kashmiri literature. These padas are of course far from today's spoken and written Kashmiri, yet these padas are to be studied in depth to understand and determine the course of Kashmiri and its development through the ages.

We are not sure as to when these padas were composed due to their unknown authorship, but it shall not be wrong to presume that the padas were in currency long before Abhinavagupta assembled and incorporated them in his book. The thought content of these padas constitutes the basics of Sahajayna, an offshoot of Vajrayana. Thus, the first progenitors of Kashmiri have been the Buddhists.

It is note-worthy that through the ages Kashmiri was never a privileged language. In the earlier phase it was under the sway of Sanskrit, and from the 7th decade of 14th century. Persian dominated the scene upto the end of 19th century. Instead of Kashmiri, Persian was replaced by Urdu. Urdu continues to be the official language of Jammu and Kashmir till date, Kashmiri never enjoyed royal patronage. Even after Independence, it is still fighting for its constitutional status given to it in the 8th schedule of the Constitution of the country.

Kashmiri, from the very beginning, thrived in the lap of hermits, siddhas, rishis, mystics and sufis.

We do not possess any record of literature produced between the 11th and the 12th century, but Shitikanth (13th century) wrote Mahanaya prakash, a treatise on Mantradhana of Uddiyana, Linguistically Mahanaya prakash is another step in the development of Kashmiri. It is the link between chumcharya padas and 'vakhs' of Lal Ded.

In the 14th century, Lal Ded (1320-1338) appeared on the horizon of Kashmiri, emitting her dazzling light all around. In diction, subtlety of thought, poetic grace and spiritual glow, she has no parallel. She is the tallest of the tall in the entire community of Kashmiri writers from the 14th century down to the present day. Her poetry termed as vakhs is considered by all Kashmiris as sacred literature. Her poetry has attracted the attention of a host of foreign as well as native scholars and spiritualists.

A peep into her great poetry indicates the rich, varied and powerful literary tradition behind her. Her vakhs were not the beginning of a new era, but the end of a glorious literary period of Kashmiri which is lost for ever as a result of political turmoil in the valley for a long time.

Nund Rishi (1337-1442), the only junior contemporary of Lal Ded, whose compositions have come down to us, is a luminary of our language and culture in his own right. The poetry of Nund Rishi is called 'shruk', the Kashmiri form of Sanskrit shloka. Having hardly anything in common with shloka, excepting the name; his poetry is the expression of his rishi doctrine, an indigeneous mystic cult of Kashmiri, which stands for universal brotherhood, fraternity, compassion, non-violence and tolerance. Like vakhs of Lal Ded, a good number of shruks come within the range of very good and graceful poetry and they came to an end with his departure from the world, but the tradition of vakhs continued down to the present century. This tradition, however, remained confined to the Shaiva poets of Kashmir.

Avtar Bhat (15th century) wrote Banasurabadh katha (around 1446). His epic is based on a portion of Harivamshapurana. This epic is still to be brought out in a book form, though it is the first epic in Kashmiri. The only manuscript of this epic is in the library of Bhandarkar Research Institute of Pune. The language of Avtar Bhat is archaic as compared to the language of Nund Rishi. The historical importance of this epic cannot be denied, because this epic provides us with an opportunity to peep into the language of the elite of that age.

There are recorded references in histories that some more books like Zaina Charit and Zainavilas were written during the reign of Zain-ul-Abdin (1420-1470). But nothing in original has reached us. From the period of Zain-ul-Abdin down to the period of Chaks, we draw a complete blank. Then the Kashmiri song composer, Habba Khatoon (d. 1604), entertains us with her sweet and melodious songs. She is the forerunner of lyric tradition in our literature. Her songs are full of pathos and longings for her beloved, Yusuf Shah, who was detained by Akbar the great. Her 'Vachanas', as these are called in Kashmiri, opened new vistas of form in Kashmiri. These lola vachanas (love lyrics) are a precious treasure cherished by all Kashmiris. Those who followed her tradition include Khwaja Habibullah Naushahri (1555-1617), Mirza Akmal-ud-Din (1642-1717) and Arnimal (d. 1800). Only a meagre number of poems composed by the above mentioned poets has reached us, but the poems of these composers are worthwhile and superior to the compositions of those poets who followed them.

Sahab Kaul (1629-1682) also belongs to this period, but has nothing common with Habba Khatoon and others. His book Zanmacharit is a treatise of philosophical nature. Same is the case of Rupa Bhawani (1625-1721). She continued the tradition of vakh, but her vakhs lack the spontaniety of those of Lal Ded, though every word of her vakhs glows with spiritual fervour.

LITERATURE-KASHMIRI

There are some more poets of the 18th century, like Nunda Dar, G.S. Azad and Nur Saadullah, but they fail to attract the attention of critics and readers. After going through the compositions of these poets, we can easily understand that under the influence of Persian, Kashmiri was changing its complexion and Kashmiri word-hoard was absorbing Persian words at an accelerated speed. Excepting Arnimal, the 18th century failed to produce a major poet.

Historically and politically, the 19th century was a century of tyranny and gloom for the common Kashmiri folks. But, so far as the Kashmiri literature is concerned, it blossomed like a bud and provided enough stimulus to the poets for expressing their inner feelings. This century proved to be the harbinger of the new trends and literary genres.

'Masnavi' was for the first time introduced as a new genre of literature by Mumin Saab (18th-19th century). A host of poets followed Mumin Saab, and among them Mahmud Gami (d. 1885) deserves special attention. Mahmud wrote quite a good number of masnavis. Besides, he wrote 'naats', vachanas, ghazals and elegies. Among his contemporaries, he is the tallest, keeping in view the contribution he made to literature. Among the contemporaries of Mahmud, Shah Qalander, Nazim (19th century) and Azizullah Haqqani (d. 1926) proved their mettle in the realm of masnavi to a large extent. The central idea or the plot of most of the Masnavis owes its origin to Persian. In certain cases the language is loaded with Persian words to such an extent that it is very difficult to decide whether the language is Persian or Kashmiri. Indiscriminate borrowing from Persian word-hoard has rather damaged the quality of most of the masnavis, whether written in the 19th or the 20th century. This observation is also true of the epics of Amir Shah Keri (1838-1899), Wahab Pare (1846-1914) and Pir Ghulam Mohammad Hanfi (1869-1937) also.

Gulrez of Maqbul Shah Kralwari (1820-1875) is a masterpiece in the form of masnavi. Maqbul too has borrowed the plot of his work from Persian. The creative genius of Maqbul has made this unknown narrative of Persian a masterpiece of all times. The sweetness, melody and poetic spontaneity of Gulrez can not be explained, but these can only be felt and enjoyed. In today's electronic age, the people long to listen to the soothing verses of Gulrez. Maqbul has written many more masnavis, but he will be survived by Gulrez alone in future. Some of the masnavis have their roots in Indian classics, like Ramavtar charit of Prakash Ram (1819-1885), Nal Damyanti by Bulbul Nagami (1812-1902), Krishnavtar and Rukmani mangal by Manju Attar (d. 1964). Masnavis based on Indian classics have one thing praiseworthy about them that these are not loaded with Sanskrit word-hoard. The poets have tried to maintain the idiom and temper of the Kashmiri language. Another aspects of these masnavis that attracts the attention of the reader is that the poets have localised the plots and have decorated the narration with local similes, metaphors, phrases, allusions and episodes.

Based on a local legend, Waliullah Mattu's (19th century) Himal is a reputed masnavi and is cherished by people.

In the field of epics, Prakash Ram is the first to introduce this genre. He was followed by Bulbul Nagami and others. Lesser known poets of 19th and 20th century have written epics in a large number, but no one has succeeded to reach the standard of the epic established by Bulbul Nagami in his Samnama. Most of the epics written in Kashmiri are based on Islamic history and have religious appeal. These epics are the models of versification of certain episodes, and lack the grace and grandeur of real poetry.

Mystic poetry is the most precious treasure of Kashmiri literature and has its roots in the 19th century, because all the leading mystic poets were born in this century. After a lull of almost four hundred years after Lal Ded and Nund Rishi, the mystics appeared on the scene of Kashmiri literature to sustain and enrich it. Generally known as 'sufi shairi', the theme of Kashmiri mystic poetry is a blend of Vedanta, Kashmiri Shaivism, Sahajayana, Shunyavada and Islamic sufi thought. Sufi poets have freely used the terms of Hindi mythology in their compositions with command and full knowledge of their connotation. They have mostly used the forms of padda and vachun for giving expression to their experiences and inner most feelings. As a matter of fact padda and vachun forms have been added to the treasure of Kashmiri poetry by the sufi poets. Some of the representative poets of this trend are Mumin Saab, Sauch Kral, Rehman Dar (d. 1875) Rahim Saab (d. 1850), Naima Saab (d.1880), Shah Qalander (d. 1880), Shams Faqir (1843-1904), Samad Mir (1892-1950) and Ahad Zarger (1898-1983).

It was Rusool Mir (d. 1870) who proved to be the founder of romantic trend. His poetry is the expression of his love and taste for female beauty. He influenced a number of poets who followed him but there was none to exceed his stature or to equal him. The spontaneity of his expression and intensity of emotions have given a new dimension to his poetry.

Bhakti poetry too has its roots in the 19th century. Both Rambhakti and Krishnabhakti made their way in Kashmiri in this century. The representative bhakti-poets of this century are Prakash Ram, Paramananda and Bulbul Nagami. Prakash Ram is a Ramabhakta, while Paramananda is a Krishnabhakta and is the representative of 'Mudhurabhava'. Shivabhakti was initiated in Kashmiri by Lal Ded, Shivabhakti of suganvada flourished at the hands of Krishna Razdan (1851-1926). A poet of marvels, Krishna Razdan wrote some unsurpassed 'Bhajans' and hymns. In the field of bhakti-poetry, Krishna Razdan has no equal so far as the execution of the theme, poetic grace and originality are concerned. He was an epoch making poet. There were many others in the field to pour their bhakti in verse, but they failed to do better. It was Master Zinda Kaul (1884-1965), who enriched the bhakti-poetry after Razdan.

It is a matter of debate whether Mahjur (1885-1952) was an epoch making poet, not because he failed to influence his contemporaries at large excepting Azad to some extent, but there is no doubt that Mahjur was through and through a poet and will always be considered one of the prominent poets of Kashmiri. In the beginning, he followed the path of Habba Khatoon and Rasul Mir, but later he broke new ground and made his own way. Mahjur was a fortunate poet who enjoyed tremendous popularity during his life time. It is not the number but the quality of his verses which made him popular. The poetry of Mahjur and A.A. Azad (1903-1948) gave a new direction to the Kashmiri verse in the thirties of this century. Both of them made poetry a vehicle of the life and made it the expression of objective experiences instead of subjectivity. In this way they emancipated Kashmiri poetry from a long mystic tradition. They broke the monotony of the earlier poetry, and their poetry began to throb with life. In its variety, pathos and sweetness, Mahjur's poetry is superior to that of Azad by any standards. Even then, Azad has a unique place in the history of Kashmiri literature as a poet, researcher, critic and the first literary historian, though most of his research papers and literary history are in Urdu. Other better-known poets of this period are Ghulam Nabi Dilsoz (1916-1941), Master Zinda Kaul (1884-1965) and Abdul Satter Asi (d. 1951).

The excellent 'Naats' of Abdul Ahad Nadim (1840-1911) are a highly prized contribution to our devotional poetry. Others who did their bit in this field are Maqbul Kralwari, Haqqani Nazim and Ghulam Rasul Nazki (b. 1909). Naats and Rubais of Nazki have a charm of their own and are of significant literary value.

Dina Nath Nadim (1916-1988) began to express himself in Kashmiri somewhere in the mid-forties when Mahjur was alive. Earlier he wrote in Hindi, Urdu and sometimes in English also. His very first composition proved a challenge to the traditional poets, so much so that Mahjur too tried to follow in his foot steps at the fag end of his life. Progressive writers movement was fortunate enough to have a poet of Nadim's poetic calibre and genius. As its exponent and spokesman, Nadim changed the entire complexion of Kashmiri poetry and put it on an untrodden but vast and progressive path, opening new vistas of thought content and form. He proved to be the founder of a new trend. His era began when Mahjur was alive. He influenced all his old and young contemporaries and introduced new and powerful literary genres like free verse, blank verse, sonnet, opera and haiku with full command and knowledge. He made his contemporaries to tread in his foot steps. His mastery on language, forceful style of expression, variety in thought content, observation and intensity of feeling are matchless qualities which make him the towering literary personality of the 20th century in Kashmiri literature.

Nadim's contemporary, Abdul Rahman Rahi (b. 1925) parted his way from Nadim in the concluding years of the 6th decade of this century and made some worthwhile experiments of 'new wave' in poetry. He influenced some of his contemporaries also, but with the lapse of time, he too lost grip over his contemporaries.

Amin Kamil (b. 1924) is a poet of calibre and has proved his mettle in all the areas of poetry, however, his remarkable achievement is in the form of ghazals. As a matter of fact, it is Kamil who introduced perfect ghazal in Kashmiri. Before Kamil, we hardly come across real ghazals in Kashmiri.

In the field of poetry other noteworthy poets include Ghulam Nabi Firaq (b. 1922), Arjandev Majbore (b. 1922), Reh Sopori (b. 1926) Nazir Kulgami (b. 1931), Muzaffar Azmi (b. 1934), Motilal Saqi (b. 1936), Chamanlal Chaman (b. 1936), Ghulam Nabi Khyal (b. 1936), Margub Banihali (b. 1937), Mohi-ud-Din Gowhar (b. 1941) and Ghulam Ahmad Gash (b. 1942).

Ghulam Nabi Ariz (1916-1965) was a poet of melodious notes. Though he too was influenced by the progressive movement to some extent, he never gave up his own way and composed some of the sweetest songs of Kashmiri. He was another Rasul Mir of Kashmiri.

Rasa Javidani (1907-1981) too was a composer of sweet songs. He always wrote in his lyrical strain and hardly came under the influence of his contemporaries.

The first available work of Kashmiri prose is the translation of a portion of the Bible, or New Testament, which was translated somewhere in the 3rd decade of the 19th century and published by Serampore Missionary Press in 1821, in Sharda script. Two more parts of this work appeared in 1827. In 1884 British Bible Society came forward and published the revised version of previous portions alongwith the translation of Old Testament in Nastaliq. The whole work in a single volume appeared in 1899 from Ludhiana in Nastaliq script. Those who accomplished the work of translating the Bible alongwith Old Testament in Kashmiri include T.R. Wardy, J. Hanton Knowles, Neve, Sulaiman and Yar Mohammad Khan. These publications were followed by utter inactivity for a period of more than two decades. In 1921-1922, some articles pertaining to "Health and Hygiene" were published in Bahari Kashmiri by S.K. Toshakhani (1895-1981), who happened to be the editor of the journal. This journal was published from Lahore. Some portions of a novel Kamala by the same author also appeared in this journal. All the articles which appeared in this journal were in Devanagari script. In 1923, Mark Aurel Stein (1862-1943) published Hatim's tales in collaboration with Govind Kaul (1846-1899) from London alongwith English rendering. In the forth decade of current century, Nandlal Kaul (1877-1940) wrote first Kashmiri drama Satch kahvat based on famous episode of Maharaja Harishchandra. This drama was staged in 1931 and was later on published in the same decade. On the basis of this very episode, another drama was written by T.C. Bismil (1904-1948). This drama alongwith another drama of Bismil was published by Ali Mohammad and Sons in 1938. Bismil wrote some more plays and translated Bhagvat Gita in Kashmiri. His unpublished works include 'Preamich kahvat', 'Bharat milap', 'Ramavtar' and 'Haqiqatrai'. A contemporary of Kaul and Bismil, Ghulam Nabi Dilsoz (1916-1941) wrote short plays captioned as Laila Majnun, Shirin Khusrau and Shoda. These plays were published from Srinagar in 1940. Besides this, Rajpal and Sons prepared the gramophone records of these farces. All the dramas referred to above have been based on the pattern of Parsi theatre drama, mostly written by Aga Hashar Kashmiri.

LITERATURE-KONKANI

Mohi-ud-Din Hajni's (b. 1917) drama Grish sund gari was written in 1938. Some portions of this drama were published in the Pratap magazine in 1938. This drama, though loose in structure, is a departure from the dramas of Kaul and Bismil, and is the first attempt to write a drama in the western style. This drama was later published in book form also.

In July, 1940 Mahjur launched the first Kashmiri weekly, Gash, but due to dearth of paper, he was compelled to stop its publication shortly afterwards. In between 1940 and 1950 some more prose was written mostly in the form of translations, but not of much significance. It was the inauguration of the monthly Kong Posh in 1949 which set the ball rolling and various genres of prose were introduced which included critical essays, translations of classics, short stories, etc. The first short story of Kashmiri, 'Reply paid post card', was written in 1950. The first anthology of Kashmiri short stories was published by Akhtar Mohi-ud-Din (b.1928) under the title Sath sangar (1956) which brought him Sahitya Akademi award in 1958.

After Akhtar Mohi-ud-Din, Amin Kamil, Ali Mohammad Lone (1927-1987), Harikrishan Kaul, Bansi Nirdosh (b. 1930), Avtarkrishna Rehbar (b.1933), Rattanlal Shant, Hardy Kaul Bharti (b. 1935) and Bashir Akhtar (b. 1944) have added to the treasure of our short stories.

Amin Kamil wrote the first novel in Kashmiri Gatimanzi gash. After him Akhtar wrote another novel, Doud ta dug. Ghulam Nabi Gohar is the only writer who has published three of his novels so far. Bansi Nirdosh has contributed a very good novel Akh dour to Kashmiri literature. In the field of novel, we are in fact lagging behind as compared to other regional languages.

There was no tradition of literary criticism prior to 1947. Later, some writers devoted themselves to this field and produced some good pieces of applied criticism and critical appraisal. Among these critics Rahi, Mohammad Yusuf Taing (b.1935), Hamidi (b.1932), P.N. Pushp and Amin Kamil are included.

Kashmiri has made great strides in the field of drama. Three of the dramatists Ali Mohammad Lone, Pushkar Bhan (b.1926) and Motilal Kemmu earned Sahitya Akademi award for their dramas. Avtarkrishna Rehbar, Hardy Kaul Bharti, Faruq Masudi and Akhtar Mohiddin too have written standard Radio and stage plays.

Being a neglected language for centuries, Kashmiri was in need of zealous research scholars. A devoted band of research scholars took up the challenge and unearthed the hidden treasures of Kashmiri literature. Abdul Ahad Azad was the pioneer and after him people like Avtarkrishna Rehbar, Mohammad Yusuf Taing, Motilal Saqi and Amin Kamil carried on the work.

Prior to Independence, Kashmiri had hardly a firm base of prose writing, but today this genre has come up. Besides novels, short stories and dramas, there are books available on Historiography, Sociology, Psychology, History, Political Science, Botany, Scientific Inventions, Dramatics, Religious Philosophies, etc.

LITERATURE (Konkani). During the times of Yadavas of Devagiri, many Goans rose to eminence in their court and brought to their homeland many Marathi poetical works of religious character, written by the stalwarts like Namadev and Jnaneshwar. Konkani poets took them as models to write their works of the same genre. Krishnadas Shama, Vishnudas Nama, Jnandev and Nivritti wrote in Marathi, profusely drawing upon Konkani words and constructions, while there were others who wrote in pure Konkani. Pisurlekar came across the Ramayana and the Mahabharata in Konkani prose in the public library at Brage in Portugal, which he ascribed to the pen of the same Krishnadas Shama who wrote his famous Shri Krishnacharitra in Marathi verse. John Leydon (1775-1811), the first European scholar to classify modern Indian languages, speaks of many old Konkani works. He says, "The Koongani (Konkani) characters differ considerably from the Maharatta, and the Bhagvadam, Linga, Purana, the Ramayana and Bharata are translated into this language and written in its appropriate characters, and the bramins of this class profess to be in possession of many other translations from the Sanskrit as well as of various original works among which are the Vira Bhadracharitra and Parasrama charitra. The Koogani is said to possess many local histories and regional puranas among which the Ugria-bukhir or history of the pirate Angria, and the Mali vani bukhir are probably interesting."

By the end of the 15th century, Konkani had reached a fairly high stage of development. It could have made strides in literature had the Goan life continued undisturbed. But evil fate fell upon Goa in 1510 and its three most populous and prosperous talukas of Ilhas (Tiswadi), Salcete and Bardez were conquered by the Portuguese by 1544. Every library, either personal or public, was confiscated or burnt down and the Portuguese language was forced upon Goa's inhabitants, banning the use of their mother tongue. However, the sober authorities of the state and the enlightened missionaries of the time, in the interest of both the state and the Catholic faith, thought it profitable to study the language of the conquered people. They set up a printing press, the first in India, 1556. In this very year, Christian doctrine was printed in Konkani and circulated among new converts for their daily use. This was naturally in Roman script. These missionaries, especially the Jesuits and the Franciscans among them, seriously took to the study of Konkani language and literature with the help of neo-convert brahmins like Andre Vaz and Manuel de Oliveira in order to be able to preach their faith fluently and to refute the religious beliefs of the Hindus. The honour of writing the elementary grammar of Konkani goes to Andre Vaz (prior to 1558) on the basis of which was raised the structure of Konkani's linguistic achievement by grammarians like Henrique Henriques (1520-1600), Thomas Stephens (1549-1617), Joao de S. Matias (alive between 1595 and 1647), Serncao Alvares (alive between 1695 and 1744) and Karel Prikeril (1718-1785), and Lexicographers like the Jesuits of Rature of the 16th century, Diogo Rebeiro (1560-1623), Antonio de Saldanha (1598-1683), Miguel de Almeida (1610-1683) and Diogo de Amaral (1699-1762).

Amongst these missionaries, Thomas Stephens is the most outstanding. By his Doutrina Christam (Konkani), Konkani Grammar, and the epic Christa Purana (Konkani-mixed-Marathi), he set very high standards of grammatical exactitude and literary excellence for Konkani. Emulating his example, more than hundred religious books of merit were produced during the span of two hundred years, both in rich prose and elegant poetry. Out of them some are original, while others are translations of standard European works. Among these Sant Antonichina acharyam ani jivitva katha by Antonio de Saldanha, and Miguel de Almeida's Van-valleanche mallo (The Garden of shepherds) stand out prominently for their lucid and mature prose.

This achievement in prose was far in advance of any modern Indian language. This was possible only because earlier literary works of merit were available to them for their deep study and close scrutiny.

The educated Konkanis, lured by wider readership or compelled by circumstances, took to languages other than their own for literary expression. But even they in their irresistible creative moments could not help writing in their mother gongue. Among them are saints, writers and poets of repute from from all the four Konkani settlements. They kept up Konkani's literary tradition in their respective areas.

From the last decade of the nineteenth century, Konkani periodicals started their publication in increasing numbers, fanning the diminishing embers of Konkani consciousness.

Initially, Konkani literary movement was mainly confined to the Catholics from Goa and Mangalore. In fact, the credit for developing Konkani as a literary medium goes to them. To cater to the needs of the semi-literate masses, they produced a religious and fictional literature stupendous in its output. Some of the periodicals started by them sixty years ago are still being published Vanraddianchocho istl, published from Pilar, Goa, is but one example.

In Goa, this literature was written in Roman script, while in Mangalore it was in Kannada script.

In 1894, Eduardo Bruno de Souza dedicated himself to the mission of raising the Roman script literature to a higher level through his fortnightly paper Udentechem Sallok. Joaquim Antonio Fernandes followed up his work more vigorously and in a more scholarly manner through his book Amcho Soddvonndar (Our saviour), which is one of the treasures of Konkani literature. Udentechem Neketr and Do Mhoireachi Rotti though exclusively religious periodicals, have been instrumental in standardizing Konkani as a literary medium. This work was carried on further by writers of later date like A. Pereira, Moreno de Souza, Planton Faria, Felicio Cardozo, Evagrio Jorge and Judas Barros Pereira's Onvllam is considered as one of the best books published in Roman script in recent times.

In Kannada speaking areas, Konkani speakers adopted Kannada script for Konkani. In 1878, Maffei, an Italian priest, gave them the first dictionary of Konkani and a Konkani grammar written in Kannada script. Following his example, Miguel Colaco and Raimundo Mascarenhas wrote the first Konkani books in Kannada script. Both of them were poets as well as prose writers. Mascarenhas' work of great magnitude is his translation of the New Testament.

However, with the publication of the Dirvem (1912), a new age dawned on Konkani literature. There was a spate of short stories, poems and songs. Its first editor Luis de Mascarenhas was a lover of nature and a master craftsman. His poem 'Abramvachem yadna-dan' (The sacrifice of Abraham) is a masterpiece. Podre Joao Souza, its subsequent editor, was the first to get out of the religious context. He is considered as the 'Father of Konkani fiction'. He has translated into Konkani Shakespeare and Canon Smith. He was succeeded by Alex Pais, who edited the Dirvem for about two decades. He has many collections of short stories to his credit.

The Dirvem brought to prominence many a new writer like Jose Rego, Sylvester Menezes, Felix Noronha. etc. M.P. Antonio Joao D'Souza (Maridas) continued the tradition of poetry. Leo D'Souza, M.F. Botelho, John Carlo and some of the popular poets like J.B. Moraes and C.P. D'Costa occupy a special place among modern poets.

However, in dramas and novels, Konkani literature in Kannada script is exceptionally rich. Martin D'Sa, S.S. Miranda, C.F. D'Costa, Fred Fernandes, Cyril Viegas, Wilfred Robindas, Valeoiano Vaz and Gabby are some of the foremost dramatists. Most of them are also poets as well as novelists.

Among them Joaquim Santana Alvares is considered to be the foremost. After his first novel, Angel, he has written about twentyfive novels. V.J.P. Saldanhas is known for his historical novels. Gabbu, Eulalia Alvares, Irene Pinto, T.A. Lobo, Pradip, Sirivant, Edwin D'Souza and Vassu are some of the most popular novelists.

The age of the Dirvem continued up to 1940. After the Dirvem, the Rakhano, the Sukh-dukh, the Pionari and the Mitr encouraged new talent.

Thus, a new literary awakening was a foot in the first quarter of the twentieth century, and it was at its zenith in the colossal literary output of Varde Valanikar. The twenty books he had left behind have laid the solid foundation of modern Konkani literature. R.S. Nayak the dramatist and lexicographer, Dinkar Desai and Bayabhav, the poets, and R.N. Nayak, the essayist soon followed him. Though the impact of Valanlikar's literature was slow but steady during his life time, the seeds he had sown quietly germinated in Konkani people's consciousness and sprouted in full bloom with Goa's freedom struggle that started a year after his death.

Laxmanrao Sardesai was a regular contributor to the fortnightly journal Porjecho Avaz edited by B.B. Borker. He wrote fiery essays, beautiful short stories and well-etched sketches, and gave to Konkani a prose literature which could make any language proud.

Ravindra Kelekar, with the help of Gandhi Smarak Nidhi, published some of the Gandhiji's basic writings translated into Konkani by a veteran Gandhian, R.N. Naik, who also translated Tagore's Gitanjali and Omar Khayyam's Rubaiyat into Konkani.

The 'father of Goan nationalism', T.B. D'Cunha, started a weekly paper called Azad Goem exclusively dedicated to the cause of freedom. Lucio Rodrigues wrote some of his finest essays like 'Pader' 'Rai Loari', etc; and dedicated himself to the research of Konkani folklore.

The message of Konkani had also reached the Reis

Magos and Aguada forts where some of the valiant Goan freedom fighters were interned. They started a magazine named Zor, edited by Nagesh Karmali.

The liberation of Goa opened wide the flood gates of creativity. During the first six years after the liberation of Goa, poetry was the literary form that flourished the most. With his collection of poems entitled Goema tujea mogakhatir (For thy sake, Oh Goa), Manoharrai Sardesai gave a fresh content and a new direction to Konkani poetry. His poetry expresses a nostalgic feeling about his native land whose beauty he describes in colourful and emotionally charged words. Written in a simple and suave Konkani, Sardesai's poetry instantly became popular. He has five collections of poems to his credit which show the growth of his poetry into maturity.

R.V. Pandit, more virile and ardent, voiced the suppressed cries of the dumb masses in Whitmanic free verse. He sought justice for them, both social and economic, in his thunder-like style. His is prolific writer and has eight collections of poems to his credit. His poetry has been translated in many languages of the world and has bagged awards from different countries.

Pandurang Bhangi, Nagesh Karmali, Ramesh Veluskar, Madhav Borkar, Prakash Padgaokar, Pundalik Narayan Naik, Purushottam Singbal, Drin-Drin, Olivinho Gomes, Jess Fernandes, Vijayabai Sarmalkar and Yussuf Shaikh have enriched modern Konkani poetry, both in its content and form, by their creative distinctiveness and uniqueness of experience and expression. Among these, Pundalik Narayan Naik not only promises to be the mouth-piece of the aspirations of the suppressed masses rendered mute for so long, but also handles with confidence other forms of literary art like the short story, the novel and the drama. Besides those who have collections of poems to their credit, there are many other poets who show some promise. Outstanding among them are Shankar, Bhandari, Uday Bhembro, Shankar Ramani, Dilip Borkar and Lino de Sa.

Chandrakant Keni, Damodar Manzo, Sheela Naik, Meena Gaitonde, Suresh Kakodkar and Pundalik Narayan Naik are the most skilful short story writers of the post liberation period. Deep-rooted in the soil, they have portrayed not merely the characters of Goan Life, but have also depicted the universal traits of human nature.

An average Konkani is both a poet and satirist. This second trait of his character is ably represented by two humorists, Dauaram K.Sukthunkar and A.N. Mhambro. Their humour is both humane and subtle.

Among the non-fiction writers, Ravindra Kelekar can rightly be said to be the foremost essayist. He is a contemplator par excellence. His enormous prose output in the form of tales, essays, travelogues, dialogues, diaries and letters, centres around the theme of man's place in the universe and his duties as a citizen. Deeply involved in day-to-day social, cultural and political activities, he brings in a philosophical outlook to everything he touches. Sociology, Linguistics, History, Education, political philosophy, rather all the subjects that are related to human society, he deals with genuine seriousness and scholarship. Simplicity, clarity, stern logic and originality are essential characteristics of his prose. In his Vellevaileo Ghulo and Sangangati he proves what a fine artist he is.

Konkani has a long tradition of the stage, both sophisticated and popular. The theatre performed by the Catholic community of Goa, though simple in structure and naive in dialogues, has been highly moralizing and bitterly satirical. It is immensely popular with the masses.

The one-act play flourished in Bombay in the fifties. A host of writers like Raghuvir Nevrekar, Kisan Kamat, Bhiku Pai Angle and others wrote highly entertaining and instructive plays.

The tradition of sophisticated drama started by Valanlikar was enriched by R.S. Naik. During the post-liberation period, Pundalik Dando, Krishna Moyo, Vinay Surlakar, Chandrakant Parsekar and Ramkrishna Zuankar enlivened the stage with their plays. But the Konkani stage is yet to produce a great original dramatist.

All India Konkani Sahitya Parishad has accepted Devanagari as the main script for Konkani and the literature in this language limited though, is quite mature in content, artistic in form and modern in outlook.

B.B.B.

LITERATURE (Maithili) Maithili literature in its proto form is traced back to the 9th or 10th century, when a host of Buddhist monks known as the 'Siddhas' preached their mystic cult through metaphysical erotic songs. This stage, however, seems to represent the common vernacular literature of entire Eastern India comprising Magadha, Mithila, Bengal, Assam and Orissa. The great folk-astrologer-cum-didactic poet Dak (c. 12th cent) is yet popular and has the credit of having been quoted even in the Sanskrit smriti works.

With the emergence of Mithila as an independent principality under the Karnata dynasty (1097-1324), Maithili literature began to grow rapidly. The Varnaratnakara of Jyotirishwara (1280-1340) dealing with the poetic conventions in describing royal life and surroundings is perhaps the earliest vernacular prose-work in north India and presupposes a developed state of Maithili literature. He is said to have moulded the genius of the great poet Vidyapati (1360-1448) and his successors. His only drama Dhurta-samagama (The assemblage of rogues) introduced a new type known later on as 'Kiratania' drama.

Vidyapati raised the Maithili literature to the highest point of excellence. His sweet songs on the love of Radha and Krishna occupied the hearts and lips of pandits and ploughmen alike not only in Mithila, but throughout the North-Eastern India, and were imitated by a number of Vaishnava poets culminating in the growth of the vast Brajbuli literature. In Mithila, however, his Hara-Gauri songs and secular lyrics are more popular. His influence on Maithili literature is overwhelming. So much so that a staunch critic has branded the whole middle Maithili. Nevertheless, we do find a number of poets of genius among his contemporaries and successors, such as Amritakara, Bhikham, Kamsanarayana, Chaturbhuj, Govindadasa, etc.

Govindadasa (1600-1700), the last one, stands next to Vidyapati. Like Vidyapati he is widely received and highly acclaimed by the Vaishnavas, but he differs from Vidyapati inasmuch as he is more concerned with his diction, more divine in his feeling and more subtle in his imagination. The tradition of Vidyapati came to an end with him.

From the 16th century onwards, some fresh types of drama grew up throughout the North-Eastern India, such as 'Yatra' in Bengal, 'Ankia Nat' in Assam and 'Kiratania' in Mithila. While the former two are exclusively devotional, the latter is more romantic based of course on Puranic and legendary tales. Maithili drama developed in these regions: Mithila, Nepal and Assam. Those written in Mithila are known as Kiratania Natak and have dialogue in Sanskrit and Prakrit interspersed with profuse Maithili songs. The Parijataharana of Umapati (c. 1620) and Rukminiharana of Ramapati (c. 1750) were most popular on the stage. Later Sanskrit and Prakrit dialogue gradually disappeared and drama took the form of opera or ballad. Due to Muslim depredations in Mithila, Maithili took refuge in Nepal and a large number of Maithili dramas were produced and staged there during 1533-1768 under the patronage of Malla rulers. Most of the rulers were themselves writers of Maithili drama. The credit of adopting Maithili prose-dialogue first goes to Nepal. Here we find the literary art of Mithila combined with the stage-craft of Nepal. The Hara-Gauri-vivaha of Vamshamani or Jagajyotirmalla (c. 1627) is the best example. Maithili dramas written in Assam are the common property of both the regions and are better treated in the history of Assamese literature.

The modern Maithili literature shows very late and poor start for some exterior reasons. On the very outset of the modern period, Hindi was introduced as the regional language of Mithila ousting the Maithili from all avenues. Consequently, Maithili writers, instead of enriching their literature harnessed their energy to the survival of their mother tongue. Secondly the modern light through English education reached the remote land of Mithila very late. Nevertheless, after Independence growth rate of literature improved gradually. Chanda Jha (1880-1920) and his age is the first stage and is characterised by the voice of awakening, the appearance of some periodicals, emergence of readable prose-style and adoption of new forms of literature. As the most authors came from traditional Pandits, the literature reflected the retention of the conservative outlook and pedantic diction.

It is, however, Harimohan Jha (1908-1984) and Vaidyanath Mishra 'Yatri' (1911) who broke the stalemate, ushered in a revolutionary, liberal and rational outlook, and introduced the full-fledged modernism in its true sense. They fought bravely against social evils and superstitions and brought the Maithili literature nearer to the mass.

The third and the last stage starts after 1960 and reflects all the trends,—isms and techniques of contemporary Indian literature. Rajkamal (1929-67) is the undisputed superstar of this stage.

LITERATURE (Malayalam). Malayalam is a language of Dravidian origin spoken by nearly twenty-five million Malayalis living in Kerala in the south west corner of India. This language and its literature, in their history of nearly a thousand years, have come into contact with a variety of foreign influences that have enriched them in every possible way. The people of Kerala, although united by a unique cultural bond, have also been exposed to different cultures and races and religions through their long history, in some cases even before the evolution of Malayalam as a separate language. But about the earliest period of their history there is still no universally accepted historical account. The history of Malayalam literature however presents a continuous evolution from the 10th or 11th century.

The earliest compositions in any language are likely to be of folk origin, which may even be described as pre-literary. The inscriptions and the copper plates have on the whole very little value as literature, although they are valuable historical documents which have a bearing on the understanding of literary development. But the proverbs, riddles and folk songs, including ballads, even when they are of very early origin, keep changing from time to time and place to place so that it is difficult to trace their earliest form. The forms in which they have come to be recorded may be quite recent. Among the earliest of these may be included the ritual chants accompanying folk festivals which still have a great hold on the Malayali mind. The songs recited by traditional minstrels like pulluvans and panans may through the oral tradition have preserved several expressions and metrical forms from very early times. Work songs, songs about the seasons, songs relating to sports and games, battle songs and heroic or romantic ballads may all come under this category. Of these perhaps the heroic songs known as the 'Tekkan Pattukal' (Ballads of the South) and the 'Vadakkan Pattukal' (Ballads of the North) seem to have been only a few centuries old. But several of the work songs and the ritual chants may claim historical priority.

The earliest example of regular literary creation in the language is Ramacharitam, a version of Ramayana in a form of Malayalam very close to older Tamil, written in the 12th century probably by Vira Rama Varma (Cheeraman). It belongs to the pattu tradition which was the popular mode later replaced by the manipravala tradition favoured mainly by the erudite and the elite. Ramacharitam is the first of several versions of the Sanskrit epic that were to appear in Malayalam. In that sense it provided a pattern of poetic creation emulated by the most important poets in Malayalam. Every major Malayalam poet seems to have rendered his own version of the story of Rama in some form or other.

The earliest work in the manipravala style is Vaishika tantram, written in the 13th century. The style is close to the Sanskrit models: in diction, poetic appeal, theme and metre, it tries to conform to the upper class tastes. The moral fervour of the pattu school is absent here. The substance of Vaishika tantram is a mother's professional advice to her daughter on courtesanship. Several of the manipravala works are tales of courtesans like Unniyahchi charitam, Unnichiruthevi charitam and Unniyadi charitam. Apart from these champu poems, manipravala poets also wrote several 'sandeshas' (message) poems, both modelled on Sanskrit works. The most important of the sandesha poems is Unnuneeli sandesham written in the 14th century.

Against this worldly school there arose the bhakti movement as in most other Indian literatures. The first poets of this movement in Malayalam were the Niranam poets of the Kannassa family, namely Madhava Panikkar, Sankara Panikkar and Rama Panikkar. They lived between 1350 and 1450, and revived the pattu tradition by using Dravidian metres and diction. Their works include Bhagavad Gita, Bharatamala, Ramayanam, Bharatam, Bhagavatam and Shivaratri mahatmyam. Kannassa Ramayanam is an important link between Ramakatha pattu of Ayyippillai Asan and Adhyatma Ramayanam of Thunchat Ezhuttacchan.

The manipravala school and the pattu school flourished on parallel lines in the 15th century. The chief manipravala work of this period is Ramayanam champu by Punam Nambudiri, which is a very sophisticated work with many baroque elements in it. Intellectual thrill rather than religious devotion is the objective of the manipravala Ramayanam. Another manipravala work of this period is the long narrative-descriptive poem Chandrotsavam. Several muktakas or single quatrains also came to be written during this time.

The growth of prose in the early centuries may be traced from the Attoor copper plate of Vira Udaya Marthanda Varma of Venad dated 1251 through Bhasha Kautaliyam, a Malayalam version of Kautalya's Arthashastra, Dutavakyam, and the Attaprakarams and Kramadeepikas for the performances of kudiyattam, to Brahmanda puranam in the fifteenth century. It seems to have taken a few centuries for Malayalam prose to emerge from the hold of Tamil and Sanskrit.

The greatest literary work of the 15th century is Krishnagatha by Cherusseri Nambudiri of Kolathunad. It is a retelling of the story of Krishna in a simple and limpid style using the same Dravidian metre almost throughout. Cherusseri has managed to endow this North Indian tale with a typical Kerala touch, and his work may be said to reflect the madhura bhakti school. He particularly excels in the narration of Krishna's childhood in Ampadi or Vraja. His work is one of the high points of the pattu school in Malayalam poetry.

The movement that gradually evolved through the writings of the Niranam poets and Cherusseri found its ultimate fulfilment in the poems of Thunchat Ramanujan Ezhuttacchan and Poontanam Nambudiri, contemporaries of the great Sanskrit author of Narayaneeyam, Melpattoor Narayana Bhattathiri. Ezhuttacchan's major works are Adhyatma Ramayanam, Shrimahabharatam, Irupattinalluvritam and Harinama kirtanam. His renderings of the stories of Rama and Krishna are perhaps the most philosophical poems in Malayalam, but their unique value comes from their aesthetic and imaginative qualities. There is perfect fusion of the intellect with the emotion under the synthesizing force of imagination. In Ezhuttacchan's hands the language lent itself with natural ease and controlled sensuousness to render the whole gamut of human feelings and thoughts. The mode of the bird-song or 'kilippattu' which he adopted in his narratives, where the convention is to have bird as the narrator, underscores the planetary music that countless generations of readers (who used to read his works aloud for huge gatherings) have listened to with rapt attention and spiritual dedication. He never obscures the human element of the story even when he leads the readers to an imaginative realization of the divine. It is the divine in man and the human in the deity that he projects in his narrative poems. His characterization of Rama and Sita and Krishna clearly demonstrates this divine-human identification. Ezhuttacchan uses the imagination as a means of transcending the duality and achieving the integration of the principles of truth and beauty. Duality for him is just illusion; it is a necessary stage, but only to be left behind when the inner spirit had attained a visionary realization of the ultimate. The truthfulness of the experience is validated by the quality of the poetry itself. There is no false note anywhere. His works have the magnitude and the magnificence one associates with great classics. He is undoubtedly the example of the sublime in Malayalam. Some of the interspersed hymns in his narrative poems are truly inspired and passionate. Metaphysics is truly subordinated to the demands of aesthetics.

One of Ezhuttacchan's great contributions is the standardization of the language for mature literary usage. No poet coming after him can hope to escape from his influence. The judicious integration between the Aryan and Dravidian elements in Malayalam proper was achieved by him, and his choice has stood the test of time. His linguistic insights are by no means inferior to his spiritual intuition, for language to him seems to have been nothing but the veritable embodiment of universal experience. His choice of Dravidian metres in preference to the quantitative metres of Sanskrit has also been endorsed by all the major poets of later times.

Poontanam Nambudiri is the perfect exemplar of the Bhakti school of poetry in medieval India. He knew the essence of the Vedas and the puranas as well as anybody else, but he could also express it in the simplest language better than any one else. His Jnanappana (The Song of divine Wisdom) is full of passages which have become household expressions. Without being a champion of orthodoxy he could visualize human destiny in terms of spiritual values. For personal sincerity and poetic authenticity he has scarcely any rival in the language. The truths of the Upanishads were no intellectual abstractions for him; he understood them in terms of everyday life. His other works are Bhasha karnamritam and Santanagopalam. His language has a colloquial vigour even when used in verse. Like Ezhuttacchan he also favoured the use of Dravidian metres.

The 16th century saw many unusual developments in Malayalam. The starting of the printing presses led to the growth of prose. Christian and Muslim literary works also began to appear about this time. Like the sanghakali of the brahmins, the Christians developed their own margamkali based on a poem depicting the story of St. Thomas the Apostle who is believed to have visited India and converted the first Syrian Christians. The Jews of Cochin came to have simple folk songs of a religious nature with a large admixture of Hebrew words. The Muslim hymn, Mohiyuddin Mall, is composed in what is called Arabi-Malayalam.

One of the first dramatic works in manipravala which came to be produced in the 16th century is Bharatavakyam. It is a comedy of social life with an overdose of farce specifically meant for stage performance. But the growth of visual arts took a very interesting turn in the 17th century. The various forms of ritual drama in use like mudi yettu, tiyyattu, kalam ezhuttu, teyyam, tira, padeni and kolam tullal, along with the performance of classical Sanskrit drama called kudiyaṭṭam and the dance-drama evolved from Gitagovinda known as Krishṇaṭṭam, led to the evolution of a new theatre called attam or kathakali. The texts used for kathakali performances are known as attakkatha, which became a very popular literary form since the 17th century. Kottarakkara Tampuran wrote a cycle of eight plays based on the story of Ramayana. Their style is naturally a compromise between the purely literary conventions of dramatic poetry and the requirements of all-night stage performances. The typology seen in make-up and costume has its influence on the classification of character types in the attakkathas. After Kottarakkara Tampuran came Kottayam Tampuran with his four attakkathas, Bakavadham, Kalyana saugandhikam, Kirmiravadham and Kalakeyavadham. The narrative-descriptive linking passages in these plays are in Sanskrit, while the dialogues are in Malayalam.

But the greatest writer of attakkathas is Unnayi Warriar who belonged to the end of the 17th century and the beginning of the 18th. His Nalacharitham (in four parts to suit a four-night performance) is a magnificent achievement in this genre. Without sacrificing the stage conventions and their requirements, he has managed to retain all the literary qualities expected of a great work of poetry. In his understanding of human psychology, in his daring exploitation of the linguistic resources at his disposal, and in the careful arrangement of scenes and situations, he has left all other writers of attakkathas far behind. Through the sufferings of Nala and Damayanti he has been able to explore the nature of evil and the operation of fate in human lives.

Kartika Tirunal Rama Varma (1724-1798), the ruling prince of Travancore, was not only a generous patron of letters, but also a competent writer of attakkathas. An expert in the theory of the visual arts, he wrote seven plays: Rajasootyam, Subhadraharanam, Bakavadham, Gandharvavijayam, Panchaliswayamvaram, Kalyana saugandhikam and Narakasuravadham Part I. His nephew Aswathi Tirunal (1756-1794) wrote five attakkathas: Narakasuravadham Part II, Rugminiswayamvaram, Poothanamoksham, Ambarishacharitham and Paundrakavadham. Several of these plays still form an important part of today's Kathakali repertoire.

Among the many writers who flourished in the Travancore royal court was Ramapurattu Warriar, the unique author of the greatest 'vanchipattu' or boat-song in the language. Kuchelavrittam is not just a narration of the story of Kuchela and Krishna; Warriar has personalized the whole episode and breathed his life-breath into every couplet of this moving boat-song. The verbal felicity and visual clarity of this work mark it off as a unique achievement.

But a more ebullient, and sometimes irreverent, courtier-poet of the time was Kunchan Nambiar. He specialized in the writing of recitative narratives meant to be sung for the performance of 'tullal', a popular form of entertainment for the lay public in which the narrator puts on a colourful costume and make-up and dances while telling the story. Nambiar was a prolific writer, and has at least forty tullalkathas to his credit. His other poems like Srikrishnacharitham, although competent compositions, have all been overshadowed by the popularity of his tullal songs. Among the most important of his works may be mentioned Syamantakam, Ghoshayatra, Kiratam, Patracharitham, Kalyana saugandhikam and Sabhapravesham. In the ease with which he handles language he probably has no equal or rival in Malayalam. He was a master humorist; often his comedy took the form of social and psychological satire, which he deftly inserted into the structure of his puranic narratives.

For about a century after Kunchan Nambiar no great writer appeared on the scene. But it was the time of steady growth in prose. The work of several missionaries of the Christian church like Father Clement, the author of Samkshepa vedartham (1772), deserves to be mentioned here. Paremmakkal Thoma Kathanar (1737-1799) wrote Vartamana pustakam (The book of news), a travelogue of real distinction. Foreign missionaries like Arnos Patiri and Paulinose Patiri also produced important works.

The first decades of the 19th century were historically very important. It was the time when the foundations of education on Western lines were laid in the different parts of Kerala. Maharaja Swati Tirunal (1813-1847), famous as a music composer, was responsible for popularizing English education in Travancore. He too had a court that believed in royal patronage of the arts. Two major writers of attakkathas enjoyed his patronage: Irayimman Tampi (1783-1856) and Kilimanoor Vidwan Rajaraja Varma Koil Tampuran (1812-1846). Irayimman Tampi is a close successor to Unnayi Warriar as a writer of attakkathas. He probably lacks the philosophical and psychological depth of Warriar, but he shows a better command of the musical and histrionic aspects of this complex art form. His plays Keechakavadham, Uttaraswayamvaram and Dakshayagam are still immensely popular, both with the public and with the actors. Tampi's unique command of lyrical melody and fine sentiment is to be seen in the song 'Omanathinkal' (Darling moon), the greatest lullaby in the language.

The dominant trend in 19th century Malayalam literature was perhaps neoclassicism as reflected in the writings of Kerala Varma, Valia Koil Tampuran, the greatest single figure whose influence was felt throughout Kerala. But there were also other tendencies like the 'pure' and 'simple' Malayalam movement led by the Venmani poets and the writers of the Kodungalloor royal household. The cult of simplicity had adherents elsewhere too, like Velutteri Kesavan Vaidyar and Perunnelli Krishnan Vaidyar. They were all preoccupied with questions of form and texture, but they did not pay any great attention to anything of deeper significance. Only Kunjikuttan Tampuran put his gift of versification to great use by translating Vyasa's Mahabharata in full into Malayalam. Most of the others cultivated the half of letters with diligence as an end in itself.

In one sense, it may be said that the modern age in Malayalam literature was inaugurated by Kerala Varma. Although his own taste and training lay in the direction of the classics, he was also exposed to a Western literature and thought, and this had a great impact on his work as a whole. His patronage of countless aspirants after fame and money had a salutary effect on the cultural climate. Swati Tirunal's successors like Uttram Tirunal, Ayilyam Tirunal and Vishakhram Tirunal also were not only patrons, but writers themselves. The spread of education necessitated the writing of text books, and Kerala Varma did yeoman's service in this regard. This was also the time that saw the starting of several periodicals. Literature of utility also came to be cared for. Books of grammar and dictionaries like that of Gundert were published. The use of prose for fictional purposes after the European model was accepted and the first novels in the language opened a wholly new chapter. Ghatakavadham by Collins is believed to be the earliest novel in Malayalam. Literary criticism and essay were among the many new forms borrowed from English at this stage. Translations from Sanskrit and English began to appear in large numbers.

Kerala Varma's own contributions were important. His message-poem Mayurasandesham, despite the conventions of form inherited, was based on personal experience, and is an intense lyrical utterance. His translation of Kalidasa's Shakuntalam pointed to the possibility of a new way of staging plays different from that of kathakali or kudiyaattam. His translation of the novel Akbar highlighted the need for a form of prose suitable for fictional narration. He may also be credited with having introduced the informal essay into Malayalam.

Among the early periodicals that promoted the growth of literature should be mentioned Kandathil Varghese Mappila's Malayala Manorama and C.P. Achyutha Menon's Vidyavinodini, both of which were started in 1890. In 1903 Appan Tampuran started Rasikaranjini. These journals popularized poetry as well as literary criticism, especially book reviews.

In the wake of Kerala Varma's translation of Shakuntalam, many plays came to be translated. New plays also were written in large numbers, and this provoked P. Ramakurup to write a burlesque called Chakkichankaram. The earliest play on a realistic theme is Kalyani natakam by Kodungalloor Kochunni Tampuran (1855-1926).

Even during the lifetime of Kerala Varma new changes were in the offing. His nephew A.R. Raja Raja Varma (1863-1918) was partly instrumental in preparing the way for new things. The controversy over rhyme on the second syllable was perhaps the surface manifestation of something more serious. Raja Raja Varma's poem Malayavilasam looked obliquely in the direction of a romantic revival. V.C. Balakrishna Panikkar's 'Oru vilapam' also pointed to the same direction. With the publication of Asan's 'Vina puvu' (A fallen flower) the new trend already achieved its great victory. Sentiments of this kind found expression in the writings of traditionalists like K.C. Kesava Pillai, e.g. Asannamarana chintasatakam (Reflections of a dying man). The various mahakavyas which came to be written at this time were in fact the death pangs of the neoclassical tradition.

The end of the 19th century saw the birth of great fiction. O. Chandu Menon (1847-1900) wrote his epoch-making Indulekha, but died without completing his second novel Sarada. C.V. Raman Pillai (1858-1922) continued to write and turned the legends of history into remarkable works of fiction. His Martanda Varma, Dharma Raja and Rama Raja Bahadur form a composite whole, whose magnificence still stands unsurpassed. His successors who have tried their hand at historical fiction have only served to confirm his superiority. Chandu Menon may be said to have used the novel for social reform; C.V. used it to plumb the depths of human passions. Together they provided a strong foundation for Malayalam fiction and also set up serious challenges to those who were to come later.

Among the earliest essayists in the language should be mentioned Vengayil Kunjiraman Nayanar, C. Kunjirama Menon, Appu Nedungadi and Murkoth Kumaran.

The romantic movement that was launched by Kumaran Asan (1873-1924) caught the imagination of other writers also quite independently and the work of Vallattol Narayana Menon (1878-1958) and Ulloor Parameswara Iyer (1877-1949) combined with Asan's work to turn the first quarter of the 20th century into one of the golden ages of Malayalam poetry. Their short narratives and lyrics opened the eyes of the Malayalis afresh to the beauties of nature, the sufferings of man, and the values enshrined in India's great tradition. Their work had an aesthetic as well as a moral dimension to it. They liberated Malayalam poetry from a decadent neoclassical tradition and rejuvenated the language with fresh insights into the perennial springs of human life.

The work of these masters was continued by their immediate successors like Nalappattu Narayana Menon, G. Sankara Kurup, P. Kunhiraman Nair, Vennikulam Gopala Kurup, Balamani Amma and Vyloppillil Sreedhara Menon. Sankara Kurup's Odakkuzhal (The reed) is a collection of lyrics which have a mystical quality about them. A slightly different offshoot of this may be seen in the poems of Edappally Raghavan Pillai and Changampuzha Krishna Pillai. They had a more delicate sensibility, a more lyrical imagination and a greater command of the musical structure of the language.

LITERATURE-MANIPURI

Changampuzha's Ramanan is still the best-selling poem in Malayalam. All these poets, unlike their immediate predecessors, by and large stuck to the exploitation of the lyrical mode. This was continued by writers like P. Bhaskaran, Vayalar Rama Varma and O.N.V. Kurup. An intensification of the lyrical mode may be seen in Sugathakumari and Vishnu Narayanan Nambudiri.

In the late 1940s there arose a reaction against the mellifluousness of the later romantics, as seen in the works of Edasseri Govindan Nair, N.V. Krishna Warriar and M. Govindan. This was intensified in the work of Olappamanna and Akkitham. In the fifties and sixties the modernist trend came to be manifested in the poems of Ayyappa Paniker, Kakkad, Kadammanitta, Satchidanandan and others.

The second quarter of the 20th century saw the remarkable growth of the short story. Kesava Dev, Basheer, Varkey, Takazhi, Pottekkat and Karoor came into prominence. Several of them in later years turned to the novel. Kesava Dev's Odayil ninnu (From the gutter) and Ayalkkar (Neighbours), Basheer's Balyakalasakhi (Childhood friend) and Ntuppuppakkoranendarnnu (Me grandpa 'ad an elephant), Takazhi's Chemmeen and Kayar (Coir) and Pottekkatt's Vishkanyaka (Poison maid) are important achievements of this period. These writers have been followed by Uroob, Parappurath, Surendran, M.T. Vasudevan Nair, T. Padmanabhan, Ponjikara Rapphy, Vilasini and Lalithambika Antharjanam. The latest trend which constitutes a reaction against this is represented by Kakkanadan, V.K.N., O.V. Vijayan, Anand and M. Sukumaran.

Drama had a great spurt at the turn of the century with the farces of C.V. Raman Pillai. This was continued in the work of E.V. Krishna Pillai and N.P. Chellappan Nair. Serious plays with an intellectual appeal were written by Kainikara Padmanabha Pillai and Kainikara Kumara Pillai. This trend was improved by N. Krishna Pillai and Kuttanad Ramakrishna Pillai. Political plays were written by K. Damodaran and Thoppil Bhasi, while plays aiming at social reform have been written by V.T. Bhattathiripad and M.P. Bhattathiripad. The Ibsenite mode pursued by N. Krishna Pillai have been replaced by experimental drama in the work of C.J. Thomas, C.N. Sreekantan Nair, G. Sankara Pillai, Kavalam Narayana Panikkar and Narendra Prasad.

A.R. Raja Raja Varma was not only a poet, but a great critic too. He may be said to have laid the foundation for academic criticism in Malayalam. He wrote a series of books on classical rhetoric, adapting it for use in Malayalam. But he was more influential in an unorthodox way by promoting new trends. His mantle as a critic fell for a time on P.K. Narayana Pillai (1878-1937), who wrote excellent studies on Ezhuttacchan, Cherusseri, Kunchan Nambiar and Unnayi Warriar. In the 1930s, however, fresh contact with European literature enabled A. Balakrishna Pillai (1889-1960) to launch an entirely different approach to criticism. He had his focus not only on poetry but also on prose literature. He became a powerful influence on the younger generation, especially short story writers and novelists like Takazhi and Dev. In his criticism we find the application of new psychology, philosophy, and aesthetic theories borrowed from the West. He began to view Malayalam literature from an internationalist perspective. A further development of this may be found in the critical writings of Joseph Mundasseri (1901-1977), who in later years became the advocate of sociological criticism. His counterpart in the traditional school was Kuttikrishna Marar (1900-1973), who derived his theories from Sanskrit classics. Most other critics fall between these two extreme points. Kuttipuzha Krishna Pillai, Guptan Nair, K.M. George, Sukumar Azhikode and Kainikara Kumara Pillai try to combine western and Indian approaches. Modernist literary criticism may be found in K.S. Narayana Pillai, M.K. Sanoo, K.P. Appan and Thomas Mathew.

Prose literature other than fiction and criticism has made tremendous progress in the last few decades. E.V. Krishna Pillai and Sanjayan were masters of the comic mode. Among the major autobiographies in the language should be mentioned Jeevitasmaranakaal by P.K. Narayana Pillai and Jeevitasamaram by C. Kesavan. P.K. Parameswaran Nair's biographies of C.V. Raman Pillai and P.K. Narayana Pillai are among the best of their kind in Malayalam. Among literary histories the one by Ulloor tops the list by its magnitude and comprehensiveness.

K.A.P

LITERATURE (Manipuri). The pre-Hinduized period of Manipuri literature may be said to be its early period which again can be divided into two phases: the first from the early time to the sixteenth century; the second the seventeenth century. The early period covers a great length of time extending over several centuries, but this arrangement does not mean that the trends with regard to theme, language, style and form did not undergo any change within this period. The criteria are rather based on (a) the absence of the writers' names and dates of composition and (b) the freedom from the influence of any Indo-Aryan literature of language.

Characteristic of all literatures, poetry made its appearance in the Early Period in the form of ritual songs and hymns. This formative period reminds one of the period of 'mantra' in early Vedic literature. The ritual songs are associated with Lai-haraoba, a religious and social festival of the Meiteis the origin of which is lost in antiquity. Some of the songs indispensable for Lai-haraoba performance are Ougri, Khencho, Anoirol and Lairemme paosa. They are included in the text Panthoipi khongkul, a manuscript work of the seventeenth century depicting the passionate love of two divine beings. Ougri and Khencho, in view of their more archaic diction and much later historical allusions may be considered earlier than the rest. The first describes in the beginning the various appellations of the Sun and then recounts the creation of the earth and the living beings. It is said that it was sung on the occasion of the coronation on Nongda Lairen Pakhangba which took place in 33 A.D. It is always sung in chorus and the lines with their vowel harmonies and matching consonants when rendered in a long drawn stylised manner always create an eerie charm. Khencho though mostly unintelligible to the present generation is equally graceful in its music which arises out of the stately consonants. Liremma paosa and Anoirol use comparatively simple words. The first is a pungent love repartee between juvenile gods and goddesses. The latter is a long composition describing the evolution of dance in different ages and other short incidents related to it. Besides these, four ritual songs and a few more are supposed to date from time immemorial. There is Hijan hirao, sung in the said festival. It is a long narrative poem filled with deep human sentiments to which is added the charm of its music. Of the other ritual songs having great importance in other ceremonial and social occasions Ahonglon, Yakeiba, Pakhangba langyensei and Kumdansei stand out distinctly. Of which again, Yakeiba for its portrayal of nature interspersed with interesting legends may be singled out as a neatly accomplished piece of creative work.

These songs might have formed a part of the oral traditions handed down through generations, but before long we do come across serious works some of which form a trend. A society based on physical prowess for its sustenance had to glorify heroism. Therefore a cult of heroism flourished. The unknown writers of this Early Period gave varied and colourful accounts of such heroic lives in Chenglerion, Tutenglon, Numit kappa, Nungpan pampi luwaopa, Thawanthaba hiran and Chainarol.

Chengleiron, literally meaning eventful accounts of the Chenglei clan dynasty, mainly depicts the superhuman feats of a new-born child, Chingjin Naran Panganda. Tutenglon in the saga of the Meitei princes, Yoimongba and Taothingmang who took upon themselves the incredible task of dredging the channels of the biggest and longest river in Manipur. Numit Kappa is an allegory on the attempt of an overworked servant to do away with the lives of his masters, two princes, who are described as two suns. Thawan thaba Hiran is a tragedy arising out of crime passionate but also portraying the heroic spirit of the persons belonging to different clan dynasties. Chainarol may be described as the crowning work of all that went before in its realistic portrayal of valiant souls who wagered life for honour and sport. Nangsamei is predominantly a portrayal of the heroic achievements of the great Meitei king, Khagemba (1597-1652).

When heroism was the prime cult of the people for generations, love in its highest form was another ideal cherished by them. Nungpan pampi luwaopa is a story of love fulfilled after a tragic event and is, perhaps, unique of its kind in that the lover challenges the God of the Dead himself to a single combat for the return of his deceased wife's soul. Naothing phambal kaba depicting the love of a Langmai princess for a Meitei prince is a tragedy resulting from circumstances which are not the making of the characters. Khongchomnupi nongkarol is a strange story of love of six Luwang girls of superior caste with six tribal youths and their journey together to heaven after the ill-treatment of the girls by their angry mothers. It is either a tragedy or a comedy depending on how one looks at it. Panthoipi khongkul portrays the impetuous love between a married Meitei princess and the chief of the Langmais against the age-old barrier of social custom and other obstacles. Chothe thangwai pakhangpa, another story of intense love, reminds one of the myth of Orpheus and Eurydice. But here the characters are reversely placed: the surviving wife follows her deceased husband to the Hades and retrieves his soul from the hands of the King of Terrors.

There are many works of this period which cannot be grouped under categories of similar themes but they do stand out distinct in their own individual beauty. Poireiton khunthok, an account of an adventurer into this valley at the turn of the first century is one of the earliest manuscripts ever done in the original script of this language. It is a landmark in the history of Manipuri literature for the theme as well as for the manner of composition. All the works of the Early Period were meant to be recited or sung, hence each of them was more or less invested with certain poetic elements. But Poireiton khunthok's narrative is couched in prose with no prolixity or decorative figures of speech. In other respect this work conforms to the general form of early compositions. Salkao, literally meaning an ox is a rare work of its kind in any written literature for it provides with great amusement accounts of fighting bulls gone feral. Another attractive element is the glamourising of the locales where such fights took place. Leiron exudes the freshness and fragrance of nature in its description of varied flowers blooming of trees, land and water during the changing seasons. Its composition is attributed to the Meitei King, Charairongba (1697-1709). Among the chronicles that the ancient kings of Manipur maintained, the Ningthourol lambuba may be cited to belong to the Early Period in point of content and style of composition, while the other chronicles like the cheitharol kumbaba, though beginning with historical event dating back from the early part of the first century A.D., are of much later composition from the point of language. The Ningthourol lambuba may be said to be the Raj tarangini of Manipur in that it was composed in poetry. It mainly confines to describing the heroic achievements of the Meitei kings on the battle fields, to recounting the origin of place names and also to the origin of royal lineages. It does not dwell so much on social, economic and religious changes or movements and relations with other countries.

The advent of the eighteenth century is a watershed not only in the course of the political history of Manipur but also in the religious and social literary history. Though King Charairongba embraced Gaudiya Vaishnavism, the cult of the worship of Radha and Krishna, he could not induce his own subjects to embrace the new religion. Therefore, no perceptible change took place in the society and literature during his time. But when his son Pamheiba, later Garibaniwaz (1709-1749) became king far reaching changes began to take place on all sides. He took to Rama worship under the influence of one Shanti Das Goswami of the Ramanandi sect and with that he caused the people to be converted to the new religion and to relinquish the age-old traditional beliefs and social practices.

The impact of all this was first felt in literature. Works from the pen of writers well versed in Old Manipuri, Sanskrit and Bengali saw the light of day. All the seven cantos of the Ramayana and some interesting parts of the Mahabharata were brought out in Old Manipuri. These works were not translations from either Sanskrit or Bengali, but were rather epitomes of the voluminous works to suit the local atmosphere and taste. Angom Gopi was the most notable of the crop of new writers and though he confesses that he depended on Krittibas's Ramayana, he is more eclectic in his presentation. For example, in the early part of the Uttarakanda, the Manipuri poet follows Valmiki instead of Krittibas. In these works the diction is comparatively more simple, more lyrical and interlarded with Sanskrit and Bengali words particularly nouns. These new words are used for the sake of embellishment and musical effect. The imagery is mostly local and homely; the main characters are sometimes drawn after the likenesses of heroic Manipuri kings and nobles. The change-over to the Vaishnavism of Bengal again accelerated the literary output with the accompanying impetus to performing arts, particularly the reputed classical dances of Manipur and nata sangeet. Gopiram Singh Wangkhei, Madhavram Wahengba, Labanga Singh Konthoujamba, Ningthoujamba Madhav and Brindavan Wayengba are some of the prominent writers proficient in Old Manipuri and Indo-Aryan literatures. Among them Madhavram was the most prolific. His lasting works are Langlon (Moral aphorisms), Viratsanthuplon (Virat parva), Chingthangkomba maharaj Ganga chatpa (Account of the journey of Maharaj Bhagyachandra to Sri Pat Kshetra) and Sanamanik (a poetic narrative). The reign of Bhagyachandra saw the apogee of the Middle Period of Manipuri literature.

During this period a new genre of writing came into vogue. It was historical biography of kings. Samsok ngamba is an exciting account of the victory of king Garibniwas over the Burmese. Owa ngamba and Khahi ngamba vividly recount the exploits of Maharaja Gambhir Singh (1815-40) over the Burmese and the Khasis. Chandrakirti jila changba provides a graphic description of the meeting of Maharaja Chandrakirti Singh and the Governor General of India in 1876 at Silchar and also the different aspects of his nobility and courage. Another form of writing no longer based on history (which had so long been the general feature of Manipuri literature) followed. They may, perhaps, be called the harbingers of Manipuri fiction. Of these works, mention may be made of Dhananjoi laibu ningba, Sanamanik, Arong Nandakumar and Bir Singh panchali. All the works extol the virtues of righteousness and the victory of good over evil. Dhananjoi laibu ningba is cast in the mould of the story of Nala and Damayanti but with a firmer plot and realistic characters. Sanamanik is a captivating story charged both with fancy and realism. Arong Nandakumar breathes with the freshness of nature and vigour of youth while portraying the ideals of Bodhisattva. Bir Singh panchali encompasses both heaven and earth and reaches an epic height by dint of its diction and structure.

Interestingly, when the ardour of the new religion was on the rise, the traditional faith raised its head for some time in the middle of the eighteenth century and as a result valuable works like Sanamahi laikan and Sanamahi laihui appeared. But the movement soon faded away. The British came in 1891 and for better or worse, a new era dawned on Manipur.

There was a lull in the course of Manipuri literature between the momentous work of Chandrakirti jila changba in 1876 and the rise of modern Manipuri literature in the early twenties of the present century. The works worth mention were those of Haodijamba Chaitanya, a prodigious writer on history and the heroic achievements of the Meitei kings.

Chaoba, Kamal and Angalhal were the pioneers of modern Manipuri literature. They were prolific writers who wrote novels, poetry, short stories, essays and dramas. As novels, Madhabi of Kamal, Labanga lata of Chaoba and Jahera of Angalhal have still undiminished appeal. The works of Chaoba and Kamal set the pace of modern Manipuri poetry. Chaoba's essays though didactic in character are a class by themselves. Khamba Thoibi seireng of Angalhal is the first epic poem in modern Manipuri literature. It contains 34000 lines in payar and blank verse. The two were followed by Dorendra, a poet and Shitaljit, a novelist and also by a number of other writers.

World War II had its impact on Manipuri society and literature, many age-old values fell apart. The younger generation of writers strove to establish a distinct identity of these people. These young writers, steeped in modern ideas, were no longer moved by the idealism of love of the beauty of nature. They felt called upon to expose the ailments of modern society and the moral disintegration of its members. The poems of Nilkanta, Samarendra, Padmakumar, Biren, Ibopishak, R.K. Madhubir and Ibomcha give vent to feelings without inhibition. The novel of Rama Singh, Rajnikant, Pacha and Guno echo the impact of war and the turbid aspects of contemporary society. But it is in the realm of drama that post-War Manipuri literature attained a maturity of theme and form. Bormani, Tomba, Biramangol, G.C. Tongbra, Ramachandran, A. Samarandra, Kanhailal and Tomchou are some of the dramatists who enriched the Manipuri stage with new productions and catered to the public with savoury literature. The short story, though practically emerging only after the War has managed to steal the show by virtue of its wide popularity. As such there were writers galore in this genre. Along with these creative works there is a spurt of translations in Manipuri of classics from different languages.

LITERATURE (Marathi). Marathi is spoken by forty million people in the western region of India. It is the official language of the modern state of Maharashtra, with Bombay as its capital. The first reference to Maharashtra is found in the Pali Mahavamsa probably the work of a poet Mahanama, of Sri Lanka who lived in the last quarter of the 5th century A.D. This language developed from Maharashtri Prakrit, one of the Middle Indo-Aryan languages. Many scholars don't agree with this view. But in the outer circle of Indo-Aryan languages, Marathi and Konkani are grouped together, though S.K. Chatterjee does not agree with this Griersonian division of inner and outer circles of Indo-Aryan. Marathi has in its pronunciation contrast between dental and palatal affricates ch and j. Morphologically Marathi has three genders, preserving the neuter which is lost in most Indo-Aryan languages. Verbal conjugation expresses distinctions in tense, number, gender and person, the future tense is indicated by a suffix 'i'. Vocabulary of Marathi consists of pure Sanskrit, derived and indigenous (deshi) words; there are also many Perisan, Portuguese and English borrowings. While the language spoken around Pune is considered standard, the dialects of Marathi are Varadi, Ahiran and Dangi. Kudali and northern Konkani have affinity with Marathi. In Goa it is called Bhati Konkani (The Konkani of the brahmins). The script of Marathi is Devanagari. In the thirteenth century, Hemapant had introduced a fast writing script Modi in which most of the historical papers and records of Marathas and Peshvas are available.

Someshvara's Manasollasa (1129) records the first Marathi song. Viveka-sindhu by Mukundaraj is a dialogue in verse between the guru and his disciple, composed in the twelfth century. It is a philosophical work expounding 'Rajayoga'. Mahanubhava cult and Varkari cult were the two non-vedic and Bhakti cults which dominated traditional Marathi poetry for six centuries. Founded by Chakradhara (c.1274), the prince from Gujarat turned recluse, the Mahanubhava poets did not follow the Vedic-Brahmanic tenets, preached non-violence and based their poetic themes on mythological and secular themes. Around 1313 Bhaskarbhata Borikar composed Shishupalvadh; Keshavaraj Suri composed Sahyadri varnan in 1933. The Mahanubhavis are called Jaikrishnis in Punjab. They did not accept idol-worship, caste system and discrimination towards women. The other important cult is the Varkari sampradaya in which the most significant saint-poets of Maharashtra wrote their great epics and devotional lyrics or padas and abhangas. The following are the great poets and their works representing the bhakti tradition of the mediaeval period. Namdev (1270-1350), Jnaneshvara (1275-1296), Eknath (1533-1599), Mukteshvar (1574-1645), Tukaram (1608-1650), Ramdas (1608-1681), Jnaneshvari (1290), Amritanubhava (1292); Bhavartha Ramayana, Bhagavata (1570-1573); Mahabharata; Dasbodha ad Gathas, Abhangas and Bhasudas.

In Marathwada, in the village Apegaon, Vitthalpant and Rukmini Kulkarni gave birth to four children—Nivritti, Jnanadeva, Sopanadeva, Muktabai, who all turned to be saintly and devotional poets. All the four were declared outcaste by orthodox Brahmins as they were children of a sanyasin. To get himself cleared of the stigma, Vitthalpant travelled upto Benaras, but of no avail. He effected his release from the mortal coil by entering into a samadhi through yoga at a very early age. Yet he was a prodigy, and the monumental epic commentary on the Bhagavadgita, composed by him as the Jnaneshvari, is considered the highest watermark of Marathi metaphysical poetry, unsurpassed by any other later work. At the age of nineteen he composed these 9000 'ovi' verses. he was the founder of the Varkari school of poets, which was an offshoot of the 'Nath Panth', combining the Shaiva-Vedanta philosophy and the worship of God as Vishnu, in the form of Vitthala at the shrine of Pandharpur.

Namdev was a tailor by profession, but he travelled to North India. His 'padas' are included in the sacred book of the Sikhs, Adi granth. He composed his verses in Marathi, Hindustani and Punjabi. He is ranked as a great saint poet like Kabir and Nanak, Dadu and Vemana. Namdev's guru, Visoba Khechara, a grocer, Namdev's sister Mukta Bai, the maidservant in that household Janabai, Savata (a gardner), Gora (a potter), Sena (the barber), Chokha (a scavenger), Kanho Patra (a dancing girl) were other saint-poets of humble rank who all composed devotional poems and ushered a democratic social revolution amongst the rank and file, the common masses of Maharashtra. There were also Muslim saintpoets, nearly fifty, prominent amongst them being Shahmuni, Sheikh Muhammad, Wajid Pathan and Latif Shah. Jains also contributed to this literary renaissance, particularly Brahmagunadas, Gunakirti, Medha and others. Virashaiva saints, who contributed to Marathi poetry, were Shivalinga, Ramlinga, Revansiddha, Shantlinga and others.

Eknath and Tukaram were two great architects of bhakti poetry in Marathi, who built this grand and sublime structure of which Jnanadeva was the foundation and Tukaram the pinnacle. Eknath Swami translated the entire Bhagavata and Ramayana from Sanskrit in 20,000 ovi stanzas each. He also redacted Jnaneshvari and brought out its authentic version in a final manuscript form. Amongst his disciples, Dasopant (1551-1615) was a prolific poet. Thomas Stephens (1559-1619), and English Jesuit, who settled in Goa, was Eknath's contemporary. He wrote Krista-purna, based on the Bible.

Tukaram's five thousand lyrical abhangas are written in very simple language, but have deep metaphysical import. Born in a Sudra family, he was a poet of the masses. He vehemently criticized the hypocrisies of his time. Among other great poets of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries were Mukteshar, who translated the entire Mahabharata into Marathi verse, and Samarth Ramdas who wrote the inspiring moral epic Dasbodha. Other pandit poets were Vamana Pandita (1608-1695), Raghunath Pandita (1650), Shridhara (1658-1729) and Mayura Pandita or Moropanta (1729-94). All these scholarly poets composed many long narrative poems based on mythological legends in Sanskrit style and metres.

The second half of the seventeenth century witnessed the growth of a kind of heroic poetry, known as 'povada', composed by wandering ballad-singers called 'shahirs'. They enthralled the common masses with their dramatic narrations of heroic exploits. For example Agindasa wrote the ballad of Shivaji's fight with Afzal Khan. Honaji Bala, Prabhakara, Saganbhau, Parashurama and others composed lavanis in Peshwa period, which were folk-poetry with erotic themes.

Though Marathi prose came into existence in the Yadava period, it developed in the seventeenth century in the form of chronicles of Maratha rulers, called 'Bakhars', for example Sabhasadi bakhar (1697), Ajnapatra (1718) and so on. They are a very rich source material for historical research.

After the Treaty of Bassein in 1818, transfer of power from Peshwas to the British was complete. Now Maharashtra had to face western onslaught on socio-political as well as cultural fronts. Great thinkers and scholars, educationists and writers as well as political activists ushered in the nineteenth century renaissance. Balgangadhar Shastri Jambhekar (1810-1846), Govind vitthal Mahajan (1815-1890) and Krishna Shastri Chiplunkar (1824-1878) were pioneers in this modernizing process. Foundations of Marathi journalism were laid around 1840

by Jambhekar's daily Darpana and the periodical Digdarshan, Mahajan's Prabhakara, Krishna Shastri Chiplunkar's Vichar lahari (1853). Many other journalists and scholars helped the development of Marathi prose, amongst them being the stalwarts like Vishnu Shastri Chiplunkar, Gopal Ganesh Agarkar (1856-1895), Mahadev Govind Ranade (1842-1901), Gopal Krishna Gokhale, Lokmanya Bal Gangadhar Tilak (1856-1920), K.T. Telang (1850-1893), Jotiba Phule (1827-1890), R.G. Bhandarkar (1837-1925), and Bhimrao R. Ambedkar (1891-1956). The writings of these great men—the memoirs of M.G. Ranade by his wife Ramabai, published in 1910, the essays of Agarkar and Tilak, Tilak's great classic Gita-rahasya, Jotiba Phule's essays in his journal and Ambedkar's learned works on the origin of untouchables—enriched Marathi.

Krishnaji Keshava Damle alias 'Keshavasuta' (1866-1905) heralded the dawn of Marathi poetry. His first poem appeared in 1885, but he cast off the traditional form and gave to Marathi poetry a new style, expression and content. He wrote the first poem on the untouchable boy and the starving labourer. Amongst his contemporaries, the most significant romantic and reformist poets were the Christian poet Narayan Vaman Tilak (1862-1919), Vinayak Janardan Karandikar (1872-1909), Narayan Murlidhar Gupta (1872-1947), Bhaskar Ramchandra Tambe (1874-1941), Ram Ganesh Gadkari alias 'Govindaraja' (1885-1919), Tryambak Bapuji Thomare alias 'Balkavi' (1890-1918) and many others.

In the twenties of the present century, a group of poets called the 'Ravi Kirana Mandal', emerged, who experimented with many new forms like sonnet, dramatic lyric, ode and rubai, translating some poems from English and Persian. Prominent among them were Yashwant Dinkar Pendharkar alias 'Yashwant', Madhav Tryambak Patwardhan alias 'Madhav Julian' and S.K. Kanetkar alias 'Girish'. In 1925, Prahlad Keshav Atre (1898-1969), a powerful journalist and dramatist, parodied the middle class sentimentality in his Jhenduchin phulen. Anant Kanekar (1905-1980) also brought realism in poetry.

Modernist idiom in Marathi poetry began, however, in the forties, after the second world war, though the old idealism continued to attract the average reader. The three poets who brought about this revolution in poetic sensibility were A.R. Deshpande (1901-1982), B.S. Mardhekar (1909-1956), P.S. Rege (1910-1978). Though P.S. Rege already struck some typical features of the new poetry movement, Mardhekar's Kahin kavita (1947) heralded it in true spirit. Mardhekar is to Marathi what T.S. Eliot was to English, both in poetry and aesthetic theory. His Saundarya ani sahitya won posthumously the Sahitya Akademi Award (1956). P.S. Rege did something magical to the use of language in poetic composition, experimenting with it in his pithy, sinewy poems. 'Anil' introduced free verse and deepened the social awareness of the poet by emphasising his commitment of the betterment of humanity. His collections Perteva (1947) and Dashpadi were hailed as his best. The Mardhekar-Rege School was kept alive by many younger advocates of 'pure poetry', individualists and anti-establishment in their outlook, like Manmohan Natu, Mangesh Padgaonkar, Dilip Chitre, Arun Kolatkar, 'Grace' and Anuradha Potdar. Side by side with this subjective trend was the other school of progressive poetry to which belonged V.V. Shirwardkar alias 'Kusumagraja' (b. 1912), his famous work is Vishakha (1947), Sharatchandra Muktibodh, Vasant Bapat, Vinda Karandikar and Narayan Surve. While poets like B.B. Borkar, Indira Sant, N.G. Deshpande and G.D. Madgulkar excelled in lyrical poetry and were popular (three lakh copies of Gita-Ramayan by Madgulkar were sold), the so-called intellectual or high brow poetry rapidly advanced towards an incomprehensible area like abstract art, to a land without labels.

In angry protest against this abstraction, young Dalit poets raised a voice, rather raucous but very realistic. Prominent amongst them were Namdev Dhasal, Keshav Meshram, Daya Pawar and others. They met with resistance from the public in the beginning, but later, during the last decade they seem to have become a part of the establishment, not unlike the beat generation.

The Marathi novel has a history of more than a century, since the publication of Baba Padmanji's Yamuna paryatana in 1857. He was a Christian author and the novel was modelled on Pilgrims Progress. While Padmanji wrote on social themes, N.S. Risbud in his novels like Manjughosh (1868) and R.B. Gunjikar in his Mochangad (1870) preferred to spin the romantic and historical yarns. But the Marathi novel was seeking a really mature and creative talent in the field which it found in Hari Narayan Apte (1864-1919), commonly referred to as the 'prince of novelists'. From 1885 onwards he produced a large number of historical and social novels, serializing them in his own journal Karamnuk. Idealism is writ large in the novels of Apte and he particularly excels in the portrayal of female characters. Among his notable works the following deserve mention; Pan lakshat kon gheto (1893), Gad ala pan simha gela (1904), Ushakal (1911), Mi (1916), Vajraghat athava vijayanagarcha vinashkal (2nd. ed. 1922).

Vaman Malhar Joshi (1882-1943) ushered in the more serious problem-novel discussing moral issues as in his Ragini athava Kavyashastravinod (1915), Sushilecha dev (1930) and Indu Kale va Sarala Bhole (an epistolary novel, 1934). Vishvanath Bedekar's novel Ranangana (1939) is the most characteristic work as it has an international background of the last war and is infused with deep humanism. Translations of Bengali novels of Bankimchandra Chatterjee, and Rabindranath Tagore were done by V.S. Gurjar, K.R. Mitra, S.B. Shastri and Mama Warerkar.

From 1930 to 1950 Narayan Sitaram Phadke (1894-1978) and Vishnu Sakhambar Khandekar (1898-1976) were the most popular social novelists who represented two rival schools of art for art's sake' and 'art for life's sake'. They enlarged the readership of Marathi novels. Phadke's technical skill is apparent in the novels like Jadugar (1928), Uddhar and Jhelum (1935) and Pravasi. Khandekar was famous for his Ulka (1934), Kraunchavadha (1942) and Yayati, which won him the Jnanpith Award. Another popular writer Gajanan Tryambak Madkholkar (1899-1976) broke a new ground by writing political novels, which later deteriorated into novels of Hindu-based socialism and escapist entertainment. Among other socio-political significant novelists were S.V. Ketkar (1884-1937), the sociologist encyclopaedist, (Brahman, kanya, 1930), P.Y. Deshpande (1900-86), the socialist Bandhananchyapalikade (Beyond bondage) 1927, P.S. Sane popularly known as Sane Guruji (1899-1950) Shyam chi ai, 1935). Some sporadic experiments were done in fiction by B.S. Mardhekar (1909-1956), Vasant Kanetkar (b. 1923) and later by P.S. Rege (1910-1978) and Jayawant Dalvi (b. 1925) in psycho-analytical fiction. But the real break came with Bhalchandra Nemade's (b. 1938) Kosla (1963). One more interesting aspect of Marathi novel is the biographical novel and S.J. Joshi (b. 1915), N.S. Inamdar (b. 1923), Gangadhar Gadgil (b. 1923), and Ranjit Desai (b. 1928), B.D. Kher, Mrinalini Desai have penned some excellent novels in the genre.

The art of short story writing was practised by almost all these novelists. But S.M. Mate (1886-1957), Y.G. Joshi (1901-1936), Waman Chorghade (b. 1914) set new styles. Later, the 'new' short story introduced by P.B. Bhavé (1910), Aravind Gokhale (b. 1919), Gangadhar Gadgil and K.J. Purohit (Shantaram, b. 1923), Vyankatesh Madgulkar (b. 1927), C.T. Khanolkar, Sadanand Rege (1923-1982); G.A. Kulkarni (b. 1923), Kamal Desai and Gauri Deshpande enlarged the frontiers for exploring the human consciousness as affected by the unconscious and the primordial pulls.

The Marathi people are very fond of drama and there is a fairly old tradition of Marathi stage and play writing. Earlier plays were based on mythological themes. Tamil folk-play 'Kuravanchi' and Kannada folk-play 'Yakshagana' influenced Marathi 'Lalita'. In 1841 Sita swayamvara by Vishnudas Bhavé was the pioneering play. Later, translations and adaptations of Sanskrit plays were in vogue. B.P. Kirloskar (1843-1885) wrote Shakuntala (1881), Saubhadra (1882) and Ramarajya viyoga (1884), combining modern presentation and mythological subjects. Musical plays became very popular. G.B. Deval (1854-1916) and K.P. Khadilkar (1872-1948) set Marathi drama on a more sound footing. Deval's Sharada (1899) was a vehement attack on child-marriage. Khadilkar's Kichaka-vadha (1907) was banned by the British Government as Kichaka and Bhima resembled Lord Curzon and Lokamanya respectively. Ram Ganesh Gadkari (1885-1919) wrote Ekach pyala (Only one goblet, 1919), a play against the evils of alcoholism, and Rajsanyasa, a historical play, which were staged for decades, sustaining the interest of the audience all along.

After 1930, the advent of the talkie affected theatre in the worst manner, as many theatre-halls were turned into cinema-houses. Bhargavaram Vitthal Warerkar (1883-1964) and Prahlad Keshav Atre (1898-1969) were the monarchs of Marathi social drama for three decades. They wrote problem-plays, with Ibsen and Shaw as the models, and challenged many social traditions and outdated customs. Warerkar's plays Hach mulacha bap (1917) was against the dowry system and Sonyacha kalas (1932) had the background of the working-class struggle against capitalism. He was a committed social dramatist. Atre had greater sense of humour. His serious plays Gharabahr (1934) and Udyacha sansar (1935) dealt with the emerging 'new woman'. M.G. Ranganekar modernized the stage.

From 1943 onwards, historical plays on Shivaji and Peshwa period became very popular, like Dusra peshwa (1947) by V.V. Shirwadkar (1912) and Raigarhala jenva jag yete (When Raigarh rises, 1962). But the social plays by new playwrights like Bal Kolhatkar, Madhusudan Kalelkar, though sentimental, had a larger and longer appeal. Following the popular plays and musicals by Vidyadhar Gokhale and P.V. Darvhekar, there was the 'new' drama of which the great masters were P.L. Deshpande (b. 1919), Vasant Kanetkar (b. 1922) and Vijay Tendulkar (b. 1928). Tendulkar's three plays Shantata, Court chalu ahe (1968), Sakharam Binder (1972) and Ghasiram Kotwal (1973) made him the most famous and well-known dramatist. His plays were translated in other Indian languages and even staged abroad. Amongst the more experimental playwrights are C.T. Khanolkar, Mahesh Elkunchvar and Anil Barve (b. 1948).

Marathi literature is rich in personal essays, sketches, travelogues, autobiographies and biographies. Early discursive essays by Chiplunkar and S.M. Paranjape (1864-1929) were given a new turn to personal and light essays by Khandekar and N.S. Phadke. Many other essayists like Kusumavati Deshpande, Anant Kanekar, N.M. Sant and P.L. Deshpande enriched this form. The essay suffered a decline in the forties, but during the last thirty years it had many serious practitioners like Iravati Karve, Durga Bhagavat, N.G. Gore, Vinda Karandikar, Subhash and Anil Avachat, R.B. Joshi and others.

Biography in Marathi had an old tradition based on the Lilacharitra of Mahanubhava saints. Life of Johnson was written by Vishnusastri Chiplunkar, lives of Mazzini and Ganibaldi were written by N.C. Kelkar and V.D. Savarkar respectively. N.R. Phatak, B.M. Purandare, Dhananjay Keer, D.N. Gokhale had specialized in it. The autobiographies of D.K. Karve and Dharmananda Kosambi, Lakshmibai Tilak and V.D. Savarkar, Senapati Bapat and N.V. Gadgil, Chintamanrao Kolhatkar and P.K. Atre, Yashwantrao Chauhan and S.M. Joshi are a class by themselves. These are not mere chronological or confessional documents, but graphs of their times and social milieu.

Maharashtra has a rich tradition of scholarship in disciplines like history, philosophy, politics, linguistics and literary criticism including aesthetics. In the early years of the twentieth century V.K. Rajwade and C.V. Vaidya contributed to historical research, further enriched by S.G. Sardesai, Shejwalkar, Potdar, Bendre and Pagdi. Philosophy and logic had valuable contributions from R.D. Ranade, Tarkatirtha Lakshmanshastri Joshi, Surrendra Barlinge and D.D. Wadekar. Iravati Karve and G.S. Ghurye's works on sociology, and S.M. Katre, N.G. Kalelkar and Ashok Kelkar's works on linguistics are internationally recognised. Lexicographical and encyclopaedic works were undertaken in Maharashtra from Shivaji's times, (Rajya vyavahara Kosh, for example). S.V. Ketkar (1884-1937), Siddheshvarashastri Chitrava, Mahadevshastri Joshi (b. 1906) and other encyclopaedists have done lifelong work of lasting significance. Literary criticism had a varied record with critics of the traditional Sanskrit poetics as well as of modern analytical and Marxist critical theories. Prominent amongst them were G.P. Deshpande, K.N. Watwe, R.S. Joag, S.K. Kshirasagar, R.S. Walimbe, B.S. Mardhekar, W.L. Kulkarni, Kusumavati Deshpande, Prabhakar Padhye, Madhav Achwal, Vasant Datar, D.K. Bedekar, Saratchandra Muktibodh, R.B. Patankar and G.D. Godse to mention only a few.

Several translations are done in Marathi from other Indian language, prominently from Bengali, Gujarati, Hindi and Urdu, as well as from several European languages. Marathi journalism has also grown from strength to strength. Literature for children is full of variety and charm. There are several literary institutions serving different specialized branches of literature. There is also science fiction popularized by writers like Jayant Narlikar. Excellent books are there on the theory and practice as well as history of music and architecture. The new challenges of mass-media, broadcasting, films and T.V. have also been taken up, and new writing has been influenced by these demands. The readership is fast growing, with rapid urbanization and spread of literacy. Movements like Granthali, Writers Co-operatives are becoming more effective.

Marathi literature has a rich past and a richer future. Creativity and critical faculties are well-balanced. Intellectual ferment and questioning attitude are demonstrated in new writing. Sentimentality and linguistic chauvinism are receding and there is a conscious attempt to advance towards a new era of optimism and achievement.

P.M.

LITERATURE (Nepali). Nepali literature is said to be about 250 years old counting from the time of Subananda Das, the first poet to write in Nepali. But since Jagdishchandra Ragmi's discovery of Bhaswati's Nepali translation some scholars have tended to believe that writing in Nepali actually began as far back as 1400 A.D. From the welter of various works which have come down to us it appears that, as with most literatures, Nepali literature also began with verse writing.

It is customary to divide the history of Nepali literature into the following periods: (1) Adikala (1742-1815) (2) Bhaktikala (1816-1872) (3) Ritikala (1873-1917) (4) New Era (1904-1950) and (5) Modern Period (1951 to this day).

Adikala which has been described as the Heroic Age of Nepali literature saw a plethora of heroic poems and songs about warlike princes, their battles and their prowess. Subananda Das was indeed the first poet to write. Among the other poets were Shakti Ballav, Udayananda Aryal, Raghunath Bhatt and Hira Gainyani. The last two wrote songs extolling the prowess and valiance of the Shah kings.

The Bhaktikala or 'The Era of Devotion' starts from 1816 and extends upto 1872 during which time the influence of the Hindi poets first came to be felt. The first devotional poet was Gumani Patna whose Krishna charitra became a source of inspiration for the later poets. He was followed by Indiras with his Gopika stuti and by Vidyaranya Keshari with his Draupadi stuti, Yugal giti and Benu giti. Yadunath and Basanta Sharma each wrote a Krishna charitra, the former in 1816 and the latter in 1827. From Gumani Patna to Yadunath Pokhrel poetry centred on the Krishnabhakti cult. Patanjali Guzaral mixed Ramabhakti with Krishnabhakti. Guzaral's Matsendranath ko katha, Haribhakta mala and Gopal bani are famous. Some historians even hold that it was he who wrote the famous Ramashwamedha. But it was with the translation of Raghu Nath's Sundarakanda Ramayana that Ramabhakti came to permeate Nepali literature more fully. Bhanu Bhakta's translation of Adhyatma Ramayana has indeed a touch of originality. His language is simple and lucid and has a chastity which could touch the readers' heart. Bhanu Bhakta was influenced by the age he lived in. He was more a poet of the people than a religious poet. He became the more so because the earlier poets like Gumani, Indiras, Vidyaranya Keshari and to some extent Yadunath and Raghunath had employed Hindi words and had written a language which was not the language of the common man. Those were times when poetic excellence was thought to consist in the laboured language forged with a liberal borrowing of Hindi and Sanskrit words. Bhanu Bhakta for the first time in Nepali literature perceived that poetry consisted not in a strange language removed from the people but in the simple language of the common man. It is in this simple language that he wrote his Ramayana, Bhaktimala, Dadhu shiksha and Prashnottarmala and other shorter poems. His works are so exquisite and at the same time has such a popular appeal that historians have justly described him as the Adikavi or the father of modern Nepali literature. If Subananda Das is the first Nepali poet Bhanu Bhakta is the first great Nepali poet.

Apart from the Krishnabhakti and Ramabhakti there is a third devotional cult which came to influence Nepali poetry. It was the cult of Sant Josmani. Its first poet was Sushidhar who wrote the famous poem, Sachidananda lahari. Josmani Santa cult preached the doctrine of nirguna bhakti and discarded traditional idolatry and sacrifices. One of the prominent saints of this tradition was Santa Gyandil Dasa who came to Darjeeling from Nepal in 1877 and composed a long poem, Udaya lahari, and about five hundred bhajanas or devotional songs.

Ritikala or the Period of Eroticism saw the beginning or and development of prose writing. In poetry there was a shift from bhakti (devotion) to riti (shringarik or the erotic). This last first manifested itself in the works of Motiram Bhatta and his group. Motiram Bhatta, Rajivlochan Joshi, Laxmi Datta Pant, Nar Dev Panday et al published Mano dwayga prawaha and Sangit chandradaya which were collections of their poems. Motiram Bhatta himself wrote Kamal-bhramar sambad, Pikduti, Prahlad-bhakti, Gajendra moksha, Ushacharitra, Gafastak, Panchak-prapanchak, Kavisamuha baranam, Tij ko katha, and a number of ghazals besides translating Kalidasa's Abhijnanshakuntalam and Harsha's Priyadarshika. He was the first to write critical biography of Bhanu Bhakta. He was also the first to found a Nepali journal, Gorkha Bharat jiwan (1897.) Motiram Bhatta loved Nepali literature and spared no pains for its nourishment and development. It was in his works that prose was practically born became an adequate medium for expressing ideas.

The New Era. After Motiram Bhatta Nepali prose continued to develop with the publication of literary journals like Chandrika (1918) from Kurseong, Nepali saitya sammelan patrika (1932) from Darjeeling, Gorkha sansar (1924) from Dehradun and Sarada (1932) from Nepal. These journals tenderly fostered the writing of essays and short stories in Nepali.

In poetry, Lekh Nath's Pinjara ko sugha broke new grounds. Among his other works are the three long poems,—Satya kali sambad, Ritu bichar, and Buddhi binod and a collection of his short poems in two volumes, Lalitya. Lekh Nath's Tarun tapasi is regarded as a great philosophical work. Dharnidhar Sharma, another poet with a leaning towards the classical wrote of a number of poems which are collected in Naibedya (1920).

LITERATURE-NEPALI

From the time of the publication of Sarada in 1932 and with the writings of Lakshmi Prasad Devkota, Siddhicharan Srestha and Gopalprasad Rimal the influence of romanticism came to be felt in Nepali poetry. It was about this time that Nepali drama of ideas found an exponent in Balkrishna. Balkrishna was a poet as well as a dramatist and successfully employed the blank verse. In his Prahlad which is a play based on a story of the Puranas, the two characters of Prahlad and Hiranyakasipu represent Mahatma Gandhi and the devastating atomic power of the Second World War. Balkrishna wrote about thirty plays besides a number of poems and one-act plays. He also wrote a long poem called Ago ra pani and an epic called Chiso chulo, in which he totally dispensed with the traditional rules. Balkrishna was progressive in outlook and has been described as a rebel poet.

Mahakavi Lakshmi Prasad Devkota was one of the greatest Nepali poets. When he died in 1959 he left six mahakavyas which were subsequently published. They are Sakuntal, Sulochana, Maharana Pratap, Banaphul, Prometheus and Prithviraj Chowhan. He wrote twenty-one longer poems and more than six hundred shorter poems. Apart from these he wrote a number of essays which were collected and published in the two volumes named Lakshmi nibandah sangraha and Dadim ko rukh. He also wrote a novel called Champa, a play named Sabitri Satyavan and a number of short stories collected in Lakshmi katha sangraha.

In the sphere of short story, Guruprasad Mainali's Naso (1935), Balkrishna Sama's Parai ghar (1935), Bisweshwar Prasad Koirala's Chandra badan (1935), Puskar Shamsher's Paribanda, Rupnarayan Sinha's Dhanmati ko cinema swapna and Indra Sundas's Gadawan and Shiva Kumar Rai's Macha ko mol (1943) broke new grounds in Nepali short story. All these writers barring Bisweshwar Prasad Koirala focussed on one or another social problem. Bisweshwar Prasad Koirala's 'Chandrabadan' was the first psychological story. Bhikasha, Gobinda Bahadur Mala 'Gothalay' and Posan Panday followed the trend set by Bisweshwar. Guru Prasad Mainali's 'Paral ko ago' (1938), Puskar Samsher's 'Paribanda' (1938) and Shiva Kumar Rai's 'Macha ko mol' (1943) are a few of the masterpieces of Nepali short stories.

Indra Bahadur Rai's Bipana katipaya (1961) and Kathastha (1971), Ramesh Bikal's Naya Sadak ko Geet (1962) and Euto buro violin asawari ko dhun ma (1968), Posan Panday's Manas (1968) Shankar Lamchanay's Gauthali ko qund (1968), Parijat's Adim desh (1968) and Sadak ra pratibha (1975), Prema Shah's Pahenlo qulaf (1966) Parasu Pradhan's Pheri akraman (1968) and Euta arko dantya katha (1971) are modern short story collections which deal with various human problems. Since 1970 Nepali short stories have more and more tended to expound new ideas and novel thoughts sometimes at the expense of the narrative. Present short story writers feel that since life exists without a plot the story should dispense with the plot and project life as it is. Even so Nepali short story is second only to Nepali poetry in its richness and versatility.

In fiction romanticism became a marked trend since the thirties. Rudra Raj Panday's Rupmati (1934) was the first Nepali romantic novel and a trend-setter. So long fiction had only dealt with social problem leavened with elements of cheap entertainment. Rupmati with its idealism opened up new vistas. It was followed by Bhramar (1936) by Rupnarayan Singh. In contrast Lain Singh Bangdel's novels, Muluk bahira (1947) and Langara ko sathi (1949) are marked by a realism hitherto unknown in Nepali fiction.

Though during the 50's new trend had already set in, social problems continued to be the dominant theme of Nepali fiction. Ill-treatment of women by their mothers'-in-law and by their husbands, problems arising out of the husband's taking in a second wife, slavish treatment meted out to women—these remained the recurring themes.

From 1960 onwards a completely new image of women began to be projected by the novelists. They are the new women, educated and accomplished. These new women are found in Bijaya Bahadur Malla's Anuradha (1966), Indra Bahadur Rai's Aja ramita cha (1964). Bisweshwar Prasad Koirala's Tin ghumti (1965) Parijat's Siris ko phul (1965). Asit Rai's eleven novels are based on existentialist ideas. Parijat, an outstanding woman novelist turned from existentialism (Siris ko phul) to the creed of progress (Andio pahad sanga). She not only projects human problem but hints at its solution also. She is at bottom a revolutionary who preaches a total social change. Asit Rai and Dhrubachandra Gautam are too of the outstanding modern novelists who are experimenting with various new forms of writing.

Modern period. From 1950 onwards Nepali literature has rapid changes with a new outlook and view of life. Bharati, a monthly literary magazine published from Darjeeling in 1949 by Parasmani Pradhan helped to disseminate new ideas and foster this new outlook. This age saw the growth of prose literature. Emphasis was laid on the use of the standard form of the language. Grammatical rules were strictly adhered to in order to give a character to the language and to foster a discipline in writing. Writers of this period started with a new orientation. Literature tended to have stronger moorings in society but most important of all it became self conscious. But side by side with these new moorings, there was a rise of individualism which asserted itself in different styles assumed by different authors.

In May 1963 a literary movement known as Tesro ayam or the Third Dimension in Literature propounded by the three stalwarts—Indra Bahadur Rai, Iswar Ballav and Til Bikram Nimbang, better known as Bairagi

LITERATURE-ORIYA

Kanhila started at Darjeeling. Their mouth-piece was a slender magazine known as Tesro Aayam. In its very first issue it set forth its principles. Of the three exponents of tesro ayam Indra Bahadur Rai is a critic, short story writer and novelist while the others are poets. Their poems and short stories present the third dimensional principles. They discarded the old patterns and forms in poetry and prose. They insisted on presenting the inner thoughts and the overall meaning of life. Literature to them was not an expression of emotions. It was a medium through which life is to be projected with its inner philosophy. The Third Dimensional Movement tended to discard old poetic forms and metrical patterns and adopted in its place a new prose style, new similes and symbols, and both the eastern and western myths.

From 1963 onwards, Nepali Literature has slowly and gradually headed for new and refreshing experiments in prose and poetry.

LITERATURE (Oriya). The Oriya language is derived from the Eastern Maghadi Apabhramsha of about 1200 years ago, and owes common origin with Assamese, Bengali and Maithili. Though the language is ancient, it had no literature of its own till the 14th-15th century A.D. due to certain historical circumstances.

From the Nandas (4th century B.C.), Ashoka (3rd century B.C.), Kharavela (1st century B.C.) down to the Sailodbhabas (7th century A.D.), the Bhaumas (9th century A.D.), the Somavamsis (11th century A.D.) and the Eastern Gangas (12th century A.D.), the ruling dynasties of Orissa were not patrons of the Oriya language. The Rock Edicts of Ashoka at Dhauli and Jaugarh are inscribed in Prakrit. The successive ruling dynasties patronised Sanskrit. The royal scribes and panegyrists in the copper plate grants and stone inscriptions of the kings used highly stylised and ornate Sanskrit.

Thus under these constraints Oriya had no opportunity to grow. The oldest specimen of Oriya that can be found is in the shape of place-names and in some inscriptions three of which are dated 990 A.D., 1036 A.D. and 1249 A.D. The last is very important as it contains a number of connected lines in old Oriya.

Nonetheless, as the language existed notwithstanding the cold neglect of the ruling dynasties, it had an oral literature of its own which in the shape of folk songs, proverbs and riddles has passed down from generation to generation through words of mouth though in the process of transmission they underwent a great deal of changes.

Moreover, the lack of a script was yet another constraint in the path of the development of Oriya literature. The curvilinear Oriya script reached its fully developed form towards the middle of the 13th century after which Oriya literature could make its faint beginning.

It was under the Imperial Solar Dynasty Kings (15th century A.D.) that Oriya literature fully blossomed. The reason is not far to seek. It was simply because the Solar Dynasty kings spoke Oriya. Under their rule the Utkal Kalinga Empire stretched from the Ganges in the North of the Krishna in the South. That the Solar Dynasty Kings, though no mean scholars in Sanskrit, patronised the Oriya language is evident from their use of Oriya in some of the Jagannath Temple inscriptions at Puri. Patronised by these Kings Oriya literature soon reached its zenith.

The history of Oriya literature can be divided into the following periods: (1) Proto-Oriya to 1400 A.D. (2) Early Oriya 1400-1650 (3) Late Middle Oriya (1650 to 1866) (4) Modern Oriya (1866-1947) (5) Post-Independence period.

To 1400 A.D. the Jagannath Temple inscriptions of the Solar Dynasty Kings (15th-16th century) exhibit a fully developed form of Oriya composition. But prior to this, some of the Charyapada songs of the Sahajiya Buddhists can be cited as specimens of proto-Oriya writings. M.M. Haraprasad Sastri, who first discovered and published these songs ascribed the authorship of some of these songs from linguistic evidence to Luipa, Kanhupa, Birupa etc., who belonged to Orissa. Sastri's conclusions have been corroborated by other Buddhist-tantric scholars like Binaytosh Bhattacharya also. Naturally the composition of these Oriya Siddha poets contained the seeds of proto-Oriya writings and is rightly regarded as the oldest form of Oriya literature. The writings of the Nathasiddhas also belong to this proto-Oriya period. Sisu veda of Gorakhanatha is acknowledged by discriminating scholars as specimen of old Oriya. The early portions of Madala panji or the palm-leaf chronicles of the temple of Jagannatha at Puri, the beginnings of which goes back to the 12th century A.D., show the early use of Oriya prose.

Before we come to Sarala Dasa and his magnum opus, the Oriya Mahabharata, two other works Kesava-koili of Markanda Dasa and Kalasa-chautisa of Vatsa Dasa deserve some notice. Kesavakoili is hailed as the earliest chautisa each line of which begins with a consonant of the Oriya alphabet. It depicts Yashoda's grief at Krishna's departure to Mathura. Kalasa of Vatsa Dasa is an interesting poem which depicts Shiva's marriage with Parvati. Shiva in the Kalasa-chautisa is not the conventional Shiva of the Sanskrit traditions but a common good-for-nothing cultivator addicted to drugs who amuses us more than commands our reverence.

Early Oriya (1400-1650). It may be said with some justification that Oriya literature begins with Sarala Dasa just as English literature begins with Chaucer. Sarala Dasa was a contemporary of the Emperor Kapilendra Deva (1415 A.D.) The magnum opus of Sarala Dasa was the Mahabharata which is read and admired even today. Though the crux of Sarala's Oriya Mahabharata is based on the Sanskrit original it is full of deviations, exaggerations, suppressions, alternations and even reversions of the various episodes of the Sanskrit original. Sarala's Mahabharata was in effect an independent creation. His Mahabharata has created many myths, legends and proverbs which have gone deep down into the Oriya mind. Besides the Mahabharata Sarala also wrote Bilanka-Ramayana and the Chandi-purana, both extolling the cult of Shakti, and that was not in imitation of Sanskrit. The massive writings of Sarala Dasa firmly laid the foundation of Oriya literature, which since then has a continuous history of development.

LITERATURE-ORIYA

Arjuna Dasa belonged to this early period. It is Rama-bibaha (The marriage of Rama) which is regarded as the earliest kavya in Oriya, composed in colloquial Oriya and set in metres.

The Panchasakha period (1497-1568) is noteworthy in the history of Oriya literature for its voluminous contributions both quantitatively and qualitatively. Achyutananda Dasa, Balarama Dasa, Ananta Dasa, Jagannatha Dasa and Yashobanta Dasa are celebrated in the history of Oriya literature and religion, as the Pancha-sakhas. The religious or spiritual doctrine, which they preached and practised was based on yoga and tantra, most likely a continuation of the Natha Siddha traditions coupled with bhakti or devotion. The Supreme Deity according to them was the Sunya-purusha (the Void) who can be realised only through esoteric yogic practices. This has led scholars like N.N. Vasu and others to characterise them as Prachhannabaudhdhas or the disguised Buddhists. Barring Jagannatha Dasa, whose Bhagavata is read even today with adoration, the others of the Pancha-sakha, mostly wrote ecclesiastical tracts, elucidating their esoteric cults. Though from the critical point of view most of these voluminous compositions were drab, didactic and devoid of any literary merit, these poets through their efforts made the Oriya language adequate for philosophical and metaphysical writings. From the socio-cultural point of view the Pancha-sakha poets brought about a silent cultural and spiritual revolution among the masses. The religious scriptures and epics like the Mahabharata and the Ramayana had so long been kept as a close preserve of the learned Brahmins well-versed in Sanskrit. But by transcreating these works in Oriya the brahmanical stranglehold on the spiritual life of the people was broken. Balarama Dasa, considered to be the eldest among the Pancha-sakhas, went to the extent of even teaching Vedanta in Oriya medium to the Bauris, a community considered untouchable, in the hallowed precincts of the temple of Jagannatha in Puri. Besides Vedanta-sara, he also rendered the Bhagavat-gita into Oriya. Balarama composed many other tracts on the spiritual doctrines and practices of the popularly known Gyanamisra bhakti (devotion with knowledge) school. But the fame of Balarama Dasa rests on his Oriya Ramayana which not unlike the Sarala Mahabharata was a transcreation of the Sanskrit Ramayana. The most celebrated among the Pancha-sakha poets was Jagannatha Dasa whose Bhagavata has not only shaped Oriya literature but also the spiritual life and culture of the people. The eagerness to be able to read Bhagavata has helped the spread of literacy in Orissa. The language used in Bhagavata is simple and lyrical and has a chastity which is unique. Achyutananda Dasa was another prolific writer of this school. He is credited with the composition of an many as 1,000 works though most of them must have been credited to him by his disciples. The Shunya samhita (The doctrines of the void) of Achyutananda only expounds the cult of Knowledge with Devotion, but sheds considerable light on the contemporary religious history of his times. The Vaishnava saint, Chaitanya, came to Orissa at this time to spend the last eighteen years of his life in Puri. His long sojourn in Orissa, though influenced the spiritual life of the people and King Prataparudra Deva left the Pancha-sakhas untouched. To avoid persecution by the state the Pancha-sakhas like Achyutananda professed outward devotion to Chaitanya but in their writings they skilfully avoided the ragamisra bhakti (emotional devotion).

The writers of this period were a legion and composed works by the scores and by the hundreds. Though the dominant trend of this vast literature was ecclesiastical and though it bore mulishly the burden of religion and cults, it was during this same period that the literature without any obvious didactic purpose also made its beginning: This could be seen in the kavyas or verse romances. Though these early Oriya kavyas were influenced by Sanskrit poetics, they eschewed the baroque, ornate style such as is found in the later kavyas of the 17th century. The writings of these poets equipped Oriya language and made it adequate to express soft, delicate, poetic images and nuances. The few outstanding kavyas of this period are Parimala of Narasingha Sena, Ushabhilasa of Sisu Sankara Dasa, the Rahasyamanjari of Deva Durlabha Dasa; Rukmini-bibha of Kartika Dasa and Sasisena of Pratapa Raya. Other poets of this period like Madhusudana, Bhima Dhivara, Sadasiva and Sisu Iswara Dasa composed kavyas or long poems on themes derived from the puranas. Towards the close of the 17th century, Oriya literature had been fully developed in every aspect. The language of the poets of this period is simple though rhetorical and bereft of the verbal jugglery which is the mode of the later kavya period. The early Oriya kavyas like Usabhilasa and Rukmini bibha etc., though came under the influence of the Sanskrit kavyas, particularly of Naisadha by Sriharsha, were comparatively free from uninhibited eroticism. The physical charms of the heroines were of course described in voluptuous idioms and sensuous lines but unlike in the later kavyas, aesthetics dominated over erotics.

Late Middle Oriya (1650-1866). From 1650 A.D. onwards till the close of the 19th century, kavyas and lyrics dominated the literary scene. In fact, this period can rightly be termed as the Kavya Age in Oriya literature. Towards the close of the 17th century all the epics, puranas and religious scriptures had already been translated or trans-created in Oriya. In fact, it had reached a point of exhaustion. The poets were in search of new themes to give vent to their poetical skill or talents. There appeared in this literary milieu the early Oriya kavyas dealing with both secular and puranic themes. In the late middle period this trend was further strengthened. The poets of this age gave a new orientation to Oriya poetry, marked by verbal acrobatics, unabashed eroticism, even covert obscenity and a highly sophisticated artificial style or conceits. Though the Victorian puritanic taste of the early 20th century critics consigned these works to the dirt-heap of obscenity they are cherished till today by both the literate and illiterate masses.

The poetry of the period under review were both secular and non-secular though the later was more voluminous. Erotic dalliance of Krishna with the Gopi maids was the grist for the mills which reached its zenith in Krishna's erotic exploits with Radha. The dualistic love-cult of Sri Caitanya had in the meantime deeply influenced the spiritual outlook of the people which inspired these erotic Krishna-lila kavyas. The other group of the non-secular poetry had the old Ramayana story for its theme embellished with ornate baroque style and erotic descriptions. The language was sanskritised and words were alliterative and sonorous. If the works of Dinakrishna, Upendra Bhanja, Abhimanyu Samanta Singhara, Kavisurya and Gopalakrishna etc., have survived even till today, it is not so much for their thematic contents or literary excellence but for their musical charm. These apparently non-secular lila kavyas gave unbridled scope to the poets, smothered so long under the normative religious constraints and inhibitions, to give vent to their repressed emotions and shingarabhava (erotic emotions) behind the façade of Radha and Krishna or Rama and Sita. The supra-poetic emotion of these kavyas was love or shringara regarded as the adi-rasa or primordial emotion.

The earliest exponent of this ornate style was Dinakrishna Dasa, whose immortality in Oriya literature rests on a single poem, Rasakallolla. It is a work of considerable merit and deals with the amorous escapades of Krishna with the Gopis. Each line begins with the letter ka. Though composed in the medieval milieu, the imagery it employs is strikingly modern.

But the greatest exponent of this artificial ornate style was Upendra Bhanja (1670-1720), a scion of the ruling Bhanja Dynasty of Ghumsara. In fact his grandfather, Dhananjaya Bhanja, in his poetical works like Ichabati and Anangarekha had started this trend which reached its climax in the works of Upendra Bhanja. Upendra Bhanja was a man of unquestioned talents and a great poet. His influence dominated the whole of the 18th and the first half of the 19th century. He has been rightly hailed as the "Kavi-samrat", the King of Poets. His claim to immortality rests on the famous poems like Baidehisha vilasha, Koti brahmada sundari and Lavanyavati. While Baidehisha vilasa deals with the Rama-Sita theme, the two later kavyas are secular love-romances. Upendra Bhanja wrote about 42 kavyas. He wrote, besides, countless short lyrics called chaupadi dealing mostly with love which are as alive today through the Odissi-dancers and musicians as they were in his own time.

Abhimanyu Samantasinghara, the last of the trios of the Ornate Kavya School, treated the Radha-Krishna story in his famous kavya, Bidagha chintamani. Erotics or sringara-rasa is predominant though the poet does not ignore other rasas of the Sanskrit poetics. The devotional love cult or raganuga bhakti found its sweetest poetic expression in this poem. Among others of this period, Bhaktacharan Dasa, Brindabati Dasi, Yadumani Dasa, Bhupati Pandit and Viswanatha Khuntia, deserve mention.

But special mention should be made of Kavisurya Baladev Rath (1789-1845) and Gopalakrishna (1785-1862). Kavisurya is famous for his Kishora chandranana champu. Not many poets before Kavisurya had attempted the champu genre. The champu is a collection of short poems arranged in the alphabetical order from ka to khya which in its entirety forms a kavya. Each poem has been set to meter and is sung separately. Though it deals with the age-old ubiquitous theme of Radha and Krishna, its treatment is novel and the portrayal of Radha Krishna and Lalita (ago between) is something unique. Gopalakrishna attempted no kavyas but is famous for his padavalis or short poems dealing with the Krishna theme. The lyrical quality and depth of emotion in his poems have kept them alive even today notwithstanding the changes in time and taste.

Though the Oriya people were famed in history as great soldiers and empire builders this is not reflected in the medieval Oriya literature except in Purusottama Dasa's Kanchi-Kaveri and Brajanath Badajena's Samara taranga. The latter is a spirited ballad describing the fight between the Oriya paikas (soldiers) under the Raja of Dhenkanal and the Maratha forces under Bhaskara Pandit in which the latter was defeated. Samara taranga, gives a picturesque, eye-witness account of the battle, a description of the peasant militia and of the weapons they used. To the credit of Badajena goes also the composition of Chatura vinoda, a collection of tales in prose. It is the earliest work in Oriya prose though some scholars believe that Rudra sudhanidhi by Narayana Abadhuta Swami, a prose work written in the Sanskrit churnaka prose style, preceded Chatura-vinoda.

Before we conclude this period special mention should be made of Bhima Bhoi (1855-1895) belonging to the tribal Kandha community. He was a follower of the Mahima sect, which worshipped the monistic void and practised abstinence. Though he had no formal education he wrote Stuti-chintamani and some other short poetical works of considerable literary merit.

Though thematically constrained the output of Oriya literature in the late middle period was indeed vast and important. Under the influence of Sanskrit poetics court poetry came to be highly sanskritised in the 18th century, but towards the close of the 19th century Oriya had again started coming into its own emancipating itself from the shackles of Sanskrit and in the process, acquiring a lucidity and elegance all its own.

Modern Oriya Period (1866-1947). After the British conquest of Orissa in 1803 A.D. the modern age began in Orissa. Fakirmohan Senapati (1843-1918), Radhanath Rai (1849-1908) and Madhusudan Rao (1853-1912) were the three great prosateurs and poets who ushered in the Modern Age in Oriya literature.

Though Fakirmohan wrote a vast number of verses in the form of epics, kavyas and short poems, his undying fame rests on his novels and short stories. Umeshchandra Sircar and Ramshankar Rai had, of course, written novels before Fakirmohan but Umeshchandra's Padmamali (1888) and Ramashankar's Bibasini (1898) were more romantic tales than novels in its strictly technical sense. Fakirmohan for the first time introduced character-portrayal in the hitherto colourless one-dimensional narration of tales. The magic of his pen could even bestow an identifiable personality on a mute animal like a cow (Neta) in his novel Chaman athaguntha. Characterisation in the earlier novels lacked depth and dimension and was flat. But Fakirmohan's characters are in the round. To him also goes the credit of introducing a social realism not only in Oriya fiction, but in Indian fiction as well. Before Chamana athaguntha (1897) Indian fiction was caught in the cobwebs of romances. Never before this book did the woes and miseries of the rural folks, exploited and humiliated by the unscrupulous landlords and money lenders and abetted by the establishment, find powerful and poignant articulation. Its language is spicy and colloquial, its characters are drawn in a subtle, humorous way, and its innate appeal is tragic. All these have made it a classic. Fakirmohan wrote three other novels, Mamu (The maternal uncle) Prayaschita (Expiation) and Lachama. While Lachama is a historical novel depicting the ravages of the Maratha Bargis, Prayaschita is a social, didactic novel. His autobiography or Atmacharita is another classic, whose candour and style is yet to be excelled. Fakirmohan is also the father of Oriya short story. Though his earliest story, 'Lachamania', published in 1868 in the pages of Bodhadayini is lost to posterity, Revati (1900) and Randipua Ananta (Ananta the widow's son) are two important works in Oriya short story. Fakirmohan influenced generations of novelists and short story writers well past the post-Independence period.

Radhanath Rai is rightly hailed as the Father of Modern Oriya Poetry. He redeemed the Oriya kavyas from medieval ornateness and conceits and imparted to it a modern idiom. His kavyas, Kedara-Gauri, Chandrabhaga, Nandikeswari, Usha and Parvati were written in modern neo-classical style. Though in some kavyas the themes and sometimes even ideas and imageries were drawn from European sources the atmosphere he evoked is most beautifully Oriya. His Chilika is a very fine piece of descriptive nature poetry on the famous Chilika lake of Orissa. The co-mingling of the personal moods of the poet with the different facets of Nature as reflected in the placid waters of Chilika and the feeling of communion, even identification with Nature make it an enduring classic in Oriya poetry. But his incomplete kavya Mahayatra (9 cantos) describing the ascent of the Pandavas to Heaven and composed in blank verse, is his most significant contribution. Though Ramashankar Rai had experimented with blank verse earlier in his plays, it was Radhanath who successfully used it in Mahayatra. Radhanath also wrote many interesting prose pieces in Viveki which dealt with men and manners. But he was primarily a poet and a major influence in Oriya poetry even till the post-Independence period.

Madhusudan Rao extended the horizon of Oriya poetry in respect of subject-matter as well as of prosody and music. Vasanta-gatha and Kusumanjali are delightful collections of sonnets and lyrics. He also wrote a considerable amount of Oriya prose which was different in style from the prose of Fakirmohan. Madhusudan's prose was sanskritised.

At the time when Radhanath's influence dominated the poetical scene, Gangadhar Meher (1862-1924) freed himself from the master's influence. His kavyas, like Pranaya ballari and Tapaswini were written in a delectable style synthesising the medieval with the modern. Tapaswini, dealing with Sita's exile, is a classic which enjoys undiminishing popularity even today. Nandakishore Bal (1875-1928) popularly known as 'palli-kavi' (poet of the village) introduced a genre of ballad-like poems in colloquial language quite unlike that employed by Radhanath, Madhusudan or Gangadhar. Never before Nandakishore did the countryside in its different moods, nuances and picturesque colours feature in Oriya poetry. His collection of poems, Palli-chitra (The rural scenes), is an enchanting pageant of the Orissan village life which evokes a sweet nostalgia. Nandakishore also wrote some picturesque and colourful ballads and a novel named Kanakalata. Chintamani Mohanty was a prolific poet of this period who wrote under the influence of Radhanath. He wrote a considerable number of novels. While poetry of this period came to be influenced by a puritanical prudery—which was actually a reaction to the uninhibited eroticism of the medieval poetry, Padmacharan Patnaik (1885-1956) devoted his poems to the subtle feelings, deep romantic yearnings and passions of human heart. Aparna Patnaik is a distinguished poetess of this period. Though she was born in a Telugu-speaking area in Visakhapatnam district of the erstwhile Madras Presidency and had no opportunity to receive modern education, she wrote remarkable lyrical poems.

About this time modern Oriya drama was born. Though lyrical dramas known as suanga and lila natyas had been in vogue since a long time, Jagmohan Lala (1838-1913) with his three-Act drama, Babaji, could be said to have ushered in the modern Oriya drama. Lack of a modern stage had long been felt to be a great handicap, Jagmohan established a stage which he named Radhakanta Rangamancha on which his first plays, Babaji (1877), Sati (1886) and Priti were enacted.

But it was Ramashankar Rai (1860-1920), who gave drama a regular shape fashioning it after Sanskrit and English plays and enriching it with new themes. Ramashankar wrote twelve plays beginning with Kanchi-kaveri (1880) which was a page from Orissa's glorious history. This play received wide approbation and is regarded as a classic. Bhikaricharan Patnaik (1878-1962) and Kamapala Misra (1875-1927) are two other playwrights of this period. Misra's Sita bibaha (Marriage of Sita) is hailed as a classic. It was very popular with amateur theatre groups.

Among the other prosateurs of this period who deserve special mention are Viswanath Kara, Gopalachandra Praharaj, Pandit Gopinatha Nanda, Jalandhara Dev and Tarinicharan Rath. Viswanath Kar as the editor of Utkala sahitya shaped the career of many modern writers in Oriya. Even Fakirmohan's famous stories had appeared in the pages of Utkala-sahitya. Viswanath also can be said to have strengthened the genre of modern Oriya essays. His Bibidha prabandha (1896), a collection of essays, deserves special mention in this context. His prose style is lucid and sonorous.

On the other hand, Gopalachandra Prajaraj's (1864-1946) prose is scintillating with wit and humour. Though Fakirmohan had started the genre of belles lettres in Oriya, Gopalchandra can be said to have improved it and was more prolific. Bhagavata tungire sandhya (Evening in the bhagavata tungi), Bai Mahanty pani (Chronicles of Bai Mahanty) are impressive. In the process he created characters like Mastaram (one who is mad in ecstasy) whose acid comments on the fads, foibles and manners of his contemporaries, as also the empty rituals and superstitions prevailing in the society are as witty as thought-provoking. Bai Mahanty is also another cynical character suspicious of modern values and also sceptical of the old-world values. In these writings Gopalachandra could be said to have set the genre of satire on firm footings. He has earned undying fame as the compiler of the quadrilingual Oriya encyclopaedia, Bhashakosha, in seven volumes containing about a hundred thousand entries.

Sashibhusan Rai (1876-1953), son of poet Radhanath Rai, also wrote belles lettres but in a style totally different from that of Gopalachandra. His prose has a poetic quality. In fact, some of his pieces which describe nature in its various moods can be read as poems in prose.

The period immediately following that of Fakirmohan and Radhanath was dominated by the Satyavadi group of poets and prosateurs. Satyavadi group derives its name from the Satyavadi School, an educational institution founded by Pandit Gopabandhu Das (1877-1928) with a nationalist orientation. The school which Gopabandhu had founded in a grove in idyllic surroundings had for its principal aim the creation of a generation of youths dedicated to social service and to the cause of the nation. A monthly journal, Satyabadi, was founded and edited by Gopabandhu himself in 1915 A.D. The Satyabadi group of writers made their debut in its columns and carved for themselves permanent niches in the history of Oriya literature. Pandit Nilakantha Das (1884-1967) and Pandit Godavarish Misra (1886-1956) were two notable poets of the Satyavadi Group. Pandit Kripasindhu Mishra was a noted prosateur of the group. His prose writings were mostly historical among which Konarka and Barabati (The last bastion of the Utkal empire) deserve special mention. Orissan renaissance was the basic theme of these writers inspired by Madhusudan Das (1845-1934) who though wrote only seven poems came to be hailed as the Father of the Renaissance Movement in Orissa.

Pandit Gopabandhu's poems are marked by a spontaneity of emotions and feelings and a lack of artistry. Bandira atamakatha (Soliloquies of a prisoner) and Dharmapada, written during his incarceration in the Hazaribag jail during the non-cooperation movement, took Orissa by storm. These two works have reached every home in Orissa and are as popular as folk-poetry. Pandit Gopabandhu gave a new orientation to the Oriya prose style in the columns of the weekly Samaja which he had founded and continued to edit till his death. Gopabandhu's prose was almost biblical in its simplicity and profundity.

Though Pandit Nilakantha wrote a few kavyas, Konarka (At Konarak) was his best work. The poet's musings over the lost glory of Orissa are as touching as elevating. But Pandit Nilakantha's chief contribution was to the evolution of modern Oriya prose. His prose-style was robust. Pandit Nilakantha was a versatile writer. His works ranged from a scholarly philosophical introduction to the Bhagavat gita, to a critical survey of Oriya literature and culture in Oriya sahityar krama parinama (The evolution of Oriya literature) in which he delved deep into every aspect of Oriya literature and culture.

Among the Satyavadi group of writers Pandit Godavarish Misra was the most versatile. He wrote short stories, novels, dramas and poems. But his ballads contained in Alekhika are superb in colour and melody and assure him immortality as a poet.

Towards the close of the Satyavadi Period with writers whose dominating passions were the Orissan renaissance and patriotism, the Subuja group (The Greens) made its appearance. Historically this period can be placed between 1921 and 1935 when the two of its leading poets, Kalindicharan Panigrahi (1901) and Baikunthanath Patnaik (1904-1978), joined the progressive school of writers led by Bhagavaticharan Panigrahi. This school formed the Navajuga Sahitya Sansad. Annadashankar Ray, a leading poet of this group shifted to Bengal where he attained celebrity both as a Bengali poet and novelist. However, his Oriya poem, Kamala bilasira bidaya (Farewell of the lotus-eater) leaves behind his fond memories in Oriya literature which in a way also symbolised his exit from Oriya literature.

Since 1913 Rabindranath Tagore cast a magic spell on Oriya literature. The Sabuja poets of Orissa both consciously and unconsciously came under his influence. Romantic yearnings, mysticism, aestheticism and sweet nostalgia were the chief characteristics of these poets. Though Baikunthanath's poems at times were terse it did not lack warmth, fluidity of expression and sincerity of feelings. Towards the end of his career he became a mystic; but before that his poems had been marked by his strident protest against the Establishment and the exploitative order of the society. Mruttika darshan (The philosophy of the dust), a collection of poems, is regarded as his masterpiece.

Kalindicharan was more prolific and versatile. He wrote short stories, novels, essays, poems and poetic dramas. His novel Matira manisa (The man of the soil) is hailed as a classic next only to Fakirmohan's Chaman athaguntha.

So long Oriya poetry followed a tradition that had evolved through the ages; but the Sabuja poetry was distinctly a departure from all that had been produced so far. Nonetheless, the Sabuja poets cannot claim to be the sole representatives of the period under discussion. There were other notable poets also who had made significant contribution to the growth of modern Oriya poetry. Kuntala Kumari Savat (1903-1938), Mayadhar Mansingh (1905-1973), Radhamohan Garnaik (b. 1911), Lokaratna Kunja Bihari Dash (b. 1914), Kunja Bihari Tripathy (b. 1911) and Nityananda Mohapatra are some of these poets who deserve mention. Though they were not associated with any school, romanticism had cast its spell on their writings also. Mansingh, of course, was fired with Oriya patriotism though at one time his love lyrics in Dhupa and Hema sasya had earned for him unstinted adoration from the youth. Radhamohan Garnaik is one of the foremost ballad writers. He turned out many memorable ballads out of the forgotten episodes of the history of Orissa. As a metrist he has earned wide readership among the Oriyas.

Luxmikanta Mohapatra (1818-1953) and Godavarish Mohapatra (1898-1965) were two other notable poets who struck a different note in the contemporary Oriya poetry. Luxmikanta's poems have a musicality and sincerity which have kept them still alive. Luxmikanta was equally versatile in prose. His incomplete novel, Kanamamu (The blind uncle), is a masterpiece. Had the novel been completed it would perhaps have lost its abiding charm.

Godavarish Mohapatra was the last echo of the Satyavadi School. He inherited the literary traditions of the Satyavadi group of writers. Though his satirical poems published in the pages of the journal, Niakhunta, which he founded in 1938, were highly popular, he will be best remembered for his other poems and short stories. He wrote about half a dozen novels some of which dealt with historical themes.

Birakishore Das (1898-1973) and Banchanidhi Mohanty (1897-1938) were two other poets of the pre-Independence period whose poetry was solely motivated by the aspirations and urges of the nationalist movement.

Since the death of Fakirmohan in 1918 very few novelists produced novels of any significance. Two novels, however, achieved some degree of success. They were Manemane (In the mind) by Baishnabcharan Das and Mala jahna (The dying moon) by Upendra Kishore Das. Harekrishna Mahatab (b. 1899) and Ramprasad Singh wrote political novels in a prolific measure. Even in a very advanced age Mahatab wrote a novel, Tritiya parva (The third Act) in 1977 against the socio-political background of the mid-'70s. But these novelists laid greater stress on social reforms and political awakening than on the artistic aspects of the novel. Luxmidhar Nayak (b. 1914) also wrote novels of this kind. But he has written many popular romantic novels also. Ananta Panda (b. 1906) was an indefatigable writer of short stories, novels, poems and dramas. But the shadow of Fakirmohan loomed large over the novels and short stories of this period. Among the other novelists and short-story writers, mention can be made of Kamalakanta Das, Jagatbandhu Mohapatra, Batakrishna Praharaj, Satyananda Behura, Pranakrishna Samal and Chandramoni Das.

Since Ramshankar Rai Oriya drama was making a steady progress. Pandit Godavarish of the Satyavadi group had written two historical dramas, Mukunda Deva and Purusottama Deva. Balakrishna Kar, Ramchandra Mohapatra and Ashwinikumar Ghosh (1892-1962) were the later playwrights of whom Ashwinikumar was more prolific and successful on the stage. Balakrishna and Ramachandra were the more literary. Ramaranjan Mohanty's Gouda bijeta dealing with historical theme attained a good deal of celebrity. But the dramas written during this period were mostly dictated by the requirements of the stage. They catered to the popular taste but they lacked depth and real literary value.

Kavichandra Kalicharan Patnaik (1898-1978) made a happy combination of literature with entertainment. Though he wrote in the traditional style, his plays are refreshingly modern. Kalicharan was a lyricist of distinction. He was an excellent producer and directed his own plays in the Orissa Theatre which he had founded in 1939. His famous play Bhata (Rice), written against the background of the man-made famine of 1942-43, was a sensational hit which ran consecutively for 108 nights.

Since 1947 political independence ushered in imperceptibly a new milieu. Since the early forties the 'progressives' had given a new orientation to Oriya poetry so long bogged down in romanticism. Anantacharan Patnaik, Manmohan Misra, Raghunath Das and Satchidananda Rautrai were some of the leading lights of this period. But the publication of Pandulipi by Satchidananda Rautrai, Agamikali by a group of poets including Kalindicharan Panigrahi, Satchidananda Rautrai and Manmohan Misra and Panchajanya by Nityananda Mohapatra immediately after independence marked the beginning of a new age in Oriya poetry. Satchidananda claims to be an innovator both in technique and content. The poems of Pandulipi were written in verse libre of which Satchidananda was the earliest exponent though he has to share the distinction with Binodechandra Naik. Though an Imagist who influenced the younger generation of poets profoundly, towards the sixties Satchidananda's style turned towards the neo-classical. The archetypes he employed in his later poems are noted for their traditional motifs drawn from familiar sources.

The post-Independence period serves as a convenient watershed and marks the beginning of new sensibilities, new techniques and new poetic idioms. Not unlike T.S. Eliot who had redeemed English poetry from the insulation of England and had linked it with European values, symbols and traditions, the Oriya writers of the post-Independence period linked Oriya poetry with the English poetic traditions. An important difference that set the post-Independence poets apart from the older generation of poets was their wider inheritance of the European culture. The major thematic pre-occupations of the post-Independence poetry—social concern, lack of faith in religion and traditional virtues—had not not been so marked in the pre-Independence poetry.

Guruprasad Mohanty (b. 1924) was another notable poet who had already distinguished himself before 1947. Few poets have made for themselves a great reputation with such a small quantity of published poetry and with such an economy of themes, moods and images as Guruprasad. Samundra snana (Sea bath), a slim volume published in 1970 is the only work to his credit though his influence on the younger generation of poets has endured. Though a romantic, he was influenced by T.S. Eliot in no small measure.

The poets of the fifties were expressionists and were more concerned with the hard outline of the matter-of-fact experience than the vague elusive aura surrounding it. The sixties were vibrant with the strident voice of a multitude of young accomplished poets who vied with each other for attention. Each of these new poets strove in his or her own way to forge out a new poetic technique. The poetry of the sixties was clearly distinct from the poetry of the fifties in the following aspects: (a) a break with the poetic traditions, (b) metaphysical colloquialism of style and rhythms, complex and often dissonant expression of tension and conflict, (c) retirement to private symbols and experience, (d) abandonment of logical structure of ideas and the building up of poems with images, (e) the resultant obscurity which was more a fashion than arising out of genuine experience, (f) morbid obsession with sex, (g) undue emphasis on experimentation in form rather than on content and (h) indolent melancholy in the absence of a heroic outlook.

Ramakanta Ratha (b. 1934), in spite of his deliberate and cultivated obscurity, distinguished himself earlier by a finished polish. But whenever he employed homelier imagery and subtler symbol, his poetry became highly evocative. The poems of Aneka kothari are an example.

Sitakanta Mohapatra (b. 1936), however, is less obscure and he uses archetypes drawn from indigenous sources. His poetic idioms are colloquial and his poems are formed around familiar images and symbols.

Jagannatha Prasad Das, Soubhagya Kumar Misra and Harihar Misra were three other noted poets who distinguished themselves in the sixties. These poets were not experimentalists though the sense of alienation, the search for identity, cultivated frustration and existentialist despair are not indiscernible in their poems. Though in the beginning Soubhagya Kumar Misra and Harihar Misra employed strikingly fresh images drawn from familiar milieu, they soon turned to surrealism. Rabi Singh (b. 1932) was another poet of the sixties, whose poetry had a keenly felt outburst of anger and protest against the Establishment. Among the rest mention may be made of Dipak Misra, Benudhar Raut, Braja Nath Ratha, Chintamani Behera, Gopal Chandra Misra, Rajendra Kishore Panda, Nrisingha Misra, Brahmotri Mohanty, Pratibha Satpathy, Prafulla Tripathy, Saurindra Barik, Jayakrushna Barik, Phani Mohanty, Bibhudatta Misra, Haraprasad Das, Bibekananda Jena and Prasanna Patasani. Most of these poets were preoccupied with symbolism, surrealism and imagism. Poets like Rajendra Panda deliberately aimed at isolating themselves within the solitary confines of the inner self.

The sixties witnessed the proliferation of a number of literary groups or 'gosthis' which came into being not impelled by any literary creed or sociopolitical ideology but inspired by a nebulous concept of progress and a nihilistic revolt with an exaggerated emphasis on innovation and experimentation. At poem reading sessions which have since become a regular feature of the cultural milieu, their poems sound quite impressive though only time will prove how much of it will perish as mere exercises in technical novelty or empty verbiage. Most of the poets of the sixties were surrealists beneath a thin veneer of nihilistic neo-romanticism.

Seventies was a continuation of the trends which had been manifest in the sixties. Major poets of the earlier decades are eschewing deliberate obscurity and are trying to bring poetry nearer to the reading public. At least an awareness has grown that obscurity is counter-productive and that the poet only begins a poem to be completed in the appreciative understanding of the readers.

In the post-Independence period novels and short stories registered a phenomenal growth. Kanhucharan Mohanty (b. 1906) rose to a new prominence with a number of new novels, all with well-knit plots. The rural domestic themes of his novels made him popular among the masses. But his characters were flat and lacked emotional strains and tensions. Gopinath Mohanty (b. 1914) laid greater stress on story and characters and his works show a departure from the beaten track. Hitherto, since Fakirmohan, the language of the novel was aliterary and approximated to the speech of the rural folks; Gopinath invested this colloquialism with a poetic suggestiveness and gave it a new subtlety.

Among the other novelists were Rajakishore Patnaik (b. 1916) Nityananda Mohapatra (b. 1912), Gyanendra Verma, and Basanta Kumari Patnaik. Basanta Kumari is a major woman novelist after Kuntala Kumari whose novel Amadabata, depicting the life and feelings of an adolescent girl, received wide approval. Nityananda Mohapatra's social concern and sympathy for the exploited and the under-privileged distinguished his novels, Bhangahada (Broken bones) and Hidamati (The ridged land). Bibhutibhusan Patnaik (b. 1939), though more prolific than Kanhucharan, wrote mostly on romantic and sentimental themes. Santanu Kumar Acharya (b. 1934) wrote his novel Nara-Kinnara in the surrealist mode. His preoccupation is mostly with the subconscious. Satakadi Hota, Krishnaprasad Misra and Mohapatra Nilamoni Sahu are three other novelists who have contributed to the growth of Oriya novels on familiar lines. In the sixties Chandrasekhara Ratha emerged as a major novelist with his novels like Yantrarudha (Borne on the machine) and Asurya upanivesa (The sunless colony). Chandrasekhara is also an accomplished writer of belles lettres. Govinda Das is another novelist whose Amabasyar chandra (The moon of the new moon night) received wide appreciation for the novelty of his theme, plot and treatment. Gokulananda Mohapatra (b. 1923) wrote a number of science-fictions which none else had yet attempted in Oriya. Surendra Mohanty (b. 1922) had attained celebrity as the trend-setter for modern short stories in the fifties. He emerged as a major novelist in the sixties. His novel Andha-diganta (The dark horizon), depicting the sufferings and struggle of an old Gandhian worker and his frustration and disillusionments in the post-Independence period caught the reading public of Orissa by storm. He introduced the new genre of biographical novel with his Satabdir surya (The sun of the century) and Kulabridha (The grand old man). Since after Lachama of Fakirmohan Senapati the historical novel as a genre had been almost lost. Surendra in his Nila saila (The blue hills) and Niladri bijay centering around the cult and history of Jagannatha during the Moghul period resurrected the historical novel and carried it to new heights.

Though Oriya literature claims the distinction of having produced the earliest short story in Indian literature, the short story as a literary genre came to its own in the early decades of the present century with Fakirmohan. In the post-Fakirmohan period, development of Oriya short story was rather halting and restrained due to the lack of sufficient number of literary magazines which alone could nurture it. Though this period saw a galaxy of short story writers like Chintamani Mohanty, Dayanidhi Misra, Bankanidhi Patnaik, Luxmikanta Mohapatra, Godavarish Mishra, Anantaprasad Panda, Godavarish Mohapatra and others, the development of Oriya short stories continued to stagnate under the ubiquitous influence of Fakirmohan. Towards the thirties the works of Kalindicharan Panigrahi, Harish Badal, Kalia Panigrahi, Nityananda Mohapatra and Rajkishore Patnaik had given a new turn to Oriya short story. Bhagavati Panigrahi wrote and published some of his masterpieces in the pages of Adhunik and with them came the robust, socialistic realism. Gopinath Mohanty further broadened its scope. Bibhutibhusan Tripathy and Pranabandhu Kar introduced Freudian psychoanalysis in Oriya short stories. In the late forties Rajakishore Rai was the guiding light but modern short story with its subtle nuances, moods, styles, themes and characters, was born in the beginning of the fifties with the prolific writings of Surendra Mohanty. Brahmananda Panda was another distinguished short story writer. His abrupt silence was a distinct loss to the modern Oriya short story.

Of the next generation of short story writers, Bamacharan Mitra, Kishoricharan Das, Manoj Das, Akhilmohan Patnaik and Jagannath Das deserve special mention. Bamacharan was more an original thinker than a conscious artist. Kishoricharan's stories are analytical and the denouement in his stories are often vertical than horizontal. The stories of Manoj Das have a distinct flavour and style of their own. The illusion he creates in his stories keeps his readers spell-bound. Akhilmohan is preoccupied with frustration, inner alienation, emotional tension and an all-pervasive emptiness. Some of his short stories are remarkable for the element of surprise. Basantakumar Satpathy wrote quite late in his career but he distinguished himself as a short story writer of repute. Most of his short stories are marked by a mixture satire, cynicism and humour. Of those who wrote still later the names of Santanukumar Acharya, Mohapatra Nilamoni Sahu, Chandrasekhar Ratha, Krishnaprasad Misra, Rabi Patnaik, Prafulla Tripathy, Jagadish Mohanty, Ramachandra Behera, Binapani Mohanty, Jyotsna Rautrai and others deserve special mention. Short story is ever attracting many new talents.

Kalicharan Patnaik was the first important figure in modern Oriya drama. The succeeding playwrights like Gopal Chotrai (b. 1918), Ramchandra Misra (b. 1921) Bhanjakishore Patnaik (b. 1922) wrote dramas in his tradition. These dramatists expanded the scope of Oriya drama by introducing new variations in the story, characterisation and stagecraft. They took up bold social and political themes and did not hesitate to attack the corrupt politicians, the expropriating landlords and the bloodsucking profiteers. The characters of these plays were, however, stock and type characters and the denouement of their plots proceeded almost on familiar lines only with minor variations. But what thwarted the development of Oriya drama on modern lines was its dependence on the commercial stage with their eye inevitably on the box-office.

Pranabandhu Kar and Majoranjan Das (b. 1923) started with plays in the tradition of Kalicharan. But Pranabandhu was acquainted with Western drama. He introduced new themes and subject matters in his plays and there was more psychoanalysis and probing of the inner depths than well-made plots.

"Agami" (The future) of Manoranjan staged in 1950 symbolised the emergence of a new trend in dramas popularly known as the Nabanatya Movement. The sixties saw the gradual decadence of the professional stage, the net result of which was the disappearance of the commercial, well-made plays for the delectation of an audience out for entertainment. The amateur stages needed new plays with no concern for the box-office. It was in the disappearance of the commercial stage that the new theatre movement was born. Manoranjan was quick to notice the change and diversified his productions on experimental lines.

Towards the close of the sixties a group of young talented playwrights, among them Biswajit Das, Harihar Misra (b. 1940), Bijay Misra (b. 1945), Ratnakara Chaini, Kartik Chanda Ratha (b. 1949) and Ramesh Panigrahi (b. 1943) came up with new plays. These, however, were at best psychological and symbolical.

In the pre-Independence period, literary criticism was almost unknown and what passed off as literary criticism was at best pedantic appreciations. Pandit Gopinath Nanda, Jalandhar Dev, Mruturyoy Rath and Ataballabha Mohanty were some of the distinguished critics. Pandit Gopinath Nanda's Bharat darpana published in 1928 is a monumental work of erudition and analysis. In this book Pandit Nanda made a critical study of the famous Sarala Mahabharat. Ataballabha Mohanty edited about forty medieval kavyas and the Panchasakha literature with learned introductions. But these works were more in the nature of literary appreciation than critical study. Surendra Mohanty's Fakirmohan (1950) and Fakirmohan Samikhya (1952) could be said to have introduced the genre of creative literary criticism in the post-Independence period.

Natabar Samantaroy (b. 1918), Janakiballabh Mohanty Bharadwaj (b. 1920), Chintamani Behera Gangadhar Bal (b. 1927), Pathani Pattanaik (b. 1928), Gopal Chandra Misra, Narendranath Misra, Khageswar Mohapatra (b. 1933) Krishnachandra Behera, Kshetrabasi Nayak, Baishnab Charan Samal and Nityananda Satpathy are some of the leading critics who have dwelt upon different aspect of Oriya literature.

Among the other prosateurs and essayists, Chittaranjan Das, Bamacharan Mitra, Dasarathi Das, Kanhu Charan Misra, Krishna Chandra Panigrahi and Benimadhab Padhi have made significant contributions to the development of modern Oriya prose. Sarat Kumar Mohanty has also written extensively beginning from Greek Philosophy to Existentialism.

Kunja Bihari Das with his Europaru america (From Europe to America), Sriramachandra Das with his Euro-pere mora anubhuti (My experiences in Europe), Sriharsa Misra with his Paschim diganta (The Western horizon), Govinda Das with his Deshe deshe (In different lands) and Surendra Mohanty with his Peking Diary enriched the genre of travelogue.

During the period under review poets like Satchidananda Rautrai, Sitakanta Mohapatra and Ramakanta Ratha made significant contributions to the modern Oriya poetics. Jatindra Mohan Mohanty in the now defunct literary quarterly, Pragyan, brought Western poetics and literary values nearer to the Oriya readers. Saurindra Barik is also a perceptive critic whose appreciations are based on welldefined critical criteria.

Among the historians of Oriya literature Binayak Misra, Pandit Surya Narayan Das, Mayadhar Mansingh, Banshidhar Mohanty and Surendra Mohanty deserve mention.

LITERATURE-PALI

LITERATURE (PALI). The word 'Pali' primarily signifies 'Text' or 'sacred texts' or 'the text of the Buddhist canon' as opposed to the commentaries, but gradually it became the name of the language in which the canon (Tripitika) of the Theravada Buddhism and the ancillary texts were written. The Theravada tradition, however, mentions the language as Magadhi and claims that it was the actual speech of the Buddha. The major part of the literature written in Pali is religious and philosophical, the most important of which is Tipitika (Tepitika, Skt. Tripitika) of the Theravada Buddhism. The Tipitika contains the teachings of the Buddha (Buddhavachana) though the tradition of Sri Lanka and Burma insists that Pali Tipitika is the original Buddhavachana. There are reasons to believe that different rescensions of the Tripitika, belonging to other schools and written in mixed Sanskrit or different forms of Prakrit co-existed with the Pali Tipitika.

The history of the development of the Pali canon is yet to be thoroughly investigated. It is supported by all Buddhist traditions that the Tipitika was compiled in different Councils. The Theravada canon was finally settled and written down in a Council convened by King Vattagamani Abhaya (1st cent. B.C.). This Council is known as the Fourth Council. Till this time the Pali Tipitika was handed down in oral tradition. The First Council was held immediately after the death (mahaparinirvana) of the Buddha, in the Saptaparni cave near Rajgriha under the chairmanship of Mahakassapathera. Five hundred direct disciples including Upali and Ananda participated in that Council and they recited the teachings of the Buddha as they remembered them. It is believed that 'Dhamma' (i.e., 'sutta', discourses) and Vinaya (i.e., monastic rules) were codified through this recitation. This compilation may be called the beginning of the Tipitika not only of the Theravada school but of all other schools, since schism in the Buddhist church is a much later phenomenon. The tradition also narrates that one hundred years (or one hundred and ten years according to Hiuen Tsang) after the death of the Buddha another Council (the second) was convened at Valukarama in Vaishali, where seven hundred learned Bhikshus participated. Most probably this Convention was necessitated for reconciling certain minor differences in the interpretation of the monastic rules. This Council also made no endeavour to write down the teachings. During the time of Emperor Ashoka (3rd cent. B.C.), the Buddhist church witnessed severe schism and it was divided into several sects. The emperor, an ardent leader of the Theravada school, convened another Council (the third) to finally settle the Tipitika according to the school he himself adhered to. When his son, Mahindathera, and daughter, Sanghamitta, led a mission to Sri Lanka, they carried with them the oral Tipitika to that country. It is now impossible to ascertain what exactly the language of that oral tradition was. It must have been some form of Prakrit spoken in the central and eastern India or an amalgam of various dialects. It is, however, certain that the Pali Tipitika grew out of this oral tradition to be modified during the next two centuries in which form it was finally written down in the literary Pali language in the Fourth Council.

The work Tipitaka means 'a threefold basket' consisting of the Vinayapitaka, the Suttapitaka and the Abhidhammapitaka. They contain Buddhavachana or the teachings of the Buddha.

Pali literature falls into two main divisions, namely the canonical literature consisting of the three pitakas as mentioned above and the non-canonical or extra-canonical texts consisting mainly of the commentaries, sub-commentaries and chronicles besides some classical works including the Milinda-panha.

Pali canonical literature has nine angas or 'limbs' viz., 1) Sutta (the teachings of the Buddha mostly compiled in prose); 2) Geyya (sermons in mixed prose and metrical forms); 3) Veyyakarana (expositions); 4) Gatha (stanzas); 5) Udana (ecstatic utterances); 6) Itivuttaka (brief sayings); 7) Jatakas (stories of the former births of the Buddha); 8) Abbhuta dhamma (description of supernatural power) and 9) Vedalla (solution of problems in questions and answers).

The pitakas are described briefly below

Vinayapitaka: The Vinayapitaka can be described as an account of the Buddhist church. Vinaya literally means guidance and contains the rules of monastic discipline, the rules for admission to the Sangha, the periodical confession of sins as well as those pertaining to housing and use of medicines. These rules are supposed to have been laid down by the Buddha himself as occasions necessitated their promulgation.

There are five books of the Vinayapitaka which are arranged into three parts according to subject-matter. They are: (1) Sutta-vibhanga subdivided into Parajika and Pachittiya; 2) Khandhaka-mahavagga and Chulavagga, and 3) Parivara.

The Vibhanga contains an elaborate explanation of all the rules laid down by the Buddha for the monks and nuns. These rules are included in the code book called Patimokkha, which is a nucleus of the Vinayapitaka. The Patimokkha is divided into eight sections, viz., Parajika, Sanghadises, Aniyata, Nissaggiya, Pachittiya, Patidesaniya, Sekhia and Adhikarana dhamma. These rules provide remedies in the event of any transgression by the monks and nuns. The Patimokkha is recited twice a month on full and new moon days known as the uposatha days. Before the recitation, the monks make confession of their guilts.

The second part of the Vinayapitaka is Khandhakas or treatises, consisting of two books, Mahavagga and Cullavagga. They (i.e., the khandhakas) deal with all matters relating to the order or Sangha.

Mahavagga consists of the first ten khandakas and gives a splendid account of how the Buddha attained supreme Enlightenment and preached his doctrines for the welfare and happiness of the people.

Further, it contains special precepts for admission of the monks and nuns into the order as well as for the uposatha celebration and life during the rainy season, and food, clothing, seats, conveyances, dress and certain medicines (for certain specified diseases) to be used by the monks. Finally, it mentions the legal procedure to be adopted by the order especially in case of schisms.

Chullavagga, which is a continuation of Mahavagga deals with the disciplinary code and conduct with regard to minor matters. It consists of twelve khandhas. The first nine chapters deal with disciplinary proceedings and settlement of disputes among the fraternity and other things such as the daily life of the monks, their residence, furniture and the duties towards one another. Chapter X describes the duties of the nuns, while the chapters XI and XII are a kind of appendix to the Chullavagga furnishing an account of Rajagaha and the Councils.

The khandhaka also contains some very important texts called Kammavacha in the form of 'official acts', relating to admission into the order, suspension from and rehabilitation into the order, religious jurisprudence, Sangha properties, etc.

The third part of the Vinaya is the Parivara which seems to be of a later origin. It originated probably in Ceylon. It is a manual of instructions compiled in the form of questions and answers. The Parivara is called the key since it makes Vinaya explicit.

Suttapitaka: Suttapitaka consists of the original discourses of the Buddha, and is the most authentic source of our knowledge of dhamma. It falls into five divisions called Nikayas (and sometimes also agamas) grouped according to the size, style and particular arrangement of the suttas. They are Digha Nikaya, Majjhima Nikaya, Samyutta Nikaya, Anguttara Nikaya and Khuddaka Nikaya.

Digha Nikaya, the first book of the Suttapitaka, is a collection of long discourses. It is divided into three parts called Sila Khanda, Mahavagga and Pathya or Patikavagga. This work consists of 34 very lengthy suttas, with the Barahmajala-sutta translated as the excellent net' or perfect net' as the first one. It is a very important sutta, explaining moral precepts and various philosophical views. Another very important sutta of this collection is the Mahaparinibana-sutta which furnishes a historical account of the Master's last days.

Majjhima Nikaya which is the second book of the Suttapitaka, is known as the 'Middle Collection' or the collection of discourses of medium length. It contains about 150 suttas (pannasa): divided into three groups 1. Mulapannasa (1-50); 2. Majjhimapannasa (51-100) and 3. Uppipannasa (101-152).

All the fundamental doctrines such as the law of kamma and rebirth, the four noble truths, the eightfold path and various kinds of meditation are expounded in this work.

Samyutta Nikaya is the third Nikaya of the Suttapitaka. Rhys Davids translates it as the 'grouped sutta' or 'the book of the kindred sayings'. Samyutta Nikaya consists of fifty-six groups or samyuttas or suttas.

Anguttara Nikaya is the fourth book of the Suttapitaka. It is a collection characterised by numerical groupings. It contains 2308 suttas arranged in eleven sections called Nipatas.

In the whole of Suttapitaka, Anguttara Nikaya constitutes the most important source book of Buddhist psychology and ethics. The Anguttara contains a unique chapter entitled 'Etadaggavagga' wherein the Buddha enumerates the names of those disciples who had achieved prominence in certain fields of spiritual attainment.

Khuddaka Nikaya (the collection of the smaller pieces) is the fifth Nikaya of the Suttapitaka. It is sometimes classed with the Abhidhammapitaka. It contains the most important works of Buddhist poetry. The sixteen books constituting the Khuddaka Nikaya are as follows:

1. Khuddakapatha; 2. Dhammapada (containing the sublime teachings of the Buddha); 3. Udana; 4. Itivuttaka; 5. Sutta Nipata; 6. Vimanavatthu; 7. Petavatthu; 8. Theragatha; 9. Therigatha; 10. Jatakas; 11. Mahaniddesa; 12. Chullaniddesa; 13. Patisambhidamagga; 14. Apadana; 15. Buddhavamsa; 16. Chariya-pitaka

Abhidhamma pitaka is the collection of the philosophical teachings of the Buddha, the teachings which are profound, deep and subtle in nature. It is called a basket of higher expositions or 'a basket of transcendental doctrine'.

The language of the Abhidhamma is purely scientific, i.e., objective and impersonal, and contains no such words as 'I', 'We', 'He', 'She', etc. Here everything is expressed in terms of 'Khandha'.

To Rhys Davids Abhidhamma is not a systematic philosophy, but merely a supplement to the dhamma. The works contained in this pitaka discuss ethics, psychology or theory of knowledge. Abhidhamma pitaka is comprised of seven texts as follows: Dhammasangani, Vibanga, Dhatukakha, Puggalapannatti, Kathavatthu, Yamaka and Patthana.

Dhammasangani, a psychological work, contains a detailed 'enumeration of psychical phenomena'. It falls into three divisions: (1) An analysis of consciousness (citta) and its concomitant mental factors (chetasika); (2) An analysis of corporeality (rupa), (3) A summary in which all phenomena of existence are brought under 122 categories (matika) in groups of three.

Vibhanga means 'differentiation'. It is divided into three parts: Sutta explanation, Abhidhamma explanation and Summary in question and answer form.

LITERATURE-PALI

Dhatukatha is the third book of the Abhidhammapi-taka, 'discourse on the elements'. It is a short book of 14 chapters and deals with various psychic phenomena and their mutual relations in questions and answers.

Puggalappannatti is the fourth book of the Abhidhamma Pitaka, which means "description of human individuals"; it resembles Anguttara Nikaya in style and consists of ten chapters in which various types of individuals (puggala) are discussed with similes and comparisons.

Kathavatthu is the most important book in the Abhidhamma. This work was compiled by the venerable Moggaliputta Tissa, who presided over the Third Council, in order to uproot all points of controversy regarding Buddhaddhamma. There are 23 chapters dealing with some 216 controversies in the form of dialogues in a logical method. Each chapter contains eight to twelve questions and answers by means of which the most diverse false views are presented, refuted and rejected.

Yamaka (the book of double questions) clears up all ambiguities and distortions which may creep into the doctrines of Abhidhamma. It is rather a work on applied logic.

Patthana is a gigantic work which, together with Dhammasangani, constitutes the quintessence of the Buddhist philosophy. The entire work deals with the investigation of the 24 kinds of relationships.

The non-canonical or extra-canonical Pali literature falls into three historical periods. The first period extends from about the beginning of the Christian era to the 4th and 5th centuries A.D. The second period extends from the 5th century to 11th century, and the third begins with the 12th century. The literature of the first period consists of some classical works of which only a few now survive. To this period belong Nettipakarana, Petakopadesa and Milinda Panha. Nettipakarana is 'the book of guidance'. Petakopadesa is the 'Instructions on the Tipitakas'. According to tradition they were composed by Maha Kaccayana, a prominent disciple of the Buddha.

Milinda Panha or 'the questions of Milinda' written in the style of suttas, contains a dialogue between the Indo-Greek king Menander (in Pali, Milinda) and the Thera Nagasena which throw a flood of light on certain important points of Buddhism. It was composed probably during the 1st century A.D.

Two notable Pali chronicles composed in Lanka during the period are Dipavamsa and Mahavamsa. Dipavamsa gives an account of the Buddha's visit to Lanka. It describes also several other interesting topics, such as the first two Buddhist Councils, the rise of various Buddhist sects, the reign of Asoka, Mahinda's visit to Ceylon, colonisation of Lanka by Vijaya, etc. Mahavamsa is an ornate kavya and has many topics in common with Dipavamsa.

The second remarkable period of non-canonical Pali literature is characterised by commentaries which were composed on the Tipitaka and which were based on the Ceylonese Atthakatha. Buddhaghosa is the greatest figure in commentary literature. He wrote extensive commentaries on almost all the books of the Tipitaka except a few books of the Khuddaka Nikaya.

The chief contribution of the Acharya, however, was his monumental work, Visuddhimmagga, the path of purification, which serves as an encyclopaedia, of the entire Buddhavachana, very lucidly written in the style of Abhidhamma.

Along with this class of literature is to be considered Acharya Buddhaddatta's commentaries on Madhurattapakasini Vinaya-vinaya Vinicchaya, a compendium of the Vinaya in Pali verse and several other works of merit.

Another prolific commentator was Dhammapala who wrote a commentary called Paramatthadipani on these parts of the Khuddaka Nikaya not commented on by Buddhaghatha i.e., the Udana, Itivuttaka, Vimana and also sub-commentaries on Nettipakarana and several other works.

At the time of King Parakkamabahu I (1153-1186) there was a great literary activity in Ceylon. During his rule Thera Mahakassapa is said to have held a Council with the purpose of providing tikas in the Magadha language to the Atthakathas particularly of Buddhaghosa. The following is the list of the tikas constituting the important Pali works of the third period.

Saratthadipani on the Samantapasadika, Pathama-Saratthamanjusa on the Sumangalavilasini, Dutiya-Saratthamanjusa on the Papanchasudani, Tatiya-Saratthamanjusa on the Saratthappakasini, Chatuttha-Saratthamanjusa on the Manorathapurani, Pathama-Pavamattappakasini on the Atthasilini, Dutiya-Paramatthappakasini on the Sammohavinodini and Tatiya-Paramatthappakasini on the Panchappakavanatthakatha.

In this period several other works were also written by different authors on similar subjects. All these works exercised considerable influence on the literature of the period and the Jataka literature would not have been what it is without these texts.

As stated above, the Pali literature is predominantly religious and philosophical and comprises the canon, the commentaries, the digests of Buddhist philosophy and the like. The first deviation is the chronicle literature (vansa). There had been at a later period, an effort to produce some creative literature in Pali. The result was the composition of some poems—all, of course, with a strong religious preoccupation. In this genre mention may be made of Anagatavansa, Telakatahagatha Jinalankara, Jincharita, Pajjamadhu, Rasvahini, Dathavamsa and Buddhalankara. These works, though written by competent Pali scholars, could not reach the level of the true kavya, due to the fact that these authors were more eager to highlight the character and teachings of the Master than to create real poetry. They did display their ability to handle intricate figures of speech and complicated meters but it all ended in conspicuous imitation of contemporary Sanskrit works. The only branch of literature where Pali authors displayed their originality was grammar, though this branch developed in Pali at a later stage. Till the time of the celebrated commentator, Buddhaghosa, Sanskrit grammars of Panini and of the Katantra school were used for commentarial purposes. The first Pali grammar was written by Kachchayana. The other important schools of Pali grammar are those of Muggalana and Saddaniti. The authors of the first two were the Sri Lankan Buddhist teachers and the third was written by Aggavansa, a Buddhist monk from Burma. Many commentaries and super-commentaries were written on these three grammars. There is only one important work on poetics and rhetoric—Subodhalankara by Sangharakkhita. There is also one work on prosody by the same author. There is also one dictionary (kosha): Abhidhanappadipika of Moggalana. As a matter of fact, it is a thesaurus of synonyms and antonyms.

The literary Pali has never been used for writing inscriptions in the main land of India but there are quite a number of good Pali inscriptions in Sri Lanka, Burma and Thailand.

LITERATURE (Prakrit). The history of Prakrit literature is a long and vast one. It covers a period of two thousand five hundred years. There is a two-fold approach to the study of Prakrit. A modern linguist is interested in the formal study of the language and its internal structure. But a philologist involves himself in the study of the text, wherein are reflected many aspects of culture and civilisation. Actually Prakrit literature is also one of the varied source materials of Indian history. Though it has more or less a religious bias, it certainly provides the most useful material for historical, cultural and archaeological evidences. The most significant aspect of Prakrit sources is that it is connected with almost every phase and part of this vast country. These works are not restricted to one or two subjects or to only religious philosophies, but embrace various branches of literature such as toponymy, logic, politics, grammar, dialectics, astronomy, astrology, medicine, theology, cosmology, metaphysics, epigraphy, temple architecture, lexicography, ontology, sculpture, etc. These sources are highly critical and authentic and contain abundant historical information.

Prakrit literature is mainly divided into two groups,

(i) canonical or 'sutra sahitya' and pro-canonical, and (ii) purana-charita kavyas or poetical works. The canonical literature is also divided into two parts: Anga-pravishita (integral part of the canon) and Angabahya (outer part of the canon). Anga-pravishita is called 'Dvadashange' 'Jinavani' (the words of the Tirthankaras). The survival pieces of sutra or canon are reposed in the form of 'Satkhandagam'. According to the canon, the 'Jiva' is as much a fundamental fact as the Ajiva. Jiva is quite different from body. The knower and the object of knowledge are realistic. In earlier works like the Acharange and others, it is not a mere philosophical speculation, but a way of life characterised by self-restraint that is set forth, and one has to glean the philosophical concepts here and there. In Suyagadama various points of view rather than systems have been examined. In the Pannavane and its parallel texts like the Satkhandagama-sutra, we have an elaborate study of Jiva and Karma. The gross matter in its forms acts and reacts, moves and stops in the space, over all times, passing through changes; but it always maintains its existential character. This process explains change and continuity; combining and reacting of the atoms is a continuous process due to changing and reacting of our emotions. It is a form of matter, called 'Karma', that is there in association with Jiva from beginning-less time and that determines the ability of the soul to know and its degrees of knowledge. The objective of this knower is to get rid of all that hinders his knowing ability, and thus to enable the Jiva to attain perfection in every respect. Jiva passing through rebirths is at par with matter passing through various bodies (paryayas). Therefore, the first preaching of knower is "know thyself", 'Nanam narassa saro', knowledge is the reality of man. We have many phases that have been elaborated in the study of Jiva and Karma. This can be further studied in the Mahabandha and in the later works such as Labdhisara, Kshapanasara and Panchasangraha and so on. It is the correct understanding of the Jivas, their classification and their relative Paryaptis according to 'indriyas', etc. that enables one to practise abstention from harm. This is what is implied by 'Padhanamnanam tao days'. Life is the highest value, and it is the respect for its safety that is to guide us in our ethical values. We get fine reflection on these ideas in texts like Dasaveyaliya, Niyamasara and Mulachara also. The theory of knowledge has a different pattern, and that has been discussed and explained in Pavayansara separately. Nandisutta also gives us a good exposition. The early Jain saints who wrote their philosophical texts have a common tradition of philosophical concepts; but their development has not taken place at one place and along a single path. Eminent authors like Acharya Kundakunda, Vattakera, Swami Kumar, Siddhasena worked in South India; authors like Jinabhadra, Haribhadra and others worked in Western India. The environments, local thought patterns and reactions have given different tones to their thought. In this respect texts like Panchastikaya, Pravachanasara, Sammasuttam and Visheshavasyakabhasya, have special significance. The elaboration on the attainment of liberation has given ethical and ascetical overtones to their philosophy. Still an author like Sidhasena has developed Nayavada and Anekantavada to such heights that we rarely find parallels elsewhere for a tolerant understanding of reality.

We have also the modern subjects like Biology, Zoology, Chemistry, Physics and Psychology in the Jain canonical Prakrit literature. The idea that living systems are not distinguished from non-living ones by some mysterious vital force (pariyapati) has gained acceptance in the Biology of ancient India and in modern Biology, one of the basic tenets of which is that the phenomena of life can be explained in terms of Chemistry and Physics. Biology is the science of living things. 'Pariyapati' appears to be the actual material of all plants and animals. All living substances have to a greater or lesser extent the properties of specific size and shape, metabolism, movement, irritability, growth, reproduction and adaptation. The authors of Prakrit literature have tried to set up systems of classification based on natural relationship, putting into a single group those organisms which are closely related in their evolutionary origin, since many of the structural similarities depend on evolutionary relations. The classifications of organisms is similar in many respects to the principles which are based on 'logical structural similarities, that is to say, species, genus, phyla.

The history of astronomy owes its origin to remote antiquity. There had been a great diversity of systems of units of time, length and arc-division at different times in different parts of ancient India. Trigesimal system (Thirty-fold divisions system) was gradually changed into saxesimal system of time-units. The length of a 'yojana' was standardised and the relation between three different types of yojanas was explicitly mentioned in the Anuyogadvara sutra, i.e. Prakrit canonical work. It is worth noting that they also employed the use of shadow-lengths for the determination of seasons. It was advanced in measuring shadow-lengths to such an extent that summer solstice was determined up to thirty 'muhurtas' of one day. There is no doubt that Jain astronomers had a keen sense of observation. They measured precisely the time as a function of shadow and determined time of the day through shadow-lengths of a groman. It may be mentioned that the use of the infinities of several types or sets, ordinal and cordinal, was common in the Prakrit texts. We have also so many works on the different subjects written in the Prakrit verse. Some of them are:- Atthasttha (Arthashastra) of Khandapana (Economics); Rajaniti of Devidas (Political Science); Angavijja (Astrology); Karalakkhana (Palmistry); Jayaphauda (9th Century); Nimittashastra of Rshiputra; Rittha samuchchaya

(1032 A.D.) of Acharya Durgadeva; Agghakanda of Acharya Durgadeva; Laggasuddhi of Haribhadrasuri; Ganitasara of Thakkura Pheru (Mathematics); Vastusara (1315 A.D.) of Thakkura Pheru (Architecture); Jyotishasara (1315 A.D.) of Thakkura Pheru (Astronomy); Ratnapariksha (1316 A.D.) of Thakkura Pheru (Gem examination); Dravya-Pariksha (1318 A.D.) of Thakkura Pheru (Metals and coins); Dhatutpatti (1318 A.D.) of Thakkura Pheru (Preparation and properties of metals and compounds); Bhgharbha-Prakasha of Takkura Pheru (Geology)

In the poetry forms we have a large number of works. These can be divided into the following eight categories: (i) Epics, (ii) Charitakavyas, (iii) Khanda Kavya, (iv) Champukavyas (Admixture of prose and verse), (v) Mukதாகavyas, (vi) Stuti, (vii) Kathakavyas, and (viii) Sattakas.

There are five epics available in Prakrit such as Setubandha (about 440 A.D.) of Pravarasena II, Gaudavaho (760 A.D.) of Vakpatiraja, Dvyashraya (12th century) of Hemchandrasuri, Sirichindhakavya (13th century) of Shri Krishnalilashuka, and Sauricharita (18th century) of Shrikantha.

We have a long list of Charitakavyas. Some of them are as follows: Paumachariya (4th century) of Vimalasuri, Surashundarichariya (1038 A.D.) of Dhaneshwarasuri, Sirivijay Chandrakevalichariya (1070 A.D.) of Chandraprabha Mahattara, Rayanachudarayachariya (1072 A.D.) of Nemichandra Suri, Pasanahachariya (1111 A.D.) and Mahavirachariya (1082 A.D.) of Gunachandragani, Manoramachariya (1083 A.D.) and Adinahachariya of Var-dhmana Suri, Mahavira-chariya (1034 A.D.) of Nemichandra Suri, Puhavichandrachariya (1104 A.D.) of Shanti Suri, Shantinahachariya (11th century) of Devachandra Suri, Jambuchariya (11th century) of Gunapala Muni, Munisuvvaya-chariya (1135 A.D.) of Shrichandra, Supasanahachariya (1142 A.D.) of Lakshmana Gani, Sanamkumara chariya (1157 A.D.) of Shrichandra Suri, Sudarshanchariya (1213 A.D.) of Devendra Chandra Suri, Chandappaha-chariya, Malinahachariya and Neminaha-chariya (1223 V.S.) of Haribhadra Suri, Sumatinaha chariya of Somaprabha Suri, Paumappahachariya of Devasuri, Chandappaha-chariya of Yashodeva, Anantanaha-chariya of Nemichandra, Shantinaha-chariya (1353 A.D.) of Munibhadra, Kanaha-chariya of Devendra Suri.

Champukavyas are: Kuvalayamala (779 A.D.) of Udyotana Suri, Chauppana Mahapurisha chariya (868 A.D.) of Shilankacharya, Rayanachanderaya-chariya (1072 A.D.) of Nemichandra Suri, Siripasanahachariya (1111 A.D.) and Mahavira-chariya (1082 A.D.) of Gunachandra Gani, Siya-chariya (12th century) of Mahasena.

Among the Khanda-kavyas, the following deserve mention: Aranasoha-katha, Anjanasundri, Antaraya- katha, Anantakirti, Ardrakumara, Jaysundri, Bhavyasundri, Naradeva and Padmashri-katha, Kamsavaho and Ushanirudha (18th century) of Ramanivada, like this Bhringa-Sandesha are the famous Khanda-kavyas.

LITERATURE-PUNJABI

Prakrit literature is quite rich in pure poetry also. Gathasaptashati (first century A.D.) of Hala and Vajjalaggam of Jayaballabha Muni are best poetic creations. Nijatmashatka (6th century) of Yogendradeva is also a very fine composition.

The etymological meaning of 'Sattaka' is dance. It is a kind of 'Natika' that is totally based on dance. Actually-Sattakas have been written only in Prakrit language. Rajashekhara says that this is a Prakrit composition (Prakrit Bandha). It is displayed by dance. The famous Sattaka of Rajashekhara is Karpuramanjari and other well-known Sattakas are Chandaleha of Rudradasa, Ananda-Sundri of Ghanshyama, Rambhamanjari of Nayachanda, Shrangara-manjari of Vishveshvara and Vilasvati of Markandeya.

Prakrit narrative literature has elements of folklore. The beginning of fictional ideas are not revealed by existing literature, but they were certainly there. For stories and tales have been in existence long before they found their entry into literature, and these tales first of all found their place in Prakrit literature. These folk-tales are simple narratives endowed with secular elements, and therefore were devoid of any moral or teaching. Stories were divided into various categories and Jain authors got an opportunity to embellish their teachings with narratives related to love, acquiring of wealth, wit, humour, wise people, simple food, rogues, scoundrels, prostitutes, bards, and so on. It is stated that the stories related to love were not without purpose as they were conducive to virtuous life. So many symbols are used in these stories, and in the end classical explanations are given properly. The enormous variety and richness of motifs in this literature reflects the state of culture through which it has passed. The motifs are mainly based on popular folk-tales and the variety of them noticed in Prakrit tales establish their relationship with literature. In the field of narrative literature Padaliptasuri was the first well-known author who composed the famous tale, Tarangavati, in the first century B.C. Other famous kathakavyas are Vasudeva-hindi (about 5th century) of Sanghadasagani, Lilavahi Kaha (8th century) of Kauhala, Samaraichchakaha of Haribhadra Suri, Dhuttakhyana (8th century) of Haribhadra Suri, Kahanaya-kosa (1052 A.D.) and Nirvanalilavati (1038 A.D.) of Jineshwara Suri, Nanapanchami-kaha (1052 A.D.) of Maheshwara Suri, Kaharayana-kosa (1101 A.D.) of Devabhadra Suri, Nammayasundri kaha (1130 A.D.) of Mahendra Suri, Jinadattakhyana (1134 A.D.) of Sumati Suri, Sirivalakaha (1371 A.D.) of Ratnashekhara Suri, Rayana-sehari-kaha (15th century) of Jinaharshgani, etc.

LITERATURE (Punjabi) The birth of the Punjabi language and its literature may be said to have synchronised with the Muslim conquest of the Punjab by Mahmud of Ghazni at the threshold of the eleventh century of the Christain era. But the first authentic literary composition in Punjabi available so far is the work of Sheikh Farid included in the Guru Granth, the holy scripture of the Sikhs, compiled in 1604, by the fifth Sikh Guru Arjun, which has since remained sacrosanct and unchanged. That Sheikh Farid was anterior in time to Guru Nanak (1469-1539) is established by the inner testimony of the Guru Granth and by the history of its compilation.

The quality of Sheikh Farid's verse of which 112 shlokas (about 250 lines) and three hymns are available in the authentic version of the Guru Granth, is, by all standards, of the very best. His language is noble as the language of the Bible and the Quran. Its sentiment of self-abnegation and self-mortification endeared him to the down-trodden, conquered people. Its message is strictly personal and pathetically lyrical, expressing man's tragic lot in which humble devotion to God alone would be of avail.

It is near about the beginning of the sixteenth century that an exceptional flowering of the genius of the Punjabi people is witnessed in the religio-social verse of Guru Nanak (1469-1539), the founder of the Sikh faith. Guru Nanak's verses are found preserved in the Guru Granth compiled less than seventy years after his death by his fourth successor.

In respect of both the content and the tone, the poetry of Guru Nanak can be divided into two sections, lyrical and philosophical, though this division is, of course, not watertight.

Of his philosophical compositions, the Japu (Recitation) Siddha goshti (Debate with the Siddhas) and Onkar (The Divine Being) are the major three. The general tone of these poems is polemical, assessing, belittling and refuting most of the common assumptions of the various creeds of India or Islam. But after the dialectical demolition of these assumptions, the principle of human effort sanctified by divine grace is intuitively asserted.

Guru Nanak's lyrical poetry possesses much greater evocative power. Its real basis is the unhappy human situation in his day when the Indians were groaning under both native and alien oppression.

No less poignant is Guru Nanak's awareness of the social injustice and superstitious unreason of the Brahminical dispensation most of whose beliefs and practices he censures without reserve. His Asa di var in particular is full of such censure and condemnation.

LITERATURE-PUNJABI

The second and third successors of Guru Nanak, Guru Amar Dass and Guru Ram Dass, have written hymns of remarkable lyrical intensity. The emotional basis is mostly the wife's longing for union with the husband which is a much valued privilege under the feudal order and the Gurus visualise and experience in these terms the pangs of the human soul yearning for union with the divine incarnate in the Guru.

The fifth Guru Arjan Dev is the most prolific creator of this hymnology. His work makes for about half of the Guru Granth. By his time Sikh religion came to be established as an institution of some power and suspected by the Mughal rulers of interfering with their administration.

The growing tension between the Sikh leadership and the Mughal administration is probably responsible for the subdued, pacific, yet courageous, tone of Guru Arjan's compositions. The best known of these is a long poem, Sukhmani, or the Jewel of peace.

The work of Guru Arjan attains a classical dignity in the tone and style of its language which is nearer what has been called the 'Sadhu bhasha', or the classical literary Apabhramsha of medieval northern India.

Another high peak in this tradition, lower than only the top-most, appears in Bhai Gurudas, a Sikh elder, contemporary of the third, fourth, fifth and sixth Gurus. He has written both in Brajabhasha to which the Sadhu Bhasha tradition of the Sikhs was tending, and in purer Punjabi. The latter comprises 40 long poems of 20 to 30 stanzas each, which are called 'Vars', as the long metaphysical poems of the Gurus are also called, probably because they were sung to congregations in the same way as the lays of war and love before and after the Gurus. The subject matter of the vars of Bhai Gurudas is religio-social and socio-ethical, conforming in general to the doctrine and spirit of Sikh religion.

But it is for the form that these compositions merit attention, for they contain the idiom of the Punjabi speech in greater purity than those of the Gurus.

The Sikh tradition is responsible also for the beginnings of Punjabi prose literature. Much in the manner of the Christian Gospels, the accounts called 'Janam sakhis' (Life stories) are richly larded with supernatural incidents or miracles such as did not exceed the power of belief of the feudal age. The best known of these Janam sakhis is the one that is called Bhai Bala's sakhi, but its religious authenticity is not of the best; and, in fact, it is now being supplanted even in public esteem by the more authentic Puratan janam sakhi, edited by Bhai Vir Singh, who transcribed the text from the manuscript in the India Office Library in London. This Janam sakhi is believed to have been written in 1623, some eightyfour years after Guru Nanak's death, in the time of Guru Hargobind, fifth succession to Guru Nanak.

Shah Hussain is the first of the Sufi poets of his time, followed by Bulleh Shah, Sultan Bahu and others in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries and Hadayat Ullah among others of a later period. His poetry is intensely lyrical, but its import is social also, as in Bulleh Shah. It advocates a withdrawal from the ambition and strife of life and ceaseless devotion to the Divine. Communion with the Divine it seeks through the agency of a preceptor or 'murshid', though Shah Hussain does not specify who his preceptor was. Bulleh Shah also lays stress upon the falsity of the difference between Hindi and Muslim. He is more outspoken in his opposition to the rigours of Muslim religious conventions and practices like 'namaz' and fasting and to bigotry in general.

The language of this poetry remains very near the folk idiom; it is highly emotional and appeals to the pastoral and vagrant hangover in human nature on both sides of the dividing line between Indian Punjab and Pakistani Punjab.

Parallel to Sufi lyricism, a kind of verse romance has flourished in Punjabi literature, the first ancestor of which known so far is Damodar Gulati, a Hindu contemporary of Shah Hussain. He is influenced by the Sikh religious sentiment as well as by Sufi thought and with the help of these he has transformed a love story of his native Jhang, the love of Hir and Ranjah, into a classic version of man-woman love in rebellion against the strait-jacket of the institution of marriage by parental choice. He writes in his native dialect of Jhang, which, however, failed to become the standard form of literary language.

Nevertheless, this story of romantic love subsequently became a Punjabi classic in line with romances from the middle eastern countries like Yusuf Zulaikha, Laila Majnu and Shirin Farihad, and some of a later local mintage like Sohni Mahiwal and Sassi Punnu.

Pilu, a contemporary of Damodar, wrote the verse romance of Mirza and Sahiban in the heroic verse form of Punjabi and brought out the truly feudal character of contemporary Punjabi society which is smothered by Sufistic distortions in the case of Ranjah and Hir. He is followed at a distance of half a century by Hafiz Barkhurdar, who wrote some other romances besides Mirza and Sahiban.

Of the poets who subsequently wrote their own versions of the story of Hirs and Ranjah, the most celebrated is Varis Shah (1735-1781). He is preceded in this by Hamid, Muqbal, Ahmed and some others of lesser merit. After him, however, this story has been an ambitious venture of almost every poet of some note, right up to the modern times. Of these, Hashim Shah and Ahmad Yar of the period of Ranjit Singh, Joga Singh, Kishan Singh Arif, Bhagwan Singh and Fazal Shah of the later nineteenth century have achieved distinction. In the twentieth century, the vogue of this kind of romance died a natural death, though feeble attempts were made now and then to revive it in an ironical vein.

LITERATURE-PUNJABI

Hashim Shah achieved better fame with his verse romance of Sassi Punnu, a love episode that had its origin in Sindh, and Ahmed Yar with Yusuf Zulaikha and Hatim Tai. Ahmad Yar wrote numerous other romances or 'qissas' and came very near setting the style of the Punjabi verse, more particularly in western Punjab. But the coming of the British rule changed the literary scene entirely. With the lead in Punjabi literary endeavour being taken by the Sikhs, the Punjabi literary language took an orientation towards Sanskrit and the literary genres came to follow the Western pattern.

Kadir Yar is another prominent poet of the period of Ranjit Singh, but his two popular creations, Puran Bhagat and Hari Singh Nalva dimant (Death of Hari Singh Nalva), cannot be accorded eminence even in the Punjabi literature. A more sophisticated verse romance of Sohni Mahival and Mirajnama (Ascension) are also attributed to him.

Shah Mohammad is rightly acclaimed as the writer of a great patriotic narrative poem about the first Anglo-Sikh war, written according to the internal evidence before the Second Anglo-Sikh war the outcome of which abolished the Punjab as a sovereign state. But as poetry, this also cannot be accorded a high place.

Fazal Shah is celebrated for his verse-romance of Sohni Mahival which marks the cul-de-sac of the Persianised literary style in Punjabi with its copious alliterations and long stanzas with a single rhyme.

The Punjabi poetry of the latter half of the nineteenth century is generally suppressed and escapist, spiritual in its themes, and does not really amount to much.

The renaissance in the Punjabi literature came at the end of the nineteenth century under the inspiration of the Singh Sabha movement among the Sikhs. The aim of the Singh Sabha movement was to establish the identity of the Sikhs by carrying out such reforms in their religious and social life as would distinguish them from the main body of the Hindus. Adoption to the Punjabi language as the medium of this new Sikh culture was regarded as essential, for Hindi and Urdu had become the symbols and media of the old Hindu and Muslim cultures, respectively.

The most eminent literary figure of the Singh Sabha movement was Bhai Vir Singh (1872-1957). He wrote and published numerous articles in his weekly, Khalsa samachar, and in occasional pamphlets, in furtherance of this cause, but a distinct literary achievement is made in his two historical prose romances, Sundari and Bijai Singh. These mark also the beginning of the modern Punjabi prose. The historical romance, Satvant Kaur, in two parts, the first part of which was published in 1899 and the second many years later in 1908. All the three present the Sikh struggle against Mughal rule in the eighteenth century in sentimental, romantic colours, depicting the Sikhs as ideals of manhood, courage and sacrifice, and the Muslim governing class as oppressive, immoral and decadent. A later prose work, Baba Naudh Singh (1946), deals with the contemporary rural scene and its economic and social problems and conflicts, with repercussions of the changes in urban life, the emergence of the liberal professions of a lawyer and a doctor, and the contest between different religious denominations for the soul of a Hindu widow, who finds refuge finally in Sikhism. S.S. Charan Singh 'Shahid' (1891-1935) and Bhai Mohan Singh Vaid (1881-1936) wrote copiously in the first quarter of the twentieth century, depicting Sikh feudal and middle-class homes under the strain of the new rationalism of the progressive-minded and the gross materialism to which the less enlightened had fallen prey.

Bhai Vir Singh is also acknowledged as the father of the modern Punjabi poetry. His first major work in poetry is the epic popularly known as Rana Surat Singh, in which Rani Raj Kaur, considered by modern critics to symbolise the dethroned Sikh ruling class, lamenting over her dead husband, Rana Surat Singh, who is the symbol of the lost sovereignty of that class, is made to find solace in prayer and worship and in resignation to the Divine will. But the true modernity of the Rana Surat Singh lies in its prosody, its metres, and imagery.

The vogue of the short poem, apart from religious hymns, starts also with Bhai Vir Singh's body of poems published in three volumes entitled Matak hulare (Elegant swings), Lahran de har (Garlands of waves), Bijlian de har (Garlands of lighting). The tone of these short poems and lyrics is religious romantic, drawing more upon the 'sufi' way of viewing God as the Man-beloved and man as the woman-lover, than on the similar emotion in the poetry of the Sikh Gurus. Vir Singh writes much about the scenic and human beauty of Kashmir in some of these poems, evoking prayerful and wistful notes. In a volume published towards the end of his life, Mere Sayyan Jio (My Lord), he tries not very successfully to catch up with the modern social temper.

The sentiment in favour of Punjabi language and literature was beginning at this time to appear as a patriotic urge among the Hindus and the Muslims also. Bihari Lal Puri and his son Bishan Dass Puri did valuable work, as grammarians and text-book writers. Brij Lal Shastri (b.1894) wrote plays from the Sanskrit tradition, like Savitri sukania (1925), Pratigya Vasvadata and Puran Bhagat. But distinct literary achievement fell to the lot of Dhani Ram Chatrik (1876-1954) who, drawing upon the classical Hindu tradition as well as contemporary nationalism, wrote verse polite and chaste in diction and somewhat modern in form in Chandan vari (Grove of sandalwood, 1949), Kesar Kiari (Bed of saffron, 1940), Sufikhana (The house of the sufis, 1950) and Nawa jahan (The new world, 1945), and of Kirpa Sagar (1875-1939) whose Lakshmi Devi (1920), a long narrative poem in the manner of Sir Walter Scott's Lady of the Lake, celebrates Ranjit Singh's annexation of Jammu and the Dogra country to his kingdom. Kirpa Sagar's three-volume drama Maharaja Ranjit Singh (1931) of which the third part is also named Dido Jamval (1934) (after his valiant opponent), a work in the early twentieth-century style of Hindi and Urdu drama of stalwarts like Agha Hashar, has permanent value.

The Akali struggle and the Congress and Communist movements made a considerable literary impact, with poets like Feroze Din 'Sharf' (1889-1955), Gurmukh Singh 'Musafir' (1899-1975), and swaying large audiences as well as a considerable reading public. Gurmukh Singh Musafir tried to fall in line with the progressive movement and wrote short stories also with that outlook. Hira Singh Dard became a committed Marxist and more or less gave up literary ambitions.

The first beginning in drama was made by Ishvarchandra Nanda (1892-1967) with his play Subhadra (Delhi, 1924). Following the style of early twentieth century English drama, but with a hangover of Shakespearean and Punjabi folk devices, Nanda depicts the conflict between the old and the new. The focus is upon a young Hindu widow, Subhadra, who is maltreated by her mother-in-law and is rescued from this hell by her young brother, who arranges her marriage with a class-fellow. But Nanda remained a single swallow in the field until the forties. His two other full length plays, Var ghar (The marriage, 1928) and Shamu Shah (Delhi, 1949) do not attain the literary quality of Subhadra. He has written numerous one-act play also.

Similarly, Punjabi novel begins truly with Nanak Singh (1897-1972), who after a few juvenile attempts, is deemed to have arrived with Chitta lahu (White blood, 1932). Its theme is the oppression of woman in Indian society, especially when she is widowed, which obliges her in her desperation to become a prostitute and to avenge herself by becoming a vamp. Nanak Singh plays many variations on this theme in novels like Fauladi phul (Iron flower).

In some other novels, the widow prostitute is dispensed with, but the theme remains that of the patient wife, the profligate husband, a third woman, willing or unwilling victim, and the ultimate reformation of the profligate, as in Kaghazan di beri (The paper boat), Dhundle parchhaven (Misty shadows) and Jivan sangram (The battle of life, 1950).

Nanak Singh continued tackling social themes with a rather narrow range in an idealist protestant spirit in the novels that appeared almost annually. He has sought to do some preaching also in a nationalist reformist tone, with some socialism thrown in as extra weight as in Gharib di dunia (The world of the poor, 1949) and Piar di dunia (The world of love, 1946). In some of his novels, he has depicted the large-scale violence, arson, rape, and murder of the partition days as in Khun de sohile (Paeans of blood, 1949) and Agg di khed (The game of fire, 1948).

After Independence, Nanak Singh began to show a keener socio-political concern, dealing with bureaucratic corruption, religious and social hypocrisy and the heartless exploitation of the peasant and worker by the landlord and business classes as in Adam Khor (Man eater, 1953) and Chitrakar (Painter, 1951).

In Ik mian do talwaran (One scabbard and two swords, 1960), Nanak Singh has tried to pay his mead to the desperate heroism and forlorn hope of what is known as the 'Ghadar (Rebellion) Movement' of 1913-15, with its popular young leader, Kartar Singh, as the hero of the novel. In Gagan damama baja (The trumpet of heaven, 1966), he has written of the Indo-Pakistan war of 1965 as it affected the Punjabi people. And in his last novel, Koi haria but radio ri (Only a rare plant is green), he again depicts the all-round corruption in contemporary Punjabi society. He has written about sixty short stories also which show the same characteristics as his novels.

Nanak Singh's writing career runs closely parallel to the progressive by it early in his career in the late thirties under inspiration from Gurbaksh Singh, the doyen of the modern Punjabi literature and the progressive movement in it.

Gurbaksh Singh (b.1895) entered the field of Punjabi literature as a liberal humanist in the mid-thirties with his monthly magazine Prit lari (The string of love). He advocated liberalism of thought and action in every sphere of activity, in religion, in social relations and in domestic life. He made a special plea for a kind platonic love to refine relations between men and women which were subject to many restrictions in Indian life. Gurbaksh Singh's writings published in numerous volumes such as Sanvin padhari zindagi (A balanced life) Param manukh (The perfect man) Zindagi di ras (The capital of life), Navan shivala (The new temple). Gurbaksh Singh has written short stories also published in collections like Anokhe te ikalle (Strange and lonely, 1940), Bhabi maina (Sister-in-law Maina, 1950), and Pritan di pahredar (Amritsar, 1952). In these also he has tried to popularise his doctrine of 'Sahaj priti' under the epigram 'Love is not possession'.

Mohan Singh (1906-1978) started as what is called a stage poet in the early thirties reciting his poems, written for religious and natural occasions, to large public assemblies. These poems were published in collection entitled Save pattar (Green leaves, 1936), but when he came to Khalsa College, Amritsar, in 1936, he was exposed to modern intellectual influences and his mood changed to reflect psychological realism, Freudian psychoanalysis, with a smattering of Marxist socialist philosophy, a combination that passed for progressive in those days, and he published two such collections, Kasumbhara (Red oleanders, 1937) and Adhvate (Half-way house, 1939). Thereafter, influenced mainly by the communist-sponsored world peace movement, he published Kach sach (Foible and truth, 1945), which spotted two moods, those of romantic love, as in the earlier two collection, and of Marxist ideas to which, however, he gave a fitting emotional collateral. In Vada vela (Late morning, 1948) and Avazan (Voice, 1950), the Marxist tone is more pronounced. And then he published a small collection entitled Jaya mir (Victory to peace) using the Russian word 'mir' in the sense of peace. Towards the end of his life, he published poems of a sadder and wiser temper, under the titles, Jandre (Locks, 1975) and Buhe (Doors, 1977). Curiously enough, the first is dominated by the mood of resignation, and the second strikes a note of hope. From 1940 to his death in 1978, Mohan Singh remained the tallest figure in the field of Punjabi poetry.

Amrita Pritam (b. 1919), the daughter of a conservative and devout Sikh house, published under her parental name Amrit Kaur, very juvenile verses under the title, Amrit lahran (Waves of nectar, 1936). She was also soon drawn into the romantic and progressive atmosphere of the literary circles of the time and sang out her heart as a young woman whose spirit was stifled under social compulsions. Her next collections Jiunda jiwan (Living life, 1939), Trel dhote phul (Dew-washed flowers, 1941) Gitan valia (Maker of songs, 1943), Badlan de palle vich (In the lap of clouds, 1943), Sanjh di lali (Twilight, 1944) and Lok pir (The pathos of the people, 1944) became more modern in the tone and construction reflecting what has been called romantic progressivism.

But reacting to the Marxist-realist criticism, she modified her romantic sentiment to a rather feminist and mordant irony over woman's lot in her world and quite a strident tone about man's treatment of woman in Pather gite (Gravel stones, 1946). She scaled the heights of poetic achievement in her ironical as well as emotional reaction to the tragic side-effects of Independence, arson, rapes and killings that followed the division of Punjab into Pakistan and Indian parts, and the mass transfer of Hindu and Muslim population from one part to the other. Her poetry of this mood is published in two collections, Lamianvatan (Long marches, 1948) and Sarghi vela (The time of dawn, 1952). There is a falling off into romantic melancholy in Sunehare (Messages, 1955). In her latest mode, she has become pretty nearly an existentialist, betraying a precosity of expression and imagery, as in Asoka cheti, Nag Mani (The serpent's jewel), and Kaghar te kanvas (Paper and canvas, 1973).

Santokh Singh 'Dhir' (1920) is a committed Marxist both in his poems and short stories and has written some powerful pieces in both genres. His poems have been published in volumes like Dharti mangdi minh ve (1951), Guddian patohle (1944) Pahu phutala (1948).

Harbhajan Singh (b. 1920) started as a progressive aesthete in Lasan (Weals) and Adha raini (The midnight breeze, 1962). In his poetic play Tar tupka (The hanging drop, 1957), he came pretty near the Marxist line over the danger of nuclear war, but perhaps as a consequence of academic sophistication as Professor of Punjabi in the University of Delhi, he got involved with modern American criticism and structuralism, which have led his poetry into the quagmire of existentialist obscurity and surrealist paradox as in Na dhupe na chhaven (Neither sunshine nor shade, 1967), Sarak di safe te (On the page of the road) and Main jo bit gaya (I, who is a past).

Prabhjot Kaur (b.1924) started with as a sentiment at poet, much as Amrita Pritam, but she did not go over to progressivism, and after a period of romantic poetry in volumes like Pankheru, Do rang supne sadhran (1949) began to feel, with the passing away of youth, a sophisticated ennui to which she has given powerful expression in collections such as Pabbi (The plateau, 1962) Khari (Gulf, 1967) Vaddarshi Shisha (The magnifying glass, 1973) and Chandr yug (1977).

Sohan Singh Misha (1934) has broken a new path in his ironical and sophisticated realism, questioning all human relations, the common intellectual's political and class awareness marred by timidity in a rather cynical manner of understatement in Chaurasta (Crossroads, 1961), Dastak (Knocking on the door, 1966) and Kach de vastar (Apparel of glass, 1974)

But the most convincing achievement in Punjabi poetry, after Mohan Singh, can be attributed to Shiv Kumar (1936-1973). He started with a poignantly lyrical precosity in Piran da paraga (A fare of aches) and continued to add to his achievement with collections like Lajvanti (Touch me not), Mainu vida karo (Bid me farewell), Ate dian chirian (The sparrows of flour paste). But the height of achievement is shown in his verse play, Luna in which he seeks to vindicate the solicitation of the adolescent Puran by his young stepmother Lune—a legend, the parallels of which are found in the Greek legend of Phaedia, celebrated in Greek, Roman and French poetry, and in the legends of almost all parts of India and probably of the middle eastern countries. It is a great technical achievement, and perhaps a tour de force so far as its argument goes. But there are passages of great and rare poetry, especially in Puran's evasion of his step-mother's advances and the ambiguity of his answer to the charge in the court of his father, Luna is commonly regarded as Shiv Kumar's masterpiece, but a greater achievement, both poetically and intellectually, is perhaps made in his last work, Main te main (I and I, 1971), in which Shiv Kumar gives a poetically modern version of the sin of motherhood, the vulnerability of young woman, of what perhaps he had personal experience owing to his uncommon fascination for women.

Very remarkable contribution to Punjabi poetry has been made by some poets who have lived abroad for many years past. Of these, Ravinder Singh Gill (Ravi) is the most significant. He has published much poetry and fiction in short story form, and also two verse plays. He started as a progressive aesthete and has grown ever more modernist.

Ajaib Kamal, an immigrant in Kenya is Ravinder Singh's counterpart both in modernity and existential pessimism. He has published many volumes of verse which can hope to live as daring experiments in the field of Punjabi poetry.

In the novel Surinder Singh Narula (b.1917) and Jaswant Singh Kanwal show progressivist trends, while Narinderpal Singh and Sohan Singh Sital are uncommitted but display a remarkable realism. Surinder Singh Narula is Amritsar born and his novels Pio puttār and Rang mahal deal with the city life sophistication, but with a leftist tilt. His other novels, with Lahore, Delhi and Simla as the locale, are also similarly motivated. Jaswant Singh Kanwal, portrays the rural scene in the Malva district south of the Sutlej. He is pronouncedly tendentious, concerning himself with the land struggle and other progressive leftist causes (Puranmashi, Rup dhara, Rat baki hai, etc.). Narinderpal Singh has given powerful portrayals of the Punjabi woman's situation in which, under feudal motions and prejudices, she is shown to be her own worst enemy (Shakti, Triya jal). He has written a tetralogy of novels on Sikh history also. Of late, he has written experimentalist novels, like Punniā ki kassia, Tapu, Vikendrit, Ba mulhaza hoshīar, Sutardhar gaggan ganga. Sohan Singh Sital portrays intimately the life of the rural people in the Central districts of Lahore and Amritsar as before Partition. Dilip Kaur Tiwana (1935) is another prominent writer of short stories and novels. Her latest novels Eh hamara jiwana (This life of ours, 1969), Suraj te samunder (The sun and the sea, 1972), Vat hamari (Our journey, 1970) have won genuine recognition. Gurdial Singh (b.1933) has emerged as a promising novelist with half a dozen novels written in the last ten years of which Marih da diva (The lamp on the grave, 1965) Adh chanani rat (The night of half moon, 1972) and Athan uggan (Sunset and moon, 1974), give an impressionist picture of rural life in the Malva region of the Punjab. Anhoie is a poignant account of small-town development in this century which is often resisted by individuals of a too individual character.

In his latest novel, Anhe ghore da dan (The alms for a blind horse, 1976), the title is taken from a call made by the scheduled-caste women and children going for alms to the houses of the upper castes on the day of the the lunar eclipse. It depicts the oppression of these castes.

Kartar Singh Duggal (b.1917) has made his mark as a novelist, short story writer and playwright. His novel Andaran (The innards) in which his making the landlord's natural son rise against him and oblige him to distribute his land, is rather romantic. Naunh te mas (Nails and flesh) depicts the plight of the refugees from West Pakistan. He has to his credit a trilogy, based on his own life's experiences, later published in a single volume entitled Hal muridan da (The plight of the disciples).

Dil darya (The generous heart) is the story of his childhood in which, as a sensitive child and adolescent, he is exposed to passions of men and young women.

In the genre of drama, the lead given by Nanda has been followed by Harcharan Singh (b. 1914) beginning with a collection of one-act play, Jivan lila (The play of life, 1940), and continuing to date with greater maturity in Sobha sakti and Kal, aj te bhalak (1971). Of late, Harcharan Singh has been writing religious plays to serve the new upsurge in Sikh society. There include Chamkaur di garhi, Hind di chadar (1975).

Sant Singh Sekhon (b. 1908) has written plays in a more sophisticated, intellectual manner, but with the same Marxist commitment as in his short stories. His plays, Kalakar (1946), Naraki, Moyansar na kai (1955), Varis, Damayanti (1962) Mittar piara (1970) seek to interpret the Punjabi history and Indian life from a Marxist angle.

Balwant Gargi (1916) shows considerable variety in his plays from the early leftist as in Loha kut (1944), Sil pathar (1949), Kanak di bali (1954) to the experimentalist stance (Dhuni Di Agg, 1976), and the late historical phase (Sultan Razia). In his latest play, Saukan (The co-wife, 1979), he has dealt with a typical incident of hysteria in women arising from actual or repressed passion.

Of a younger generation, Harsaran Singh (b. 1929), whose works include Jigara, Lamme samme di narak, Udas lok, is remarkable for his simplicity and purposiveness and Surjit Singh Sethi for his bold modernist experiments, as his plays like Mard mard nahin tivin tivin nahin, (Man is not man, woman is not woman), King Mirza te sapera, Nangi rat sarak da pehra, indicate. Kapur Singh Ghuman (b.1927) is another prolific and experimentalist playwright of note. His works includes Putali ghar (1964), Jiondi lash (1958), Muk Sansar (1973), etc.

Sujan Singh (b.1909) (Dukh sukh, Pashu te devta, etc.) Sant Singh Sekhon (Samachar, Kame te yodhe, Adhi vat tija pahar) and Santokh Dhir (Sanjhi kandh, 1958, Saver hon tak, 1955) are progressive writers of short stories. Kartar Singh Duggal, from Saver sar (The dawn, 1941) to Pane maire (The loamy soil, 1972), began with and does not still feel chary of naturalist realism. Kulwant Singh Virk (b. 1919) writes of the rural life of his early years and urban life of his later maturity. He shows remarkable balance in both matter and manner. His works include Chhah vela (1950), Dharti te akash (1951), Naven lok (1968), etc. His language is simple, unrheterical, shot through with irony and evinces a wise perception of human needs and desires.

Surjit Singh Sethi (b.1928), Dalip Kaur Tiwana (b.1935) have written novels and short stories. Ajit Cour (b. 1934), Gulzar Singh Sandhu (b.1935) and Prem Prakash Khaunavi are still writing, holding out further promise of a breakthrough.

LITERATURE-RAJASTHANI

LITERATURE (Rajasthani), can be divided into the following periods: The initial period (1050-1450), the mediaeval period (1450-1850), the modern period (1850 to the present day), the phases of which being (a) the first phase (1850 to 1947-1950) and (b) the second phase (from 1947-1950 to date).

Poetry: Initial and mediaeval periods: The poetry of the initial and mediaeval periods can, from the point of view of subject matter and content, be classified as follows: (1) Jain poetry (2) Love poetry (mundane poetry)—(a) works of known poets and (b) works of unknown poets, (3) Charan poetry, which can be divided into two categories: (a) historical-heroic poetry and (b) epic-religious poetry, (4) Narrative poetry, (5) The poetry of saints—(a) composed by the founders of the various sects and their followers and (b) composed by poets not belonging to particular sects, (6) Folk poetry.

In the modern period, apart from the traditional poetry, the poetry connected with the new currents of thought, new beliefs and changed values has been written and continues to be written in abundance.

Jain poetry: The major portion of Jain poetry is based on Jain religion. These poems give hints about living one's life according to the tenets accepted in Jain religion. The hints may be given directly or indirectly. The objective of these poems is the building up of character and religious faith. Jain scriptures are divided into four parts, which are called the four "Anuyogas": 1. Prathamanyoga, 2. Karananyoga, 3. Charananyoga and 4. Dravyanyoga. Of these, No. 1 has, as its theme, stories and epic legends. No. 2 deals with the principles of 'karma' and the classification of people. No. 3 has as its theme the thought and action, the consciousness and the essential nature of the elements of consciousness, and No. 4 has for its theme philosophy and philosophical guidance. From the point of view of poetic merit, No. 1, Prathamanyoga, which is also called Dharmakathananyoga, occupies a very high place amongst all the four. Included in it are descriptions of men and women marked for their good conduct and for action conforming to religious doctrine. It can be easily grasped and understood by the common people and by the illiterate persons, while the other three Anuyogas demand of their readers sharp intellect as well as learning. Jain religion lays emphasis on good deeds, and an emphasis on good deeds occupies a place of the highest importance in Jain poetry. For this reason, a pretty large portion of this poetry is to be found in the form of poems about good deeds and narrative poetry concerned with Tirthankars (leading saints), Baladevas, Vasudevas, sages, preceptors, women known for excellence in character, and kings and merchants who were religion incarnate. The common man, having learnt from such poems about the evil consequences of sins, the benefits of pious conduct and the importance of adherence to religion, develops a religious bent of mind and prepares himself for adherence to religion in accordance therewith. This has been the sole object of the authors of these poems. The language which they used was also the colloquial one. The fountain of inspiration of this poetry is religion, and its key-note is a religious one. From the point of view of 'rasa' (the governing emotion in Indian poetics), this poetry has a dominance of the emotion of 'quiet'. It is worth mentioning that the Jain poet does not depart from the original story of the epic or religious source of his poetry. Of course, the description and development (of the basic plot) owe themselves to his imagination. In point of language and style also, these poems are somewhat different from the works of contemporary poets. In almost all the narrative poems, one comes across the use of certain familiar poetic devices (such as the mention of and stories relating to previous birth or births). From the point of view of subject-matter, language and style, source and object, Jain poetry stands in a category different from other poetic traditions mentioned above.

Broadly speaking, Jain poetry can be divided into four divisions:

1. Poetry about good deeds or narrative poetry: This poetry concerns itself with great men described in Jain scriptures and prominent personalities known to Jain tradition. These poems have been written under different names, such as 'rasa' 'chopai' (or chaupai), 'dhal', 'pavada', 'sandhi', 'charchari', 'prabandh', 'charita', 'akhyana', 'katha'.
2. Poems relating to festivals: These are concerned with some special occasion or festival. They have been given the names of 'faag', 'dhamar', 'barahmasa', 'vivahalo', 'dhaval', 'mangal', etc.
3. Moral and didactic poetry: Such poems are called 'samvad', 'kakka', 'matruka', 'bavani', 'battisi', 'chhattisi' (and similar other names based on particular numbers), 'kulak', 'hiyali', etc.
4. Eulogy: Such poems are in the form of eulogy of various Tirthankaras, places of pilgrimage, saintly men, etc., and are known by the names of 'stuti', 'stavan', 'sajzay', 'vinati', 'namaskar', 'chaubisi', etc.

Of the hundreds of Jain poets, mention may be made here only of a few like Vajrasen Suri (Bharateshvar Bahubali ghor, 1168), Shalibhadra Suri (Bharateshvar Bahubali ras, 1184. and Buddhiras), Asigu (Jivadaya ras, 1200, Chandanbala ras, Kripana-grihini samvad), Dharma (Jambusvami charitra, 1209), Palhana (Nemi-barahmasa, Aburas—13th century), Lakshmitilak Gani (Shantinath Deoras, 1256), Somamurti (Jineshvar Suri vivah varnana ras, Jin prabodh; Suri charchari, Guravali ratna, Suri bolika—approximately 1274), Udaydharma (Uvaesamal kahanaya chhapaya), Rajsingh (Jinadatta charita, 1297), Sagharu (Pradyumnacharita, 1354) Jin Padmasuri (Thulibhadda fag 1333), Shalibhadrasuri (Panch Pandav chatrti ras, 1353), Upadhyay Vinayprabh (Gautamswami ras, 1355), Shalisuri (Virat-parva, before 1421), Rajshekhar Suri, Hiranand Suri, Mahopadhyaya Jayasagar, Depal, etc., are the poets belonging to the initial period.

Amongst the poets of the mediaeval period, particularly those worthy of mention, are Brahma Jindas (1388-1468), Chhihal (period of writing, 1518), Kushallabh (approximately 1523-1593), Samaysundar (1553-1646), Hemratan Suri (1559-1616), Labdhodaya (1629-1693), Jinharsha (1628-1722), Dharmavarddhan (1643-1726), Daulat Vijay (approx. 1643-1743), Vinaychandra (period of writing, 1668-1712), Jayamallaji (1708-1796), Acharya Bhikhanji (1726-1803), Gyansar (1744-1841), etc.

2. Mundane poetry. Several poems relating to love, the erotic theme, separation (from the beloved), heroism, etc. have been found in Jain narrative works, such as Prabandha chintamani, Prabhavak charit, Prabandha kosha, etc., and in Hemchandra's Apabhramsha vyakarana. The language is Apabhramsha or Maru-Gurjara mixed with Apabhramsha. Many of the dohas incorporated in these works are, in fact, current amongst the people of Rajasthan even today. Bisaldi ras (14th century) written by Narpati Natha is an important literary work which describes the marriage of Rajmati, daughter of king Bhoj, with the Chauhan king Raja Bisaldeo of Ajmer, the departure of the Raja for Orissa after a quarrel with Rajmati, the pangs of separation felt by Rajmati, and the re-union of the couple. Amongst the other narrative works of this level are counted Hansraj-Bachharaj chaupai written by Vijaybhadra, Hansavali written by Asait, Saday-Vatsa-viraprabhandh written by Bhim, Malaysundari katha written by Manikyasundar Suri, Vidyavilas pavadau by Hirananda Suri, Manvati Vinayvilas pavadau written by Hirbhata, etc. Vasantvilas fagu, Shringara shata, etc. are poems in free verse dealing with a love theme and belonging to the initial period.

The numerous love poems composed during the mediaeval period fall into two categories from the point of view of authorship: works of known authors and those of unknown authors. As regards the poems in the first category, the extant versions do not show much departure from the original, while in the poems in the second category, one comes across so many versions, and numerous textual variations are found amongst them. In the first category (known authors) the well-known poems are Madhavanal Kamkandala prabandh by Ganapati Kayastha (1525), Madhavanal Kamkandala chaupai and Dhola Maravni chaupai by Kushallabh, Madhavanal katha by Damodar, Buddhi raso by Jelha, Lakhsen Padamavati chaupai by Damo, etc. In the second category may be placed the dohas and surathas relating to Dhola Maru, Jethava Ujali, Sheni Vijanand Nagji-Nagmati, Binza Sorath, Jalal Bubna, etc.

3. Charan poetry: Charan poetry has been composed not only by persons born in Charan families, but also in abundance by persons belonging to other communities. (a) Historic—heroic poetry: The poets belonging to this stream themselves used to go to the battlefields and, if necessary, engaged themselves in combat also. They used to possess proper knowledge of the warfare and of all the implements, and situations, etc. connected with war. This is the reason why history and the heroic appear to speak through their poetry. From this point of view, the praise showered upon this poetry by various scholars is well-deserved.

In the period from the 11th to the 14th century, the poetry of this category is found in scattered 'chhandas'. Shridhar Vyas is the first well-known and mature poet in this style. Ranmall chhand and Saptasati ra chhand are his works. In the first, prominence is given to the battle that Rathod Rao Ranmall of Idar fought with Zafar Khan. It was written in 1400. In the second, there is a vigorous description of the goddess Durga on the basis of the Markandeya Purana. Another composition belonging to the first half of the 15th century is Vir Ramayan written by Badar dhadhi. It contains a lucid description in a flowing style of episodes connected with Johis and Rathods, particularly, the episodes and battles connected with Johis and Viramdev Rathod. It is also of importance in regard to the beginnings of the history of Rathods. Achaldas Khinchi ri vachanika by Sivdas Gadan (approximately 1425) is the most important Charan poem of the initial period from the point of view of poetic elegance, language and history. The work gives prominence to a description of the attack of Hoshang Gouri, Sultan of Mandu, on Khinchi of Gagrongadh, and the 'johar' (sacrifice on the burning pyre) by heroic Rajput women. The battle was fought in 1423. The poet has given an account of what he himself witnessed.

Amongst the important poets belonging to the beginning of the mediaeval period, one may place Gadan Pasayat, Khidiya Chanan and Sindhayach Chaujuja. Some of the principal poets of this category are Padmanabh (Kanhadde praband, 1455), Bhandau Vyas (Hammirayana, 1481). Works by unknown authors are: Rao jaitasi chhand, Jaitasi raso, Vithu suja (Rao Jaitasi ro pakhandi chhand), (The period of composition of the last three poems is between 1534 and 1541). The other Charan poets who indicated a new ground are Barhat Asa (approximately 1493-1593), Vilhu Meha (16th century, latter half), Dudo Asiya Amrawat (1528-1533 to 1613), Barhath Issardas, Sandu Mala Udavat (approximately 1533-1623), Dursa Aadha (1538-1651), Asiya Karamsi Khinvsarot (1543-1563), Dudo Visrat, Kesodas Gadan (1583-1644), Barhat Shankar (1543-1623), Chatra Motisar (1593-1678), Hemsamor, Aadha Kisna-I, Mahesdas Rav, Girdhar Asiya (1633-1718), Kisoredas Rav (1658-1659), Khidiya Jagga (1658), Gadan Virbhan Thakur Siyot (17th century, latter half), Ratnu Virbhan Bhojrajot (1688-1735), Kaviya Karnidan Vijayramot (1693-1783), Khinchiya Bakhta, Sandu Prithviraj (18th century), Jogidas (1712), Hammirdan Ratnu (18th century, earlier half), Aadha Pahadkhan (18th century), Gadan Gopinath (18th century), Hukmichand Khidiya (1743-1803), Barhat Ummedram Palhavat (1743-1821), Ramdan Lalas (1761-1825), Manchh (1770-1883), Mahadan Mehdu (1781-1843), Aadha Kisna-II, Mahadan Bai (1843), Vithu Bhoma (1828-1848), Kaviraja Bankidas Asiya (1781-1833), etc.

(b) Epic-religious:

There are several poets who have written works falling in this category. These are Jayasinha (16th century, earlier half), Alluji Kaviya (approximately 1525-1625), Barhat Asa, Chundoji Dadhvadia (1563-1568), Sankhla Karamsi Runecha (approximately 1540), Kushallabh, Barhat Issardas, Rathod Prithviraj (1549-1600), Kisno (16th century, latter half), Kesodas Gadan, Madhadas Dadhvadia (1553-1621), Sanya Jhula (approximately 1523-1623), Surjandas Puniya (1583-1691), Kalyandas Rao (1643), Mahesdas Rao, Mohatta Rughnath (1668), Vitthaldas (1643-1670), Aidan Gadan (17th century, latter half), Khidiya Jagga, Kesarisinha Jitavat (approximately 1650-1750), Pirdan Lalas (18th century, earlier half), Maharaja Ajitsinha (1678-1724), Jati Jaichand (1719), Barhath Muraridan (1718), Haridas Lalas (1750), Barhath Kriparam Khidiya (1743-1833), Opa Adha (approximately 1752-1843), etc. 4. Narrative poetry: Rajasthan has been the sporting ground of heroes, heroic ladies and saints. It is a matter of surprise that while, in comparison with other provinces, a large number of saintly sects were founded in Rajasthan and, comparatively speaking, saint poetry has been composed in abundant quantity, the literary world does not have an adequate knowledge of this fact, even at the present day. A brief mention of the 16 sects of this region will be made later. Of the various poets (in the category of saint poetry), it is not possible even to mention the major names. In this context, a reference to the Nath sect is also necessary.

1. Nath sect: Gorakhnath (approximately 10th century) formed the Nath sect. By tradition, nine Naths and 12 sects of Naths are famous. Naths have had an extensive influence in Rajasthan. As regards the initial Naths, Gorakh, Charpat, etc., the authenticity of their compositions in the local language is doubtful. Those compositions seem to have been the works of the 16th century. In this tradition, the most famous poet of the mediaeval period is Prithvinath (1450-1550). 29 works (large and small) written by him have been known. It is worth mentioning that in these works, there is an abundant influence of devotion, which is something new. The writers in this tradition are Maharaja Mansinh of Jodhpur (1782-1843), Nananath (19th century, earlier half), Navalnath, Uttamnath, etc.

2. Rasik sect (in the Rambhakti line) and Ramavat Vairagi: Agradasji founded the Rasik sect at Revasa near Sikar. Galta is the principal sect of Ramavat Vairagis. Their compositions are mainly in the Braj and Avadi languages; however, several poems have been written in Rajasthani and Pingal also. Of such poets belonging to the Rasik sect, Siyasakhi and Kriparam are names worth mentioning.

3. Vishnoi sect: The founder of the Vishnoi sect was Jambhoji (1451-1536). This is a sect of the worship of the Formless, but with an orientation towards the Concrete. To it the incarnations of God are acceptable, but there is a total prohibition of idol-worship. The language of Jambhoji and of poets belonging to his tradition is Rajasthani. The legacy of this sect is of great importance from the cultural, ideological, literary, traditional and linguistic points of view. Poets such as Udoji Nam, Vilhoji, Kesavji, Surjanji, Paramanandji, Harchandji, etc., have given us numerous compositions.

4. Jagannathi sect: This sect was founded by Jagannathji (1482-1506). Its ideology is similar to that of the Vishnoi sect. The poets of this sect have also given us works in native Rajasthani. Karamdas, Deoji, Lalnath, Chokhnath are the famous poets of this sect.

5. Niranjani sect: Haridasji of the Niranjani sect (1455-1543) uses in his literary creations Braj along with Rajasthani. Originally, it was a sect based on the worship of the Formless, but later it was greatly influenced by the ideology of the worship of the Concrete (God in the concrete form). Poets of this sect also wrote numerous compositions. Turasidas, Jagjivandas, Savadas, Bhagwandas, Manohardas, etc. are the famous poets of this sect.

6. Nimbarka sect: Acharya Parashuram Dev (1520-1600) was the founding preceptor of the Salemad seat of the Nimbarka sect. The Nimbarka sect is one of the four principal sects based on the worship of the Concrete. However, in Parashuramji's compositions, there are a sufficient number of writings on the theme of the worship of the Formless. The language of his compositions is simple Rajasthani; at places, there is a mixture of Braj language also. His lyrics, laden with devotion and several miscellaneous chhandas are very famous. There have been, in this sect, other poets also who were devotees as well as philosophers.

7. Dadu sect: In the compositions of Daduji (1543-1603), who founded the Dadu sect, the worship of the Formless predominates, even though at one or two places, Dadu desires devotion instead of liberation, like any devotee of the Concrete. Dadu's principal message is knowledge of the self and achieving liberation of the soul. There have been so many famous poets in the Dadu sect like Bakhnaji, Rajjabji, Sudardasji (the younger), Santdas, Barahhazari, Vajind, etc. Their language is Rajasthani and Braj and Khadi Boli with a mixture of Rajasthani.

Laldasi sect or Lal Panth: The founder of the Laldasi sect was Laldasji (1540-1648), who was born in Chholidup near Alwar in a Meo Muslim family. His preachings are concerned with the importance of earning one's bread, remembering God and religious singing. Rama (God) is Formless (has no attributes). Some scholars have made a mention of one work, Chitavani, as his composition; it was not written by him but by Laldas of the Dadu sect. Of the compositions in manuscript that go under his name, only about 125 'sakhis' (dohas) and 60 poems were written by him. It is worth mentioning that he has rejected the pursuit of yoga. Haridas, Dungersi Sadh, Prani Sadh, Bhikhan Sadh, etc. are counted among the leading poets of this sect.

9. Charandasi or Shuka sect: Charandas (1703-1782) was the founder of this sect. Compositions by him and by his two female disciples, Dayabai and Sahajobai, are of importance in the bhakti tradition (tradition of devotional poetry). Their language is a mixture of Rajasthani, Braj and Khadi Boli. There have been, in this sect, numerous other poets, but their language is either Khadi Boli or one in which Braj is predominant.

10. Gudad sect: Santdasji (1642-1749) used to put on a dress made of 'Gudad' (quilt cloth). For this reason, the saints who followed his teachings came to be known as persons of the 'Gudad' sect. Their principal seat is Dantda (Bhilwara). Santdasji's compositions have as their theme worship of the Formless. He has also condemned all ostentation. The language is simple Rajasthani.

In Rajasthan, four seats have been founded under the identical name of 'Ramsnehi' in the course of time. Their traditions are separate from one another.

11. Ramsnehi sect, Shahpura: The founder of this sect was Ramcharanji Maharaj (1719-1798). His compositions are very lucid and comprise 36,000 stanzas. In a sense this is a universal encyclopaedia of subjects relating to the worship of the formless. Of the numerous poets belonging to this sect, some of the names are Ramchandji, Bhagwandasji, Navalramji, Rampratapji, Dulharam, Jagannathji, etc.

12. Ramsnehi sect, Rain: The founder of this sect was Dariyaoji (1676-1758). 412 sakhis and about 30 poems written by Dariyaoji are available. There have been numerous poets in this tradition, such as Purnadas, Kisandas, Nanakdas, Mansharam, Harkharam, etc.

13. Ramsnehi sect, Sinthal: The founder of this sect was Hariramdasji (1778). His compositions are endowed with clarity and lucidity. His selection of words is also worthy of note. Haridevdasji, Narayandasji, Piraramji, etc. are some of the famous poets of this sect.

14. Ramsnehi sect, Khedappa: The founder of this sect was Ramdasji (1726-1798). He was a disciple of Hariramdasji who had founded the Sinthal branch; he had established this new branch at the command of Hariramdasji. Dayaludas, Parshuram, Pithodas, Purandas, etc. are poets in this tradition.

All the four Ramsnehi sects have faith in the Concrete form of Divinity.

15. Alakhiya sect: This sect was founded by Lalgiri (19th century, earlier half). Bikaner was its principal seat. There is a mention in his compositions of the pursuit of yoga, worship of the Formless, etc. Gyangiriji was a poet in this tradition, and one finds a mention of his composition Alakh stuti prakash.

16. Aai sect: This was founded by Jijidevi, also known as 'Aaiji', in 1500. Its principal seat is Bilada. Persons belonging to the Sirvi community have a special faith in Aaiji. Leading poets in this tradition are Bhawani-das Vyas, Tarachand Vyas, etc. It is a 'shakta' cult, in which there is sufficient admixture of the Vaishnava ideology also.

Amongst the poets not belonging to a particular sect, a few can be mentioned. About 25 poems and some 'sakhis' written by Pipaji (1383-1453) are available. His language is mainly Braj mixed with Rajasthani. In the songs, there are sentiments in the nature of devotional poetry and mention is made about remembering God. Of Kazi Mahmud (15th century) about 35 poems are available, the language of which is Khadi Boli, with a mixture of Rajasthani. Its speciality is sweetness of emotion, linguistic expression and selection of words with appropriate commentary. The name of Miranbai (1498-1547) is familiar to the literary world. Her lyrics have achieved great fame. The problem still remains of the authenticity of her life history and her lyrics. About 2000 lyrics are available under her name, but not all of them were composed by her. Out of these, about 300 lyrics could have been hers. The speciality of these lyrics lies in the concentration of the highest order, depth of love and burning desire for union with God. The poetry of Miran is a poetry of self-surrender. In the lyrics, there is a depiction of emotions in the nature of devotion to the Concrete, devotion to the Formless and thoughts oriented towards Yoga. According to tradition, she has been regarded as a poetess of Krishna, whom she worshipped and adored. Other famous saints are Sant Mavji (1714-1744), Gauribai (1758-1808), Darvesh (approximately 1753-1833), etc.

Folk literature: The folk literature of Rajasthan is exceedingly rich and vast, and exists in so many forms. It can be classified thus: 1. Folk-songs, 2. Folk-sagas, 3. Folk-stories, 4. Folk-plays and 5. Folk-sayings, in which may be included idiomatic usages, proverbs, etc.

The world of folk-songs is one of considerable variety and has a distinctive character. From numerous ancient compositions, one gets an idea of the ancient character of many of the folk-songs also. Mohanlal Dalichand Desai has, in his book Jain Gujar poets (Part 3), given the first line of about 2,500 folk-songs on the rhythmic pattern of which various Jain poets have composed their verses. In the religious songs that are current amongst the common people, those concerned with the worship of the Concrete are known as 'Harjas' or 'Bhajan' and the compositions relating to the worship of the formless are known as 'Sabad'. Folk-sagas also present a variety. They are heroic (Pabuji ra pavada), 'Tejoji', 'Galaleng', 'Chhavli' connected with Dundji Jawaharji, romantic (Bagdavat, Nihalde Stltan), epic and historical (Narsiji ro mahro), poems dealing with love (Dhola-maru, Jalal-Bubna), poems expressing disgust with life (Gopichand Bharthari), etc.

Amongst the rural folk, folk-sagas of numerous variety are current and attempts have also been made to compile them. Folk-plays comprise 'khyal', 'swang', 'lila', etc. Their styles also differ from region to region. This lore is fast vanishing in the modern times. The same is the plight of the folk-sayings, even though attempts have been made to compile them also.

LITERATURE-RAJASTHANI

Modern period (from 1850): Poetry

This period brought a great change in the ideas, consciousness, criteria and values of the people as a result of the contact with English, the western influence, various movements for reform in the 19th century, new system of education, the spread of scientific achievements such as railways and telegraphs, and intensive intermingling. Contemporary poetry reflects this ideological change. As regards the poetry of the modern period, its main note is the spirit of patriotism and the liberation of mankind. The background to this is presented by the compositions of Bankidas. This ideological change is proclaimed in the compositions relating to Dungaji-Jawaharji and the Thakurs and the heroes who took part in subsequent revolutionary movements.

(a) The first phase: 1850 to 1947-1950

Suryamalla Mishran (1815-1868) is regarded as the last great scholar and poet amongst the charans of the modern period. Sankardan Samaur (1824-1878) can, from several points of view, be called the first great poet of this period. His poems give a powerful, vigorous depiction of the English rule, the corruption prevalent in that rule, its injustice and exploitation, the inactivity of the rulers of the princely states, the selfishness and fraudulent policies of the English, etc. Considerable poetic output of a traditional character also took place in this period. In numerous such compositions, one also comes across new ideas born of the contemporary situation and also new sentiments so born. Here mention may be made of the names of some of the writers of this category:-

Ramnath Kaviya (1801-1879), Svarupdas (1801-1863), Rav Bakhtavar (1813-1894), Samanbai (1825-1885), Kaviya Chimanji (1833-1887), Gumansinha (1840-1914), Barhat Shivbux Palhavat (1844-1899), Umandan Lalas (1851-1903), Maharaj Chatursinha (1879-1929), Mohansinha Mahiyariya (b.1861), Hinglajdan Kaviya (1861-1948), Kesarisinha Barhat (1871-1941), Udayraj Ajjal (1885-1967), Nathusinha Mahiyariya (1891-1973), Raval Narendra Sinha (1893-1967), Kavirav Mohansinha (1899-1964), Acharya Tulsi (b. 1914), etc.

(b) Second phase: from 1947-1950 to date:

Of the persons, who, in some way or the other, fought for the independence of the nation, several sang songs of social and political awakening composed by them. The poems of Manikyalal Varma, Hiralal Shastri, Jayanarayan Vyas, Sumanesh Joshi, Ganeshilal Vyas 'Ustad', Bhariavallal 'Kala Badal', etc. belong to this category. They are mainly the propagators of certain ideas. Of these, 'Ustad' has, in the course of time, written compositions of so many varieties. His compositions deserve a place of importance from the point of view of the theme, the technique of expression and the effect. Of the compositions written round about the second phase, the poems 'Vadali' by Chandrasinha, 'Sainani' by Mukal and 'Patalu' and 'Pithalu' by Kanhaiyalal Sethia deserve special mention for reasons of their great importance.

At present, poems are being written in so many varieties of narrative poetry and free verse. Amongst the principal narrative poems, the following are counted: Shrimantkumar's 'Ramdut', Vimlesh's 'Ramkatha', Nanuram Sanskarta's 'Gopichand', Lanka naghin, 'Sankal-Sandhan', Girdharisingha Padihar's 'Manakho', Satyaprakash Joshi's 'Radha', 'Bol Bharmali', Barhath Karnidan's 'Shakuntala', 'Rani Sati', Kanha Maharshi's 'Marumayank', Narayansingha Bhati's 'Mira', Banwarilal Mishra Suman's 'Delya ro divlo', Satyanarayan Aman's 'Sisdan', Suryashankar Parik's 'Dharati', 'Siddha Jasnathji ro sirloko', Raghurajsinha Hada's 'Hardaul', Mahavirprasad Joshi's 'Bindraban', Premji Prem's 'Suraj', Kalyan Gautam's 'Piv Bandhav ra bekha', etc. Manohar Sharma has been writing poetry for the last so many years. His famous works are Kunja, Gopigita, Maravashri, Panchhi, Bapu, Amarphal, Antarjami, Ghora ro Sangit, etc. Kanhaiyalal Sethia is a famous and much discussed poet in Rajasthan. Amongst his Rajasthani works are Ramniyara soratha, Minjhar, Kun kun, Liltans, Ghar kuchan, Ghar Majlan. His speciality lies in giving expression to serious thoughts and sentiments in a terse form in the choicest of words. Meghraj 'Mukul' has been writing poetry since 1944. His Rajasthani poetry is collected in Sainani ri jagi jot, and Kirryan. There have been so many milestones in his poetic journey. Not all that Mukulji has written has been published. Of the poems written by Narainsingha Bhati may be mentioned 'Durgadas', 'Paramvir', 'Sanjh', 'Olun', 'Kalap', 'Mira', etc. The peculiarity of his poetry consists in the depiction of nature, love and romance and noble sentiments. Nanuram Sanskarta has also been serving the cause of literature for a long time. Besides those mentioned already, his other poems are 'Kalayan', 'Das Deo', 'Chappay-Satsai', etc. The first two poems are about nature, as is also the poem 'Prakrati saikado', compiled in Chhapay satsai. To the same category belong Sumersinha Shekhavat's Meghmal, Udaivir Sharma's Damphi, Sunto and Kalyansingha Rajawat's Prabhati.

In the other poems in the category of narrative poetry and lyric poetry, mention may be made of Girdharisingh Padihar's Jagi jota, Banwarilal Mishra's Premdeep, Suraj Solanki's Juni bata, Rampali Bhati's Char gatha, Raghurajsingh Hada's Anbanchya Akhar and Pul kesula phul, Rameshvardayal Shrimali's Hadi Rani, Bavno, Himalo, Dayashankar Arya's Maru Minjhar, Sitaram Maharshi's Prit pid ri pal, Machhli man mharo, etc. Amongst the poets of humour and satire, particularly worth mentioning are the names of Vishvanath 'Vimlesh' and Satyanarayan 'Aman'. The poems written by Vimlesh entitled 'Chhedkhani', 'Kucharni' and 'Taskoli' have been published together in Navras mein ras hasya. His compositions relating to Emergency have been compiled also in Janta ke darbar, which attract particular attention. There are satirical compositions of the highest excellence in Aman's Chundthia. There are many other similar poets, such as Nagraj Sharma (Birkha binani, Tharo ke Iya han), Premji 'Prem' (Chamcho), Annaram Sudama (Pirol mein kutti byai), Buddhi Prakash Parik (Chuntkiya chavadka, Tirsa, Inder sun interview), etc.

The treasure house of Rajasthani literature has been enriched and is being enriched by works of various types, written by the poets already mentioned above and also by many other poets, like Ramsinha Solanki, Ranvirsinha Shaktawat, Dinesh Mishra, Gajanand Varma, Mohammad Sadiq, Kishore Kalpanakant, Onkar Parik, Durgadasinha Gaud, Harivallabh Hari, Girdharilal Malav, Gaurishankar Sharma, Manak Tiwari brothers, Ganapatichandra Bhandari, Ramdev Acharya, Chandidan Sandu, Rewatsinha Bhati, Narvar, Mukanddan Bhuval, Akshyasinha Ratnu, Ranutsinha Dewda, Devkarna Barhat, Indokali, Devkaransinha Rathor, Shaktidan Kaviya, Rashid Ahmad Pahadi, Dayashankar Arya, Chhaganlal Sharma, Gopallal Prajapati, Brajesh Chanchal, Amar, Depavat, Revatdan Charan, Lakshmansinha Rasvant, Trilok Goyal, Ravat Sarasvat, Bhim Pandya, Madan Gopal Sharma, Devkishan Rajpurohit, Bastimal Solanki, Savaisingha Ghamora, Chandra Kumar 'Sukumar', etc.

The wave of 'new poetry' has appeared in Rajasthani, but generally the poets have depicted mainly the changes that are taking place in rural life and its changing values, and the ideological and psychological changes that are taking place in personal life. They have also written poetical satires. Many of the depictions are exceedingly powerful. The poets of the new generation are Mani Madhukar, Tejsinha Jodha, Rameshwar Dayal Shrimali, Chandraprakash Deval, Premji Prem, Paras Arora, Harman Chauhan, Gordhansinha Shekhawat, Ramswarup Paresh, Mohan Alok, Krishna Gopal Sharma, Nand Bhardwaj, Bhanwarsinha Samor, etc. While the literary activity of some of these poets has slowed down, other new poets are coming up.

In comparison with the modern Indian languages of the Aryan stock, the prose of Rajasthani is not only rich and vast, but also has a tradition that has had an uninterrupted flow. The old prose literature can be divided into these heads: 1. Religious, 2. Historical, 3. Artistic, and 4. Miscellaneous.

The oldest specimens of religious prose are found in the works of Jain authors. These works are mostly in the nature of commentaries on works in Sanskrit and Prakrit languages. Original compositions have been rather few. The commentary entitled Aradhana, written in 1273, can be called the very first specimen of 'Maru-Gurjara' prose. Other specimens are found in Sangramsinha's Bal shiksha (1279), Navkar-vyakhyana (1301), Sarvaturtha namaskar stavan (1302), Atichar (1312), Tattva vichar prakaran, Dhanpal katha, etc. Besides the last-mentioned work, in all these works there is an abundant use of Jain technical words. Being comparatively small, these compositions have the significance more as links in the ancient tradition than as mature works of prose. It is in the 15th century that the mature form of prose emerged. Acharya Tarunprabh Suri's Shadavashyak balavabodh, written in 1354, can be regarded as the first mature work of prose in Rajasthani. It contains a number of narrative episodes. The best specimen of artistic prose is found in Manikyachandra Suri's Prithvichandra charitra, also known as Vagvilas (1421). It was named Vagvilas for the reason that it abounds in description. Of the various compositions falling in this category, some are really very famous, such as Khichi Gangev Nimbavat ro dopahro, Rajan Raut ro vat vaniv, etc. These are descriptive compositions of many varieties. Somsundar Suri (1373-1392), Meru Sundar (15th century, latter half), Parshvachandra Suri (1480-1555), etc. exhibit a fine picture of Rajasthani prose.

Prose pieces with rhyming structure are also found in Achaldas khichi ri vachanika, belonging to the initial period. In another composition of this tradition, called Vachanika Rathod Ratansinghji Maheshdasot ri, the prose portion is comparatively small, but it is well-structured and lucid. Apart from 'Vachanika', compositions entitled Davavait also furnish good specimens of artistic prose. In the language of Davavait, one finds, here and there, a mixture of Khadi Boli. Narasimhadas ki davavait by Bhat Matidas, Maharaja Ajitsinha's davavait by Dvarkadas Dadhvadia, Maharaja Ratansinha's davavait by Sindhayach Dayaldas, etc are famous 'Davavaits'.

Historical prose: Historical prose and 'Vat' literature are important constituents of Rajasthani prose. Historical prose is found in a number of forms, such as 'Khyat', 'Vat', 'Vanshaval', 'Pidhiyavali', 'Pattavali', 'Vigat', 'Hakigat', 'Hal', 'Yad', 'Vachanika', 'Davavait', etc. The last two have already been mentioned.

'Khyat' is another name of history. In 'Vat', there is a brief descriptive historical account of some individual, community, incident or episode. Between khyat and vat, the difference is related to size, khyat being the larger of the two, while vat is the smaller one. Vanshaval, pidhiyavali and gurvavali contain genealogical tables, also giving at the same time some particulars about individuals. Vigat is the name given to a descriptive account. Hakigat and hal contain a detailed description with full particulars of some episode or incident. Yad is the name given to a description of facts and incidents, written in the style of a memorandum. The writing of history received great encouragement during the time of Emperor Akbar's rule. Inspired by this, Rajput kings also made attempts to get khyats written about their respective kingdoms. The writers of these works were Government officers, Pancholis, etc. Khyats were written independently also. Of such writers, the most famous names are Muhnot Nainsi, Asiya Bankidas and Sindhayach Dayaldas. These khyats', important as they are from the historical point of view, have also great importance from the literary and cultural points of view.

Besides the above, a very important historical prose work is Dalpat-vilas (approximately 1608). In it we find several important accounts and descriptions in a flowing and attractive style. As an historical writing, this is an invaluable work. Being an account contemporary with its principal character, it has the stamp of credibility from the point of view of description of personalities and the narration of the events of the times.

From the point of view of artistic prose, 'vats' stand supreme. The vats furnish a multi-faceted description of medieval life. It is to be borne in mind that these stories were narrated and listened to orally. One can derive the maximum enjoyment from vats, only in the context of the totality of the situations that are to be recounted and listened to. It was the object of vats, besides entertainment, to provide material that would increase knowledge and impart practical wisdom and principles of moral conduct. Their canvas was also very vast and it was only for that reason that the vats used to give satisfaction to people of all strata and classes. Many of the vats used to be interspersed with 'Dohas' and 'Sorathas'. Vats used to circulate as oral traditions, but, as from the 17th century, they started being recorded in writing. From the point of view of size, one finds all types of vats, large as well as small. The field of Rajasthani vats is, indeed, very extensive.

Many of the present day writers have also got attracted towards the vat literature. These authors are presenting so many vats current amongst the people in the same style and structure, in a beautiful manner. Vijaydan Detha, Govind Agrawal, Lakshmikumari Chundavat, Mulchand 'Pranesh', etc. are writers who have edited and published numerous vats. 'Katha' also presents a powerful form of Rajasthani prose. Kathas ordinarily relate to religious and epic subjects. Even today, such kathas are widely current amongst women of faith.

Apart from the above, examples of Rajasthani prose are found in rock inscriptions, royal grants and title deeds, letters, etc. Their authenticity is also beyond question.

As a writer of modern Rajasthani prose, Shivchandra Bharatiya's name stands at the top. He presented powerful prose in the genre of the novel, short story, drama, etc. Novel: Bharatiya's novel Kanak-sundar (1903) can be called the first novel in Rajasthani. Next to it comes the name of Shri Narain Agarwal's novel Champa (1925). Both are idealist and reformist novels. Shrilal Nathmal Joshi's novel Abhe-patki (1956) mainly presents the problem of widow re-marriage and its solution. Along with this, there is an exposure of social malpractices and ostentation. Joshi's other novels are Ghora ro ghor (1968) and Ek binani do bin (1973). The first is concerned with the life story of Tessitori, the famous scholar of Rajasthani. The second has been written on the basis of Tennyson's descriptive long poem Enoch Arden. Joshi's language is simple and flowing. His novels are idealistic. The pacing of the events is also carried out in a manner befitting this objective.

Annaram 'Sudama's' three novels, Mehekti kaya, mulakti dharti (1966), Andhi aur astha (1974) and Meve ra rukh (1977) have been published. In the first, there is the story of Sugni (another name-Suthari Nani), who has been abandoned by her husband, while the second is a story of a rural brahmin family oppressed by the zemindar. The keynotes of both the novels are faith in life and the ability to put up patiently with miseries. Sudama has his own style, and the language is embellished with idiomatic usages and proverbs. Meve ra rukh is a very powerful novel. What it depicts appeals to the heart and is realistic. It depicts certain incidents that took place during the Emergency (particularly the forced sterilisation), the so-called leaders of those days both old and new, the moneylending traders of the village and the heads of monasteries in the village, and the poor villagers who, encircled by so many problems, amidst all these, somehow live their daily lives. It is the money lender himself who has been called, 'Meve ra rukh', Yadavendra Sharma 'Chandra' has written two novels, Hun gori kin piv ri (1970) and Jog sanjog (1973). The first has, as its focal point, a widow named Surajadi, belonging to a potter's family. In the second, there is the story of Ganesh, son of a middle class trader named Batuk, who, in the end, marries a Christian girl. The first is a very powerful novel. Chhatrapatisinha's Trishanku (1974) tells the story of Pavan, son of a zamindar's manager. It describes his romance, the influence exercised by revolutionary ideas on him and his eventual reformist approach and achievement. Satyen Joshi's Kanwal Puja is an historical novel. It depicts battles and incidents connected with the initial history of Jaisalmer. Sitaram Maharashi's Kun samajhai chanvari ra kaul (1976) and Laladi ek pherun gamagi present an effective delineation of marital maladjustments. Vijaydan Detha's Tidorav converts a folk tale into modern fiction. Ramnivas Sharma's Kal Bhairavi (1976) depicts the pursuit of tantric system in the background of rural life. Paras Arora's Khulati ganthan (1977) and B.L. Mali's Minakh ra khoj are other works of fiction. Many novels have, from time to time, been published in periodicals in a complete or incomplete form, such as Haraval, Olamo, Ladesar, etc.

The modern short story is a gift of the West. The short story in Rajasthani begins with Shiv Chandra Bharatiya's story 'Vishrant pravasi' (1904), published in a Hindi monthly Vaishyopakar. After this can be placed the stories by Gulabchand Nagori's 'Badi Tij', 'Beti ki bikri tatha bahu ki kharidi', published in Maheshvari in 1912, and the stories by Shiv Narayan Toshniwal, 'Vidya pram daivatam', 'Stri shikshan ko onamav' (1916). These are stories connected with various social problems. After 20 years, Murlidhar Vyas and Shrichand Rai of Bikaner commenced the writing of short stories. From 1950 stories of various types began to be written in large number. Numerous writers have written stories of reformist, idealist and social type and those aimed at a depiction of the ideological, historical, religious, satirical changes. Amongst the leading short story writers may be mentioned Muralidhar Vyas, Manohar Sharma, Nanuram Sanskarta, Nrisinha Rajpurohit, Annaram 'Sudama', Mulchand 'Pranesh', Rameshvardayal Shrimali, Kishore Kalpanakant, Premji Prem, Brajnaranayan Purohit, Nand Bharadwaj, Ram Niranjana Sharma, Brajmohan Javaliya, Saubhagyasinha Shekhawat, Lakshmikumari Chundawat, etc. Their stories have been published in various periodicals and anthologies.

Shivchandra Bharatiya's Kesar Vilas (1900) can be regarded as the first play in Rajasthani. The names of other playwrights are Bhagwati Prasad Daruka (Bal vivah natak, Vridhha vivah natak), Gulabchand Nagauri (Marwari, Mausar aur sagai janjal), Balkrishna Lahoti (Kanya bikri), Madan Mohan Siddha's Jaipur ki jyonar became very famous. This play, and the play Nai binani by Jamnaprasad Pachoriya, are comparatively successful plays from the point of view of the stage. In all these plays, one or the other social problem furnishes the basis. Besides these, the following plays have been written: Mahabharat ko shri ganesh and Maharana Pratap by Narayandas Agarwal, Pranvir Pratap by Girdharilal Shastri, Panna dhai by Agyachandra Bhandari, etc. These are historical plays. Yadavendra Sharma's play Tas ro ghar (1973) describes the numerous problems and anomalies of urban living.

In a Hindi monthly periodical entitled Vaishyopakar-ak, there were published in 1940, certain dialogues under the title Kanak sundar. In the same magazine there was published a dialogue entitled Bara bazaar (1905) consisting of two scenes. Amongst the initial one-act plays may be mentioned Shobhachand Jammad's Vridhha-vivah vidushan (1930), Shrinath Modi's Gaon sudhar ya Goma Jat (1931) and Suryakaran Parik's Bolavan ya pratigya purti. Several one-act plays of Govindlal Mathur were published in Satrangini (1955). These plays have taken up numerous problems of urban as well as rural life. Amongst the other playwrights the names of the following are worth mentioning: Narayan Dutt Shrimali (Chhiyan Tavado), Damodar Prasad (Top ro license), Shrimant Kumar Vyas (Chananaau), Jagdish Mathur (Pitaran ro agaman), Surendra Anchal (Ragat ek minakh ro), Satyanarayan, 'Aman' (Guvad ri jayodi), Agyachand Bhandari (Badle ri aag), etc. These writers have portrayed social life and its realities. Manohar Sharma (Nainsi ro sako), Lakshmikumari Chundawat (Samgharma maji), Ramdutt Sanskritya (Desh ro helo), Ganpatichandra Bhandari (Siha jay sav), Damodar Prasad (Kamran ri ankhadyan) have written one-act historical plays. Apart from the last-mentioned one-act play, all are concerned with Rajasthan or with the Rajput way of life. Satirical one-act plays have been written by Ravat Sarasvat (Sampadak ri maut), Baijnath Panwar (Aapno khas aadmi), Vinod Somani Hans (Rang mein bhang).

Pen-portraits, reminiscences, travelogues, etc.:

In this field, Muralidhar Vyas is a leading writer. A collection of his pen-portraits has been published under the name Jana jivata chitaran. It contains pen-portraits of professional persons. Shrilal Nathmal Joshi's Sabadka, which is also a collection of pen-portraits, has been the subject-matter of much discussion. It contains mostly humorous pen-portraits. Noteworthy contribution has been made in this genre by Shivraj Chhangani (Uniyara Olukhan), Kunjbehari Sharma (Batan hi chale), Braj Narayan Purohit (Atarva) and (Vakil sahab), etc. Apart from these pen-portraits and reminiscences which have been published in a book form, numerous pen-portraits are published in various periodicals.

Annaram Sudama's Dur disawar (1973) and Naval Kishore Kankar's Sail sapata (1980) are travelogues.

Prose-poems: In 1946, the well-known poet, Chandrasinha published a bunch of 9 prose-poems under the title Sip. The works of Kanhaiyalal Sethia and Govind Agrawal are noticeable and important in this genre. Sethia's Galgachiya and Agarwal's Nukti dana present specimens of the best prose poetry.

Amongst the writers of essays in the category of belles lettres, a name worth mentioning is that of Braj Lal Biyani. His 'Mogara Kali', 'Badi fajar ko divo', 'Marwadi boli' are essays furnishing the best specimens of this genre. Giriraj Bhanwar, Krishna Gopal Sharma, Manohar Sharma, Ravat Saraswat, etc. are also authors who have made commendable efforts in this direction.

Hi.M.

LITERATURE (Sanskrit). The earliest and the most glorious chapter not only in the history of Sanskrit literature, but in the history of world literature and culture, is the vast body of writing known as Veda (lit. 'Wisdom'). It is the most ancient record left by hoary sages holding a mirror to all human interests—literary, socio-political, religious, mythological, cultural and philosophical. Though it is tentative, the first composition called the Rigveda is very old and cannot be later than 2000 B.C. The collections themselves of this as well as of the other three Vedas, viz. Yajus (prose formulae), Saman (songs set to music) and Atharvan (magical spells and incantations) are considered by scholars to be not later than 1500 B.C. at the latest.

A student of literature will find in the Vedas several gem-like instances of pure poetry, where the creative energy finds a free and spontaneous expression. The hymns to Ushas, the goddess of the Dawn, and to Savitri, the Sun-god that animates birds and beasts alike into joyful activity, are but two examples. The simple joys and sorrows of the Aryans who lived in India on the banks of the seven rivers (in the North west), bubbling with a zest for life and adventure, are beautifully reflected in the Rigvedic hymns. They offer their oblations in the sacred fire invoking the blessings of gods like Agni, Indra and Varuna, and the hymns are primarily religious. Yet the homely similes and metaphors in their prayers reveal consummate poetic art. Their pastoral life, rich in cows and offspring, also had moments of exaltation and exhilaration. They were oppressed by fears of divine wrath and devilish dark forces at the same time. Their loves and hates too had their heart-warming and heart-burning aspects. Occasionally, we find them speculating on cosmological problems and attempting philosophical explanations. Their love of wine and women, sports like chariot-racing and gambling also inspire some lovely lines. Thus the Rigvedic poetry is one the most ancient records available today not only of the Vedic Indians but also of man on earth. Though steeped in religion, the Rigveda is not blind to profane joys of life.

Like all branches of learning in India, poetry too has its first beginnings in the Rigveda itself. Some of the dialogue (akhyana) hymns in the Rigveda might have provided the germs for the later pantomimes and plays in Sanskrit. These very hymns were for the most part re-set with prose formulae to constitute what is known as the Yajurveda to help the sacrificial priest. When they were further redacted and set to music, they came to be called the Samaveda or the Veda of musical songs. And several schools came into vogue specializing in three Vedas, since all these were assigned a due place in the performance of sacrifice, an institution which tended to become more and more cumbersome by adding details of ritual, each of which was sacrosanct. Yet the Yajurveda and the Samaveda have no literary value of their own.

Not so is the Atharvaveda which came to be ranked as a Veda only after some initial opposition, though it is chronologically as early as the Rigveda itself. The opposition of the orthodox camp was occasioned by the preponderance of witch-craft and black-magic in the hymns and spells of the Atharvaveda. While the other three Vedas contained adorations of exalted and virtuous divinities, the Atharvaveda made room for imprecations, love-charms and magic cures also which were popular in that ancient society. Nevertheless, we find in some of these hymns the higher reaches of philosophy on the one hand and the most charming adorations of the Mother-Earth on the other.

Apart from the vast body of Vedic hymns we have an equally large library of ritualistic prose known as Brahmana (c. 1000 B.C.) on the minutiae of sacrificial ritual. From the literary perspective, it is insipid and usually dismissed as 'theological twaddle'. But like oases in an arid desert, we do come across 'upakhyanas' or literary episodes such as that of Shunahshepa in the Aitareya-brahmana (associated with the Rigveda) and that of Pururavas and Urvashi in the Shatapatha-brahmana (coming under the Yajurveda). The stories are full of dramatic suspense and literary interest. Though they are dovetailed in these theological texts into the fabric of ritual, they can be reckoned as the earliest specimens of literary prose in Sanskrit.

This trend becomes more and more pronounced in the still later works of the Vedic age, viz. the Aranyakas (lit. 'forest-texts') and the Upanishads (lit. 'esoteric teachings') which mostly belong to the period 800-600 B.C. Some texts of the latter class, e.g. Katha and Mundaka are in verse. But others like the Brihadaranyaka contain philosophical dialogues reminiscent of Plato. Hence this Upanishad expounding Yajnavalkya's philosophy of Atman, as Deussen remarks, 'for richness and warmth of expression, surely stands alone in Indian literature, and perhaps in the literature of nations'. The verse-Upanishads also set the pattern for the later Bhagavadgita celebrated as the cream of the later epic, the Mahabharata. While the locale of the Rigveda is mostly the Saptasindhu region comprising a part of modern Afghanistan, Punjab, Haryana and North-western frontier, that of the other works is as wide as the whole of Northern India.

Chronologically the Vedic literature is followed by the epics and Puranas. The two premier epics in Sanskrit are the Ramayana of Valmiki and the Mahabharata of Vyasa. Unlike the sages of the Vedic hymns who are only called seers (rishis) of divinely revealed hymns, Valmiki and Vyasa are regarded by tradition as authors of the two epics respectively. Yet modern scholarship has succeeded in showing that these too are more or less eponymous and that they were no more than individual redactors of pre-existing popular ballads and folk-tales, in verse more refined than those of the Vedic hymns, though not as classical as those of succeeding kavya (or art-epic) poets. Though chronologically, the encyclopaedic Mahabharata in its final shape is undoubtedly posterior to the Ramayana, it is not impossible that its nucleus contains material much older than that of the sister-epic Ramayana. From the purely literary standpoint, however, the Ramayana is far more unified and artistic and the age-old tradition of regarding Valmiki as the 'adi-kavi' or father of Sanskrit poetry is thus justified. Out of its seven books (with 24000 verses in all), the first and last are regarded by modern scholars as later additions but their hypothesis is hardly convincing whereas the voluminous Mahabharata (with more than a lac of verses) seems to have undergone a series of revisions and additions up to the 2nd cent A.D. if not earlier, along with its additions. The Rama-story is found in an abridged form in the present Mahabharata. Yet the latter is more archaic than the former and belongs to the region of Kuru-Panchala, the heartland of North India; whereas the former is more refined in style and replete with poetic conventions besides having its locale in the more eastern region of Kosala-Magadha. The critical editions of these two major epics have revealed how the two epics enjoyed unbroken popularity in the whole of India down the centuries and also in Greater India, i.e. Thailand, Indonesia, Cambodia, etc., since there are numerous recensions and versions well preserved in hundreds of manuscripts throughout the length and breadth of India. Almost every classical Sanskrit poet or playwright pays his homage to these two author-sages Vyasa and Valmiki as the path-makers of the poetic tradition. Yet it should be noted that only the Ramayana is out-and-out a poem, whereas the Mahabharata is not only a poem, but a historical-political narrative, a theological law-book, a textbook of ethics, a treatise on philosophy, etc. all in one. Both these epics have exercised deep influence on the life and thought of the Indians down the centuries; they have also served as source-books for later authors of plays, poems and other literary genres.

Though the didactic element is evident throughout, Valmiki's poetry is steeped in the 'rasas' of tender pathos (karuna) and heroism (vira) which overwhelm the reader with their afflatus. Valmiki is equally at home in the depiction of the whole gamut of emotions and feelings that surge in a human heart; and he uses the supernatural element very sparingly. His communion with nature in all her moods is indeed masterly. The interest of the poem is thus a result of a deft handling of all the elements, viz. narrative, characters and life-message. To crown it all, Valmiki has perfected a style at once limpid and sprightly and his best effects are so deftly achieved that they appear uncontrived. We have in him an abundance of artful turns of expression, which became cliches in the hands of later poets.

But we move to a different world altogether when we enter the maze of the Mahabharata. The Pandava heroes and their half-brothers, viz. the Kauravas, are all victims of ambition and avarice, with varying degrees of dharma and adharma in their thought and action. Intrigue, rivalry and divine strength drive them to an internecine battle which rages furiously until everyone is slain or laid low. Not even Krishna, the avatara, can change this pre-ordained course of events. The main story is interspersed with innumerable lengthy disquisitions on law, ethical values, philosophy, socio-political norms, myths and legends and so forth which try the reader's patience. But students of literature will find that the epic has within itself a number of smaller epics, each with a unified interest of its own. Thus, the episodes on Nala and Damayanti, Savitri and Satyavan, etc., may be deemed as epic poems in their own right. Poetic graces are but few; and the ruling sentiment is vague. But as a source-book, for later writers, it is indeed unique. Indeed, the Mahabharata should be looked upon as a thesaurus of everything Indians valued and created in the realm of thought in the course of several centuries.

Between the spontaneous abundance of the epics and the cultivated artistry of classical kavya in Sanskrit, we see a transition but dimly, since the bulk of pre-Kalidasian literature is lost. The detailed rules of versification, the large variety of metres experimented with and even the enchanting names of these found in the early authors of metrics like Pingala (c. A.D. 200) point to the many-sided activity of court-poets in lyrical as well as dramatic forms. Bharata's rules of dramaturgy, music and dance in his Natyashastra confirm this. Stray references to individual works in embellished prose and lyrical verse are found in Patanjali (2nd cent. B.C). The detailed account of a 'nagaraka' (man-about-town) furnished by Vatsyayana, a celebrated author on erotics (c. A.D. 200) presents a society given to sensual pleasures and cultivating as many as sixty-four arts (kalas). Courtesans provided saloons where these could flourish. In this new culture, many a sophistication and fashion arose heralding a new movement in poetry. Several deviant ways of expression, especially for eulogising kings and describing the charms of woman were devised by ingenious poets. 'Alankaras' or figures of speech were defined and elaborated in books on rhetoric, the earliest of which, again, are lost. Yet, how the simple Sanskrit of the epics had been chiselled into a scintillating, conventional and ornate medium brimming with alliteration, chime, hyperbole, paradox and so forth is illustrated by a few epigraphs on the one hand and by the works of the dramatist Bhasa on the other. This spans the period of about six centuries, three before and three after the Christian era.

These represent the genre of kavya called 'prashasti' or 'eulogy' which is most popular in Sanskrit. Rudradaman's Junagadh Inscription (A.D. 150) has already the profusion of long compounds and alliterative effects in prose and actually it names some literary qualities like 'sweetness', 'strikingness' and 'brilliance'. Samudragupta's Allahabad Pillar Inscription (A.D. 350) describes at length the all-India conquests of king Samudragupta in ornate prose and verse. The king is compared to epic heroes and styled 'kaviraja' or 'emperor among poets' whom the other poets tried to emulate. The highly conventional and artificial kavya style was thus an established fact long before Kalidasa, the master-poet in Sanskrit.

The same conclusion is strengthened by the two art-epics which have come down to us from the pen of the Buddhist poet Ashvaghosha, the mentor of Kanishka (2nd cent. A.D.) They are: the Buddhacharita describing the life of the Buddha in 28 cantos (only 13 are extant though) with all the conventional imagery and descriptions like those of the city, the harem, the sporting women, sunrise and so forth, yet the poet succeeds in underscoring the wave of renunciation that overwhelms the prince Siddhartha and his sense of welt-schemerz. His other mahakavya or ornate epic is the Saundarananda depicting the sensuous attachment of Nanda to his charming wife Sundari and his ultimate disenchantment, thanks to the labours of his half-brother, the Buddha. The didactic and religious elements in the poems are unmistakable. Yet they are noteworthy as embodying full-blooded developments of ornate Sanskrit kavya striking out a new path, distinct from that of popular ballad-poetry of the epics, and choosing the line of ascetic-poetry, already illustrated in the Mahabharata.

Similarly, we know from Patanjali's Mahabhashya that there were Sanskrit romantic tales of heroines in love like Bhaimarathi, Vasavadatta and Sumanottara.

Kalidasa, by universal judgement of critics, ancient and modern, represents the high water-mark of Sanskrit poetry and drama. He is expressly alluded to by Ravikirti in an epigraph (A.D. 637) and imitated by Vatsabhathi in another epigraph (A.D. 472). The poems so imitated by him are the two lyrics of Kalidasa, viz. the Ritusamhara (The cycle of seasons) and the Meghaduta (The Cloud-Messenger). According to some scholars, these facts and the wide-spread tradition that Kalidasa was a poet-laureate of king Vikramaditya point to Chandragupta II (A.D. 380-413) as the patron of this celebrated poet, who had also Ujjain as one of his sub-capitals and for which city Kalidasa exhibits special fondness.

The age of Kalidasa and his indebtedness to Ashvaghosha are, however, still an unresolved problem. Quite a few eminent Indian scholars are inclined to place him in the latter part of the Shunga period (2nd cent. B.C.) on the basis of the strong evidence to be found in the Malavikagnimitra. They also consider the so-called borrowing by Kalidasa from Ashvaghosha to be, in fact, the other way round.

The Ritusamhara is a short lyrical collection, each of the six Indian seasons being described in a separate canto, from the eyes of a lover addressing his new-wed. The poet's communion with nature in its most delicate aspects is complete and his song as sweet as it is simple.

The poet's lyrical genius takes wings in the next poem Meghaduta which is a gem in Sanskrit lyrical poetry.

The first mahakavya or ornate epic from Kalidasa is the Raghuvamsa in nineteen cantos, recounting the glories of the solar race of kings according to the legendary lore.

Kalidasa's second mahakavya is the Kumarasambhava in eight cantos which describes the divine love of Parvati and Shiva, designed to beget a son capable of destroying Taraka, the redoubtable demon who had defeated all gods including Indra, Varuna and Surya.

Though widely read in all the branches of learning of his time, Kalidasa wears the mantle of his learning lightly, and never allows his scholarship to interfere with poetic judgement. He imbibes the values of epic religion and gives them a universality unknown before or even after. He plumbs the depths of the most profound and subtle emotions and shows his acute discernment in the choice of metres as well as expressions to depict them in their finest shades. He is a high-priest of Nature and combines ease with grace and scores his success effortlessly. He remains for all time the unapproached Everest of Sanskrit poetry. The greatest epic poets after Kalidasa are Bharavi, Magha and Shriharsha, the trilogy of their epics, viz. Kiratarjuna.

Shishupalavadha and Naishdhacharita, respectively, is called 'Brihatrari'.

In the medieval period, religious sects began utilizing this genre for the glorification of their ideologies or pontiffs. Among the former, Vedantadeshika's Yadvabhyudaya (c.1350) is popular since it sings the glory of Lord Krishna from his boyhood up to his demise. The Shankara-digvijaya of Madhava (13th cent.) during the same period, is a biography of the great Acharya of Advaita, replete with several miracles, so dear to popular taste. The Sumadhva-vijaya of Naryana, also of the same period, portrays in similar terms the supernatural glory of Madhvacharya. The Rukminisa-vijaya of Vadiraja (16th cent) is modelled after Magha's poems and introduces covertly the philosophical tenets of the Madhva school of Vaisnavism. Shivalilarnava of Nilakantha Dikshita (17th cent) depicts the 64 lilas or sports of Shiva and is a highly readable work combining dignity of diction and fervent devotion. Another equally interesting poem of his is Gangavatarana, describing the legend of the descent of Ganga to earth from heaven, in a memorable manner. Narayana Bhattatiri's Naryanaiya is a recast of the Bhagavatapurana, brimming with devotional fervour. All these long poems hail from South India, indicating how the kavya tradition was preserved well there, when the North was reeling under the impact of Muslim invasions.

A noteworthy improvisation of mahakavya for historical chronicle saw the rise of historical kavya of 'charita'. Padmagupta's Navasahasankacharita (c.1000) eulogises king Munja of Dhara. Bilhana's Vikramankadevacharita glorifies king Vikramaditya VI (1076-1127) of Kalyana in Karnataka as a hero of many battles. Kalhana (11th cent), the Kashmirian poet, is the greatest in this genre, since his Rajatarangini covers the history of Kashmir from earliest times down to A.D. 1000 and contains as many as 7826 verses. Hemachandra, of the same period, wrote a eulogy of the Gujarat king Kumarapala, under the name Kumarapalacharita. None of these are history in the modern sense; they contain a lot of legendary material and descriptions.

A curious offshoot of the artificial pedantry which the later-day decadents valued is 'chitra-kavya' or 'pictorial verse' which abounds in verbal acrostics. Verses which read alike both forwards and backwards, which read alike in Sanskrit and Prakrit, and which can be written in geometrical patterns all come under this category. They revel in puns and rhymes and contain at times just one, two or three consonants recurring in a whole verse. The Kichakavadha of Nitivarman (c. 850 A.D.), the Nalodaya ascribed to Kalidasa (date and authorship uncertain), the Rakshasa-kavya, attributed to Vararuchi and Kalidasa, Vidagdhamukhamandana of Dharmadasa (15th cent) are some examples. Some poets like Dhananjaya (c.900 A.D.) and Kaviraja (c.1300) wrote 'divisandhana-kavyas' or poems which telescope the stories of both the premier epics into a single poem by the break-up of words in different ways.

Secular drama too had already progressed, shaking off the shackles of sacrificial religion in which it might have first arisen, to judge from Bhasa's plays (c. A.D. 200) since quite a few of them are based on folk-tales though the majority depict epic themes. His magnum opus is the Svapnavasavadatta, a play based on the story of king Udayana's love for Vasavadatta, celebrated in Gunadhya's Brihatkatha. The verses in these plays are often highly lyrical.

The technical name for drama is 'Rupaka', Nataka being one of its ten varieties. Dhananjaya accordingly named his work on dramaturgy as Dasarupaka. The ten Rupakas are: 1. Nataka, 2. Prakarana, 3. Dima, 4. Prahāsana, 5. Samavakara, 6. Vyayoga, 7. Ihamriga, 8. Vithi, 9. Utsristanka and 10. Bhana. There are eighteen 'uparupakas' also, prominent among them being Natika, Trotaka, etc., being minor plays. Among the division of kavya, Sanskrit drama is called 'drishya kavya' also as it is seen by the audience and is exhibited on the stage before them. Brahma, the mythical god, is believed to be the creator of first Indian drama, called Samudra-manthana which was enacted in heaven on the occasion of the festival, 'Indra dhvaja'. To Sarasvati also is ascribed a drama named Lakshmi-svayamvara.

The first evidence of the existence of dramas may be found in Buddhist Sanskrit literature where it is mentioned that the legends of gods and of the Buddha are utilised in the composition of Sanskrit drama frequently. In popular religious feasts and holy places dramas with religious content were played and were popular with the audience. The Avadana-shataka and the Lalita-vistara, the two Buddhist texts point to dramatic performances related to the life of the Buddha.

With Bhasa who is said to have composed thirteen dramas, prominent among them being his Svapna-Vasavadatta or Svapna nataka, we enter into a definitive period of Sanskrit drama. Balacharita, Duta-Ghatotkacha, Dutavakya, Karnabhara, Puncharatra, Urubhanga, Madhyama-vyayoga are based on the Mahabharata; Pratima and Abhisheka on the Ramayana; Avimarka and Charudatta on fiction, while Svapana and Pratijnayaugandharayana are centred on king Udayana's romances. Bhasa's plays are written in smooth and perspicuous Sanskrit and are most stage-worthy in comparison with other Sanskrit plays. They are not rigid and traditional as they seem to violate the dramatic norms and traditions set by the Natyashastra in introducing death and violent action on the stage. Bhasa is superb in characterisation. Later Sanskrit dramatists like Shudraka and Harsha are influenced by him and borrow themes from his plays. He is most respectfully quoted by later Sanskrit writers like Kalidasa, Rajshekhara, Banabhatta, etc.

Kalidasa, apart from being a poet par excellence, is also a dramatist of high rank. He is credited with the composition of three Sanskrit dramas—Malavikagnimitra, Vikramorvasi and Abhijnana-Shakuntala. In the judgement of many, Shakuntala is held as his greatest work, in which there is a unique alliance of his poetic and dramatic gifts. Love in its different aspects and situations is the dominant theme of his plays which is beautifully portrayed by his creative imagination.

Four Bhanas, collected in an ancient anthology called Chaturbhani, are ascribed to Vararuchi, Ishvaradatta, Shyhamilaka and Shudraka and are said to be composed at the beginning of the Christian era. But Shudraka is more known by his play, the Mrichchhakatika (Little clay cart) in which love between a common citizen Charudatta and a courtesan Vasantasena is admirably portrayed. The play is a Prakarna variety of Rupaka and differs from the usual type of dramas on account of the use of different local dialects (Prakrits), simplicity of expression and vivid characterisation. The play is so real to life that it unfolds a world like ours where thieves, gamblers, rogues, housemaids live and move and, thus it has a great appeal to modern taste. The play is mostly appreciated due to its dramatic qualities and is fully worthy of stage performance. To Shudraka also are ascribed two other plays—the Vina-Vasavadatta and the Padmaprabhritaka. Chandragomin, a Buddhist philosopher and grammarian, is also credited with the composition of a play, Lokananda. A.K. Warder observes that it was perhaps known in Japan in the 8th century A.D. and was one of the verse dramas selected for translation into Tibetan.

To Harsha or Harsavardhana are attributed three plays—the Ratnavali, the Priyadarshika and the Nagananda. The Ratnavali, in four acts, reflects the court and harem life of the age and it is a Natika in four acts. The Priyadarshika also is a Natika in four acts and forms a sequel to the Ratnavali. The Nagananda in four acts projects the sentiment of universal love and is tinged with Buddhist doctrine of self-sacrifice. Dinnaga is known by his play the Kundamala in six acts where the later history of Rama after coronation is described. He is a fore-runner of Bhavabhuti, who wrote Uttararamacharita, highlighting the pathetic element (karunarasa) by describing the banishment of Sita and ardent love of Rama for her. His other play based on the earlier part of the life of Rama is the Mahaviracharita. Another play Malti-Madhava, a Prakarana, is in ten acts depicting love between Malati and Madhava. The plays of Bhavabhuti are different from other plays due to the absence of the character of the jester (Vidushaka) over-emphasis on pathetic element, descriptive and emotional passages and long prose passages with lengthy compounds.

Vishakhadatta's Mudra-Rakshasa is another noteworthy play which deviates from the romantic trend common in other dramas where emotions are described in poems. It is an interesting play dramatising political rivalry between two prudent ministers and is based on the historical background of the Maurya king Chandragupta and his minister Chanakya. Apart from historical tinge, the play is forceful and realistic in characterisation. The play assumes importance as it is frequently referred to in the works on poetics and dramaturgy. The Venisamhara by Bhatta Narayana is based on the Mahabharata wherein Bhimasena takes revenge on Duhshasana and fulfils his vow by binding the loosened plaits of hair of Droupadi with the blood of the former. On the story of Rama, Murai composed a play Anargha-Raghava in seven acts. Rajashekhara, the reputed critic, is credited with the composition of three Sanskrit plays, viz. the Balaramayana, the Bhalabharata and the Viddhashalabhanjika and another one Karpuramanjari in Prakrita, a variety of play called Sattaka. The Mahanataka, better known as Hanumannataka, is traditionally regarded as the work of the Monkey god, Hanuman himself. It is more a poem than a play and there are verses of other authors interpolated in it. Keshavamishra's Chandakaushika is a play in five acts based on the legendary character of King Harishchandra and his adherence to the vow of truthfulness. Other plays to be noticed are Vigharajadeva's Harakeli, Jayadeva's Prasanna-Raghava, Prahlada's Partha-parakrama, Madana's Parijatamanjari, Ravivarman's Pradyumnabhudaya, Rudradeva's Usharagodaya, Bhaskara's Unamattaraghava, and Narasimha's Kadambari-kalyana. Besides, there have been playwrights like Balakavi Bhudeva Shukla, Kumara Tatacharya, Madhusudana Saraswati, etc. who have enriched Sanskrit drama till we descend to the 20th century when dramas on various topics like biography, legends, religion, social evils, politics, allegory, humour, etc. were composed. Among the modern playwrights are J.B. Choudhary who composed biographical plays like Mahaprabhu-Haridasa, Bharata-hrdyaravinda, Bhaskarodayam, etc. Reputed critic late V. Raghavan has contributed historical plays like Anarakali. Some of modern plays are Kalidasacharita by S.B. Velankar, Vangiyapratapa and Mevarapratapa by Haridasa Siddhantavagisha, Bharatavijayanataka by Mathura Prasad Dikshit, Chatrapati-samrajya by Mulshanker Maneklal Yajnika, Shringaranaradiya by Y. Mahalinga Sashtri, Haidarabadavijaya by Nirpaje Bhimabhatta, etc. Sanskrit is not restricted to old stereotyped themes, but the other hand it can be adapted to depict current problems like any living Indian language. In Sanskrit even one-act plays are also being composed and songs are also introduced. Sanskrit plays have their stage and they are adapted for Radio and T.V. also, where they are successfully enacted and presented.

The study of poetry in English is named poetics. In Sanskrit the most common name for the subject of literary criticism is 'Alamkara shastra' or 'Sahitya shastra'. 'Kavyalakshana' and 'Kriya-kalpa' are also two other names for the science of poetry which were in vogue before 'Alamkara' and 'Sahitya' came into popular usage. Consequently most of the works on Sanskrit poetics are named after either Alamkara or Sahitya, e.g. Kavyalank- ara of Bhamaha, Udbhata, Rudrata, Ruyyaka, etc. and Sahitya-darpana by Vishvanatha.

Seeds of literary criticism like those of other Indian sciences were embedded in Vedic literature from where they developed in the full-fledged systems of Alamkara, 'Rasa', 'Dhvani', etc. The Nighantu (III. 13) gives a list of particles of comparison relating to the Vedic 'Upama'. Yaska in the Nirukta mentions different varieties of Upama. Panini also uses technical terms of Sanskrit poetics like 'upamana', 'upamita', 'samanya', etc. which are elaborately treated by later rhetoricians. The theoretical background of the science of poetry is formed on the philosophical speculations of linguistics and systems of poetics like Dhvani of Anandavardhana owe their allegiance to the concept of 'sphota' of the grammarians like Bhartrihari, etc. The name Sahitya is evidently born out of grammar which came to denote poetry itself. Bhamaha and Vamana, the earlier formulators of poetic theory, apart from analysing poetic beauty in the form of figures of speech and style are equally concerned with the question of grammatical correctness to which they devote chapters of their works. Thus apart from the Vedic literature, the proverbial source of all sciences, the science of language, is the appropriate breeding ground from where Sanskrit poetics sprouted and later flourished independently. Sanskrit poetics deals with various subjects like the definition of poetry, the purpose and equipment of poetry, etc. While defending poetry it deals with word and sense and the inherent powers with which word conveys different senses—primary (vachya), secondary (lakshya), and suggested (vyangya) senses. It also deals with the blemishes, excellences and embellishments of poetry. Some of the works on Sanskrit poetics are exhaustive and take up all subjects concerned with poetry. Some confine themselves to limited topics like the powers of word (shabdavrittis), the aesthetic experience (Rasa) or embellishment (Alamkara) only. Thus, we have works like the Abhidhavarittimatrika, the Vrittivarttika, the Shabdavyapara-vichara dealing exclusively with the potency of word, works like the Alamkara-sara-samgraha, the Alamkarasarvasva, the Kuvalayanavada, the Chitra-mimansha, etc. dealing with embellishments, and works like the Rasa-pradipa, the Rasamanjari, etc. focussing on Rasa only.

Sanskrit poetics is branched into six main schools or systems: the Rasa, the Alamkara, the Riti, the Dhvani, the Vakrokti and the Auchitya. Rasa school is the most ancient. Rasa was discussed even before Bharata, as is evident from the verses on Rasa quoted by him in his Natyashastra. It was composed keeping in mind dramatic composition and is a prominent work on dramaturgy. As Rasa (aesthetic relish) forms the integral part of dramatic representation it is taken up for full discussion by Bharata. His commentator, the great Abhinavagupta of the 11th century having a versatile genius, elaborated Bharata's views on the theory of Rasa in his commentary, Abhinava- bharati and controverted the views of other scholars like Bhatta Lollata, Shankuka, Bhatta Nayaka, etc.

Alamkara School: Poetry requires not only fact and feeling but a beautiful form also. All poetic expression requires an unusual way of expression which lends it charm and is termed Alamkara. In Sanskrit poetics the world Alamkara is taken in its widest sense and in its narrow sense also. Alamkara is the beautiful in poetry and covers in its wide net every principle of poetry—Guna, Riti, Dhvani, etc.—which enhances its charm. Vamana and Bhoja use the term Alamkara in wider connotation. Later on the Alamkara in its narrow sense denoted simply figures of speech in which it is now generally stereotyped. Bharata speaks of four Alamkaras in his Natyashastra. He enumerated thirty-six 'Lakshanas' also which gradually faded. Some of them were amalgamated into Alamkaras. Later on Bhamaha was to be the foremost upholder of Alamkaras in poetry and was followed by Udbhata, Pratiharenduraja, Appayya Dikshita, etc. Alamkaras were a popular subject with later rhetoricians. Mammata and Vishvanatha treated them extensively in their works. Important works on the Alamkaras are as follows: The Kavyalamkara of Bhamaha, the Kavyalamkarasara-samgraha of Udbhata, the Alamkarasarvasva of Ruyyaka, the Chandraloka of Jaideva, the Kuvalayananda and the Chitra-mimamsa of Appayya Dikshita.

Riti School: Riti is a literary manner and in its technical sense means the outward formal beauty in poetry generated through a harmonious combination of literary excellences, called 'Gunas' which are ten in number. It is, therefore, not equivalent of English 'style'. In English, 'style' is the expression of poetic individuality. But Riti in Sanskrit is a conglomeration of a certain set of literary excellences called Gunas. Ritis in Sanskrit are two or three or four or six, prominent among them being 'Vaidarbhi', 'Gaudi' and 'Panchali' and these are related to certain kinds of subjects or themes.

Dhvani School: With Dhvani ushers in a new school of Sanskrit poetics wherein suggested sense (vyangya artha), the sense oblique or hinted rather than directly conveyed (vachya artha) forms the essence of poetry and lends it a shine which turns the poetic work superb and charming. Anandavardhana asserts that the beauty of poetry does not lie in the meaning of words which we comprehend in the first instance but in the flash that follows. The lustre of suggested expression, 'Dhvani', is like that of the glamour of a lovely damsel who fascinates by her grace and charm which is over and above her apparent limbs. The greatness of Dhvani theory lies in assimilating in its fold the Rasa theory hitherto treated in dramaturgical works only and establishing that Rasa is always suggested and never expressed. Thus Anandavardhana brings Rasa into his Rasa-Dhvani besides classifying Dhvani into 'Vastu' (mere fact) and Alamkara (imaginative thing, assuming the form of some figure of speech). By reconciling other systems like Alamkara, Riti, etc. with his doctrine of Dhvani, Anandavardhana enlarges the scope of his system and turns it into an all-comprehensive and all-pervading system of Sanskrit poetics to be followed and accepted mostly by later poets like Abhinavagupta, Mammata, Vishvanatha, etc.

Vakrokti school: Vakrokti is a striking mode of speech which is different from the plain and ordinary mode of speech. The thrust of the Vakrokti doctrine is that when the poetic expression deviates from ordinary expression, it becomes heightened and striking. The poetry appeals due to its striking characteristics and that is achieved through Vakrokti, an out of way expression. Hence Bhamaha dismisses 'Jati', ordinary expression like the sun is setting etc. from the realm of poetry and advocates strikingness, the very essence of all figures of speech or embellishments. He sows the seeds of Vakrokti theory which was developed fully in the Vakrokti-jivita of Kuntaka.

Auchitya school: 'Auchitya' means appropriateness and is not an independent system, rather it is related to all systems of Sanskrit poetics determining propriety, the appropriate use of figures, style, suggestion, sentiments, etc. in poetry. When Bharata discusses the correct way of speaking, and dressing in dramatic presentation, he hints at Auchitya. The law of propriety is frequently mentioned in all Sanskrit literature. Impropropriety can only produce blemishes. Hence it is to be avoided. Kshemendra in his Auchitya-vichara-charcha elaborates this doctrine of appropriateness into a system of Auchitya (propriety and adaptation). Auchitya, thus, means proper placing of things in a proper manner and avoiding of things which are unsuitable in the artistic expression. From Bharata to Anandavardhana Auchitya is discussed which is turned into a system by Kshemendra.

LITERATURE (Sindhi). Though a stateless language, Sindhi is one of the 15 languages specified in the Eighth Schedule of the Indian Constitution. It is one of the major languages of the Indo-Pak-Bangladesh sub-continent and its ancestry goes back to the earliest so-far traces of Indian civilization of the Mo'an-Jo-Daro times.

A language of the north-western branch of Indo-Aryan family, Sindhi passed through the old stages of Primary Prakrits, Vedic-Sanskrit, Sanskrit, the middle stage of Pali, other Prakrits and Apabhramshas, and reached the new stage of a New Indo-Aryan language around 1000. Sindhi is, as Ernest Trumpp said a century ago, a Sanskritical language and is more akin to Sanskrit and Prakrits than to any of the North Indian languages.

The latest researches in the field support the view that in it are still present many an archaic linguistic features which are not found in the other New Indo-Aryan languages. In this respect it is nearer to the Middle Indo-Aryan Prakrit or the Old Primary Prakrit on which it is based. It is related to Sanskrit and Prakrit in its structure (phonological and grammatical), though its vocabulary has been more enriched, mostly in nouns and adjectives, by the Arabic and Persian languages in the course of its contact with them in Sindhi.

As for the literature in Sindhi, Richard F. Burton said in his work Sind (1851), "It may safely be asserted that no vernacular dialect in India, at the time of our taking the country, possessed more, and few so much, original composition." And Blumhardt's Catalogue of Sindhi Printed Books in the Library of the British Museum (1893), The Catalogue of Sindhi Printed Books in the Library of India Office (1902) and the recently published The National Bibliography of Indian Literature (1901-1953): Vol. IV, Sindhi Section (1974) vouch for Burton's statement of 1851. The Sindhi literature has ever afterwards been varied and valuable.

Periodized in the Early Age (up to 1522), when Sindhi was being ruled by the native Sumras and Sammas, the Middle Age (1522-1843) when it was governed by the alien Arghuns, Tarkhans and Mughals, and also the native Kalhoras, and the Modern Age (1843 onwards), when it came to be taken over by the British and left out to Pakistan in the wake of partition of the country, historical ballads and poetic riddles, love and war themes, the sufi bayts and bhakti shlokas, and in the modern times fiction and drama, essay and literary criticism embody the fine expression of the creative Sindhi genius.

Beginnings of Sindhi poetry may be traced back to a Khojki (also a variant of Nagari)—verse of an Ismaili missionary called Nuruddin or Satguru Nur (c. 1079). By the fourteenth century, the Ismaili missionaries were quite active in the north-west India and the contents of their Sindhi, Multani, Gujarati and Punjabi verses (known as ginans or jnans) showed a strange mixture of the Islamic and Hindu views of life. Also, the Early Age saw the rise of native genius in the forms of epic poetry by the name of Dodo Chanesar and B'aghul B'ai during the Sumra period (1050-1350), and mystic poetry largely based on the indigenous love-stories during the Samma period (1350-1522) and also in the times of Arghuns, Tarkhans, Mughal Subedars, Kalhoras and Talpurs (1522-1843).

While the first three major Sindhi poets were Qazi Qadan (1463-1551), Shah Abdul Karim (1536-1623) and Shah Inayat (1623-1712), the first distinguished Sindhi poet was Shah Abdul Latif (1689-1752). Shah Abdul Latif's Risalo gives him a rightful place in Indian literature, which is basically one, though written in many languages.

Qazi Qadan, whose seven bayts given in the appendix to the Bayan al-Arifin (1630) and 112 more bayts discovered recently from Haryana, as known to us, was a 'wujudi' (believer in the the Unity of Existence) sufi poet. To him, 'kanz' (a collection of the Prophetic Tradition), 'quduri' (a handbook of Hanifi Law) and 'kafiya' (a grammatical poem) which the 'Moulvis' of the day administered to students in the Indian madrasas, and were the be-all with them, had no importance. In one of his bayts he says: "Leave the people with their grammar./ I contemplate the Beloved."

Shah Abdul Karim was a highly spiritual man and cared for the suffering humanity. He said: "Give your heart to the beloved/ and your body to the people;/ Private cloisters and public mosques go together for the general weal." Like other sufis, he was critical of the orthodox 'mullas' of the day. In one of his bayts, he said: "Those with faith crossed the river/ those without it were afraid;/ the mulla found it too swollen./ you brave it with a smile."

A representative Sindhi sufi poet of the bhakti movement, Shah Abdul Latif, criticised the mulla and the 'panda' alike. He said to the orthodox mulla and the dogmatic panda: "'Iman' or faith doesn't consist in this way./ you recite holy maxims and your heart hides deceit, duality and devil./ Islamic outwardly, you have idolatry inside." .. "If true to your faith, why you be called 'unfaithful'./ You are never a Hindu, should you trust only the vermilion on your forehead and the sacred thread on your body?"

Earlier, Mahamati Pran Nath (1618-1694) had tried through his Sindhi vani to bring Hinduism and Islam closer and evolve a composite culture. The Mahamati established 'sakhya' (friendship) instead of 'dasya' (master-servant) relationship between God and man. In the Sindhi Vani, as also in his other works, he meets God on an equal level and tells him: "My darling hubby! I play games with you/ and if in this play I sometimes behave impudently./ it is because you and I stand equal chances in it."

Sachal Sarmast (1739-1829) was the most vocal of the Sindhi sufi poets. What Shah Abdul Latif had artistically concealed in his metaphorical treatment of folk-tales, he laid bare as if in the state of 'intoxicated non-chalance'. He made plain speaking in his poetry and saw no difference among followers of various religions: "Break all customs and usages,/ then only will you be heroic/ Don't take yourself to be an outsider,/ you are yourself He, the Peerless."

At one place, Sachal Sarmast says: "Haji ! we visited the Ka'ba today, it is the Beloved's face we turned to/ Friend ! We obtained the 'hajj' now and here, and were granted what we had asked for." This verse illustrates what Hujviri the Data Bakhsh of Lahore, mystically interpreted the 'hajj', or the pilgrimage, that "anyone who is present with God in his house is in the same position as if he were present with 'God in Mecca'...."

Another equally distinguished poet was Chainrai Bachomal Sami (1743-1850), who vernacularised the Vedic wisdom in Sindhi. He was born in a family of a well-to-do merchant. But he, like Guru Nanak, did not engage himself in the worldly merchandise and struck the True Deal, or 'Sacho Saudo'. By the age of 40, Chainrai developed a great poetic power and composed verses, at once lyrical and mystical, in the name of Sami, or after the name of his guru, Sami Meghraj. A saint-poet who appeared on the scene during the last phase of the bhakti movement, Sami wrote bayts (which he called shlokas) embodying everything the movement espoused, viz. unity of Godhead, unity of existence, equality on the ground of religion, caste and creed. He says: "The six shastras, the eighteen Puranas and the four Vedas describe the One;/ why do you then go from door to door?/ He is in you, look within/ and experience His presence now and here."

According to him as also other saint-poets of the age, a mere book-learnedness is no aid to the knowledge of God. He says: "By reading a lot, they style themselves 'erudite',/ the secret of harmony these fools forget;/ he who realises, throws all books aside;/ within him he beholds the fourteen spheres scintillate." (Tr. by Shanti L. Shahani, Song of the Spirit, Karachi, 1947.)

Dalpat Rai (1769-1849) echoed what his senior contemporary Sami said in his poetry. He vehemently criticised the communal hatred which showed up sometimes despite the prevalent sufistic ideas in Sindh. In one of his verses, he posed a question: "Whence comes this dissension between peoples?/ It God is in the 'peepal' tree, who is there in the 'babool'?" (Tr. by L.H. Ajwani, History of Sindhi Literature, New Delhi, 1970.)

Sometimes the Sindhi poets of the day, Rohal and his three sons Shahu (1747-1815), Ghulam Ali (1750-1836) and Darya Khan (1775-1850) included, sang devotedly of Lord Rama and Lord Krishna. But the 'saguna' poetry, or the poetry dedicated to Personal God, did not thrive in Sindh, it being the land of 'nirguna' sufi/sant poetry devoted to Impersonal Transcendent God. Or, if the saguna must have existed, keeping in view the composite culture of Sindh, it could not survive during the intolerant Kalhora-Talpur rule. The content of the major portion of Sindhi poetry veered round the 'advaita' (non-dualism) philosophy and showed affinities with that of the other modern Indian languages. The poetic form of 'doho' in its many varieties was the main vehicle of expression.

The British annexed Sindh in 1843. Constituents as they were of the monotheistic Judo-Christian-Islamic tradition, they showed at the socio-cultural level little or no appreciation for the Indian subcontinental monistic way of life, which the people, the Sindhi Muslims also among them, lived. The Sindhi people were on a personal-name and du-basis relationship with God—a relationship which was anything but obedient to Him, contrary to their own tradition. Hence the British took upon themselves the pseudo-divine role of civilising the 'barbarous and semi-civilised' people (see Richard F. Burton's Sind, 1851) by their rule over them.

In the multilingual and multiscriptal situation in Sindh, the alien rulers effected two vital changes. First, following T.B. Macaulay's Minute of 1835, Persian as the official language in the British India had been abolished in 1837 and this came to be applied to the status of Persian in Sindh in 1843. Secondly, subsequent to 1843, the Perso-Arabic script for Sindhi was officially recognised with a view to pleasing the Muslim majority in Sindh, a view which formed part of the British general policy of 'divide and rule'. As regards the first change, it may be observed that the composite way of life in Sindh made it possible to retain the appreciation for Persian as a classical language of the Sindhian historical links with Persia. So much so, the Sindhi Hindus and Muslims came to deploy the Persian poetic forms of 'ghazal' and 'marsia' etc., wrought in the 'Ilm-Aruz', or the Persian prosody. As for the introduction of Perso-Arabic script, suffice it to say that George Stack (d.1853) and Ernest Trumpp (1828-85), to name only two foreign scholars among many, voiced their opinion that the Perso-Arabic letters were absolutely unfitting for the transcription of Sindhi, a Sanskrit-Prakritical language. They used Devanagari for the Sindhi words in their works.

Though the Persian style of writing in Sindhi stayed in Sindh and Gul Muhammad Gul (1807-55) became the first poet to produce a 'divan' of ghazals, it was the native style of writing in Sindhi 'dohas', 'vais' and 'shlokas' and all these with indigenous content, that was in vogue at that time. The sufi-vedantic poetry held the sway till the beginning of the present century and is alive even today.

Soon after the conquest of Sindh by the British, lithographic presses were established to produce Sindhi text books in the new script, apropos the 1853 decision, in Bombay, the then capital of the Bombay Presidency to which Sindh belonged, and in Karachi, Sukkur and Hyderabad in Sindh. The first book to come out of a lithographic press in Sindh in 1853 was Nandiram Merani's Babnamo, a primer for the new entrants in schools. In the same year, for the young generation pupils, Udharam Thanvardas Mirchandani (1833-83) prepared Pahiron kitab and B'you kitab for classes I and II and Prabhadas Anandram compiled Tiyon kitab and Chothon kitab for classes III and IV in Sindhi.

After the first war of independence in 1857, a new awakening was seen in the Sindhi masses and a new spurt was felt in the Sindhi literary activity. That the situation in Sindh continued to be multilingual and multiscriptal is seen from three of many illustrations that Surat Singh (1832-97) authored Divan Surat Bahar, a collection of poems in Sindhi, Urdu, Hindi and Persian, Ernest Trumpp published Sindhi Reading Book in 1858 and Grammar of the Sindhi Language in 1872 in the Devanagari and Perso-Arabic characters, and the Sikh Sabha, established by Sadhu Navalrai (1848-93) in 1868, issued literature in Gurumukhi also.

In the modern age, prose emerged as a powerful means of literary expression. Besides the text book-writers, there appeared conspicuously on the scene four great essayists—Kauromal Chandanmal Khilnani (1844-1916), Mirza Qalich Beg (1853-1929), Dayaram Gidumal (1857-1927) and Parmanand Mevaram (1865-1938). A great quartet of essayists, they produced original works and adapted books from Sanskrit, Hindi, Persian and English. Another quartet of essayists and prose writers in Lalchand Amard'inomal Jagtiani (1885-1954), Bherumal Meharchand Advani (1875-1950), H.M. Gurbuxani (1884-1947) and Jethmal Parasram (1886-1948) is also known for its rich and varied contributions.

As for the Sindhi poetry in the Modern Age, a curious fact of Sindhi literary history may be observed that upto the conquest of Sindh by the British, Sindh had resisted the Persian influence, though Persian had been in use at the official level for six centuries. The Sindhi poets, both Hindus and Muslims, barring a few exceptions among them, had used Sindhi as a vehicle of expression, deployed indigenous tales and legends, images and allusions and poetic forms and metres. Their poetry had been a part of the great bhakti literature. But with the alien people ruling over Sindh, the Sindhis came to own Persian and its paraphernalia as a part of the common cultural heritage. Distinguished among the poets who used the Persian poetic forms were Ghulam Shah Gada (1826-1905), Mir Abdul Husain Sangi (1851-1924), Lilaram Watanmal Lalwani (1867-1941), Shamsuddin Bulbul (1857-1919) and Mirza Qalich Beg (1853-1929). With the ushering in of the new era of the modern-in-outlook poetry by Kishinchand Bevas (1885-1947), the Sindhi poets gave up the Persian themes, though the Persian prosody has been practised side by side with the Indian one of doha, soratha, etc. Besides Bevas, Hundraj Dukhayal, Ram Panjwani, Khialdas Fani and Baldev Gajra wrote on Gandhiji and the struggle for Independence. The Karachi Congress session in 1931 resolved that Gandhiji alone should represent the Indian people at the Second Round Table Conference in England. Wherever Gandhiji went in that country, people were impressed by his simple and austere life. Bevas wrote a poem entitled 'Vir vilait mein' on his visit. In 'Sabarmati jo sant', written earlier in 1929, he says about him: "You need only to point your finger/ And the sixtysix crores of eyes will look in that direction."

Hundraj Dukhayal's Sangit Varkha, Sangit Mukhriyun, Latyun, Jhungar and parlau sing about Gandhiji, his thoughts and actions. If read together, these collections of poems give a coherent account of those days when Gandhiji steadily but surely led the country to the goal of Independence.

Literature in Sindhi began to develop in new directions after 1947 under various socio-political and psychological compulsions. Indian Independence movement and the ideology of the Russian revolution paved the way for the progressive literature. Since then the literature has grown manifold, in both quality and bulk.

The political involvement of Hyderbux Jatoti (1901-1970) changed the literary situation, especially after the publication of the collection of his poems, Tuhfa-e-Sindh (1930), the contents of which were progressive. There was yet another poet, Kishinchand 'Bevas' (1885-1947), who showed progressiveness in his thought and sentiment. Many poems in his compilations like Samundi sipun (1929), Shirin shairu (1929) and Shair-e-Bevas (1953) give sufficient evidence of the progressive trend.

It was again the translations from Urdu and Hindi during the forties that provided the required impetus for the development of progressive trend in Sindhi literature. The Sindhi writer leaned heavily on these translated works to seek new techniques and forms adopted for depicting social realism. The authors like Munshi Premchand, Krishin Chander, Khwaja Ahmed Abbas and other progressive writers were translated into Sindhi. It was, indeed, during the forties that the progressive trend took roots. The writers for a time rid themselves of the out-moded romances for inspiration and guidance, and embarked upon creating fiction depicting social realism. Registani phula (The flowers of the desert, 1941) is a collection of very good short stories that follow the progressive trend. The authors in the collection included inter alia Gobind Malhi and Sobho Gianchandani, the pioneers of progressivism in Sindhi fiction. The second collection of short stories reflecting progressivism, Sard ahun (The cold sighs, 1940), was authored by Gobind Panjabi (b. 1918). Two more collections of short stories based on progressivism were brought out during this period, viz. Praha phuti (The dawn, 1945) and Pharak (The flapping, 1945). Most of the stories in the latter collection probe deep into the social and political problems, but strangely enough, these end with a note of pessimism.

A.J. Uttam, the staunch devotee of progressivism, made his debut as a short story writer in Phuleli magazine with his story 'Shikasta' (The defeat, 1944). Another story of his, depicting progressivism, entitled 'Akhir kesitain' (How long, after all), was published in Jivan kala in 1945. Kirat Babani was another progressive writer of the time and his short story 'Hua' (she) included in the anthology published by the Zindagi magazine publications in 1947, brought him to the forefront of the progressives.

Strangely, the concern of the progressive short story during the period covered up to 1947, keeps away from bringing out the chicanery of the capitalistic society, and the writers direct their emphasis on the common man adopting no different approach from that of the famous Hindi writer, Munshi Premchand, who was much translated into Sindhi. Their characters never rebel and submit to the destiny.

There were other trends running side by side with the progressive trend in Sindhi literature during the modern period. The trend of realism was ushered in Sindhi literature by Lalchand Amard'inomal (1885-1954) with his short story 'Hura Makhia ja' (Hurs of Makhi) which was published in the Jote magazine in 1902 and later included in the collection of short stories, Hura Makhia ja (1914). The story comes under the purview of what in the modern jargon is called 'journalistic fiction'. More than two decades later, Lalchand was followed in the trend by Amarlal Hingorani (1907-1956) well-known for his short story 'Ado Abdur Rehman' which enjoys the international status. The story was first published in Phulwari magazine in 1930 and later included in the collection of his short stories, Ado abdur rehman (Brother Abdur Rehman, 1981). The trends of 'romanticism' and 'stream of consciousness' were brought in Sindhi literature by Asanand Mamtora (b. 1903). His novel Shairu (The poet, 1941) represents the former trend and the collection of short stories Papa ain prema jun kahaniyan (The stories of sin and love, 1939) represents the latter.

After the partition of the country in 1947, the great exodus left the Sindhi Hindu community in turmoil and confusion for quite some time. Their influx into the states of Maharashtra, Gujarat, Rajasthan, Madhya Pradesh in sizeable chunks and into other states in small numbers, brought a sense of rootlessness in them, coupled with the problems brought about by migration and final settlement. It goes to the credit of the progressives that they established the literary press and restarted literary activities soon after settling down in India, especially in Maharashtra. It is for this reason that the progressive literature drew full attention during the major part of the sixth decade. It grew and thrived, carrying with it the tradition of the forties, but at the same time it was different in a way. It depicted social realism to the core, but was not effective inasmuch as almost all their short stories ended with slogans, and sacrificed the art at the altar of ideology. There is yet another aspect of this movement which was later condemned by the rebels. The literary press at this time was literally in the hands of the progressives who punished young writers by rehashing their writings to bring them in line with their ideology. Ultimately, the slogan-mongering attitude of the progressives landed them in trouble and proved to be one of the reasons for their decline. Much later, they conceded that what they had produced during the forties and the fifties was bereft of art, an essential ingredient of creative work. However, some of the short stories written during this period can certainly be taken note of, especially those of Sundri Uttamchandani who has her own place in this trend. Her gift is the ability to create characters so vital that they seem to leap from the pages. She has to her credit a number of novels and short story collections. She would have been a marvel of a creative writer—there is nothing that can escape her lynx-like eyes—but for her forced commitment which set her to work writing pot-boilers whimpering with slogans.

Later, in the sixties and seventies, the progressives did change the texture of their writings by simply avoiding overtones and, instead, weaving undertones of ideology in their works, but at the same time made sure that the writings conveyed the desired message. It is also true that in their later works, the characters submitted to the superficial subjectivity, and the progressives failed to bring us anywhere near the work of art.

Whatever the standard of writing of the progressives be, there is no doubt about the fact that, but for their efforts for creating something, whether dreary or drab, the Sindhi literature would not have developed to the extent it has. They provided the infra-structure and all the means, and the contemporary writers used them in order to build up the formidable Sindhi literature of today.

The present trends in Sindhi literature are essentially the outcome of a literary quarrel that shook the Sindhi literary world sometime in 1957. The literary press after 1947 was in the hands of the progressives who tried to impose their ideology on the young and budding writers. The young writers could not stand this for long and rebelled against the inimical slogan-mongering attitude of the progressives. They wanted to free Sindhi literature from the inhibitions and bring contemporary trends into it. The angry young men imported a new invigorating wind of change into the literary atmosphere. The communist ideology that had crept into Sindhi literature was put on the defensive. Mohan Kalpana (b. 1930) Guno Samtaney (b. 1934) and Lal Pushp (b. 1935), who were the pioneers of this movement, injected a new philosophy into Sindhi literature, and the characters and the plot were given a new dimension in fiction. Neo-realistic in their approach, they set about probing the intricate emotional and psychological aspects of human mind. Their psychoanalysis of the characters brought out the manifold realities of human behaviour and set out the raison d'être of their actions.

Guno Samtaney comes under the 'neo-classic' label and one of his earlier short stories entitled 'Pralaya' (The deluge) won him critical acclaim. In the story the author goes to the minutest details to create a peculiar atmosphere with visual, auditory and tactile details. In his stories the author relies on subtle minute expressions of mood, scene, situation and the vivid unravelling of the psychological strands, with a sure touch. Author of two collections of short stories, Aparajita (1970) and Abhiman (1965), Samtaney is regarded by some to have salvaged his heritage distorted by the progressives and the 'new' writers, and boldly faced the cultural gangsterism. It does not take an intelligent reader long to understand that the characters of his fiction belong to the ethereal world. Samtaney's much heightened realism works because it is faithful to specific locales, customs, attitudes and speech-patterns.

Mohan Kalpana, the other member of the trio, is a romantic and individualistic writer. There has always been a sort of off-putting about the fiction of Kalpana even when, as in his novel Runja ain pachha (The wilderness and the shadows, 1966) and a number of short stories, it is at its most controlled and least melodramatic. The sense of monstrosity that arises from his fiction seems to have its source in an unbridgeable chasm between the highly rational and ordered intelligence of the writer and the chaos and hysteria of nearly everything he writes about.

Lal Pushp, the third of the trio, was the most successful among contemporary writers in depicting 'stream of consciousness' in his fiction. Many of his short stories in as many as nine collections, and a few novels, reflecting one or the other Freudian complex, reach logical conclusion. There are a few stories like 'Hika sard divar' (A cold wall) and his novel Huna je atama jo maut (Death of his 'self', 1973) which rise above these complexes and reflect to an extent modern sensibility, though these cannot be assessed in terms of the 'new' fiction. More or less, the psychic gelatin is the main ingredient of his fiction. The 'stream of consciousness' was in fact introduced by Asanand Mamtara in early forties. The trend could not, however, take roots at that time. Now the social realism gave place to the 'stream of consciousness'.

But then, another controversy ensued and the 'stream' writers were challenged. The 'stream' writers were faced with two views which the other writers put forward: (i) Is it possible to describe an experience fully? and (ii) what is it that provides an experience? The views, no doubt, carried weight, but the quarrel was not limited only to the introduction of 'stream of consciousness'. There was the important question of determining the essence and the 'limit' of Sindhi fiction. In any case, the very concept of the 'stream' was very important and its introduction in fiction was necessary for its healthy growth. The 'stream' writers insisted that the depiction of inner reality was the only thing that counted. The style and the structure are the essence of the work and the great ideas are only secondary. However, the 'stream' writers carried their day and jumped into the fray of creative activity.

Now going back to the romantic trend which still continues in Sindhi literature, we have yet another outstanding writer, Krishin Khatwani (b. 1927), who follows it. None of his characters develops and arouses any deep sympathy as portrayed in his earlier short stories. His quick-cut writing, however, sustains flagging interest and some of the stories are really fascinating. But he has given us elegant pieces in his subsequent short stories compiled in Akeli (The lone one, 1980). Though the stories are old-fashioned in style, yet virtually avant garde in their author's insistence on divorcing the worlds that fiction writers create from what dull readers call 'real life'. For them, Khatwani's romantic fiction is neither naturalistic nor realistic, nor even an indictment of bourgeois values, but a prose poem, a fantasy in so far as it reflects a unique world of a unique individual. However, Khatwani is at his best in his novel Yad Hika Pyar ji (Reminiscences of a love, 1978). It treats with candour and sensibility some of the most disturbing problems of human relations.

And now, a new concept of romanticism is taking roots in fiction. It is boy-meets-girl no doubt, but the boy is not a hip-dope-smoking, counter-culture type who, having met his liberated chic, climbs into bed with her on their first date. They are the archetypal lovers in a new neo-romantic type of fiction. This may yet be another form of escape in a realism-weary world. One of the reasons for the onset of this new trend in literature may be that the readers are simply tired of believing in nothing. The neo-romantic fiction is bereft of eroticism and sexual play, though a gentle hand might reach out occasionally to a discreetly clothed bosom. We have yet to wait and see how this new trend succeeds.

Romantic poetry had its share in Sindhi literature in the fifties and the sixties. During this period, we had quite a few poets who wrote frank and uninhibited love poems reflecting abrasive animal love giving vent to their intense emotions, cried away the pangs of separation and depicted love-waits for their beloveds. Most of the romantic poets have now switched over to 'new' poetry. But the trend has been kept alive by Narayan Shyam (1922-1989) who is considered to be the most successful romantic poet religiously following the philosophy of romanticism which has nothing to do with physical love. He excels in the description of Nature in the raw. He tries to develop a new relationship between man and the universe. In his poems, especially those in Maak bhina raabela (Jasmines moist with Dew, 1964), he avoids the daylight in order that his imagination may play with the fading lights of the twilight. The 'new' trend in the mid-sixties overshadowed the romantic poetry. The new poets denounced the romantic poetry and called it something that makes the soul of the poet putrid. Once again the Sindhi poets turned to analysis through logic to solve the riddles of life.

The 'new' writers have naturally a new awareness of contemporary reality and of the changing Indian scene. They accused the 'stream' writers of unnecessarily probing deep into the dark recesses of the human mind and producing in their works an uncalled-for complexity. They believed that what was expected of an artist was to find out the 'total truth' about man and his situation. In fact, the modernists felt that the basis of contemporary Sindhi fiction was crumbling and a new approach was needed in conformity with the changes which had so rapidly taken place. They insisted that the writer had to keep away from the Freudian filth and Jungian abracadabra in order to produce clean and healthy fiction. Now, these new angry young men, the modernists, should be viewed instead as a rare example of Sindhi achievement, as writers who were peculiarly responsive, especially in the mid-sixties, to modern complexity.

The pioneers of the new movement were Anand Khemani (b. 1933) Ishwar Chander (b. 1937) and Vishnu Bhatia (b. 1941). They were followed by other writers like Harish Vaswani (b. 1940), K.S. Balani (b. 1930), Shyam Jaisinghani (b. 1937), Prem Prakash (b. 1946). In his collection of short stories November ji akhriin raat (The last night of November, 1976) Anand Khemani depicts the consciousness of man exerting under the opposite forces of equal momentum which have to be changed—the pulls as well as the direction. What is pleasing about Khemani is that he does not resort to fantasies or historical sketching. On the other hand, Vishnu Bhatia depicts in his stories erotic, naked and unabashed sex, especially in those compiled in Chandramukhi and Sija ja tukra (Spots of the sun).

Ishwar Chander, who has quite a few subjects in his stock, belongs to the same school. Of course, he has written too much and some of his stories may be termed as prosaic and stale, but most of them are modernistic and representative. He has his own diction and tells the tale of his time. Ishwar has never had much patience for furtive symbolism. His fine fictional instrument is perfectly tuned to the dissonances of the times. In his stories, Ishwar observes the situations with a cold eye and captures the aimless, rootless and heartless situation of the lost generation. He does not take it upon himself to make statements over which he has no mental or emotional control.

Shyam Jaisinghani has live-wire sensibility which keeps throbbing in his short stories. He has developed his own style. Some of his stories like 'Kue jo maut' (Death of a rat), 'Irado jadahn ain jeean jo' (Intention, as and when it surfaces) and 'Rirhandaru waqt' (Creeping time) will ever defy time.

Prem Prakash is also a writer of new sensibility. In one of his stories, 'Paroon' (The roots), he is face to face with the hopeless situation the destiny casts him into, and wages his lone war through the labyrinthine paths. The efforts fail and he is resigned to his fate and bears with the curse.

The 'new' story in Sindhi is really sweeping in its range. It is not philosophical in content though, it has all the compulsions of philosophy about it. Talented writers keep popping up in the few magazines that still publish fiction. The technical level is high and the values that make a good story—compression, subtle tone and micro-surgical eye—strike many readers as of high standard. The new wave has also its share of grim tale-bearers who unusually attract wide audience for short story writers. Reading their work is like taking an unblinking look through the files of a psychiatrist social worker.

The present trend in Sindhi literature encompasses novel, poetry and drama also. The first Sindhi novel imbibing the trend, entitled Hika shaksa ji vasna (Lust of a man, 1970) was by Anand Khemani. The novel is a modern Gothic Passion Play with animalistic overtones. Khemani turns what might be a literary grab-bag into a sex play instead of a powerful haunting tale. The author explores sex and erotics to achieve ideas which he probably thinks can no longer be conveyed through conventional style. The second modern novel was that of Lal Pushp entitled Huna je atama jo maut (Death of his 'self', 1973). Rejecting the conventional form, he has tried to portray an anti-hero who goes deep inside himself to find a reason for his peculiar behaviour of which he was not aware before. The author has administered psychological overdoses in certain situations and made these passages incomprehensible. It is, however, a successful stream-of-consciousness novel.

The third 'new' novel was brought out by Motilal Jotwani with the title Narangi traffic light te (At the amber traffic light, 1974). The novel starts with a bang, but ends with a whimper. It opens with the onslaughts of tension nearly casting to the winds the husband-wife relations and involving the individuality of both. A stage comes when both are face to face with the reality of their lives, their destiny. Jotwani takes the respite from the tension in-between for too long and loosens his grip in the latter half of the novel.

The novel entitled Khahia je chautaraf (Around an abyss, 1976) by Shyam Jaisinghani is on anti-sentiment of a character who is deeply involved in life, so much so that his detachment and coldness are a refusal to recognize any priority among objects and events. He clings to his 'self', seeks refuge in the self-created shell to keep away from the pressures of sentiment caused by the social milieu he is forced to live within. The book is a graceful meditation on survival, both in harsh, cruel external milieu and in the scarier terrain of the 'self'. The latest 'new' novel by Param Abichandani recently brought out is entitled Ien bi (That too, 1988).

The collections of anti-poems entitled Bimar Pirhi (The sick generation, 1974) and Shamshan ghat vatan langhande (1985) were brought out by Anand Khemani. While some critics denounced the poems as filth, others pronounced them as the first real new poetry published in Sindhi. Moving restlessly through his poems, Khemani tells a tale of our times, a pitiful tale and depressing, too. Some of the poems are shocking indeed and rebel against well-established attitudes of thought and culture. Through the stray thoughts which the poet calls poems, he talks of today only, of no tomorrows and yesterdays—today which is restless and daring.

Khemani's Bimar pirhi was followed by Tazad (Contradiction), a compilation of poems by Vasdev Mohi in 1975. Tazad is the most appreciated collection of 'new' poems by a single author. Hardly any adverse comment by the critics appeared. It seemed that Bimar pirhi acted as a shock-absorber and smothered the ire of the traditionalists and paved the way for acceptance of new poetry. Mohi's poems are pure psychic automations which express the way human beings really think and feel. The poems bypass reason. In fact Mohi's poems do not know any reason and express only feeling. They associate objects and men wide apart in space, time, or both. Later, in 1976, a collection of new poems by Harish Vaswani entitled 40-76 came out. Many of his poems in this collection are individualistic, both in essence and in expression.

Shyam Jaisinghani, in his collection of poems Vichhotiyun (The crevices, 1980), takes us to a world where the souls are gnarled and agony seems to be the only common measure of humanity. It is a twilight point between the reality and its symbol, a compelling fusion of the economy of a symbol with the essential sense-data from the reality. At this point, Jaisinghani's poems unfold a world of silence, alienation and sombreness, a romantic desire to escape and a sense of waste keeps peeping through the words.

The latest collection of new poems published in 1983 was by Mohan Kalpana entitled Jahza je deck te (On the deck of the ship). It seems that Mohan Kalpana is still grappling with the very concept of 'new' poetry and the idiom for lucid expression.

So far as the impact of the new trend on drama is concerned, Prem Prakash is the only 'new' playwright published so far in book-form. Prem Prakash has always posed a challenge to the actors because of the limited possibilities of action and the burden of an entire philosophy. His first play entitled Picnic was published in 1974 and in it the main characters are in a kind of torpor, as if immersed in a feeling of ennui, too weary to talk, too tired to move. The author distils the quintessence of our times. He focuses on small insignificant things, making the point that ordinary people are helplessly unable to influence events. The plot, as hard-edged as a cartoon strip and as plausible as tomorrow's headlines, is the backbone of this play. Another play of Prem Prakash entitled Morchabandi (The barricade) is a political satire in which, he just succeeds in achieving sensationalism by combining a dilution of the complicated infra-structure of the 'new' drama with the all-popular phenomenon, speed, which makes the work of art seemingly an achievement in excellence.

Satire requires both savagery and familiarity and the authors who can do it have been away for too long, except one who has really done it. A book of political satire, a compilation of 'new' poems, entitled Ughara awaza (The naked voices), has been published by Harikant. Most of the poems in this compilation are set in the present time and imbued with a sense of dread of the encroaching authoritarian rule. The poems are full of pyrotechnics and make impact.

What is pleasing about the writers of the 'new' trend is that they write about their time and do not resort to fantasies or historical sketching. Unlike the followers of other trends, they risk more and are willing to take the responsibility for the consequences. Unlike the writers of older generation, they wield heavy sabres and do not depend on nimble foot-work and less cumbersome weapons.

LITERATURE (Tamil). Among the languages spoken in the world today, Tamil has the oldest literature, dating back at least to two thousand five hundred years. In fact from the high quality of the oldest extant works in Tamil, the Sangam lyrics, students of history and culture would certainly reckon that they are the mature works of a highly literary people with a long history of creativity behind them. Their oldest grammar, the Tolkappiyam, legislates for a whole fabric of extremely well-devised literary conventions which must have taken centuries to evolve to that level of maturity. From all accounts, the literature of the Tamils is one of the oldest we have, one that can invite comparison only with that of Sanskrit.

The date of the origin of Tamil literature is a matter of dispute. There are certain accounts dating back to several thousands of years; they speak of two earlier Sangams which were snuffed out by geological cataclysms, the older one supposed to have been patronised by Lord Shiva Himself. As none of the works that can be put down to these epochs have survived it is safer today to discount these accounts and fix the origin of this literature very approximately at five centuries before the birth of Christ.

The earliest literary works in Tamil, called Sangam works as they had the imprimatur of a body of learned men convoked by the king of Madurai, fall into three divisions. One, easily the most important on the basis of quality, consists of eight anthologies, five of which are wholly devoted to love, two wholly to heroism, munificence and topics other than love and one in which both these kinds of topics are dealt with. Out of those devoted to love, three are organised on the basis of the size (or number of lines) of the pieces and one on the basis of the special metre adopted; the fifth is a collection of five hundred verses sung by five poets which has the structure not of an anthology of verses sung haphazardly at different times but of a deliberately planned work with each poet having a sub-topic to compose his poems on. Naturally the quality of the other collections is much higher than that of this fifth book; the others were obviously built up by a careful process of selection, only the best being admitted.

Even of these four, the anthology of the shortest verses, the Kuruntokai appeals most to the common readers of today. The verses in this collection have usually five or six lines only and their very size compels the poet to cut all verbiage and focus his insight on the essentials, on the sentiment which is the heart of all poetry. We do not find here the leisurely descriptions of characters and of nature which disfigure the later compositions. Each of the verses captures a baring moment of intense experience. The subject-matter may appear limited, but the poets have introduced infinite variations with subtle touches of character portraiture and sentiment-delineation.

Of the two anthologies wholly devoted to topics other than love, the Purananooru is much better work with some of the most famous, the most widely quoted passages incorporated in it. Many of the pieces in it are frankly panegyric, sung on the most famous kings and potentates of the epoch. On account of the wealth of historical information they contain, they have enjoyed a vogue not quite justified by their poetic merit; in fact many of the non-panegyric pieces in the latter half of the work are of high aesthetic appeal, but they have been largely put in the shade by those in the earlier part on account of non-aesthetic reasons. The reader gets a strong impression of the independence of spirit displayed by the poets of this era, who, though impecunious, often take up righteous causes on behalf of the subjects and bravely intercede with the king. A Western thinker called poets unacknowledged legislators; Sangam poets seem to have functioned as acknowledged legislators whose constituency was the entire country. Thus a poet obtained remission of land tax and a poetess made peace between warring kings.

The second division comprises ten long poems, construed 'long' only by Sangam standards, the longest being of only 800 lines. The poems treat of both love and topics other than love. There are some exquisite passages in many of them and the descriptions of Madurai and Puhar (a city on the eastern seashore) throw a lot of light on urban living in the Tamil country two thousand years ago. But in aesthetic quality, they rank well below the short pieces in the first division. The third division comprises 18 books, many of which treat of ethics and morals; some books are wholly devoted to love. The chief work among these eighteen is the Tirukkural, regarded by many as the greatest of the Sangam works; it has been translated into many of the languages of the world and is extensively quoted for the pithy wisdom of its condensed aphorisms.

These literary works of the Sangam era were composed in strict accord with conventions that had been guiding creative effort for centuries before. The conventions that regulated Akam poetry are of particular significance as they show a unique grasp of aesthetic requirements. For instance, one convention stipulates that all love poetry should be presented, not in the poets version but invariably in that of one of the characters involved. This makes for a much greater authenticity of presentation and consequently a higher level of aesthetic delight. Another convention specifically bans the presentation of any identifying particulars about the characters; they are all referred to only through personal pronouns. The advantage of this is obviously to promote a greater degree of universalisation by the dropping of details which would localize, individualize and particularize.

The advent of the Jains and to a lesser extent of the Buddhists led to a renaissance of Tamil letters after a dark interregnum which succeeded the Sangam Age. Roughly estimated, the period covers seven centuries from the third to the tenth century A.D. This literature marked a significant break from the established literary conventions of the Sangam Age. Thus in the place of short poems of a few lines, poets preferred to compose long poems telling a story in considerable detail after the fashion of Sanskrit poets. Sangam poets were prevented by convention from referring to the names of their characters; these poets of the later era threw overboard this convention and described in detail their characters, tracing their genealogy upto seven generations before. They did not conform to the convention of reporting everything through the mouths of their characters; on the other hand, they included in their epic poems long descriptive and narrative passages straight from the poets themselves. Thus the advent of this literature meant the death of the most vital elements of the Sangam literary tradition which was never to revive in the later epochs. Grammarians were written to accord with the structure and contents of such long epic poems and when Hindu poets started composing them, they too preferred to follow this new set of conventions.

Out of all the non-Hindu epic poems that came to be composed during this post-Sangam period, the Silappadikaram, which was the earliest of them, is, beyond doubt, the greatest of them all. This great love story was composed by a Jain monk, Ilango, whose brother plays a certain part in the poem. His evocative diction, his wonderful ability to manoeuvre the metres, his insight into the working of the minds of his characters, his wide experience of the world and its ways, all make him one of the greatest poets of the world. He is assumed to have been a monk of the Jain sect, but his wonderfully tolerant mind which presents the methods of Hindu worship, the Hindu temples and Hindu gods without a trace of prejudice, raises him far above the fanatically inclined writers who followed him. There are vivid pictures of the natives of the desert, the mountain-dwellers and the cowherds of the meadows shown at worship. This immortal work has inspired great poets like Kamban who came later and Bharati of the modern age; it is evoking wonder and delight in countries far removed from Ilango's space and time.

Manimekhalai took up the story from where Ilango signed off. Composed by a Buddhist Sathanar, it has neither the literary qualities of the Silappadikaram nor the wonderful tolerance of all religions displayed in the earlier work. Even though it has some merits and it is prized for non-aesthetic reasons such as its religious message and its evangelical value in the cause of prohibition, modern critical-minded readers will not rank this epic poem very high; in fact it surprises them that it has been counted by tradition as one of the five great epic poems of Tamil. It may have been composed in the 6th century A.D.

The third of the five great epic poems, the Chintamani, by a Jain monk Tiruttakka Tevar, relates the marital adventures of a great hero named Seevaka. It ranks high as a literary work and has several features to recommend it, one of which is the facility with which the poet has handled the variegated metres which had developed from the limited number in vogue during the time of Silappadikaram. In fact, Kamban appears to have studied Tevar's handling of the metres and is clearly in his debt even in the matter of poetic diction. Chintamani is more like the Odyssey in classical Greek, being a collection of a number of episodes not organically related to each other except through the common hero. It thus lacks a central motif and on that ground and others, it must take its place below Ilango's immortal epic poem in literary quality. Tevar should however be reckoned as one of the greatest Tamil poets whose influence on Kamban, the greatest of them all, is quite considerable. The other two great epic poems have been lost to us; they are, Valayapati which is thought to be a Jain work and Kundalakesi which is a Buddhistic work whose source is the Therigatha. It seems to be aggressively religious in outlook and the other religions come in for attack in it.

Among the five minor epic poems, Soolamani easily ranks as the best. There is a remarkable work Perunkathai by a Jain author Konguvel; its story content is derived from the Sanskrit Kathasaritsagara dealing with the adventures of prince Udayana. Despite its loose episodic structure and its author's excessive religious zeal, it must rank as good poetry with a happy diction and very vivid descriptions; the poet has handled the sober and inflexible 'asiriappa' metre with great ability.

In the meantime, the Hindus were not idle. Their poetic talents in the early centuries of the Christian era ran in the direction of hymnal composition. There were twelve seers of the Vaishnavite cult called Alvars and four of the Shaivite cult called Nayanmar, principally. Their work appears to be a reaction, at one level to the influence of Jain and Buddhist cults and at another, to the hold of the philosophical schools based on the Upanishads. Instead of Sanskrit, Pali or Prakrit they adopted Tamil as their linguistic medium; disdaining the path of philosophy, they chose to tread the high road of devotion. The Alvars and the Nayanmar composed stirring poems suffused with love of God, often related to the temples, associating the name of the shrine and the specific (local) name of the deity enshrined there. Some of these saint minstrels like Tirumangai Alvar and Andal and Tirugnanasambandar and Sundarar were good poets and their devotional outpourings turned out to be good poetry. Many miracles began to happen around their lives, especially those of the Shaivite cult and the stories of these supernatural experiences make a fascinating study. Temple worship and the bhakti cult attained a degree of popularity in the Tamil land never before witnessed.

Nammalwar is universally regarded as the greatest of the Alvars, on account of his total devotion to the Lord. He did not go round to the temples to sing about the Lord enshrined in them; the Lord as enthroned in the 108 Vishnu shrines appeared before him and accepted his soul stirring hymns, according to Vaishnavite tradition. Most of the Alvars composed hymns in the manner of love poems, in the guise of girls in love with the Lord. Andal, being born a woman, composed such hymns with greater authenticity. Perialwar imagined himself to be Yashoda and sang the most affectionate hymns looking upon Him as her child Krishna. The hymns of Kulashekharar are remarkable for their total earnestness and their poetic beauty.

The Devaram hymns of Sambandhar and Sundarar are full of descriptions of nature and other poetic devices expertly handled. Appar sings in a very humble vein, putting himself in the position of a servant of God. Sambandhar sings in a certain tone of authority as the privileged son of God and is regarded as the chief of the saint-minstrels. They were followed by Manickavachakar whose Tiruvachakam, though not the highest poetry, ranks very high in the hymnal field. There were many other saint-minstrels who sang of Lord Shiva, the most notable among whom is Karaikkal Ammaiyar, the devout lady who preceded all of them from the viewpoint of chronology, and authored three prabandhas. The period of these minstrels' maximal influence was the three centuries between the 6th and the 8th, though most of the lesser figures flourished after this.

Kamban came after this period, showing clearly the influence of the prabandhas of the Alvars in his monumental work. Some writers place him in the 9th century, but most thinkers would ascribe a later age to him bringing him down to the 12th century. No king can lay claim to having patronised him; perhaps no king of that era was big enough to be patron of this king of poets. Kamban pays sincere tribute to a philanthropist Sadayappa who helped him when he was quite unknown.

Kamban took the story of his version of the Ramayana from Valmiki's immortal epic which has ensnared the collective Indian psyche and has had greater influence over the people than the more prestigious Vedas.

Kamban took the story and the characters from Valmiki and breathed his own genius into it, transforming it into an independent and highly original epic poem that can stand comparison with the greatest works of the world. Beyond a doubt it can be asserted that Kamban's is the best of the works on the Ramayana theme that came to be written after Valmiki in the regional languages; indeed it overshadows the original itself, in many respects.

The reasons behind these high claims are many. An important feature of Kamban's poetic genius is his sure sense of what to retain and what to alter and how to alter it, from source story. A second claim is undoubtedly his great ability at characterization; not only Rama and Sita and Ravana, but even his lesser characters like Sugriva and Kumbhakarna and Guha become highly credible persons we can expect to meet in our lives. Though Kamban retains the religious flavour of the original and even reinforces the devotional spirit that runs through it, he has designed his work as a great poem of love which exacts big sacrifices from its votaries but hands out the most rewarding compensations, too, to them. His adroit handling of the metres, his sense of diction, of timing and proportion, his knowledge of the world and acquaintance with people of all strata—these and many such qualities raise him to the level of a world poet; not more than perhaps a dozen times has the world produced a creative genius of Kamban's mould in all this long history of civilization.

Much later to Kamban arose a poet Villiputhur by name who presented the story of the Mahabharata in Tamil verse. Villibharata, as it is called, is chiefly remarkable for three things: one is the way war scenes are depicted with verve and authenticity; another is the ease with which the poet handles musical metres whose structure is complex and demanding; and the third is the rich use he makes of Sanskrit words. It takes rank well below Kamban's Ramayana as a literary work.

There is a short work in 424 'venba' verses telling the story of King Nala; composed by Pugazhendi, it is very pleasant reading and enjoys a high reputation. Among the major epic poems is the Periyapurana which is of a very different nature from all the three we have discussed here. For while these three are based on Sanskrit sources, Periyapurana is based entirely on Tamil sources and records the lives of Shaivite saints. The literary quality of this is high; its one further merit is the meticulousness with which its author Sekkizhar has collected and verified his facts.

In the period following Kamban, prose writings began to appear—almost always as commentaries on earlier poetic works. Thus commentaries on Sangam works were composed by Ilampuranar and Nachchinarkiniyar among others. Though these commentators were painstaking and were renowned scholars, they did not grasp fully the Sangam literary tradition which was quite dead before they came on the scene and hence they wrote misleading interpretations in quite a few cases. Books on aesthetics like that composed by Narkavirasa Nambi also fell to the same error. Nambi and Irayanar who composed books on aesthetics did not seem to be quite aware that the Sangam conventions were no longer in application, that a new set of conventions based on North Indian concepts was now ruling the field. On this latter set of conventions, the most important guide is Acharya Dandi's work called Dandi alankaram.

Works on grammar, too, came to be written in numbers during this time, out of which Nannool by Pavanandimuniyar is the most authoritative; it rules the field even today. The Jains dominated the field of lexicography; the method of presentation is by way of verses linking up synonyms which are expected to be committed to memory by every student, exactly like the lexicon of Sanskrit by Amarasimha.

After the great epics, we see a significant decline in creative inspiration. There was a strong tendency to conform to literary types, even the metre was required to conform to the stipulated standard. This left little scope for originality; hence poets resorted to far-fetched conceits and a recondite style of writing. Tootu, Ula, Pillai Tamizh and Kovai were the chief genres in vogue, though the total number of genres is counted as 96. Tootu describes the sending of a messenger by a love-lorn boy or girl to the other party; Ula describes the sensuous reactions of the ladies of a town when the hero drives in state through its streets. In Pillai Tamizh the stages (ten in number) through which a child grows up are described; the hero is usually popular God like Muruga or Krishna. Kovai is a genre where the hundreds of stages of love of a specific couple of lovers are minutely described. In addition to these (called the prabandhas), poets loved to write sthalapuranas on the many centres of religious interest; there is little of literary interest in them.

Poets were still writing such stylised, type-cast works in pedantic style when Subramania Bharati came on the scene in the beginning of this century. With his genuine fervour and in simple popular diction he sang not about kings and potentates, but on contemporary matters with which the people were very much concerned. In a short life time he had started a revolution in man's attitude towards literature and in all the decades that have followed, Bharati continues to serve as the model. His most illustrious successors were Bharatidasan, Ramalingam Pillai and Desikavinayakam Pillai; today there is a host of poets, some composing in the old style (but in simple, modern diction) and many in the new, emancipated style, the best known being Kannadasan and Surata.

The novel and the short story forms have had a rapid development in the last fifty years. The outstanding writers in the field of novel writing were Vedanayakam Pillai, Natesa Sastry and B.Rajam Iyer; they were followed by Arni Kuppaswamy Mudaliar, J.R. Rangaraju and Vaduvor K.Duraiswamy Iyengar who showed the influence of the West in their writing. K.S. Venkataramani wrote on simple themes with a great deal of idealism. R.Krishnamurthy (Kalki) is the celebrated father of the historical novel; he is succeeded by a host of writers of whom Sandilayan, N.Parthasarathy and Kovi Manisekharan are the most notable. The field of social novels is dominated by Jayakanthan whose artistic perception and courage in experimentation mark him off from all the others, among whom should be mentioned Akhilan, Lakshmi, Rajam Krishnan, K.N. Subramanian, Vasanti, Sivasankari and Indira Parthasarathy. T. Janakiraman should be mentioned as a writer of powerful novels with a central concept which was never banal but always fresh and generally unusual.

In the field of short-story writing, after V.V.S. Iyer and the Manikkodi school presided over by K.P. Rajagopalan and Pudumaippittan came Kalki, Devan, Sundara Ramaswamy, Jayakanthan and K.Alagiriswamy whose creations often turn out to be sparkling specimens of this most difficult form.

Play-writing has received a certain fillip from the popular media, the A.I.R. and T.V., but the quality of the plays cannot be ranked very high. Literary criticism is another field in which Tamil is yet to progress; K.N. Subramanian is the only critic of note writing today. The late K. Kailasapathy made notable contributions to literary theory and aesthetics. M. Varadanasanar, A.S. Gnanasambandhan, S.V. Subramanian and A.V. Subramanian have been the most notable contributors in the field of literary theory and aesthetics.

A.V.S

LITERATURE (Telugu). Telugu is one of the major Indian languages spoken by more than six crores of people all over the country. It is the official language of Andhra Pradesh, the land of Telugu with a population of about five crores. Telugu speaking people migrated to distant countries like South Africa, Mauritius, Malaysia, Fiji and contributed to the development of those countries in all spheres. Telugu is a sweet language sometimes referred to the Italian of the East. Eminent intellectuals like Haldane described it as the most phonetic language with a complete and beautiful alphabet.

Of the ancient works of Telugu literature available, Nannaya's Andhra Mahabharata (two and half parvas) is the first and the oldest. It belongs to the eleventh century. Nannaya in his Mahabharata referred to the language as Telugu, but its other name Andhra was mentioned in Kuvalayamala by Udyotana, a Prakrit poet of the ninth century. But Agathiam, the most ancient book on rhetoric in Tamil belonging to fifth century, referred to Telugu as Telugam. Thus Telugu is undisputedly the oldest name attributed to the language. Despite the fact that others called it Telugu even by fifth century, we do not have sufficient historical evidence that throws light on the state of Telugu language and literature before Nannaya, save the inscriptions.

The excavated stupa at Amaravati built in second century B.C. gives the first Telugu word 'Nagabu'. Perhaps it refers to the native Naga race or their deity Nagaraja. The snake-hooded men carved on stupa confirm the opinion that Nagas were the natives who had inhabited the region before the advent of Aryans. Andhra was first ruled by Satavahana kings succeeded by rulers of dynasties namely Ikshvakas, Brihatpalayanas, Pallavas, Salankayans, Vishnu kundins, etc. Prakrit was the lingua franca during the reign of Satavahanas and it was gradually replaced by Sanskrit. Those were the times when Gunadhy's Brihatkatha and Hala's Gatha sap-tashati were written. Gatha saptashati of first century A.D. contained many Telugu words and so the linguists opine that Telugu was in currency among laity while Sanskrit and Prakrit were patronized by the court. In fact many Sanskrit and Prakrit inscriptions, about ninety, contain Telugu regional and place names and the names of awardees of 'agraharas' (jagir villages).

The first inscription as it is available in Telugu script and language was that of Dhananjaya of the Cholas of Renadu laid in 575 A.D. found at Kallamalla village (Kamalpuram Taluq, Cuddapah District.) It is partially in a mutilated state. The other inscription found at Ramapuram (Cuddapah District) laid by Vasanta Pori, wife of Punya Kumara of Renadu Chola dynasty, is complete. Vipparti inscription of Jayasimha Vallabha I (641-673) and Ahadanakara inscription of Vishnuvardhana (718-752) are also important. Though written in Telugu, these inscriptions show the lingering influence of Sanskrit and Prakrit. It was the age in which the Telugu words of Dravidian stock slowly emerged, rubbed and refined by the influence of Sanskrit and Prakrit.

The year 848-49 in which Gunaga Vijayaditya of Eastern Chalukyas was crowned, also marked the beginning of a new era. The inscriptions were first set to metre during his reign. The stone inscription at Addanke laid by Panduranga, commander of Vijayaditya's armies, contains poems, besides prose. The poems were set to Taruvoja metre. The Kandukuru inscription and the Bezvada inscription of Yuddhamalla (950 A.D.) give us poems in Seesa and Madhyakkara metres. About 190 inscriptions written in Telugu script and language were found.

Therefore to say that Nannaya's Mahabharata is the beginning of Telugu literature, is contrary to all rationalistic norms and theories of literary evolution. The culminating poetic qualities like high seriousness, lucidity (which are the characteristics of Nannaya's poetry), can never be achieved like a revelation. Such high beginnings cannot be found in any literature. As such the Mahabharata is not the beginning, but the flowering of human intellect secured after many phases of literary evolution.

The song or ballad is the precursor of all metrical compositions. In fact folk songs like Prabhata padamulu, Parvata padamulu, Ananda padamulu, etc. referred to by Palkurki Somanatha (a later poet) are lost. The rustic men and women might have sung them to the accompaniment of musical instruments. The culmination of such songs could be seen in deshi (native) metres like Taruvoja, Seesa, Madhyakkara, etc. Besides the deshi metres Nannaya used marga (Sanskrit) metres as well.

Telugu was totally ignored during the reign of Satavahanas and other successive dynasties which patronized Sanskrit and Prakrit. The recognition of the native language by the cultured society was slow. Telugu acquired its prestigious position during the reign of Eastern Chalukyas.

The time was also ripe for the rendering of the Mahabharata into Telugu. Buddhism and Jainism lost their hold on the people. The degenerated faiths like those enunciated by Charyaka and Kapalika led to profligacy.

LITERATURE-TELUGU

There was unrest among the people. Kumarila Bhatta of 7th century and Shankara of 9th century already rendered signal services for the revival of Vedic religion. Tamil and Kannada versions of the Mahabharata had by then appeared. Nannaya responded to the call of the people, as expressed by his patron Raja Raja Narendra.

Nannaya (1028-1078) was the priest of Raja Raja Narendra who ascended to the Vengi throne 1022. He was a profound scholar and a poet of unsurpassed merit. His tasks were onerous. He had to bring order into the chaotic language and suitably adopt it in verse. He was called 'Vaganushashana' or the one who regulated and controlled the volition. Aided and encouraged by his friend Narayana Bhatta who was also a poet, he took up the task of rendering the Mahabharata into Telugu, but he left the work unfinished.

For two hundred years after Nannaya, no significant work was produced and the Mahabharata remained incomplete. Many political changes took place and Andhra was ruled by Tamil and Kanerese kings. Bitter rivalries persisted among the devotees of Shiva and Vishnu which influenced the literature as well.

Basaveshvara, minister of Bijjala, propounded the Virashaiva faith. Propped and supported by him, a storm raged and a new branch of literature (of Shaiva cult) sprouted. Vedic religion was looked down upon with contempt and the same fate awaited the Sanskrit language and metrics. Virashaivites aimed at preaching their religion in native dialect, metre and topic.

Nannechoda who wrote Kumarasambhava was the first of this Shaiva cult. His work was a confluence of marga and deshi schools. Kumarasambhava was the first prabandha where this genre in all its features reached its culmination. In his poetry, the chivalric, devotional emotion augmented by an innate poetic talent surged forth. It is generally agreed by many scholars that he lived in a period between Nannaya and Tikkana.

Among the scholar trio of Shaiva cult, Mallikarjuna (1100-1800) was prominent. His Shiva tatvasara reveals his contempt for other faiths. He was the precursor of Telugu Shatakas.

The next great poet of Virashaiva cult was Palkuriki Somanatha (1135-1199). His Basava purana and Panditaradhy charitra set to dwipada metre are the best among his works.

Following the foot prints of Shaivites, Vaishnavites also wrote books for the spread of their cult. Gona Buddha Reddi, a contemporary of Soman, set his Ranganatha Ramayana to dwipada metre. While Valmiki humanized Rama, Buddha Reddi attributed to him divinity. His sons Kachavibhu and Vithala Raja completed the book at their father's behest.

The restoration of Rama by the Ramayana paved the way to an atmosphere leading to the completion of the Mahabharata. The times necessitated the emergence of one who could visualize and preach the non-duality of Hari; and Tikkana (around 1187-1188), the next luminary after Nannaya to brighten the Telugu literary horizon for ages to come responded to the call. In his Nirvachanottara Ramayana, Tikkana propounded the desirable qualities in poetic diction. He believed that "the sound must seem an echo to the sense" and castigated the usage of unnecessary words even at the places of 'yati' or 'prasa'. The tasks of translation faced by Nannaya and Tikkana were different. Nannaya's part of the Mahabharata is episodic. He narrated the events in the lives of the Pandavas, left them in forest and died. The rest of the Mahabharata is an exact replica of life. Narrative style employed by Nannaya was unsuitable and Tikkana had to take recourse to dramatic style. It was a rare harmonious, subtle blend of marga and deshi schools; in him the styles of Nannaya and the later poets of Shaiva cult blended. He wrote the rest of fifteen parvas (books) of the Mahabharata starting from Virataparva. His characterization, especially of women, is exquisite.

Ketana (1200-1250), a contemporary of Tikkana, rendered Dashakumara charita into Telugu. Tikkana's disciple Marana wrote Markandeya purana. Manchana wrote Keyurabahu charitra. The author of Sumati shataka, a gnostic verse, Baddena, was a contemporary of Tikkana.

Then comes the last of the poetic triumvirate Errapragada 14th cent. was completed the remaining portion, the Aranya Parva of the Mahabharata, left incomplete by Nannaya and untouched by Tikkana. His task was unique, which consisted of combining the poetic styles of Nannaya and Tikkana, transforming into a perfect harmonious whole and he did it with matchless skill. Errapragada was the poet laureate of Prolaya Vema Reddi (1325-1353) of Addanki. His other works are Harivamsha and Nrisimha purana.

Nachana Somana (around 1344 A.D.) was a contemporary of Errapragada. He wrote Uttara Harivamsha. He was a poet of great talent, next to the poetic triumvirate.

Another work of merit belonging to this age was the Bhaskara Ramayana, a combined effort of Hulakki Bhaskara (around 1320) Mallikarjuna Bhattu, Kumara Rudradeva and Ayyalaraya. This age of poetic triumvirate, can also be called the age of translation or the classical age.

Srinatha (1380-1460), is the representative poet of the next age. He was the poet laureate of the Reddi kings of Kondaveedu and also the Vidyadhikari (a combination of the offices of poet laureate and Director of Education). He was a great scholar who always defeated his opponents in scholastic arguments; a poet who travelled the length and breadth of Andhra besides the neighbouring kingdoms of Karnataka, Odhra and other visiting the courts of various kings and making them happy by his scholarship wit, humour and poetic talents, in recognition of which he was once anointed with gold coins and given the Kavisarvabhauma (the poet-emperor).

LITERATURE-TELUGU

Srinatha's Maruttarat charitra, Salivahana saptashati and Panditaradhy charitra are lost. His available works are Naishadha, Bhimakhanda, Kashi khanda, Haravilasa, Shivaratri mahatmyam and Palanati viracharita. Kridabhirama is a work of disputed authorship. Most claim that it is written by Shrinatha, mainly basing their arguments on style, while others argue that the author is Vallabharaya. It was the first satire to bloom in Telugu literature wherein he depicted the society of the day.

Srinatha's Sringara Naishadha, a Telugu rendering of Sri Harsha's kavya, heralded a new era. Shrinatha was a young man when he undertook to translate it at the instance of Mamidi Singana. While rendering a work into Telugu, he said that one should pay heed to sound pattern and tone, bring the exact idea of the original, infuse the work with figures of speech, maintain propriety and avoid all impropriety.

Haravilasa was dedicated to his close friend Avachi Tippaiah Setti. His Kashikhanda was a veritable work of what he saw at Banaras. His heroic poem Palanati vira charita set to dwipada metre was an example of the democratic spirit of Shrinatha who descended from the high pedestal of high seriousness and majesty of neoclassical school to the popular level, encouraging patriotic feelings among people.

Shrinatha, while composing poems, gave equal importance to sound and meaning, thus setting an example to be imitated and followed for generations to come. Bammera Pothana (1420-) was a contemporary of Shrinatha. While Shrinatha was called Kavisarvabhouma (Poet-emperor), he was Kavi pravakta (poet-prophet) next to Tikkana. He was a great devotee of Lord Rama and a great poet. The numbers flowed from him as natural as his erudition and learning.

While the two of the epic trio the Mahabhrata and the Ramayana were already brought into Telugu, Bhagavata was yet to be translated into the language. It was Pothana who undertook the task of doing so. He knew the delicate undertones of the sound which recreate the celestial beauty in a poem. In the felicity of expression he was next to none.

Out of twelve skandhas (books) of the Mahabhagavata only eight skandhas (1 to 4 and 7 to 10 skandhas) were translated by Pothana. The other skandhas available were translated by Bopparaju Gangaya (fifth skandha), Erchuri Singana (sixth skandha) and Veligandala Naraya (eleventh and twelfth skandhas). All of them were his disciples. Apart from Bhagavata, Bhogini dandaka, Virabhadra vijaya and Narayana shataka are said to have been written by him.

Among the minor poets of the age Pillalamarri Pinaveerabhadra (last part of the fifteenth century) was prominent. His Shringara Shakuntala and Jaimini Bharata are famous. Nandi Mallaya and Ghanta Singaya, the twin poets wrote Varaha purana and Prabodhachandrodaya (1480). We have some works written with a palpable historic content in this age. Jakkana's (1375-1404) Vikramarka charitra and Anantamatya's (around 1435) Bhojarajeeya are such. Among them Gourana revived dwipada metre and wrote Harischandropakhya and Navanatha charitra. Following the example of Jakkana and Anantamatya, Koravi Goparaju wrote Simhasana dwatrinsika.

Without a word on the lyric trio the age is not complete. If Nannaya brought order into the chaos of language and revived it, Tallapaka Annamacharaya (1424-1503) revived the lyrical ballads. Annamacharya's lyrics are full of Vaishnavite devotional fervour. His deft handling of the Telugu language lends a quaint sweetness and beauty to his poems. He was called Padakavita Pithamaha (the grand father of lyrical ballads). His son Peda Tirumalacharya (1458-1554) and grand son China Tirumalacharya (1488-1553) along with Tallapaka Thimmaka following the foot-prints of their sire and grandsire wrote poems moving the hearts of the people for generations.

In this age we find new trends in translation; the style became prominently figurative; devotion and love are the elements that mark the poetry of this age.

The age of Prabandhas is compared by some scholars to the Elizabethan period in English literature. It can also be called the age of Krishnadevaraya of Vijayanagara called Andhra Bhoja, who patronized arts and letters. Himself a poet, he patronized Ashtadiggajas at his court which was called Bhuvana Vijayam.

Among the court-poets of Krishnadevaraya, Allasani Peddana (1470-1535) who was endearingly called Andhra Kavita Pitamaha (the grand father of Andhra poetry) by his King was the first and the foremost poet. His characters Pravarakhya and Varudhini of Manu charitra are unforgettable. Manu charitra is a harmonious blend of conflicting aesthetic moods or elements and characters, shanta rasa as embodied in Pravarakhya and shringara rasa as in Varudhini. In the felicity of expression Peddana is matchless.

Next in position and prestige to Peddana was Nandi Timmana. His Satyabhama in Parijatapaharana is the epitome of all feminine wiles and lures. Timmana presented her as 'khandita nayika' on whose model many writers of the southern school of literature portrayed their own heroines.

Ayyalaraju Rambhadra, wrote Rambhayudaya (about 1550) of Rama, in prabandhic style. Dhurjati's Srikalahasti mahatmya is a sthala purana written in prabandhic style. Tenali Ramakrishana's Panduranga mahatmya is also of the same genre.

Krishnadevaraya was also a poet who wrote Amukta-malyada. In 1530 A.D. Krishnadevaraya died. Among the poets who illumined the literary horizon after his death, Pingali Surana (1520-80) was a poet whose contribution to Telugu literature is unique. Unlike all other poets who sought puranas for their stories, he fabricated his own story in Kalapurnodaya (1550) and we find a comedy of errors in it. In a way the first seed of Telugu novel was sown by him. His other work is Prabhavati Pradyumna (1555). He also wrote Raghava Pandaviya (1545) entirely set with 'shlesha' (pun), narrating the stories of Rama and Pandava in the same poem. He was a pioneer of shlesha kavyas.

Ramaraja Bhushana or Bhattumurti who did not hesitate to call Surana's own story as an artificial pearl, was indeed, an imitator of Surana and Peddana. His dwyrathi or shlesha kavya Harischandra nalopakhya was written in a competitive spirit to outdo Raghava Pandaviya. Later, his Vasucharitra was written to outshine Peddana's Manu charitra. However the fact that he was a poet of real merit and scholar of unbounded knowledge cannot be denied. Besides the pedantic literary feats, there are many beautiful melodious poems. He was keen to the music, melody and euphony of the sound of word.

Tenali Ramakrishna's Panduranga mahatmya is also a major kavya and one among the best. His characterization of Nigama Sarma's sister is superb. He did not name her, perhaps aiming to make her the very epitome of endearing sisterhood which the Telugu people always cherish.

Among the minor poetry of this age Kandukuri Rudraya's Nirankushopakhya is famous. The story of Tondaradppodi Alwar, a devotee of Vishnu called popularly Vipranarayana, was portrayed by Sarangu Tammaya in his Vaijayanti vilasa and Chadalawada Mallaya in his Vipranarayana charitra. The story depicts the fall of a god-man infatuated by a woman.

Ponnaganti Telaganna was the mentor of all other later poets who wrote 'accha Tenugu' kavyas. He wrote Yayaticharitra. Gourana's dwipada kavya, Harischandro-pakhya was rendered into a major prabandha by Shankarakavi.

Thus ended the glorious sixteenth century. Arts and letters flourish when people are prosperous and civilized, leading a peaceful and quiet life under a stable government or a benevolent monarch like Krishnadevaraya.

Tanjore was the centre of hectic literary activity for more than one hundred and fifty years. Chemakuri Venkata Kavi occupied an honoured place in the court of Raghunatharaya. His Vijaya vilasa displays the beauty tenderness and sweetness of Telugu word. Vedam Venkatraya Sastri compared it to a garden where in the flowers of 'shlesha' (pun) and 'vyangya' (irony) bloom unaided.

Raghunadharaya (1600-1633) himself was a poet who wrote Valmiki charitra, Ramayana and Shringara Savitri. The rendering of Savitri into a 'shringara nayika' (romantic heroine) who originally in the Mahabharata was portrayed in shanta rasa, was an indication of the prevailing atmosphere of the day. The danseuses described in his Ramayana were none other than his court dancers, who occupied a position of honour and prestige and led a dissipated life unknown at any other time. The court dancers like Madhuravani, Ramabhadramba, etc. were not only connoisseurs of music and dance, but also women of deep erudition who were treated at par with other poets of eminence.

Sesham Venkatapati's Tarashahsanka, Samukaham Venkata Krishnappa Nayaka's Ahalya Sankrandana and Radhamadhava samvada, Muddupalani's Radhika hold mirror to the attitude of people and society of the day. They professed and practised their hedonistic philosophy under a puranic veil too thin to cover it. Hitherto in Telugu literature didactic and aesthetic elements were inseparable but these poets first visualized the essential independence of the aesthetic element from that of the didactic.

A significant feature of this age was the abundance of native dwipada works and yakshaganas (ballads) at the court of Tanjore. At Madhura, prose works in spoken language were written. Rayavachakam written by an employee of Viswanatha Nayaka is an important work among them, which serves as a bridge that connects the age of poetry and the ensuing age of prose. It is to be noted that Telugu was patronised in Madhura and Tanjore kingdoms, both Tamil speaking areas ruled by some Maharashtra kings.

In lyricism Ramadasu (1620-1680) of Bhadrachalam is the very incarnation of devotional fervour. Kshetravaya (1600-1680) set his lyrics Muvva Gopala padamulu to be enacted. The shringara rasa is expressed with the rhythmic movement of the hands and feet the facial expressions of the danceuse in his lyrical ballads. In the later lyricists like Tyagaraja (1767-1847) and others, musical element replete with devotion is dominant. The name of Tyagaraja is extremely popular not only in Telugu musical world but through out the length and breadth of India.

Vemana (1652) is the poet of gnomic verse Vemana shataka. The stanzas are famous for their pithy, short, epigrammatic expression. They are masterly satires on contemporary society. At some places the social criticism is mild and philosophical and at other places it is quite sharp. Of the galaxy of poets, that glitter in the Telugu language he is the most original. Shataka is a genre of verse characteristic to Telugu literature.

Tanjore and Madhura were lost to foreign invaders and the period between 1775-1875 was described by scholars as the age of decline. Nevertheless there was an incessant breed of poetical works, which trod the same beaten track.

However there were some poets of considerable merit; Kankanti Paparaju author of Attarama charita was one among them. Kuchimanchi Timmakavi (1684-1757) was also a poet of real worth who began writing 'accha' Tenugu kavyas. Vakkalanka Virabhadra kavi wrote Vasavadtta parinaya. Adidam Surakavi penned kavijanananjana. His Chandramati vivaha is reminiscent of Vasucharitra. The prabandhas written in the style of southern school of literature was Chitrakavi Singanarya's

Bilhaniya, Krishnadas's Radhakrishna vilasa, Sangameswara Kavi's Ahalya sankrandana, Chellapilla Narasakavi's Yamini purna tilaka vilasa. In shlesha kavyas Laxmana Kavi's Ravana dammiya was a work worth mentioning.

C.P. Brown, an English civilian, made an in-depth study of Telugu. His name will, for ever, remain in the history of Telugu literature. He got many important works of Telugu literature printed within a decade (1860-70). He wrote the history of the Telugu country. He was the first lexicographer in Telugu (Telugu to English and vice versa). Next to Brown, Collin Mackenzie, Robert Caldwell rendered meritorious service to Telugu language and literature.

Chellapilla Venkata Sastry (1870-1950), and Diwakarla Tirupathi Sastry (1871-1919), the twin poets, may be said to have been the links between the medieval and modern ages. Like Srinatha these poets toured the entire Andhra composing extempore poems. They were profound scholars. Despite their dynamic poetic activity there was nothing new or modern in their compositions. However many modern poets were inspired by them. Buddhacharitra and Devi Bhagavata are their great works.

The modern age seems to be an age of movements. Reformatory, political, romantic, radical and revolutionary movements succeeded one another. Of course none of these periods is exclusive.

The literature hitherto limited only to a sect had now reached the common man. Upto now it was meant either for religious instruction or for the pleasure of the elite. Kandukuri Vireshalingam (1848-1919) changed its course to reform the society. By religion he was an ardent follower of the Brahmosamaja and was above all superstitions of his time. He introduced diverse literary forms into Telugu literature. He was a poet, the first novelist (the first novel being his Rajasekhara charitra, 1880), the first essayist, playwright, the author of biographies including an autobiography and an editor of many journals. He was an uncompromising reformer who was sensitive to the plight of women. He propagated women's education and widow-remarriage, abolition of prostitution and child marriages. However literature was only a weapon for him to castigate the evil-ridden society.

Chilukuri Veerabhadra Rao (1872-1939) and Komaraju Venkata Laxmana Rao following the foot-prints of Kandukuri did meritorious service to Andhra history and language. Panuganti Laxminarasimha Rao's (1865-1940) essays of Sakshi (The spectator) were modelled on Addison's Spectator essays which are masterly satires on contemporary society.

Gidugu Ramamurthy endeavoured to reform the language. His Andhra Pandita bhishakkula bhasha bhesha jam exposed the uselessness of the fetters imposed on language. He propagated the use of the spoken language.

The tasks of Gurajada Appa Rao (1861-1915) were onerous. It was in him that the social reform of Kandukuri and the language reform of Gidugu had come together. His play Kanyashulkam pioneered a revolution. The theme of the play is to expose the evil of 'kanyashulkam' (bride-price). The characters Girisham and Madhuravani are unforgettable. Like Wordsworth he chose "incidents and situations from common life" and related them "as far as possible in a selection of language that was really used by men." His poetical works are Mutyala saralu, Nilagiri patalu, etc. "Love the country and enrich all that is good" was his message to the people. He made new experiments in prosody.

Kandukuri and Gurajada did not question the British rule in India. They did the spade work and prepared the ground for the seeds of political awakening to be sown by posterity. In 1905 Bengal was partitioned and 'Vandemataram' movement spread all over the country like wildfire. Andhra was not an exception to it. In 1907 Chilakamarti Lakshminarasimham (1867-1946) sang, telling the people how the high handed British herdsmen milk the cow (India), while the Indian calves weep.

Mangipudi Venkata Sarma sang the greatness of India in his poem 'Bharata Mata'. Rayaprolu Subba Rao's poems also were full of patriotic fervour. A number of poets came in succession singing songs of patriotism and social reform. Unnava Laxminarayana's (1873-1958) novel Malapalli was a landmark in Telugu literature, especially Telugu fiction.

Some of the educated young men of the day were influenced by English Romantic poets like Wordsworth, Shelley, Keats, Byron and moulded their poems on their model. Rayaprolu Subba Rao was the pioneer of this romantic movement which was popularized by Krishna Sastri. Rayaprolu wrote his Trunakankanam (1913), etc. and introduced platonic love in romantic poetry. Krishna Sastri's Krishna paksham (1925) and Urvashi are famous. Tallavjulla Sivashankara Sastry, Vedula Satyanarayana Sastry, Nayani Subba Rao, Basavaraju Appa Rao (1894-1933), Nanduri Sabba Rao, Duvvuri Rami Reddi (1897-1947), Pingali Lakshmikantham, Katuri Venkateshwara Rao, Vishwanatha Satyanarayana etc. followed suit. All the romantic features like subjectivity, nature-worship, love-element, etc. were dominant in their works. Nanduri Subba Rao's (1884-1957) songs of Yenki are close to the language of rustic men and women. Adavi Bapiraju (1895-1952) was a poet, painter and a novelist. His novels Himabindu (1946), Narayan Rao (1952), Konangi, etc are famous. Nori Narasimha Sastri's historical novels Narayana Bhattu (1948), Rudramadevi (1951) were also acclaimed.

During thirties of this century Telugu literature branched off into two different and distinct streams, which still continue. While the first was represented by Viswanatha Satyanarayana, the second was represented by Srirangam Srinivasa Rao. The former is traditional and romantic while the latter is radical, progressive and revolutionary.

Viswantha Satyanarayana was a literary giant whose indelible mark continued till his death in 1976. He was a poet, critic and novelist of unsurpassing merit. His literary output was abundant. The poet dreamed of the glory of the hoary past and translated it into his works. Among his works Ramayana kalpavriksha, which won the Jnanapith Award for him, Kinnerasani patalu, etc are famous. Among his innumerable novels Veyipadagalu (Vijayawada, 1947) Ekaveera (Vijayavada, 1947), Cheliyalikatta etc. are especially notable. He was the poet laureate of Andhra Pradesh till 1976.

The Telugu fiction developed in this age. Chilakamarti Narasimham's Gnanapathi is a humorous novel. Sripada Subramanya Sastri wrote many short stories. Munimanikyam Narasimha Rao introduced humorous element in his short stories. His Kantam is the epitome of the beloved housewife of the Andhra family. Gudipati Venkata Chalam introduced the concept of free-love in his novels and short stories. Short story is a dominant literary form of the present age and we have a galaxy of talented writers, both men and women.

The drama was initiated by Korada Ramachandra Sastry (Manjari Madhukariyam) and developed by Kandukuri, Dharmavaram Krishnama Charyulu, Kolachalam Srinivasa Rao, Chilkamarthi, Panuganti (Kantabharanam), Gurajada (Kanyashulkam), Vedam Venkatraya Sastri (Prataparudreeyam), Pakala Rajamannar, Swamy Sivashankara Sastry (Padmavati charana charana chakravarti, Dikshita dhuhita, etc) Bhamidipati Kameswara Rao etc. Atreya mastered the art of the writing one act plays and there are at present many talented playwrights of eminence.

The pioneer of Telugu literary criticism is C.R. Reddy, whose critical evaluation is tampered with an amalgamation of oriental and occidental norms of literary criticism. Critics like Rallapalli Anantakrishna Sarma, Vedam Venkataraya Sastri, Tapi Dharma Rao, Veturi Prabhakara Sastri, Nidadavolu Venkata Rao, etc. have raised Telugu literary criticism to a lofty, prestigious position.

Kandukuri Veerasalingam is also the harbinger of Telugu essay and he used it to reform the society; Gidugu Ramamurthy used it for the propagation of current language. His essays 'Popular Literature', 'Freedom to Use the Current Language' are well-known. In literary essays C.R. Reddy, Rallapalli Anantakrishna Sarma, Pingali Lakshminkantham, Viswanatha Satyanarayana are eminent. In historical essay the contribution of Mallampalli Somasekhara Sarma is unforgettable. Kalipathnam Kondaiiah, Gali Balasundar Rao, Vasantha Rao Venkata Rao, Mahindhara Nalinimohan have adopted the essay for scientific subjects. Humour and satire find a place in the present day essay and Bhamidipati Kameswara Rao, Munimanikyam, Mokkalapati Narasimha Sastry, etc. deserve mention.

Dasarathi, C.Narayana Reddi, Vanamamalai Varada charyulu are poets of high order who enrich the present day Telugu literature by their poetic composition brought in quick succession.

Srirangam Srinivasa Rao, known as Sri Sri, represents progressive school of poetry in Telugu literature. He is influenced by Marxism. In his Mahaprasthanam (1940) he gave the clarion call to the people to arise and awake. The poets who followed him are Arudra (Tvamevaham). Somasundar (Vajrayudham), Ramana Reddy (Adavi), Kundurti (Telangana) etc. Later, poets like Sri Sri, Arudra, Srirangam Narayan Babu violently brought surrealistic tendencies into poetry which did not survive because of its incongruity into the spirit of Telugu literature.

On 6th May, 1965 six poets Nagnamuni, Nikhileswar, Jwalamukhi, Charabanda Raju, Bhairavayya and Mahaswapna proclaimed themselves 'digambara kavulu' (the poets in favour of naked frankness in poetry) and they called their poems 'diks'. By writing poetry they wanted to identify themselves with every breathing, living individual to express the anxiety, unhappiness, weariness of their mind so as to infuse self-confidence and optimism in them.

The revolutionary writers like Sri Sri, Kodavantiganti Kutamba Rao, Rachakonda Viswanadha Sastry, K.V. Ramana Reddy, Varavara Rao, etc. and some of the digambara poets came to a common platform and established Revolutionary Writers Association and now write on themes which expose the exploitation of common man.

LITERATURE (Tibeto-Burman), The Tibeto-Burman languages of India with the exception of the Manipuri language are yet to develop as the languages of literature. None of the genres have evolved in the majority of them, as the publication of books in most of them is in a very infant phase. The languages of the family have vast treasure of oral literature, most of which is yet to be collected, compiled, edited and published. Manipuri, Lepcha, Limbu (ie Kirati), Chakma, Khamti, Laddakhi and Balti are the only Tibeto-Burman languages which have their own scripts. Other languages of this family did not have any script of their own, although the legends of many tribal communities point to the fact that they also once possessed the art of writing. As for example the Nagas have a widely prevalent legend, which says that in the beginning God gave the knowledge of reading and writing to both Nagas and Plainsmen and that the Nagas were given a book of skins, which perished soon, but the latter were given stone to inscribe their writing which could last. Lack of script was responsible for non-availability of any book in these languages upto the beginning of the last century. According to Manipuri legend, Atiya Gurushidaba (Lord Shiva) created Manipur during harichak (Satyayug) and taught his two sons—Sanamahi and Pakhangba through Meiteirol (Manipuri language). The alphabet used by him was the ancient script of Manipur, which was named as Shibakhar (the alphabet of Shiva). Shibiga (Instruction or order of Shiva) was the name of the religious book, which lord Shiva taught to his two sons and disciples. Some poems were composed during the reign of Pakhangba, the first king of Manipur. One such poem, which is very famous, was written for the invocation of the Sun-god. The book entitled Chakparol was written by the poet Langon Kurumba in the year 663 A.D. during the reign of the King Naothingkhong. Copper plate inscriptions of King Khongtekcha 765 AD contain Shibbu Phang naba lairik (the book of meeting Lord shiva).

The two epics entitled Khamba thoibi and Nura naha were written during the years 1074 to 1195 A.D. Loiyumba sillem (a book on State craft and administration) and Meitei Puya (Manipuri Puran) were also written in the same period. The writing of Kumaba (history of Manipur) was initiated in the year 1471 during the reign of Maharaj Kyamba. The ancient Manipuri literature also included the books entitled Uron waron and Nunglon-leiron (books on scientific subjects), Thiren (a book on researches) and Langbun (a book of magic and witchcraft).

The great love story of Prince Khamba and Princess Thoibi of Moirang is termed as the 'national romantic legend of Manipur' by Sunitikumar Chatterjee. It is the story of the happy love of the two lovers, which ended in a tragedy. According to Sunitikumar Chatterjee, the lovers lived during the reign of King Loyamba in about 1130 A.D. and the love story began to be treated in old Meithei ballads from the middle of the twelfth century. According to N. Khelchandra Singh, the lovers lived during the reign of the Moirang king, Chingkhü 'Telheiba, who was the contemporary of the Meithei kings, Moiramba (1278-1302) and Thangbi Lanthaba (1302-1434 A.D.), and the love story began to be treated in old Meithei ballads from the latter part of the thirteenth century.

The Lepcha language has a large number of very old manuscripts and only a few of them have been published as yet. It is believed that a large number of Lepcha manuscripts are lying in the possession of individuals and monasteries. The Lepcha script, it is believed, was invented in very ancient times by five scholars named During, Tugarab, Rapgay, Golay and Sayun. Some historians believed it to be discovered by Chador Namgyal, the fourth ruler of Sikkim of Namgyal dynasty. The invention of this script is also attributed to the Morang kings of Kirat dynasty by Imansingha Chamjong. This script is also known as Rong script, as the Lepchas call themselves Rong. A knowledge of this script is necessary for the publication of the old Lepcha manuscripts.

The old Lepcha literature mostly consists of Buddhist and other religious literature, law books etc, most of which was the result of the translation from Tibetan sources. Mainwaring's remarks in this context is worth quoting and needs re-examination. He writes 'in essaying to proselytize the people, they were not at all scrupulous as to their mode of conversion. They collected and destroyed the manuscript books of the Lepchas and translated into Lepcha parts of their own mythological works, under the name of Tashisung (History of Tashi), thus giving the pure and unsullied name of Tashi (which single and invisible god, the Lepchas had hitherto worshipped), to a foul and fabulous incarnation, whose pretended life they published, and this (with the indoc-trination of the host of other deities), they preached to the Lepchas as Gospel'.

It is said that the Kirat king, Shirijonga of the Ninth century gathered all the ancient books of his kingdom, invented a Kirat or Limbu script (which is also known as Shirijonga script) and spread learning through out the Kirat country. An inscription on the Western foundation of the Uma-Maheshwar temple at Mahalakshmi Tikhel located a furlong southward of Patan Tundikhel in Nepal is found to be inscribed in the Kirat script. A careful search for the manuscripts of the Kirat language is urgently needed.

Monasteries in Tawang, Bomdila and other places of Kameng district of Arunachal Pradesh have numerous manuscripts of the Mompá language. The books are written in Tibetan script. Laddakhi language has also a large treasure of Buddhist literature most of which is the translation of the original Sanskrit books or that of the Tibetan translations.

Balti language of the Baltistan region of Jammu & Kashmir state is said to have many books written in a strange script of its own. Now it is written in Persian script. Neither the old manuscripts of the Balti language nor any bibliography of the same is available to-day.

Recently, few old manuscripts of the Lepcha language like 'the book of !opun Biruchana' (1971), 'the book of Kumya-Kumshi', the proverbs (1971) and 'the book of Chyoten Munlom', the prophesies (a Buddhist religious book: 1972) were published from Kalimpong.

The study of the ancient literature of the Tibeto-Burman languages of India may give us an insight into the important aspect of the formation of the literary languages due to the influence of other languages. Karbi (Mikir) and Manipuri languages have the Ramayana in them. The source of the Khamti Ramayana is a subject of research and it is still in the form of a manuscript. The Karbi Ramayana is still alive in oral tradition. The Manipuri Ramayana is based on the Krittivas Ramayana. It remained in manuscript form for long and was published only recently. However, its comparative neglect was more than compensated the by the mass media which brought it nearer to the masses and popularised it. The Manipuri Ramayana conveys the central story of the Ramayana to the Manipuri masses through popular speech in the narrative poetry of the age of the Puranic tradition. Unlike Valmiki's work it did not follow the epic tradition. The Manipuri Ramayana in its artistic expressions was nearer to the vigour of the Manipuri society. Although the Ramayana was translated by Angom Kavi in Manipuri (who also translated the Mahabharata in Manipuri) only during the reign of Maharaja Garibniwaz (1709-1748), it is certain that the theme must have been known to the Manipuri people centuries ago. The copper plate inscriptions of King Khongtekcha (799AD) and the Vishnu temple built during the reign of King Kiyamba in the 15th century adequately hint at it. The copper plate inscription starts with the word Hari; it mentions the existence of 303 gods of which Hari is the Supreme. The importance of the Manipuri Ramayana was eclipsed for sometime in the nineteenth century due to the considerable neglect of the books written in the Manipuri script during the later part of the 18th century and 19th century and also due to importance of the Bhagvata tradition of the Bengal School of Vaishnavism. The Valmiki Ramayana has also been recently translated in Manipuri. L. Ibungoyaima Singh has translated the entire Ramayana. He has also translated Meghnadvadha (an epic based on the Ramayana theme) of the Bengali poet Michael Madhusudan Dutta into Manipuri. Translations of this book in Manipuri was also done by H. Nabadwip-chandra Singh and N. Ibobi Singh. Manipuri has also a condensed form of the Ramayana. It has a translation of Uttara Ramcharita of the Sanskrit poet Bhavabhuti. Kalachand Shastri and Braj Bihari Sharma (both Sanskrit scholars) have separately translated the Raghuvamsha of the poet Kalidasa into Manipuri.

All aspects of the Manipuri literature, specially the drama has been influenced by the theme of the Ramayana. Sita vanvas (exile of Sita) is a well-known Manipuri drama, which was written by Ashangbam Minaketan Singh in the early thirties of this century.

The Ramayana Kachar Jak was published in Bengali script in Tripuri language.

Literature of the various Tibeto-Burman languages has greatly been influenced by the Buddhist, Hindu and Christian religious themes. Apart from the Ramayana and the Mahabharata, Puranas etc. have also greatly influenced the folk-literature of the Tripuris, Manipuris, Bodos, Dimasas, Khamtis etc.. It has profoundly influenced the modern literature of the Manipuri language. Vasudev Mahakavya (an epic on the theme of the Mahabharata), Manipuri Bhagvata, Manipuri Gita and Manipuri Mahabharata are learned contributions of Pandit Kalachand Shastri. The translations of other religious books have also been published in Manipuri.

Kansavadh of poet Aramban Darendrajit Singh is based on the well-known Hindu religious theme. The translation of the Holy Bible and the Gospels and Christian religious Hymn books form the core of the literature of a large number of the Naga, Kuki-Chin and Bodo languages. None of these languages had any published literature upto the end of the third quarter of the last century.

The Bible was translated into the Garo language by the American Baptist Mission in the year 1984. The Bible was also published by the Bible society of India and Ceylon in the Garo language in the year 1925.

The Gospel of St. Matthew and St. Luke were published in the Lepcha language by the Bible Society of India and Ceylon in the year 1945, Father B. Stolke, a Roman Catholic missionary of Kalimpong, translated the Old Testament Bible History in the Lepcha language and published it in the year 1976. The Gospel of St. Mark was published in the Tangkhul language in the Bengali script in the year 1909. Bible translation in the Padam language was the only published literature in any language of Arunachal Pradesh before Independence. Ao was the first Naga language to have the translation of both new and old Testaments of the Bible. Mizo Kuki, Hmar, Paite, Ao, Angami, Sema, Lotha, Tangkhul, Kachari etc. have also the Bible translations. Some more languages are in the process of having it soon. Almost all the Tibeto-Burman languages of India have one or more gospels published in them. Christian religious tracts, pamphlets, hymn book abound in almost all the Tibeto-Burman languages.

From the point of view of creative writing, Tibeto-Burman languages of India may be classified into three broad categories:

(a) Undeveloped Languages:

The number of publications in each of the languages falling in this category hardly exceeds a dozen, which mostly include textbooks and religious literature. These languages are yet to have novels, dramas, poetry, biographies, short stories, travelogues etc. The majority of the Tibeto-Burman languages of India fall in this category.

(b) The languages which are yet to grow into literary languages, but with few published literary pieces may come in this category. Some of these languages are Mizo, Bodo, Gavo, Ao and Angami.

(c) Literary languages:- Manipuri alone may come in this category in the true sense of the term although it is doubtful whether all the literary genres have evolved to a comparable degree of maturity in the literature of this language.

It is difficult to get a composite picture of the literary scene of such a diverse group of languages. Nevertheless, one can get an idea about the literature of the Tibeto-Burman languages by knowing about the publications of religious books, text books, dictionaries, grammars, folk-literature, magazines etc. in each of them. It is also necessary to know about the various organisations (voluntary and governmental) engaged in the field of publication.

The Text book Production Branch of the Directorate of Education, Nagaland has published text books of various subjects for the primary classes. Language Primers and Readers for class II to VIII and text books upto class IV have been published in various subjects in Ao, Tenyidi (Angami), Lotha, Sema, Konyak, Chokri, Rengma, Kheza, Chang, Sangtam, Phom, Yimchungru, Khiamnagan, Kuki, Zemi and Liangmai languages.

Text books of different subjects for various classes of the Primary schools of Arunachal Pradesh were published by the then NEFA Administration in Mompma, Adi, Apatani, Aka, Singpho, Idu, Gallong, Bangni, Dafla (now Nishi), Wancho, Digaru, Niju, Nocte and Idu languages. These books were published in Devanagari scripts. These books are not used in schools as text books now as the medium of instruction in Arunachal Pradesh in the primary schools is English now-a-days and not the mother tongue.

Elementary school text books have been published in Lepcha, Limbu and Sikkimese, Bhutia by State Education Department (Text Book Branch), of Sikkim. A number of supplementary text books in these languages are under preparation.

Few text books in Tangkhul, Mao, Kabui and Garo languages were the result of individual endeavours. Some Kuki-Chin communities of Manipur have formed Literature Societies for the development of their respective languages, some of which are really very active in the field of the publication of textbooks. Hmar Literature Society and Paite Literature Society have done commendable work in this field. Literature Societies of Kom, Waiphei etc. are also active.

The Education Directorate of the Tripura has published some textbooks in the Tripuri language. Some books have been published in the Reang language also.

The General Lepcha Association, which was formed in Darjeeling in the year 1923, published an elementary Lepcha Primer in the year 1923, with the reprint of the same in 1957 and 1971. A Self-taught Primer was also published by the Association in the Devanagari script in 1971. Read Lepcha: An introduction to Lepcha Script by Ashit Chakraborty (published in 1977) is an important book for learning the old Lepcha script.

Garo Gramar and Garo Arithmetic were published by the missionaries in the early part of this century. Garo grammar of Rangam Momini, (published in the 1930s), and Garo Geography by Samson Sangma were also used as text books in the schools of the Garo hills district from time to time.

The primer of the Kachari language entitled Sigang-forainai Katta by Rev. G. Maclaren was published in 1947 by Eastern Himalaya Mission of Churches of Scotland; a Mara (or Lakher language) Primer and Reader by Reginald Arthur Lorrain are among the first few books published in Tibeto-Burman languages in India. A large number of textbooks in various languages of this family have recently been written and published by individual authors.

W.J. Willimson (in the journal of Asiatic society of Bengal in 1869) Mikir Vocabulary by Rev. R.E. Neighbour (1878) and later on by Sardoka Perrin Kay (1904) and Kachari Bara language by Rev. Sidney Endle (1884) were equally important publications. Shaiyang Miri (1886), and Khamti Languages, Grammar of Rangkhoh Lushi Kuki Language by C.A. Suppit (1887); An Outline Grammar and Illustrative Phrases etc. of the Ao Language by Mrs. E.W. Clark, An Outline Grammar, Vocabulary and Illustrative sentences of the Lotha Language by Rev. E.W. Witter (1888); J.F. Needham's An Outline Grammars with Illustrative Sentences, Phrase Book and Vocabularies of Singpho (1889); An Outline Grammar of the Deori Chutia Language by W.B. Brown (1895); Kachari Grammar of Manicharan Burman were in no way less important publications. The knowledge about the vocabulary of the Tibeto-Burman languages increased by the publications of Aka Vocabulary by I.D. Anderson (1896). Grammar and Dictionary of Lushai (Mizo) language by James Herbert Lorrain (1898); Lepcha Dictionary by col. G.B. Mainwaring and A. Grunwedel (1898); Dafla Language by R.C. Hamilton (1900); Tripuri Dictionary by Radha Mohan Deb Burman (1902); Garo Language by Rev. E.G. Philips (1904); Thadou Grammar by T.C. Hodson (1906); Grammar and Dictionary of Lakher Language by Fred W. Savidge (1908) and also by Reginald Arther Lorrain, An Outline Grammar and Dictionary of Dimasa Kachari Language by W.C.M. Dundas (1908) are the pioneering works in this field. Abor Miri Dictionary by James Herbert Lorrain (1910); Ao Naga Dictionary by Rev. E.W. Clerk (1911); Tangkjul Naga Grammar and Dictionary by Rev. W. Pettigrew (1918); Mikir Dictionary by G.D. Walker (1925); Yano Dafla Grammar and Vocabulary by N.L. Bor published in journal of the Royal Asiatic Society of Bengal (1938).

The Taroon Dictionary (1961) and the Garo English Dictionary by D.S. Nengminza, (1963) were published later on. Maximum work in the field of the publication of dictionaries, grammars, vocabularies and self-teachers of Tibeto-Burman languages of India is done by the Nagaland Bhasha Parishad, Kohima, a registered voluntary organisation. The Parishad, during 1970-80, published dictionaries, vocabularies, grammars and self-teachers of 34, 23, 16, and 13 Tibeto-Burman languages respectively. These publications link Hindi with these languages. Most of these books are written by B.B. Kumar with the help of others.

Lepcha Nepali English Dictionary and Paryaywachi Shabdakosh published by the Royal Nepal Academy are very useful publications. A Lepcha Grammar by K.P. Tamsang was published in 1978. The first Lepcha Grammar was written by Colonel G.B. Mainwaring of the Bengal Staff Corps. It was published by the Baptist Mission Press, Calcutta in 1876. The reprint of the book was published by Manjushri Publications, Delhi, in the year 1971. Mainwaring believed Lepcha to be an

LITERATURE-URDU

Ursprache (ie, an ancestor language of the humanity). According to him, it "possesses and plainly evinces the principle and motive on which all language is constructed". The importance of Mainwaring's work also lies in the fact that it introduces the old Lepcha script.

There are many grammars and dictionaries in the Manipuri language. Kalachand Shastri's Manipuri Grammar and the dictionaries by Raj Kumar Shitaljit Singh, Pandit Duijmanideo Sharma and Pandit Radha Mohan Sharma are worth mentioning. We also have the published grammar and dictionary of the Laddakhi language. A small Karbi language grammar was written by Rongbong Terang.

Apakho Gisik Ra Ahio by D.S. Rongmuthu is perhaps the only verse publication in the Garo language. Harendra W. Marak has translated in this language the Gitanjali of Tagore (1966). Translations of a book on Tagore and a drama of Shakespeare are also available. The Boro Sahitya Sabha is trying hard to enrich Bodo language and its literature. However, it will take time for this language to develop its literary form. Boro Hanini Metai Aro Colobata written in roman script by P.C. Bhattacharya is a collection of Bodo folk-tales and folk-songs. Miri Kitab is a publication in the Miri language by Arunachal Administration.

Neteya (stories) by Surrhozelie Angami is the only creative literary writing in the Angami language. Angami Naga Folk-lore of Ruzhukhrie Sekhose was published in the year 1964. His book on Gandhiji was published in 1962. Aesop Thedze Leshuda (Aesop's fables) is a translation by Hisale Pinyu. An Outline History of India is also published in the Angami Naga language.

Ao Folk Stories by Talitemjen, Jibani Sangrah (Biographies) by Mayangnokcha and D. Baruah and Gandhiji by Mayangnokcha are some of the Ao language publications.

Nagaland Bhasha Parishad has published books on Gandhiji in six Naga dialects, namely, Ao, Angami, Sema, Lotha, Konyak and Chakhesang. A Biography of Gandhiji is published in the Thadou language also. The author of the book is Ngul Khopao. Denzong Gandhiji Sakhon (Sikkim remembers Gandhiji) was published in the Lepcha language in the year 1969 on the occasion of the Gandhi's birth centenary. There are also books on Gandhiji in Karbi and other languages. Anal Thimdol by N. Volrung (1967) is published in the Anal language. Hmar Selected Folk and Fables by H. Thongrela and Manipur History by Ngulchopao are publications in Hmar and Thado languages respectively. Publication of Neichawng and Lakawile, both by T. Haokip, may be mentioned as important events in the history of Thadou literature. Venkhama, Rokenga, V. Hawlla, P.S. Changthu and Ramani are among the important Mizo poets and men of literature.

Journalism: The publication of Sengbaa (The dawn), a religious monthly magazine in the Garo language by the end of the last century by the American Missionaries and that of the Achik songbat (a Garo newspaper), Chibisik (The source of stream) Chadambe (The youth), Achik Kurang (The voice of the Garos) and Achikni Nokdang (The house of the Garo family) in the 1940's deserve mention.

The publications of Mutanchi (a literary magazine) and Mayal-Sut (a news bulletin) in the Lepcha language were started by General Lepcha Association, Kalimpong, in the years 1969 and 1976 respectively. The publication of Mayal Lyang, a literary magazine was started by Sikkim Lepcha Literary Organisation from July 1978.

A large number of newspapers and magazines published in Manipuri have made significant contribution towards the growth of Manipuri prose. In this context, the names of the magazines like Jyoti, Mingnaidabi, Lalitmanjari Manipur, Matam, Ritu etc. may be mentioned. A large number of newspapers and magazines are also published in the Mizo language from time to time.

Changthan (New path) edited by M. Kasmon is a news monthly of Kabui Naga language. Abam, a Christian religious quarterly and Ao Milem, a monthly by the Ao Students Conference were published in the Ao language. Ura dzu is published by Ura Academy, Kohima. It is an Angami language monthly.

The work done by the text-book branches of education directorates has been mentioned earlier. The Research Department of Arunachal Pradesh is also doing some work in this field. Prominent voluntary organisations working in the field of Tibeto-Burman literatures of India are, Nagaland Bhasha Parishad, Kohimal, Manipuri Sahitya Parishad, Imphal, Ura Akademy, Kohima, General Lepcha Association, Kalimpong, Sikkim Lepcha Literary Organisation, Gangtok, Hmar literature Society, Churachandpur, (Manipur), Paite Literature Society, Churachandpur, Komrhen Literature Society, Churachandpur; Bodo Sahitya Sabha, Kokrajhar and Ao Literature Society, Mokokchung. There are Literary Societies for other languages like Chang, Rengma, Waiphel, Gangte, Simte, Zou, but they are yet to make any significant contribution.

LITERATURE (Urdu). Enthusiastic advocates of Urdu have been tracing the origin of Urdu literature in prose and poetry to Amir Khusrau (1252-1327). Some other writers of yore have been credited with writing couplets and prose pieces in what is named as early Urdu. Scientifically these assertions are not tenable. Any attempt to connect Urdu with Amir Khusrau or Jahangir Samnani or Shaikh Farid of Chandra Bhan 'Barahman' cannot stand on firm ground.

Although Urdu, as a spoken language, has its origin and currency in north India, its first appearance as a vehicle of literature was in the south in the courts of Bijapur and Golkunda. The oldest specimens of Urdu poetry are two 'masnavis' of Shah Miranji, a Sufi saint of Bijapur, who died in 1490. His son, Burhan-ud-Din Janam (d. 1582), was also a good poet of Urdu.

No language can maintain a single form in the course of over five centuries and Urdu literature too underwent many a change in form, content and direction. Hence literary historians have divided the history of Urdu literature in to different eras, periods and schools.

The Deccan School: The post-Bahmani Deccan kingdoms, particularly Bijapur and Golkunda, were great patrons of Urdu literature. These kings were not only fond of literature, but some of them also created literature of high quality.

In Bijapur Ibrahim Adil Shah, who ascended the throne in 1580, was the first known patron of literature. He had two great poets in his court, Nusrati and Hashimi. Another good poet, Mirza, also belonged to the courts of the Bijapur kings. Nusrati is famous for his masnavi, Gulshn-e-Ishq and Alinama. Hashimi wrote Yusuf Zulaikha, a masnavi, and some 'marsias' and 'ghazals'.

Golkunda proved to be a still bigger centre of literature. Quli Qutb Shah, who ruled the state from 1580 to 1611, was a very good poet. In the court of his father, Ibrahim Qutb Shah, there was a renowned poet, Vajahi, who was famous for his masnavi, Qutb Mushtari (1609), and a book in prose, Sab Ras (1635). The later kings of this state, Muhammad Qutb Shah and Abul Hasan Tanashah, were good poets themselves and patronised famous poets like Ghawasi, Ibne Nishati, Bahri, etc.

The language of this period contained a lot of Deccani and Sanskrit 'tadbhava' words. The feelings expressed, whether erotic or religious, were simple and natural. Masnavi and marsia were the main forms with ghazals too appearing here and there.

The next period called the Aurangabad Period began when Aurangzeb conquered the states of Bijapur and Golkunda and established a temporary capital at Aurangabad and litterateurs flocked to this city in search for livelihood. The most famous poet of this period is Wali (1668-1744), though he was a wandering saint and no court poet. He wrote a masnavi and a collection of ghazals. Muhammad Husain Azad erroneously called him the first Urdu poet. Mirza Daood, Siraj, Izlat, etc. were other notable poets of this period. They wrote a language which is easily recognisable by students of Urdu. In this period ghazal was more popular and its technique more sophisticated.

The Delhi School: In any account of the Delhi school in Urdu literature, precedence has necessarily to be accorded to the discussion of the Delhi school of poetry over that of prose, because the former blossomed forth fairly earlier.

The Delhi School of poetry was not the product of any conscious literary movement. It was distinguished by the cumulative effect of its environment, characteristics of people, their social attitudes, styles and diction. It came into sharp contrast to the later day development of Urdu poetry at Lucknow much after the death of Emperor Mohammad Shah in 1748.

Serious attention came to be devoted to Urdu poetry Delhi only after the arrival of poet Wali Dakani in 1700 in the metropolis. His Diwan (1721) set the trend. Earlier, Urdu was deemed to be an uncouth dialect not refined enough for literary use. In Wali's hands, this seemingly inadequate vehicle for poetic expression, charmed the people with its sweetness and adequacy for the expression of the whole gamut of thought and feeling which till then was considered possible only in the Persian language.

Soon thereafter, a number of Urdu poets emerged on the scene including such luminaries as Shah Mohammad 'Aabru', Shiekh Zahuruddin 'Hatim', S.M. Shakir 'Naji', Mohammad Ahsanullah 'Ahsan', Nawab Amir Khan 'Anjam', Ghulam Mustafa Khan 'Yakrang', Shah Waliullah 'Ishtiaq' and Sadruddin Mohammad Khan 'Faiz'. Most of these were equivocal poets (Ihaam-go), the principal merit of their compositions being the employment of words with more than one meaning. Soon after, the rising generation of poets rightly discarded this inhibiting factor and wrote in a simple and natural style. Chief among these poets were Mir Taqi 'Mir', Mirza Mohammad Rafi 'Sauda', Khwaja Mir 'Dard' and Qayamuddin Khan 'Qaim'. Mir excelled in ghazal's love themes and pessimism reflecting the mood of the period. Sauda's versatility exhibited itself primarily in panegyrics and satires, and Dard was the chief exponent of Sufistic modes of thought and feeling.

These poets also greatly enriched the language, translating and Indianising many Persian idioms, phrases, sayings and compounding verbs, thus giving it a vast store-house of vocabulary and diction. In fact this period of creative activity in Delhi not only founded a pattern of poetry, but also provided its linguistic superstructure. The compositions of these poets were marked by sincerity of feeling, depth of emotion, simplicity of expression, high seriousness and consciousness interspersed with a happy blend of Persian phraseology. Mir wrote about his style thus: 'Though my verses are appreciated by the highly placed, I converse really with the masses.'

This all-round fecundity of expression came to a halt with the death of Emperor Mohammad Shah in 1748 when

LITERATURE-URDU

Delhi was pillaged by foreign free-booters like Ahmad Shah Abdali and Indian insurgents like the Mahrattas, Sikhs, Jats, and Rohillas. This drove out of Delhi all that was worthy in learning and art and craft, only to find, later, a new haven in Lucknow, the seat of Nawab Asafuddaula, a great patron of art and learning. Under his sheltering bounty and that of some of his high officers, Sauda, Mir, Hasrat, Insha, Mus-hafi, Jurat and others kept up Lucknow the in undefiled tradition of the Delhi style of poetic composition.

By the end of the first quarter of the 19th century, a new generation of Urdu poets appeared Lucknow, headed chiefly by 'Nasikh'. They broke away from the tradition of Delhi poetry, discarding many idioms and archaic words in vogue in Delhi and substituting them with words and phrases of their own coinage. Floridity and over-ornamentation were, generally speaking, the salient features of their poetry.

Poets like Zauq, Ghalib, Momin, Shah Naseer and Zafar were the principal exponents of Urdu poetry in Delhi in the opening half of the 19th century. Though all of them mainly subscribed to the Delhi tradition of poetic diction, some of them also made their individual contributions. Thus, for instance, Ghalib, in his very brief Diwan, gave Urdu poetry a rich infusion of Persian phraseology and intellectuality. Momin introduced the element of intricacy and even obscurity to his poetic compositions chiefly consisting of ghazals.

The Delhi School of prose began only with Mir Amman of Delhi who was associated with the Fort William College, Calcutta. At the instance of East India Company, he wrote his Bagh-o-bahar which was intended to teach the trading officers of the company to use the Urdu language correctly in dealing with Indians. The book acquired instant popularity when it was published in 1803. The establishment of the Delhi College about the year 1825 and the Vernacular Translation Society in 1843, produced many competent translations of English books into Urdu. Many reputed scholars including Ramchandra Zakaullah, Pyarelal and Ziauddin, either teachers in the Delhi College, or associated with the Translation Society, contributed generously to the development of Urdu prose in Delhi. Later, Ghalib's letters and Saiyid's writings and many newspapers in Urdu made invaluable contributions to Urdu prose. The Delhi prose writers preferred to write in a direct and simple style as distinguished from the ornate manner of their counterparts in Lucknow.

The Lucknow School: The Lucknow School of Urdu literature flourished in the first quarter of the nineteenth century when most of the poets and litterateurs of repute, who had migrated from Delhi to Lucknow in the closing half of the eighteenth century, had died. They had left behind a very large number of poets born and educated in Lucknow and its neighbouring areas. They shared with the people of Avadh a feeling of inferiority as compared to the Delhi poets where the Mughal Emperor was supposed to be the sovereign king over the ruler of Avadh, who was called the Emperor's Nawab-Vizier.

The de jure political ascendancy of Delhi was allowed to spill over into the field of letters, and it was taken for granted that the Delhi idiom of Urdu was superior to the Lucknow idiom, and that the literary worth of the poets and prose writers of Delhi had incontrovertibly an edge over the merits of their Lucknow counterparts.

In 1819, the East India Company crowned the Nawab-Vizier Ghazi-ud-Din Hyder as King of Avadh, independent of any suzerain. This political upgrading boosted the morale of poets and prose writers of Lucknow immensely, and they began aggressively to get even with the Delhi claimants of literary superiority, losing no time in disowning the authority of the Delhi school of Urdu literature. They made drastic changes in the diction, style and mood of their creative writings which became markedly distinct from the products of the Delhi School.

Pioneers in this break from the Delhi tradition were the poets like Sheikh Imam Bakhsh 'Nasikh' and his contemporary Khwaja Hyder Ali 'Aatash'. They discarded many idioms and archaic words and phrases used in Delhi and introduced words and phrases of their own mintage. Stress fell on purity of words and laxity in the scanning of verses was banned. The genders of many nouns, in vogue in Delhi, were altered. Growing emphasis was laid on ornamentation of expression. Resort to rhetorics became the rage among the writers of poetry and prose alike. The 'marsia' form of poetry, which had already made great strides in Lucknow during the century and had, indeed, achieved its highest perfection, happily, in a large measure, escaped the baneful effect of this prevailing artificiality. In ghazals, the Sufism was largely supplanted by sensuous and sometimes fanciful romanticism. In order that all available rhyming words might get utilised in ghazals, this lyric form of poetic expression was sometimes drawn out into inordinately annoying lengths.

Prominent among the disciples of Nasikh and Aatash during the century were Mohammad Raza 'Barq', Imdad Ali 'Bahr', Mehdi Hasan 'Abad', Khwaja Mohammad 'Wazir', Mir Ai 'Ausat', Hatim Ali Beg 'Mehar', S. Ismail Husain 'Munir', Nawab Mohammad Khan 'Rind', Pandit Daya Shankar 'Naseem', Mir Wazir Ali 'Saba',.

During the closing half of the nineteenth century, amongst the foremost composers of ghazal were Muzaffar Ali 'Asir', Agha Hasan 'Amanat', Khwaja Asadullah 'Qalaq', Amir Minai. Wajid Ali Shah, himself a prolific writer, patronized many a poet and litterateur. Mir Babar Ali 'Anis' and Mirza Salamat Ali 'Dabir' were the masters of the elegiac verse, marsia. In the hands of these masters, marsia attained great heights. They invested it with such a variety of moods, mellifluousness, charm, novelty of expression and poignancy of emotion that it came to be granted on all hands that they were unmatched in this form of poetic composition.

In Urdu prose, the ornate style was introduced by

Mirza Rajab Ali Beg 'Suroor' who wrote his famous long tale, Fasana-e-Ajaeb. He adopted this style just to lower in public estimation the simple and homely style of Bagh-o-Bahar, an elegant and popular tale written by Mir Amman of Delhi and published in 1803 by the Fort William College, Calcutta. Suroor wrote about half a dozen such tales employing rhymed and also otherwise rhetorically ornamented sentences. This style soon enough gained such a popularity in Lucknow that books on almost all subjects were, for about the next succeeding fifty years, written in imitation of this florid, over-ornamented prose. Even private letters exchanged between educated persons bore the stamp of this artificiality. This ornate style came to an end in the last half of the nineteenth century when, soon after 1857, Munshi Nawal Kishore started his press and began to publish Urdu books in large numbers. He also started a daily newspaper, Avadh Akhbar. The rise of journalism and many translations from classical languages as well as from English left little room for ornamentation. New practitioners of the art of prose-writing like Ratan Nath 'Sarshar', Abdul Halim 'Sharar' and Mirza Muhammad Hadi 'Ruswa', who were conversant with English literature, began writing in a direct, polished language, without any attempt at ornamentation. The ornate style associated with the Lucknow School of literature which had carved for itself a special niche in the history of Urdu literature, however, did continue in some form or the other. This is reflected in the Lucknavi speech even today.

Next comes the era which is called the Ramification Era. It extends to the modern times. The main feature of this era is that whereas in the earlier eras pioneer poets blazed new trails without reacting to any particular trend of their predecessors, in this era they reacted to it and later formed groups with adequate theoretical bases. In the earlier part of this era, poets and writers formed no groups, but they declared unequivocally that they were writing as a reaction to certain trends that they did not like. Hence, although the time factor is very much present there, it will be better to analyse the literature of this period of over 100 years in terms of trends.

Actually Hali and Azad played a dual role in their time. As representatives of refinement, they broke new grounds in the field of literary criticism and literary history. But they also started new movements in the field of creativity and wrote such poetry as was not conceived of by their predecessors.

In the post-1857 period, India felt a great impact of western culture directly. Hali and Azad agreed with Sayyid and the British educationists of their times that Urdu had developed 'lifeless' poetry which should be replaced with the 'healthy' western, particularly English, literary trends. Thus, they wrote small poems describing natural scenes or advocating moral and social values. At the same time a subdued sort of national consciousness also began to emerge in literature.

Besides Hali and Azad, some other poets like Ismail

Merathi, Durga Sahai Suroor, Suraj Narain 'Mehr', Shibli Nuamani, Dattatreya Kaifi and others etc. came up. They wrote a very healthy sort of literature for children and adults advocating moral and social ideals. The language written by them was naturally simple, fluent and attractive.

But the over-dependence of the companions of Sayyid Ahmad Khan on western values and their almost total rejection of the literary trends of Persian and Urdu resulted in some very strong reactions. Three great poets challenged this dependence on the West in their own ways. They were Akbar, Chakbast and Iqbal.

Akbar Allahabadi (1846-1921) rejected all western values in favour of the traditional values of north India. He ridiculed not only English etiquette, English food, English dress, etc., but also denigrated the new ways of city life: he did not like piped water supply and type-print in Urdu or social reforms like ending the 'purdah' and the stress on women's education. He was not successful in his social mission, but attained a great success as a humorist since whatever he said was in a humorous vein.

Braj Narain 'Chakbast' (1882-1926) fully upheld the social, moral and cultural values of his time. He was a great advocate of the blending of the useful modern practices with the inherently powerful elements of tradition. As a poet of patriotism and natural philosophy, he is peerless.

Muhammad Iqbal (1877-1938) was a visionary. He stood for a worldwide advance towards moral goals on the basis of Islamic values and considered Christian asceticism, imperialism, nationalism and democracy great hindrances. On account of the novelty of his thoughts, he has acquired much popularity, but also has created much confusion.

There was naturally a reaction to the rejection of traditional forms like ghazal and over-socialisation of literature. This trend held its sway in the twenties and thirties of the century and re-established ghazal as the finest form of poetry. Shad Azimabadi, Hasrat Mohani, Asghar Gondvi, Jigar Moradabadi and Fani Badayuni are the famous poets of this period. They made vigorous emotional appeals based on Sufism. Firaq Gorakhpuri too should be included (though he rejected Sufism and sided with the progressives) because he was perhaps the most successful ghazal composer. A formalist school, comprising the disciples of Dagh like Nuh Narvi, Simab Akbarabadi, Josh Malsiani, Dil Shahjahanpuri, etc. also developed side by side.

The progressive trend was mostly an offshoot of a political and social philosophy and, perhaps, grew out of the reformist and socialisational trend. It advocated setting up of an economic order ending exploitation of man by man. It did not reject ghazal, but certainly gave it a secondary place. A strange feature of this trend was that though in the beginning it spread its message in a united way in all languages and advocated cooperation among the various languages, in the later period the spirit of cooperation could not be the same in some of these intellectuals. Prominent names among progressive writers in Urdu are Josh Malihabadi, Faiz, Ali Sardar Jafri, Kaifi Azami, Ghulam Rabbani Taban, Jazbi, Jan Nisar Akhtar, etc. Some uncommitted poets like Shakeel Badayuni, Anand Narain Mulla, Ravish Siddiqi, Fitrat Wasti, etc. also kept individuality, based on romanticism, despite the spate of literary 'isms'.

As a reaction to the progressive trend, there began in the mid-fifties of this century an individualistic trend known in Urdu is 'Jadidiyat'. At present it has encompassed all young writers. These poets have rejected old and traditional symbols and created new ones, but have given greatest importance to ghazal, though they also use free verse started by the progressives. They shun social thoughts and theories and concentrate on the psychological problems of the individual.

Being the current trend, it is difficult to point out to its representative poets. Some prominent names are Vazir Agha, Gopal Mittal, Waheed Akhtar, Shaz Tamkanat, Ahmad Faraz, Bani, Shaharyar, Muzhar Imam, Shamsurrahman Faruqi, Bashir Badr, Nida Fazli, Azad Gulati, Shamim Hanafi, etc.

Besides poetry, which still remains the most important part of Urdu literature, the 20th century also saw the development of some other literary forms. The most important one is fiction. In this field Prem Chand still holds the pride of place. Other prominent names are Krishan Chander, Rajender Singh Bedi, Ali Abbas Hussaini, Ram Lal, Joginder Pal, Qurrat-ul-Ain Haidar, Ismat Chughtai, Manto, etc. Most of the fiction writers lay stress on social values like equality, freedom, cooperation, etc. The new individualistic trend has also thrown up some fiction writers like Intizar Husain, but the strangeness of their style prevents them from being popular.

Drama is rather weak in Urdu. Only a few names like Imtiaz Ali Taj have emerged. But humour has made great strides. Besides the bygone giants like Azim Beg Chughtai and Shaukat Tanvi, new names like Yusuf Nazim, Wajahat Ali Sandilvi and Shafiq Farhat are also emerging.

LITERATURE AND MUSIC (Pan Indian) In the case of society, the culture prevailing at any particular point of time is invariably a sumtotal of diverse civilizing forces acting on the collective psyche—either simultaneously or successively. Along with other shaping powers, fine arts, performing arts, and the composite arts also contribute to the eventual form that a culture acquires. A collective view of the arts hence proves to be an efficient indicator of the quality of societal mind. Of course, a collective view of the arts is not always easy to realize. When we contrast the arts with other cultural segments like sciences, religions etc., the arts seem to function as cognate entities. It is against this background that a study of the interrelationship of various arts becomes important for any consideration of cultural dynamics. The present attempt to examine the mutual influences of music and literature in India is therefore to be treated as a part of a larger cultural investigation.

Perhaps the term 'influence' is, to a certain extent, premature at this stage. Can one really enumerate the ways in which arts act on each other? In a broader framework, is it possible to generalize about specific arts which are found to influence specific other arts? Further, can we correlate certain societies with such 'specific' relations between two or more arts? Moving still further and more ambitiously, can one maintain that all arts are governed by similar tendencies in a given period? In the event that we do not feel inclined to theorize about the developmental pendulum-swings of arts taken as a whole, is it possible to lay down separate principles of evolution for each of the arts? These and a number of such questions arise the moment two or more active arts are brought together for examining their cultural roles. The complexity of the phenomenon is further compounded in the Indian context because more than a dozen, regional literatures and musics flourish, and two, fully developed, active systems of art-music function side by side. Added to this is the still uncharted tribal world.

Briefly, one can say that interrelationship of arts is fundamentally characterized by a relative and mutual dependence or independence. For example, literature and architecture can be said to be independent of each other, while sculpture can be said to be dependent on painting. Secondly, the threefold classification of arts indicates that arts falling within the same group can be assumed to have closer interrelationships. In this connection, instances of music, drama and literature will easily come to mind. Thirdly, it is possible to maintain that in a particular society and at a particular stage, non-art forces active in the political, social, religious and economic spheres might prove extraordinarily decisive in respect of the nature, extent and effect of interrelationship of various arts. And finally, the transformation of the communications phenomenon as brought about in the present century is so rapid and total that all theoretical formulations concerning all interrelationships are likely to turn out to be merely tentative probings into the unknown. When viewed against the cyclorama of the revolution in all communication, all art-theories so far consecrated are in danger of becoming obsolete.

Under ordinary circumstances, it would have been logical at this stage to trace the literary development in the customary manner, juxtapose musical developments along with it and then try to judge whether the latter has influenced the former. The backbone of such an inquiry would have been the historical-chronological data and such other factual information. However, apart from the practical problems posed by the multiplicity of literatures and musics of folk-variety as well as by the legendary indifference of the Indians in chronological precision, the major difficulty to be reckoned with is of a conceptual nature. An opening query like what is literature evokes in India a response that is quite baffling. According to the customarily accepted answer to the above question, literature is understood to be the whole body of imaginative prose and poetry existing in written form in a particular society and often at a particular period. This connotation of the term is too well-established to be totally side-tracked but a qualifying note needs to be sounded.

The etymological tie-up of the term literature is with the word 'letter'—i.e., a written or a printed sign that stands for a particular sound. (It is interesting to note that a learned man is often described as a man of letters.) In India, there are two terms which are understood to correspond to it. They are 'vangmay' and 'sahitya' respectively. It is to be noted that both of them do not have any reference to the aspect of 'being written'. In addition, the term 'vangmay' is openly related to 'vak' i.e., voice. Further, it is recorded that though existence of imaginative prose and poetry dates back to the Vedic period (c. 2750-500 B.C.), the use of the term 'sahitya' arose probably after the seventh or the eighth century. It was in this period that poetry was defined as the science called 'sahitya'. Another noteworthy fact is the ancient computation of human arts as found in works like Kamasutra by Vatsyayana. Vatsyayana (200 A.D.) shows poesy and writing (i.e., lipishastra) as separate arts.

The inferences are unambiguous: 1) The usual chronological-Historical method of tracing 'literary development, might not prove fruitful under Indian conditions because the concept of literature itself becomes highly contested and it therefore becomes necessary to define literature with a flexibility that will allow inclusion of the overwhelmingly oral manifestation of the literary impulse in India.

2) At the risk of appearing casual in our approach, we may have to seek answers to 'literary' questions in music because nothing is known to be so oral-aural as music—especially in India. The rather unusual strategy will thus be to follow guidelines provided by the oral tradition to discuss matters so far pre-empted by a total reliance on the written expression. Further, considering that Indian musical expression is primarily vocal, the way it has dealt with its own musical problems will be relevant even in respect of methodology followed in literary investigations.

Quite unnecessarily, oral tradition has been defined in too literal a fashion. As a result, literary thinkers have assumed that the ability to read and write and the oral mode of literary expression are mutually exclusive. Obviously this is hardly tenable and India compels us to reject such a simplistic definition.

In India, oral tradition ranges widely from music to medicine and from judicial practices to philosophy. It is to be remembered that the pervasive persuance of the oral tradition was not a case of making a virtue out of necessity. In other words, oral tradition was not cultivated because Indians were ignorant of penmanship. Writing and cognate activities existed in the Indian antiquity in abundance. B.S. Naik has pointed out various facts which prove that writing was known even during the times of the Rigveda. Some of the interesting details that he has provided are as follows:

a) Panini (800 B.C.) mentions lipi; lipikar etc.

b) The Arthashastra by Kautilya (400 B.C) warns against the doubtful efficacy of writing in keeping knowledge secure.

c) In 300 B.C., there were two scripts in circulation in India, namely the Brahmi and the Kharosthi. In fact, Lalitvistar, a Buddhist work, mentions the names of 60 scripts.

To conclude, oral tradition does not rule out existence, knowledge and use of writing. It means coexistence of the written and the spoken word with the difference that the latter is clothed with a special sanction and validity. In this connection Winternitz has rightly observed, "From such facts one would conclude that at the time, that is, in the fifth century B.C., the idea of the possibility of writing books had not as yet occurred at all. Such a conclusion, however, would be too hasty, for it is a strange phenomenon that in India, from the oldest times, upto the present day, the spoken word, and not writing, has been the basis of the whole of the literary activity. Not out of manuscripts or books does one learn the texts, but from the mouth of the teacher, today as thousands of years ago...Authority is possessed only by the spoken word of the teacher. As in the case of the unwritten constitution of England, it is not the absence of being written that makes the tradition 'oral' but the importance attached to the oral-aural processes by the users in the communication acts. The deep-seated preference for the oral tradition is due to many reasons but not knowing writing is certainly not one of them

Apart from the peaceful coexistence of the oral tradition with the art of writing, the said tradition also incorporates the feature of being 'aural'. The tradition used and still uses the touchstone of 'how it sounds to the ear' in case of expressions falling within its purview. The hearers and the sense of hearing become the conditioning factors and the ultimate product shows unmistakable traces of their operation. In this connection Winternitz has observed, "The work of the poets, too, were in India never intended for readers, but always for hearers". The aural aspect mentioned here clearly brings out the fact that in India the chances are that a literator will be in essence a performer like a musician. It is natural for him to pick up features like improvisation, audience-participation, stylization etc. from a musician. In the final evaluation of any literary products and in fact, in any attempt to comprehend their total import, the musico-literary mode of gestation and presentation must be borne in mind in the Indian context.

Almost as a corollary to the facets of oral tradition follows the special role assigned to the Guru, the preceptor. He is an indispensable link in the process of communication irrespective of the content of the message involved. Unless he decoded the message, the texts remained a body of letters which were almost unintelligible. It meant that teaching was not necessarily confined to learning of subjects considered obscure. It was also understood that teaching was not an exchange or any transaction of commodities. Teaching was a sacred process of communication of the highest type of knowledge. Whether it was in the home of the Guru, as in the early Vedic times or in the renowned educational centres like Varanasi and Takshasila during the Buddhist times, education was Guru-oriented. Rather unfortunately, Winternitz uses the term 'transmission' to describe the educational processes initiated by the Guru, but his statements bear out the sacredness associated with the high office of the Guru. He says, "Therefore, to a teacher, as the bearer and preserver of knowledge, the highest veneration is due, according to the ancient Indian law; as the spiritual father he is venerated, now as an equal, now as a superior of the physical father; he is looked upon as an image of God Brahman, and to him who serves the teacher faithfully and humbly, Brahman's heaven is assured...A book existed only when and only so long as there were teachers and pupils, who taught and learned it." In all probability the didactic element of the Indian literature is genetically connected with the characteristics of the oral tradition briefly mentioned here. The line of literary development in India to be traced here passes through music because it illustrates best all facets of oral tradition. However, this does not mean that literature cannot be directly related to the oral tradition. For example, the Sutra literature in India shows a direct connection with the oral tradition without the intermediary role of music. This is so because with the extraordinary compression of meaning and the consequent essential role of the Guru as interpreter of the meanings implied in the Sutras, they form a link with the oral tradition and its norms. Winternitz remarks, "...The pupil memorized only these aphoristic sentences receiving the necessary explanations from the teachers...This peculiar Sutra style originated in the prose of the Brahmanas." Elsewhere he also points out that the abundant use of phrases which are literally translatable as 'This here' indicates the oral presentation of the material. This too is an instance of literature linking itself directly with the oral tradition to formulate a stylistic device.

It is of course to be expected that Indian literary development taken as a whole did not share its making at various periods with the oral tradition in equal measure. Perhaps it could be said that this phenomenon of partaking of each other's characteristics went on decreasing as individual arts became more and more differentiated and the genetic links weakened. However, there is no doubt that the oral tradition and its immediate consequences provided cultural and creative archetypes to the successive generations of Indian artists. Today the trend is to attribute various motives to the Vedic priesthood for their sedulous efforts to keep the oral tradition inviolate. The motive hunting need not concern us but the effects of the perpetuated oral tradition merit our attention because factors like vastness of the country, illiteracy of the majority of the population and the twists and turns of the media-operation are bound to make the spoken word more important—culturally as well as educationally.

It has been proved that the pre-Aryan Indian civilization, known generally as 'Indus', met its final destruction before 2750 B.C. The Aryans entered India sometime during the period 3300 B.C.—3200 B.C., and the first firm foothold of the Aryans was established in Brahnavarta in 3102 B.C. Thus, for about five hundred years the Harappan and the Aryan cultures coexisted, though in a warring state.

Under the circumstances, is it possible to comment on the culture of the pre-Aryans as a separate culture? Or, to put it in other words, is it not possible to maintain that the consideration of the pre-Aryan and the Aryan cultures virtually means grouping them together? The chronological overlap and the law of the cultural conquest of the political conquerors both encourage this point of view. The evidence for the musico-literary investigation is naturally very scant. Yet one can hardly write off the Harappans culturally, as Basham seems to have done. He says, "They were not on the whole an artistic people. No doubt they had literature, with religious epics similar to those of Sumer and Babylon, but these are forever lost to us". It is difficult to agree with Basham's description of the Indus-people as non-artistic. Their prosperity and intense trading activities; their achievement in glyptic and modelling arts and their ritualistic religion suggest conditions congenial for a thriving artistic life and music and literature cannot be excluded in this assessment. In fact, the Lothal excavations have unearthed a bridge of a two-stringed instrument and organologically this indicates a finer musical culture. Yet, it has to be admitted that the enquiry of the musico-literary relationship assumes a discernible body only when we consider the Vedic period proper.

The Vedic Literature is coextensive with the four Vedas, Brahmanas, Aryanakas and the Upanishads. Due to their content and the overall purpose, the latter three literary manifestations are independent of music. Of the four Vedas, Samaveda is in all respects a music-oriented redaction of the Rigveda—though some of its verses were of more ancient origin (out of the total 1810, about 75 are not from the Rigveda). Here, the influence of music on literature is very obvious. As Winternitz comments, "...the Samaveda Samhitas are nothing but collections of texts which have been collected for the uses of the Udgatras not for their own sake, but because of the melodies the bearers of which they were".

What is a Sama? Two of the explanations that G.H. Taralekar has referred to are meaningful. According to one explanation, 'Sama' is derived from 'satama' where sa refers to the verse-component and oma to the musical notes that are attached to it. Our attention is very patently drawn here to the tonal or melodic aspect of music as reflected in sama. The second explanation derives the word from samata which means equality, equalization. The reference is to the equalization of diverse metres like gayatri, brihati, jagati and tristubh in their use during the sacrificial rites. Different metres can hardly be equalized unless a substantial rhythmic manipulation is resorted to. Thus is realized the musical avatar of the literary metre. The Chhandogya and the Brihad-aranyaka Upanishads are also quoted and they assert the musical raison d'être of the sama. Under the circumstances, it stands to reason that a richa will undergo many changes when recited and these changes were duly regularized. It will be seen that music had become the controlling agency to such an extent that no part of the verse was left untouched. Further elaborate details of the prestigious Saman-singing are however not pertinent to us, though two points are worth noting as they are direct spillovers from the Saman-singing as evolved through the broader framework of the oral tradition. They are:

i) The nature of the Vedic accent was musical and continued to be so till the seventh century A.D.

ii) Many of the Sama-hymns were sung in older melodies. This means that the tonal moulds were provided by the non-Vedic, pre-Aryan culture and the texts were Vedic. The force of the popularity enjoyed by these melodies was such that they became the dominant partners in the new marriage of music and literature. This phenomenon will be seen to have an arresting recurrence in Indian literary development. Prosody and such related areas felt the repercussions and these deserve more analysis. In all probability, the varying degrees of musicality, accent on specific literary forms, use of stylistic devices, a certain reluctance to move away from the Sanskrit traditions and such other features will be seen in a new light when the pervasive role of music in literary development is properly understood.

It is due to this all-embracing role of music that music-literature relationship is not entirely confined to musical aspect of the Samaveda. The whole Vedic republic of letters is characterized by some general tendencies that are attributable to music. Winternitz realized this general layer of significance that the Sama-spirit might be said to have possessed and hence he opined that the term Sama means 'rhythmical speech'. In this context, following three trends are worth noting:

i) Tendency towards versification.

ii) Crystallization of pitch-patterns.

iii) Pervasiveness of the incantatory element.

These literary effects can be said to be directly ascribable to music though there are others that are traceable to the oral tradition.

Due to its very nature, verse is distinguished from prose because the former is more measured. On the other hand, it remains different from a metrical expression as it is not as regular as the latter. Thus verse is, at the same time, a suggestion of metrical regularity and also a movement away from the linearity of prose. It is, therefore a double-edged non-conformism. We find that, irrespective of the content and the exact chronological placing of the works involved, the entire Vedic literature is suffused with the measured accent which, as we have seen, is the hallmark of verse. The chief reason is that this literature is an 'utterance'. One can infer that the controlling factor was the breath-unit of the users. In India, it is the vocal music that becomes the primary expression. Therefore music and the inclination towards versification become causally connected. In this respect a general point is to be noted. All performing arts create two causal chains: one of them is the living tradition of the artistic successes and failures and the second pertains to the efficient tradition of facing and successfully solving problems involved in coordinating various physical and mental forces in operation. Very naturally, the latter chain evolves formulae that spillover to other non-art activities which need all or some of the same or similar physical and mental forces. This is how (and why) the solutions for coordinating, breathing, movement, pronunciation, ascending and descending modes in vocalization etc., originally formulated by musicians spill over in language and literature. The additional thrust received by this phenomenon in a culture in which the oral tradition holds the sway can be easily imagined. In the context of Vedic literature, we can therefore maintain that the utterances became organized because they were compelled to take cognizance of the breathing patterns. These functional formulae are then perceived as patterns and the musical impulse can be said to have been generated for the first time. In turn the impulse creates prosodic potentialities. To versify is, in reality, to give way to the musical urges of the speakers of the language.

This same impulse which has initially created a measured accent further leads to metrical use of the available linguistic resources. At this stage the impulse is of course more strictly controlled and deliberately directed. On examining the Vedic literary scene we find that about fifteen metres were employed, of which seven were in recognizable circulation and three could be almost described as popular in the sense of being frequently used. Significantly these three, namely, anushtubh, trishtubh and jagati were the most flexible. Suggestion of regularity is always more conducive to musical quality than a strict adherence to the norms set by regularity. Music thus won the day. It is no wonder that the metrical sparseness of the Vedic literature in respect of the number of metres and their more accommodative quality is in direct contrast with the literature of the classical age. The latter boasted of about eight hundred and fifty metres and also of about one hundred and fifty treatises on prosody.

The rigidity in prosodic thinking was directly responsible for both these features: loss of musicality and abundance of prosodic items. In a way the Epic Period was the nadir of metrical musicality. The point is that the Vedic literature could perform the tight-rope-walking feat of moving away from prose and yet succeeding in keeping out the rigidity of metricality. This enabled it to explore the possibilities of versification with more fullness.

Pervasiveness of versification and the importance accorded to recitation go together logically. Recitation is a purposeful and methodical reproduction of sound-structures previously patterned in memory. In music, it is assiduously practised in case of all varieties of the fundamental frameworks that are concretized in the tonal, rhythmic and the language-based aspects of musical compositions etc. The post-Vedic codification of the Vedic tradition of recitation is an indication of the importance attached to it by the users. It is natural that codification is always a consolidation of practices of long standing and therefore succeeds the practices. The entire Shiksha literature (c. 1000 B.C. 600 B.C.) consisting of five Shikshas and the five Pratishakyas collectively form a monumental exercise in scientizing an illusive phenomenon like recitation. It is significant that even today Naradiya Shiksha is regarded as a seminal musicological work inherited from antiquity. It is also known that the training and the actual recitation employed a skeleton notation-system. In addition, a gesture-language was also pressed into service to accompany the recitation. It is in this connection that the Naradiya Shiksha refers to the human body as Gatra Vina. In fact, the use of gesture language to support the musical expression has continued till today. Firstly because singing is to all purposes a moving away from the sound-patterns used in speech.

Now all speech-patterns, in all societies have corresponding effort-patterns that match the former because together they make communication more effective or expressive. For example, a man proceeding towards higher pitches invariably moves his hands etc. in the same direction. In this way, the musical intent and content both get an additional channel to realize themselves as well as to convey the import to the hearers. Secondly, purely from the physical strain involved in any singing, hand-body gestures act as relieving agents countering the tensions created by the very fact of performance. The point is that evolution of such practices and their codification ultimately 'fixed' the pitch-patterns and also made them perceivable and prominent. Vedic Sanskrit became a language of musical accents and the off-shoot was the versified pitch-patterns that also permeated the Vedic literature.

We have seen that the musical features of the measured and the accented rhythmic units spilled over into versification and that the melodic impulses resulted into crystallization of pitch-patterns. Another musical aspect which percolated into the non-musical areas of language and literature was the incantatory use of sound. This is the explanation (or at least one of the explanations) of how the Vedic culture became a Mantra-culture with all the other ramifications like prishethood, ritualism etc. Incantation-practices could easily get entrenched in India because oral tradition was already well-established and comprehensive. These are also the reasons of the primacy of vocal music in India. Under the circumstances, it is not surprising that musical expression was delegated with the function of bringing about an effective cohesion of the different communicative components like language, movement, gestures etc. Thus all non-material and aesthetically oriented human expressions in the Vedic times became a musical package, a gestalt—though music remained the dominant factor.

Incantation has been variously defined and the definitions high-light important facets of musico-literary relationship realized through sound. The following definitions are worth noting.

"Mantra is a Sanskrit syllable or a group of syllables, used to concentrate cosmic and psychic energies".

".....Thus mantras correctly uttered or sung became part of the liturgy of the sacrifice which gave them an additional authority, as well as ensuing communication with the chosen deity".

"The mantras of the Rigveda are composed in an artificial style, full of poetic archaisms and poetic constructions and complicates well defined metrical formsand under the influence of a fully developed literary convention.

"The efficacy of a Mantra in post-Vedic times was not dependent on its meaning, but rather on the subjective effect or the mental discipline involved in its utterance, and the accompanying mode of breathing.

It will be seen that the above definitions emphasize certain features and they show a literary expression which is musically inclined. These are

i) The basic linguistic and the semantic unit can be as short as a syllable and repetition is a sort of compensation for the lack of duration.

ii) The measured accent is insisted upon and breathing processes as well as utterances are to be controlled according to established methods.

iii) The ultimate aim was communication and the subjective forces were to be deliberately disciplined iv) Patterns are to be intentionally evolved and used (the patterns are to be in sound). Further they are not to be necessarily conditioned by 'meaning' as sound is efficient and legitimate per se.

Thus, love of sound for its own sake has become relevant. Iteration, assonance, echo, rhyme, onomatopoeism and such other literary devices possess the authority they possess even today, because of the musical sanction. They affect us because sound appears in them as an entity that is heard and hence felt immediately. Sound which is read and understood can hardly prove equally potent. It is the musical sensibility that has come into operation and the function that it performs gives edge to the otherwise dry 'literary' experience which is more indirect and to that extent contingent.

It is not fortuitous that Bhagawan Krishna identified himself with the Samaveda. It is also symptomatic that even among the western attempts to bring the Vedas into the literary tradition, Samaveda was the first of the Vedas to be edited in its entirety. Stevenson, a missionary brought out the earliest edition of Samaveda in 1842. Evidently, Samaveda is rightfully recognized as the conclusive voice of the Vedic literary sensibility viewed as a whole. Indian culture has been shaped by the oral tradition and hence very logically music has influenced its various manifestations. The musical forces, which so actively controlled the Vedic phase of Indian literature were in fact never obliterated. Through the successive high tides and low ebbs of love for sound, taste for finer manipulations of pitches, skilful use of flexible rhythms and finally the longing for the abstract identity of form and content—music held its sway. No doubt, the pattern of musico-literary relationship went on becoming more and more complex as the regional languages, literatures and music started claiming individual attention and set varying paces of development. But the processes initiated in the pre-Aryan aeons could hardly be expected to suffer a total submergence. However, this is anticipating the upheaval that occurred after the Epic period in Indian literary tradition.

If we follow the trails of literary history, the post-Vedic world of letters is seen to consist of the sutras, the epics, the puranas and the smritis. Of these categories, only the Epics are relevant for the literary-musical examination. As far as the subject matter is concerned the Sutras dealt with six subjects, namely, siksha (phonetics); chhandas (metre), vyakarana (grammar), nirukta (etymology), kalpa (religious practice) and jyotisha (astrology). In their normal form the Puranas treated five set topics, namely, Sarga (creation), Prati sarga (recreation after dissolution), vamsha (genealogy of gods, sages or teachers), manvantara (the groups of great ages) and vamshacharita (the history of the royal dynasties). The smritis were the law-books laying down norms governing various aspects of human living.

The sutras merit some attention. Firstly, because manuals of recitation like the Naradiya shiksha fall in the sutra category, but chiefly because essentially speaking, sutra was a style of composing literature. As a style, sutra meant stringing together of rules that are briefly and succinctly stated and pertaining to a particular area of knowledge. The aim of the style was the effective preservation of material by a systematic use of the faculty of memory. All the practices perfected by the oral tradition were fully exploited by the sutra-style. For example, repetition was strongly used and advocated in the study-procedures adopted. In fact, ability to remember was used as a criterion to grade students. Knowledge was imparted through the Guru-Shishya mode of communication. However, the style does not exhibit any exciting or enduring traces of relationship with music. In a way, it was too abrupt and discontinuous to attain rhythmic and melodic stature. Hence, it is the epic-way that becomes the resonating frequency for the musico-literary examination of the post-Vedic period.

The epic concept is more complicated than it outwardly appears to be. This is because only one meaning of the term is in reality concretized by the two great epics, namely the Ramayana and the Mahabharata respectively. Two other meanings of the term are suggested by ballad or the heroic song and the narrative respectively. Thus, like the mantras and the sutras, ballads, narratives and epics indicate separate modes and styles of expression. As a consequence, they offer three individual formulae of co-ordinating various elements that are present in the communication-processes of the oral tradition. The three modes of course enjoyed the usual overlaps and also differing proportions of musico-literary dependencies, but the pervasiveness of the oral tradition ensured a continued inter-relationship.

The ballads are often songs in praise of men (gatha narashamasi) and Winternitz rightly calls them precursors of the great epics. He says, "These old, heroic songs, whose existence we must take for granted, have not all vanished without trace; in remnants and fragments some of them have been preserved in our two great epics." Indian ballad-singers were known as sutas. They were professional, itinerant singers who composed their own songs and passed them on by oral tradition from generation to generation. They memorized the songs, sung them to lute-accompaniment in public concerts. The sutas were attached to kings, warriors etc. whom they often accompahouse and oil-sellers start their work of squeezing oil." Agriculture was the main base of regional life. The detailed description of agriculture is available in Prakrit literature. Let us see the picture, "The girls of the farmers scare away the deer by saying 'Titti-Titti', the bulls by beating them with sticks and the pigs by blowing the horns in order to save their harvest from them."

Prakrit literature contains description of many tribes living in the forest and near the villages. The Bhills, the Kirats, the Barbars, the Dravids, the Simhals, the Pulinds, the Sabars, the Tankans, the Pakkans, the Khasas, the Matangs, the Bodhiks are some of the tribes mentioned by them. Their life and customs are described with detail in this literature. J.C. Jain rightly says: "Different traditions and customs of tribal people have been preserved in the form of stories, anecdotes, parables, illustrations and riddles in ancient Jain literature which needs a comprehensive study so that the socio-economic history of India can be understood in its right perspective."

Folk culture and regional customs have been minutely described in the Apabhramsha literature. Vilasavaikaha and Bhavisayattakaha, two Apabhramsha works depict social life of the common men. Popular nicknames, proverbs, quotations and colloquial words have been used in it. It is flooded with description of social customs and practices. It is known from Siddhahemashabdanushasaka (VIII.4.352) that wives used to send messages to their husbands through crows by flying them. On the return of their husbands from other places the wives used to swell up so much that bangles of their wrists were broken because of joy. Bhavisayattakaha says that when the son proceeded on a long journey the mother would wish him a happy time by putting curd, rice and 'durva' on his head (III.17). Vilasavaikaha contains many proverbs some of which are still popular.

While portraying local life the Prakrit and Apabhramsha writers have used local words. Besides the words of Prakrit, Apabhramsha and Sanskrit, other words have also been used in this literature the usage of which was common among the people. Linguists have called these 'Deshya' words. Acharya Hemchandra of the 12th century has collected the popular Deshya words in his book named Deshinamamala. On account of their use in Prakrit and Apabhramsha literature the words are still in use in different regional languages. The connotations of such words have since been studied by various scholars. Some local words, used by Apabhramsha writers in their works, may be seen as under:

Gochchha (Mahapurana I.10.9) a cluster, a bunch; Chara (MP, 68.6.5) a morsel of grass; Chokkha (MP, 73.23.13) pure, clean; Tal (Jasahara-chariu, 3.6.3) to fry; Titta (MP, 69.26.3) moist, wet; Thora (Deshinamamala, 5.3) Large and round; Pallatta (Hemachandra, 4.166) to return, to go back; Bhalla (Jasaharchariu, 2.32.1) good, beautiful; Mella (Deshinamamala, 6.138) a gathering, a group; Boll (JC, 2.15.7) to tell, to speak; Lukk (HC, 4.55) to hide

There are thousands of such words in Prakrit and Apabhramsha which have been used in the different regions of the country in speech as well as in literature. Thus the study of Prakrit and Apabhramsha literature is important not only for studying the social life of different regions but also for the understanding of the process of linguistic unification of our country.

LOK MAHABHARAT (Rajasthani) is a collection of independent folk-ballads composed in prose and poetic forms and based on the Mahabharata. The ballads are sung in the north-western parts of Rajasthan. The book contains the 'Devalas' (Cantos) like Dharmadharna, Bhinyo Bharat, Draupadi puran, Sent Gaindo, Ailapat, Ahmano, Desunto, Sarpanjar, Kumar katha, Anba Ras, Pandavan ro paramarath, Pandavan ri goth, Ahmanai ro byavalo, Karna katha, Vikat rup, Svava-Karna Ghodo, Dharma ro mayaro, etc. In order to compose these ballads, the poets of different times have adopted characters and plots from the Mahabharata, and having adapted them according to their environment, they recreated them for the folks. Therefore, the folk mind and its tendencies are easily traceable in them and they have importance from the structural point of view also. Some of the events are the acceptance of Dharma as sister by Bhima, the marriage of the princess of Dharmagadh, the marriage of the daughter of a washerman with Kiramal Rishi, Arjun's going to Surya Lok, etc. But there is a similarity of plots with those of the Mahabharata, like the marriage of Saitan (Shantanu) with Ganga, the birth of the Kauravas and the Pandavas, the murder of Muni Kirmal, the marriage of Arjuna with Ulupi, the killing of Jarasandha, the exile of the Pandavas, the test of dharma of the Pandavas, the murder of Kamira (Kirmir), charity of Karna, the marriage of Ahmano (Abhimanyu), the creation of the world, the ascending of the Pandavas to heaven, etc. Many characters of this folk-poetry are historical and many are imaginary who have been named according to their professions.

This folk-poetry is sung by Siddhas and Kamadas with musical instruments. The Siddhas sing it in traditional ragas. Sometimes it is sung accompanied by a fire-dance. Although it is mainly a poetry of love, yet one can find examples of humour and detachment. The similes, the metaphors and the alliterations are the main figures of speech found in it. The poetry abounds in colloquial words, proverbs and idioms.

Lok Mahabharat reveals the Rajasthani folk-culture. The beliefs, the orthodox rituals, the gods and goddesses, the 'jantras' and 'mantras', the holy places, the ways of worship, etc. of the folks have been explained in the work. For its being imbued with deep emotions and its guidance to the values of life, it has been a source of inspiration for many centuries. Some Devalas of Lok Mahabharata are yet to be collected.

K.L.S.

LOKAYATA (Sanskrit). If there is one philosophy in India which would find a ready acceptance by some modern philosophers who emphasize the value of empiricism, logic, materialism and agnosticism on the one hand, and, on the other, by those who subscribe to hedonism as a philosophy of life, that system is Lokayata. Its emphasis on perception (pratyaksha) as the only valid means of knowledge, its theory that the ultimate reality is matter and the consciousness is merely an incidental product of matter find their echo in some significant theories and philosophies of the modern era.

As compared to other systems of Indian Philosophy, the Lokayata has a dubious distinction to be known from the devastating critiques levelled against it by its opponents and not through the standard books and commentaries all of which including the one by Bhaguri existing as early as 300 B.C. or even earlier, are irretrievably lost. The only extant work which presents a brief resume of the Lokayata thoughts is the Sarvadarshana samgraha of Madhavacharya (14th cent.). It appears that a full-fledged system of the Lokayata was in existence at the time of Kautilya (300-200 B.C.), for he in his Arthashastra (1.2.10) enumerates Lokayata as 'Anvikshiki' and groups it along with Samkhya and Yoga.

The peculiarly Lokayatic view in its embryonic form can, however, be traced to at least beyond 1000 B.C. in the Rigvedic times (RV., VIII. 89.3., X. 129. 6-7, and I. 164.6). The ancient Upanishads refer to the materialistic view and then refute it (Brihadaranyaka, II. 2. 12 and IV

v. 13; Chhandogya, VIII. 8.4 & 5; Katha, I.1.20 & 26; Shvetashvatara, I.2).

Charvaka, Barhaspatya and Nastika are the other names by which the Lokayata system is known. The word Lokayata can be understood in a positive or in a disparaging, negative sense. If derived from 'loka' + 'ayata' i.e., 'lokeshu ayata', it means that which is prevalent amongst people and hence popular philosophy. If derived from 'loka' + 'a' + 'yatanti', it means that which dissuades people from making efforts, and hence a philosophy for the ignorant and lazy people. The word 'Charvaka' may be taken as a corrupted form of the original 'charu vak', the pleasant, soothing speech or may be derived from the root word 'oharva', 'to eat' and means person who believes in enjoyment, a hedonist. Ananda Jha thinks that the word is the corrupted form of the phrase 'chara vakka', and means the king, minister or the executive who exclusively relies upon reports made by his spies. This interpretation rests upon the assumption that the system was conceived primarily as a political philosophy which, however, does not find conclusive corroboration from the texts of decidedly political character like the Arthashastra of Kautilya. The word Barhaspatya refers to the system founded by Brihaspati, the preceptor of gods. The sutra work ascribed to his name and published by F.W. Thomas in 1921 appears not only to be a much later work but also contradicts and criticizes the basic theories of the system itself. Nastika means a non-believer in the gods and the Vedas. The Shukra-niti-sara (IV. 3.55) includes Nastika shastra in its enumeration of various sciences and arts as one which was being studied because of its strong logical arguments and its theory that all things proceed out of their nature and for its denial of the Vedas and gods.

The whole structure of the Lokayata theories of metaphysics and of ethics is dependent upon its epistemology, theory of knowledge, and the supporting logic. In this context its inclusion as Anvikshiki by Kautilya is significant.

The Lokayata rejects inference (anumana) and the Vedas as means of valid and undoubted knowledge. It holds perception (pratyaksha) to be the only means by which the reality can be known and apprehended. Perceptible objects and their qualities are the only reality. That which lies outside perceptibility by the tactual, gustatory, olfactory, visual and the auditory organs as well as of the internal organ of mind is not real.

Inference rests upon the invariable concomitance (vyapti) between the distinguishing mark (linga) and the probandum (sadhya), the minor and major terms respectively of the syllogism. To be valid, this universal relationship must be shown to be unconditional, not vitiated by any conditions (upadhis). Perception can be of particulars and not of universals which are true of the past present and future. In order to infer fire on the hill from the smoke which we perceive, invariable concomitance between the two cannot therefore be posited. If we try to infer from the class characters of fireness and smokeness, it is also not permissible because these class characteristics are not known by perception. To infer the existence of invariable concomitance is not possible since it is vitiated by regressus infinitum (Anavastha dosha). Similarly, if we try to infer smoke every time we perceive a fire, it will be found that it is not invariably true. Why? Because the smoke does not arise unless there is wetness in wood which is burnt. This condition (upadhi) of wetness of wood in the smoke to be inferred and not in the fire, the middle term renders the invariable concomitance vitiated. Again, perception is not competent to grasp all conditions, past, future and present rendering inference of the existence of vyapti circular and thus being affected by 'anyonyashraya dosha'. The Lokayata thus shows the impossibility of vyapti being perceived or inferred thus making inference itself tenuous so as to be a valid means of knowledge.

The Lokayata considers the Vedas to be the handi-works of cheats, knaves and demons and their injunctions meaningless jargon. The perceptible results of their injunctions, when followed, are bound to be false. How, then, can those promised but imperceptible results like heaven merits and demerits be true? If the dead can be fed by performance of a shraddha, then it is unnecessary to arrange food for these travelling (long distances). For their kins staying back home can satisfy the hunger of those travellers by simply performing their shraddha. If when an animal is sacrificed it goes to heaven, why not kill one's own father and offer him in sacrifice so that he goes to heaven? How can the Vedas, vitiated by falsehood, tautology and contradiction, ever be treated as a valid means of knowledge?

It rejects causality (karya-karana-bhava). It is but an imaginary relation between antecedents and consequents perceived together on many occasions. Its universality of invariable existence is beyond the scope of perception and hence is not real.

If what is perceptible is real, we cannot hold that either the soul or transmigration of life from one place to another is real. Neither can it be perceived by the senses, external or internal. Only four elements, earth (prithvi), fire (tejas), air (vayu) and water (jala) can be perceived and hence they are real: the other, i.e., ether (akasha), being imperceptible, has to be rejected. Whatever exists is composed of these four elements. Consciousness is produced by the interaction of these unconscious four material elements as the intoxicating wine is produced by its intoxicating material ingredients. What we come across is this consciousness as a quality emerging out of the four elements and not any soul independent from them. Self and body are identical with each other. Cognition, pleasure and pain are qualities of the body; they refer always to the body as 'I'. Consciousness being the quality of the body, its existence is co-extensive with that of the body. It dies when the body dies. Pre-existence (purvajanma) is ruled out on the ground that the last cognition in the past life does not determine the first cognition of the present. The future existence is denied on the ground of the impossibility of potency in foetus which is devoid of sense organs and thus incapable of cognition or the denial of the intermediate body produced immediately after death which is not perceived. Heaven and hell are not perceptible. So are not virtue and vice, merit and demerit. They are therefore not real.

Hedonism: If what we have is the present life, it should be directed to gain more pleasure. 'Kama' is the primary 'purushartha' and 'artha' is a means to attain it. 'dharma' and 'moksha' cannot be regarded as purusharthas at all. The pleasure derived from embrace with a woman is the main purushartha. Hell is the pain caused by thorns etc. The destruction of body at death is the moksha (liberation). It cannot be had by knowledge.

The Lokayata, thus represents naive realism and empiricism. Its code of ethics may disturb many and appeal to some. However, it has all the ingredients to usher in a materialist social revolution, sometimes with disturbing consequences. It believes in the present devoted to the maximum pleasure and minimum of pain. It concentrates on the individual happiness in the present to be balanced by the happiness of the others in the pursuit of his enlightened self-interest. Its logic and epistemology find some interesting similarities in the philosophy of the modern logical positivists. It provides an alluring view which its opponents found contemptible and aroused them to develop their intellectual and logical sharpness to refute it.

LOL (Kashmiri). Right from the time of Lal Ded of the fourteenth century to the present day, every poet, known and lesser known, has expressed love in his verses with emphasis that differs from time to time and from poet to poet. Consequently, there is a good portion of Kashmiri poetry that has 'lol' (love) as its subject matter.

The 'rishis' and the mystic poets have expressed love which, in its essence, is metaphysical and at places reminiscent of religious humanism, with emphasis on the equality of man and sacrosanctity of all religions, in a diction essentially aesthetic.

There is more than a score of 'Masnavis' having love as the theme of its stories. In some of these, the lovers, after unexpected and throbbing ups and downs, meet to live the rest of their lives in peace and happiness. However, in a few of these compositions the lovers perish much to the dismay of the readers. All these are narratives and lack lyrical exuberance and subjectiveness.

The best of lol finds its fine expression in 'vachan' and 'ghazal' forms. For depicting the historical facts and religious truths, the poet dives deep into his self and applies his sensibility to shape a particular experience. This poetry can, however, be divided into two parts. In one he delineates the physical beauty, like the eyes, nose, ears, hands, hair, height, gait, gestures, etc. This poetry betrays the influence of Persian poetry, as its composers were well versed in Persian poetry of this type. Rasul Mir (d. 1870) is still supreme in this field:

I care least,
For sin or virtue,
Unveil the dazzling face,
Your refusal will be suicidal

A portion of his love poetry appears concerned with the mind and thinking of the poet. Though the world of his poetry is limited, yet it is valuable and comparatively of permanent nature. While appealing to the beloved, the lover generally reminds him of the passing away of life, the ephemeral nature of youth, the persuasive forces that drift him away from love, the importance of their dependence on each other, the painful and callous attitude of the rivals, the pangs of separation, the indomitable spirit of love and the insipidity of loneliness. A bulk of this poetry, however, does not rise above these considerations, yet there are verses which express the ecstasy of love in a style that thrills the reader for a long time and contributes to his refinement and understanding without aiming at these consciously. Mahjur (1885-1952) represents both these trends of love poetry. Of course, the former refers to his youth and the latter to his more mature period.

Besides, love finds its expression in folk-songs as well. Here the appeal is very sharp and the expressions are emotive. The metaphors, similes and symbols represent things which are around us in our everyday life, but which we see for the first time in this context in these folk-songs throbbing with simplicity and sincerity.

LOLLATA (Sanskrit). About Lollata, or Bhatta Lollata we know very little. From his name he seems to have been a Kashmiri. He is known as one of the earliest commentators on Bharata's Natyashastra and a champion of the

Rasa-theory called 'Kritivada' (Utpattivada). His commentary on Bharata's Natyashastra being lost, whatever little is known about him, is merely on the basis of brief reviews of his lost work from Abhinavagupta, Rajasekhara, Mammata, Hemachandra, Sharngadeva, etc. From Rajasekhara and Hemachandra we learn that he was the son of Aparajita and, hence, also known by the name 'Aparajiti'. Only his two verses in Arya metre are preserved by Hemachandra in his Kavyanushasana, which prove that Lollata was not merely a commentator. Besides, these verses point out some principles of 'rasa-auchitya' in the descriptions, condemning long descriptions that do not contain rasa. Manikyachandra (12th cent.) is of the opinion that Lollata was the foremost exponent of the rasa-theory 'na veti yasya gambhīryam giritungo' pi Lollatah'. Abhinavagupta has referred to Lollata as being touched with vanity at a certain stage of his literary career: 'tenapi Bhatta Lollaten...tadavalcpanaemeparaparamrishya...'. From reference to Lollata by Abhinavagupta (vide chapters VI, XII, XIII, XVIII & XXI of Abhinavabharati), Mammata (vide, chapter IV, of Kavyaprakasha) & Hemachandra (vide chapter VIII of Kavyanushasana), it may be gathered that Lollata might have composed commentary on VI, XIII, XVIII & XXI Chapters of the Natyashastra, that he considered 'natika' to be shatpada; he held that the portions of the life and doings of the hero of a 'pataka' are to be called 'anusandhis' and that he was also of the view that the 'vrittis' could be only four, e.g., Bharati, Satvati, Kaishiki and Arabhati. Besides these literary contributions in the field of poetics, a work called Shraddhaprakarana is also ascribed to Lollatacharya. On account of his Kritivada, propounding the theory that rasa is a 'kriti' of 'sthyayibhava' (karyakaranabhava), Lollata is said to be a Mimamsaka. According to Abhinavagupta, he controverted the views of Udbhata on eleven topics regarding natya and vrittis, which proves that his commentary came after Udbhata. Due to his theory that the 'abhidha' (power of speech) is comprehensive enough to include any implication of suggestion, he is complimented by Mammata and Hemachandra as 'dirghavyaparavadin'. It is Lollata who began to analyse rasa in the experience of the spectator and is aptly acclaimed as the 'originator of the theories on rasa.' Lollata's father Aparajita is held as one amongst his senior contemporaries by Rajasekhara (Karpuramanjari, I. 8) whose date is fixed around 7th/8th cent. Shankuka, champion of 'jnativada siddhanta' of rasa, is known to have criticized the views of Lollata on rasa. Thus, he was probably a younger contemporary of Lollata. Shankuka who was patronized by Ajitapida, king of Kashmir, is placed in 814-815. So relying on the tradition which tells that he was earlier than Shankuka whose rasa-theory is directly levelled against that of Lollata, and Abhinavagupta's reference to Udbhata's being controverted by Lollata one may hold that he was later or rather contemporaneous with Udbhata who was also a Kashmiri and whose date is fixed around 812.

LONE, ALI MUHAMMAD (Kashmiri; b. 1926) is a Kashmiri and Urdu playwright and short story writer. He received his early education directly from his father in Persian classics. He graduated from the Punjab University, Lahore, in 1946 and joined the Khidmat as sub-editor. During the tribal invasion, he worked in the National Militia. He joined 'Radio Kashmir' as a clerk in 1948, became a script writer in 1956 and assistant producer in 1965; he left All India Radio, Jammu and Kashmir, to join the Cultural Academy as Deputy Secretary, and retired in 1981. Lone started writing in Urdu under the 'progressive' influence of the Cultural Congress (first story 'Bache', Children, 1952), of which he was the Convener (1955-1957), and edited the Urdu section of the Kwangposh and the Karvan. His earlier plays, like 'Viz chi sany' (This time belongs to us, 1955) and 'Chattan' (The rock, 1954) show his progressive commitment. 'Divane ka khwab' (Mad man's dream, 1958), 'Khalujan ka khawab' (based on Dostoevsky's My Uncle's Dream, 1962) established him as a playwright. His Urdu novel Shahid hai teri arzu (Your craving is a witness, 1964) was given the Jammu and Kashmir Cultural Academy award. As a result of the love for Kashmiri that he had developed, he switched over to Kashmiri and wrote a dozen short stories since then. But his main preoccupation has been the radio-play and he has so far written more than 150 such plays. Prominent among his Urdu plays are 'Vadi soch rahi thi' (The valley was thinking, 1954), 'Zindagi se qarib' (Nearer the life), 'Chirag aur saye' (Lamps and shadows, 1969). His Kashmiri plays are 'Kandy sahravta vajud' (The arid realm and existence), 'Ta vyath ruz pakan' (And the Vitasta flows), 'Vanraja' (The jungle king) and 'Myani jigrki dadi vvat' (Rise, heartache rise, 1972). His four plays have been broadcast in the National Programme. His Suyya (based on a Rajatarangini episode) got him the Sahitya Akademi award in 1972. His Kashmiri translation of Gorky's Mother published by the State Academy, was given Soviet Land award. His radio-serial 'Vaital pachchisi' (based on Somdeva's Kathasaritsagar) has proved very popular with the listeners. Among the books he has edited are Kashary luka bath (a volume of Kashmiri folk-songs, 1966) and the Kashmiri section of Indian Poetry Today (Indian Council for Cultural Relation, 1977). He has translated his Suyya into Hindi himself.

LONGJAM PARSHURAM (Manipuri; b. 1760, d. 1830) was instrumental in bringing Manipuri literature to the mainstream of Indian's literary culture.

Well-versed in Bengali and Sanskrit, he was also a master of archaic Manipuri and his monumental work is Langgoi sagol thaba which is an adaptation of 'Ashvamedha parva' of the Mahabharata. It was most probably composed at the turn of the nineteenth century. The text has not yet been published, but copies of the manuscripts are found with Shri N. Kunjakishor Singh, Shri Amubi Singh, Pandit N. Amulaima Singh, Shri N. Khelchandra Singh and in the archives of the Manipur State Kala Akademi.

LOR-CHANDRANI (Bengali) or Sati Mayna o Lor-Chandrani is a seventeenth century poetical romance written by Daulat Kazi. Kazi was a court poet of Arakan. He based his story on Moina sat, a Hindi romance, by Sadhan of the folk-tradition.

Mohara was the king of Gohari. Chandrani was his daughter, a paragon of beauty. She was unhappy because her husband Kharbaketu was a dwarf and also impotent. Lorak, a young adventurous king saw her portrait and fell deeply in love with her. Lorak had been married but he forgot his wife Maynabati and arrived at Gohari. After some time, he contrived to meet Chandrani, who also fell in love with him. They decided to run away from the kingdom. When they were fleeing Kharbaketu appeared before them. A terrible battle was fought between Lorak and Kharvaketu. Kharvaketu died and Mohara happily accepted Lorak as his son-in-law. After his death Lorak became the king of Gohari. Meanwhile Chatani, a profligate prince, had sent his love proposal to Maynabati, who turned it down with contempt.

Because of his untimely death Daulat could not finish the work. Another poet, Alaol, completed it in 1659. In the concluding part the separation between Lorak and Maynabati was over and they were re-united.

Daulat was a poet of very exceptional merit. He presented an enjoyable love-story to his readers. In mediaeval Bengali literature this was quite new. To him poetry was not an instrument of religion. He was a scholar. But his scholarship did not interfere with his poetical work. Lor-chandrani is full of poetic beauty and lyrical sweetness.

LORIKAVIJAYA (Maithili). Lorika is a popular ballad in the whole of northern India from Bundelkhand to Bengal and is sung in about thirteen languages. It is a real people's epic having been in vogue for a thousand years or so. In most part the epic is yet unwritten and preserved in people's memory. Its antiquity is proved by the fact that the greatest Maithili savant Jyotirishwara (14th cent.) and the sufi poet Mulla Daud (14th cent.) have referred to it. Jyotirishwara makes a mention of the Lorika dance (Lorika nachyo) while Daud is the author of Chandayana. Grierson and Cunningham have also published fragments of this epic in their own way. Manipadma had done a commendable work by bringing to light a lost chapter based on the Tantrik version from Nepal. The whole version has been turned into a novel and the author has tried his best to preserve the flow and fire of the original epic. It is a novel based on Lorika ballad. The story is derived from the legend originating possibly from a place named Hardi (in the district of Saharsa, Bihar). The novel portrays the story of the epic—the story of Lorika and Chanain. Lorika is celebrated in the folklore of northern India. The description of his adventure is often halted by the description of places and of lover's agony of separation which has been depicted in various genre in different dialects. The Chandayana of Mulla Daud is based on the love of Lorika and Chanain and contemporary folk poetry seems to have been replete with different versions of this ballad. In those days the ballad was performed through the medium of dance and it presented a love-story. Daud depicts the hero as naked to the waist with no shoes and having 'kundala' on his ears (a description which totally fits in with the Maithili version). The heroine wears churi, armlet, sari, close-fitted garment on the upper part of the body and something like a scarf on the head. In Mithila it is one of the oldest ballads and is religiously preserved through the mouths of innumerable Yadava singers who celebrate the Lorika festival with great delight.

Though based on the Tantrik version from Nepal, it is basically the story of Maithili folklore in the form of a novel and therein lies the originality of Manipadma who has described in excellent prose the heroism of Lorika, giving a taste of the idiom of the folk ballad itself. Here in this novel we seem to breathe in the age of Lorika and the reader begins to see everything in the heroic manner of ancient days. It is in this intensity and depth of vision which Manipadma could not reach even in his historical novel Vidyapati that his greatness lies. Lorika is an example of Maithili folk-tale having long romantic episodes in verse and popular ballads.

Based on the version of the Lorika ballad, Manipadma through his novel, Lorikavijaya, has brought into light, in chaste language, one of the forgotten but important episodes of Maithili ballad. It is one of the greatest achievements of Maithili novels in modern times.

LOTA-KAMBAL (Bengali), a novel, published in 1985, is a significant work by Sanjib Chattarjee, the well-known wit and humorist. Unsurpassed both in verbal ingenuity and in mastery of comic situations, he is universally admired for his tongue in cheek humour and irony. No other writer before him exposed the pretensions, prejudices, follies and also successes of the Bengali middle class with such penetration and insight. His short stories and novels (Sanjib is an outstanding writer of short fictions) send the readers into side-splitting laughter but a tear too, usually trickles down his humour. In Lota kambal Sanjib, in his usual tongue in cheek mode, recounts the story of Palash Chatterjee alias Pmtoo from his early childhood through the vicissitudes of youth and adulthood. However he does not enjoy primacy or centrality. At least three other characters—Palash's father, Harishankar, his maternal grandfather, Rajnarayan and his maternal uncle, Jaynarayan, are of equal importance so far as the vision projected by the novel is concerned. Palash, with his delicate physical features and non-committal, effeminate nature is an unworthy heir to his father Harishankar who is a 'karmayogi', an upright and towering personality given to self help and the good of others. He has a few good friends e.g., Prafulla, an expert tabla player; Akshay, a genius in palmistry, his brother-in-law, Rajnarayan, an expert in classical music etc. All of them demonstrate, in different ways, a sincere commitment to some ideals in life. Harishankar lost his wife when Palash was a mere baby and then onwards he, without going in for a second marriage, devoted his life to bringing up his son and giving him a comprehensive education. Right from his childhood, Palash vaguely thinks of renouncing the world and becoming a celibate sanyasi. But he is a weakling and finds it difficult to conquer his sensual urges. He is simultaneously drawn towards and repelled by sexual and secular pleasures. He graduates in Chemistry. But he is not serious about taking up a job. Meanwhile one of Harishankar's distant cousins, Binay Babu, comes to stay with them along with two of his daughters—Kanak and Muku. Palash develops a liking for Muku. But Binay is a greedy man and is lured by Pratap Roy's wealth and goes to stay with him and arranges Muku's marriage with Pratap. Unable to bear with her father's mean and domineering ways, Kanak leaves the house. Prafulla comes along with his wife to stay with Harishankar. His wife whom Palash calls 'kakima' becomes a nest of the household. Jaynarain, in spite of stiff opposition from his father, Rajanarain and Harishankar, invests all his resources in making a film which flounders. He has to leave the project half-way and accept a job. Palash also gets the job of a chemist and it is arranged that he be married to Aparna. Palash likes her but given his noncommittal attitude, does not show any deep interest in her. Rajnarain dies and his death affects Palash and his father deeply. Meanwhile scandal mongering goes on involving kakima (Prafulla, her husband, being dead) and Harishankar. Harishankar remains unperturbed but when Palash, in a weak moment, makes some insinuations, he feels deeply hurt and arranges for kakima to be sent away. Muku takes Palash by surprise by expressing her violent love for him. Harishankar disappears from home leaving all his property to Palash. Palash decides to marry Muku and go out in search of his father.

The book has long, discursive passages reflecting Sanjib's cogitations on love, lust, soul, brahmacharya etc. The rather loose narrative is held together by his gift for pun, wry humour and pithy and terse dialogue. On the whole the work projects powerfully the erosion of values and ideals in a world changing in rapid strides.

LOVLEKAR, B.R. (Marathi) a poet, who belongs to the Mardhekar era has not got due attention of the critics of modern Marathi poetry. It could be so because of the fact that he resided outside Maharashtra at Indore. Unlike his contemporaries like Datta, Tambe and Kalele he remained unfamiliar to readers and his contemporaries in Maharashtra. Another reason for his being lesser known was his untimely death. His poetry, therefore, received acclaim only in a limited circle.

Still Lovlekar certainly has his own standing among the modern Marathi poets. His poetry has a highly individualistic feel, which is closer to the folk tradition. In the early phase Marathi poetry seemed to follow the form and structure of Sanskrit poetry while in the later phase it came under western influence. Consequently, at times it appeared to be searching for its identity. In such critical times it was the folk tradition that helped it recover its lost identity. Lovlekar's poetry written during 1950 to 1960 has contributed to this important task. Rejecting the Sanskrit as well as the English model it embraced the native folk tradition. The source of his inspiration was the folk-songs from Maval. Lively diction, emotional intensity, folk rhythms and romantic love scenes picturized against the rich background of beautiful nature are some of the features of his poetry.

Lovlekar is one of those poets who have successfully bridged the gap between the folk tradition and the era of new poetry pioneered by Mardhekar. His poetry needs to be evaluated in this context. Lovlekar is often compared with his contemporary, N. G. Deshpande, who wrote his poems in a similar spirit and style. Amorous love-making against the background of beautiful nature was the innate force behind their poetry. Still the local dialect, intense nature imagery and folk rhythms make Lovlekar's poetry more appealing. In Lovlekar's poetry, one finds unaffected serenity of the country life. Lovlekar's is not folk poetry in the strict sense though it shares some of the features of folk poetry. Folk poetry seems to give greater prominence to the community life. In his poems one sees lovely portraits of village girls in Malva as well as the milk-maids from Vindhya-chala. Though they resemble folk characters in some ways, typical Lovlekar touch in their delineation is unmistakable.

His poetry is not merely a poetry of nature. Indeed, it displays different shades of the experience of love. It has a provincial flavour but it has also the authenticity of an individual's experience. The interior rhythm gives his love poems a special appeal. Lovlekar's mode of writing has found its continuation in the poetry of N.D. Mahanor and its impact is undeniable.

LUHAR (Rajasthani) is a folk-genre rarely used in literary works. A Jain saint had, of course, composed a small book under the title Jambuswami ri lur (Muni Mahendrakumar-I, Jaipur, 1969). In the late seventies a few hundred 'lurs' were collected by a school teacher of Pali district and published in the issues of Maruvani, (monthly journal, 1978-79). It is a kind of folk-song accompanied by certain steps in forward and backward motions by two groups of women participating in this dance-cum-recital. Holi or Basant is the appropriate occasion when lur recitals are held in the open during moonlit nights. A song named 'luhar' is also sung generally by the unmarried girls giving expression to their erotic feelings. Though specific raga (tune) is prescribed for this particular genre, the 'dhamal' is the usual form for its recital to the accompaniment of a naggara or the drum. There are two parties of dancing women who form a circle and divide themselves in two groups. The recital is more or less in a dialogue form. One of the groups advances and sings some lines of the song and retraces its steps. Then the other group acts likewise, and so the merriment goes on till both the sides decide to retire. It is not always that the substance of the song pertains to various moods of love only. Lurs in praise of some eminent personages of history and society are also sung like dhamals recited in those very days. The word meaning, though commented upon variously by scholars, has never been finally decided. 'To recite in a loud voice' is also one of the meanings suggested.

LUNA (Punjabi) by Shiv Kumar is a classic. Not many books out of hundreds published in Punjabi in the recent past could be placed in that category, but this epic certainly merits this distinction. Shiv Kumar has touched the lofty heights of the poetic expression in Luna.

Very few epic poems have been written in Punjabi during the past several decades and, therefore, the very courage of Shiv Kumar for attempting an epic at rather a young age, is in itself worthy of notice. For this epic, he chose a popular ancient and traditional story of Puran bhakta, and transformed it into something entirely new with his sensitive imagination and interpretation of a woman's place in society, then and at present. In the epic, the pain and the suffering as well as the deep-rooted aspirations of a traditional and emancipated womanhood are superbly depicted by the poet.

Whosoever the characters be Shiv Kumar speaks through them with utmost sincerity and honesty. A few opening lines themselves transport one to a unique poetic atmosphere and leave one spellbound with the choice of the words and the celestial music the poet has created through them:

Which is this land of enchantment and under what name flows this river?
Its serpentine path makes it look like a serpent of fire
Who thrusts his splintered tongue through the valley—making it tremble.

He has wielded the myths, the motifs, the symbols and the images of typical Punjabi life and mind and thus the appeal of his poetry has become as widespread as that of Qadir Yar, who has so far written the best epic on Puran bhakta and Luna.

Shiv Kumar's Luna will ever remain rooted in the cultural ethos of the Punjab. It places the poet at par with some of the best epic poets of the past like Qadir Yar and Fazal Shah.

LUNGKHAM CAMP (Nepali) is a novel by Subhas Ghising. The hero, Charu Gurung, is a typical Gorkha soldier fighting the Japanese. The scene is an Indian army camp in the front line in Nagaland at an altitude of nine thousand feet. The time is that of the Second World War. The novel weaves into a pattern two separate stories: the story of the soldier as he falls in love with a poor and orphaned Naga girl, his musings as he perceives at a deeper level of his mind the futility and waste of war and the story of the same soldier's revenge on two of his superior officers who has once tortured and humiliated him.

Asangla is a poor Naga girl who lives in a village near where the Indian army has set up its camp. She and her brothers supply the fighting army with ration whenever the army runs out of it. This brings Asangla and Charu together. Charu plans to elope with Asangla when the war comes to an end. But his dream is shattered when one day the Commander of the camp orders the soldiers to set Asangla's village on fire. This is because the Commander apprehends that the village people might pass on information about army movements to the Japanese in the nearby Sastani. The entire village of Asangla is burnt down. And then comes the instruction that Charu should kill Asangla's brothers. This he does as a true soldier but with it he also brings an end to his love. To this story of unfulfilled love is woven the story of Charu's revenge on two senior officers who had once humiliated him for having slipped out from the army line when he had received the news of his father's death.

The description of the war front is realistic. Parallel to the battle fought between the Indians and the Japanese is the battle within the mind of Charu as his love for Asangla conflicts with his allegiance to the Army. He can never cease to be proud of being a Gorkha, a member of a warlike tribe. But he can also see through the war into its waste and its futility. While he fights the enemies with a grim determination he cannot but question the values that drive men to kill other men. Ghising lays bare the inner conflicts of a fighting soldier.

LUTF ALLAH QADIRI (Sindhi; b. 1611, d. 1679), a sufi saint poet, was most probably a resident of a well-known ancient historical place 'Agham Kot', near Hyderabad in south Sindh. He belonged to Qadiri sect of the Sufis. Further details regarding his life are not yet known, and the Sindhi work of this poet has come to light after the independence of the country. Nabî Bux Baloch has critically edited the Sindhi poetry of Lutf Allah Qadiri in a book entitled Shah Lutf Allah Qadiri jo kalam (The poetry of Shah Lutf Allah Qadiri). It was published by the Institute of Sindiology, Sindh University, Hyderabad, in 1968.

Lutf Allah Qadiri wrote a treatise in Persian entitled Minhajul Ma'rifat (Highway to spiritual knowledge). An incomplete manuscript of the work procured by Baloch contains twenty Sindhi bayts (verses). As given in the colophone, the manuscript was completed by the poet in 1667. In the manuscript, there is a reference to another work of Lutf Allah Qadiri, viz., Tuhafat-ul-salikin (Gift for the seekers of God), but it has not yet come to light. The poet explained some selected topics of sufi philosophy in a book Sindhi risalo. The available manuscript of this work contains 337 Sindhi bayts. On the basis of available evidence, it seems that the poet composed at least four hundred verses in Sindhi, out of which only 357 verses have come to light.

It is noteworthy that according to the research done so far in the history of Sindhi literature, Sindhi risalo of Lutf Allah Qadiri is the first book entirely written in

LYRIC-APABHRAMSHA

Sindhi, which has come to light. It was mostly written between the years 1667 and 1672. Prior to the procurement of Qadiri's Sindhi risalo, it was thought that the first book entirely written in Sindhi poetry was Muqaddamah-al-Salwat (A treatise on prayer), more known as Abual Hasan ji Sindhi (Sindhi book of Abual Hasan) written by the writer around 1700.

Lutf Allah Qadiri's poetry provides us with missing links in the gradual development of Sindhi poetry. A critical study of Qadiri's Sindhi poetry clearly shows an influence on him of earlier Sindhi poets like Qazi Qadan (1465-1551) and Shah Abdul Karim (1536-1622) so far as the philosophical content and the poetic form of Sindhi risalo are concerned. Besides, Lutf Allah Qadiri was also a source of inspiration to his junior contemporaries and other Sufi saint poets, such as Miyon Shah Inat (1625-1713), Shah Abdul Latif (1689-1752) and Sachal (1739-1829). Lutf Allah had profound knowledge of Sufi mysticism and theology of Islam. He was well-conversant with different sects of 'Jogis' who visited Sindh during his days, and with geographical situation of Sindh as well as the Indian sub-continent.

LYRIC (Apabhramsha). Apabhramsha was used as a medium of popular poetry as early as the time of Kalidasa. The language was cultivated as a medium of poetry, bardic, amorous, epical and mystic, throughout the length and breadth of the area of the Indo-Aryan languages right from the sixth to the sixteenth century A.D.

Originally the Apabhramsha literature began with songs, stories and hymns. It is quite rich in lyrical poetry and Rasabandha, an important genre in Apbhramsa literature. It is a sort of lyrical composition of moderate length. In one of its forms it employs a traditionally fixed metre for the general body of the poem and a variety of choice metres for the purpose of variation. Giving an account of the metres, Svayambhu established a high watermark of the Apabhramsha poetry.

The term 'Rasa' used for a group of stanzas in different metres reminds Svayambhu of an individual metre called Rasa which has 21 moras (matra) in each of its four padas (V.25). This kind of a lyric composed in Prakrit or Apabhramsha is also defined by Virahanka in the Vrittajati-samuchchaya (IV. 37-38). Another Rasa, an individual metre of the ardhāsama chatushpadi lyric, is defined by Svayambhu; its odd and even 'padas' contain respectively 7 and 13 matras. Those 'Jatis' which are employed in praising the duties in the Aphhramsha language are also called 'phullakadasa.' These are described as 'mangalas' when these are composed on the auspicious occasions of marriage, etc. There are Dhavalas also which are repeated for the specific purpose which gives inspiration for religious purposes. This clearly means tht rasabandha is a lyric poem and not a matra kavya like the Sandhibandha.

One of the landmarks in Aphhramsha lyric is the Samdesha-rasaka of Abdala Rahamana. It is a fascinating duta-kavya of 223 stanzas distributed over three 'prakamas' or sections. The first section introduces a 'virahini's' chance-meeting with a traveller through whom she sends a message to her husband who has failed to return from abroad at the promised date. In spite of the overworked theme of love-in-separation, the poet has succeeded in imparting to it genuine freshness by a skilful handling of diction and metre. Thus, the Samdesha-rasaka gives us a typical and the only preserved example of genuine rasabandha. This poem is in conformity with Svayambhu's definition of rasa-kavya. Another fine lyric poem is Chundi, written by Muni Vinayachandra, a disciple of Balachandra Muni. This lyric poem was composed in the 13th century A.D. at Tribhuvanagiri (Tahangarh), fourteen miles away from Bayana in Rajasthan.

This Chundi contains only 33 verses in the composition of musical drut-laya of Kaharwa. Actually 'chundi' is a garment which is worn especially by Rajasthani women. In this short poem, a young lady makes a request to her husband, in a sweet manner, saying, "Oh my most beloved! kindly go to the Jina temple and oblige me by getting printed the unique garment of Chundi shortly so that I shall be skilful in the Jina religion. If you do not bring it, the painter will taunt me."

In the critical edition of Vikramorvasi by the great Sanskrit poet Kalidasa some stanzas in Apabhramsha in 'khandika' and 'charchari' have been quoted. Charchari is a special type of song.

Shriharsha in the beginning of his Ratnavali also mentions charchari as sweet songs.

Jindattasuri's Chachhari (Skt. Charchari) is a well-known composition in Apabhramsha. In Charchari the songs were sung while dancing at the time of exhibiting the characters of the plays. These were quite popular in Jina temples, especially in Gujarat. We find a reference to the charachari type of dance-drama in the Kuvlaymala-katha. Even the great poet of Apabhramsha, Vira has mentioned in his Jambu svami charitra about 'Ambadevi Rasa' composed in 'Charchari bandhi'. Other lyric poems of Apbhramsha are; the chariya-gitis of the Buddhists, thudi poems, Jaymala literature, kulak, pathadi, etc.

We find songs also in Apabhramsha. Muni Charit-rasena's Samadhi gita and Mahanandi's Ananda and Sate are worth mentioning. There are 50 stanzas in Samadhi gita. It is a spiritual song which portrays the devotional feelings of the saints. It gives a description of the state of beatitude.

Ananda is a small work which contains 43 stanzas. The main subject of the work is spiritual vision. The stanzas express lofty sense in a few words. The date of the work is not known but it seems that it was composed in about 13th century.

LYRIC-ASSAMESE

Sate is also a small composition of eleven stanzas. It depicts the eternal pious focus of a saint or yogi. These songs show a recurrence of 'tek' and are composed with 'tala' and 'laya' which are the characteristics of songs.

A few 'phagu' types of compositions can also be mentioned as examples of Apabhramsha lyrics. These are the following: Neminatha-phagu (Rajsekharā Suri, 1348), Sirithulabhadda-phagu (Janapadmasuri, 1333) and Thulabhadda (Depala Kavi).

The Rasa types of composition are also found in abundance in Apbhramsha, besides Hindi and Gujarati. There are about 1200 works in Apbhramsha alone. There are good examples of lyrical composition.

LYRIC (Assamese), in the western sense of the term, seems to have originated in Assamese during the latter part of the 19th century. Several influences in the cultural and literary fields, including the contact with western literature through the Christian missionaries and a new awakening in all spheres of life leading to a radical exploration of one's own history and tradition, led to the flowering of lyric in Assamese.

The new poetic consciousness manifested itself in a new awareness of values. Love, Beauty and Humanism provided the main threads that run through the poetry of Assam. There was a radically new approach in the exploration of myth, legend and elements of folk tradition as poetic themes. There was also a greater use of rhythms and patterns of speech for expression of ideas or in making personal statements in verse. At this stage of new awakening, the mind and spirit of Tagore entered and informed the new poetic consciousness in Assam.

The publication of Jonaki in 1889 which marks the beginning of romanticism in Assamese literature was preceded by a period of experimentation in poetry. Ramakanta Choudhury (1858-1929) and Bholanath Das (1858-1929) were the two important poets whose chief distinction lay in the adoption of blank verse in imitation of Michael Madhusudan Datta of Bengal. Kamalakanta Bhattacharyya (1853-1927) who was noted for bold patriotic themes rather than innovative skill published his first volume of poems Chintanal (Thought-flames) in 1890. However, he was outside the pale of the new poetic credo of romanticism in Assamese poetry. Lakshminath Bezbarua (1864-1938), Chandrakumar Agarwalla (1867-1938) and Hemchandra Goswami (1872-1928) made significant contributions to this new genre.

The Jonaki (1889-93) and later on, the Banhi (1910-29) edited by Bezbarua established the basic notes of the romantic mode in Assamese literature. The first poem in the Assamese lyrical tradition is 'Bankuwari' (Sylvan deity) by Chandrakumar Agarwalla, published in 1889. His collected poems were later published in two volumes, the Pratima (The image) and Binabaragi (the minstrel).

All these poems show the strength of his inspiration and the range of his sensibility as a poet with a visionary approach and deep attachment to human values. A poem like 'Prakriti' (Nature) contemplates Nature as an entity or a substratum of reality while another poem 'Niyar' (the dew drops) captures the evanescent beauty of Nature. It is a measure of the strength of the poet that the use of figurative and evocative language is balanced with a grasp of reality and his handling of impersonal themes is never at the expense of the lyrical impulse, which is basically personal in inspiration. A poem like 'Tejimala' deals with the theme of innocence and suffering on a sustained human scale without an overt manipulation of the lyrical impulse, retaining all the naturalness of the original folk theme deeply etched in the mind of the readers. Occasionally the lyrical inspiration becomes apparent as for instance in 'Ajeyo' (The unconquered) with its use of the dramatic nuances for a final lyrical resolution. To rephrase his own words, the poet is a worshipper of Beauty, which again in its imagined fruition is not divorced from human reality or the human predicament. In this context his long poem Bin Baragi acquires added significance.

Lakshminath Bezbarua was a many-sided genius who contributed to the literary movement in every possible way and dominated the literary scene for half a century. Bezbarua was a pioneer in a variety of literary forms including the novel, the drama and the short story and set the norms of critical appreciation for the Assamese. He also absorbed and assimilated the creative streams of English literature particularly those of Shakespeare and the romantic poets. He had a perfect understanding of the best lyrical tradition in Bengal and of Rabindranath Tagore, who influenced him deeply. His first collection of poems, Kadamkali (Kadamba buds, 1913) contained a number of excellent lyrics, which are representative of the mainstream of the romantic consciousness in poetry.

There are a few important aspects to be recalled in considering the unique achievement of Lakshminath Bezbarua in the field of Assamese lyric poetry. First of all, the poet's use of the language—and of the essence of the Assamese folk tradition, suggested a deep human overtone and a resonance of immemorial human ties which fit in so well with the romantic themes of love or the transience of human experience. 'Malati', for instance, is a superb poem with a resonance of Wordsworth's 'She dwelt among the untrodden ways' but the suggestive power of the language seems to be a natural evolution from the traditional folk or rural lore. 'Dhabar aru Ratani' (Dhanabr and Ratani) and 'Nimati kanya' (Silent maiden) are other poems, in which the traditional ballad form has been transformed or rather recreated with remarkable ease and felicity.

Despite a few recognised limitations in his poetry—the poems do not have an intensity of a personal kind—the poet's disciplined sensibility and imaginative strength invest the theme of love with a kind of centrality and significance. Patriotism is the theme of some of the other poems of which one of the most important is 'Been aru baragi' (The man and lyre).

Hemchandra Goswami wrote a fewer number of poems and the only volume of poems Phular chaki (The flower garland) was published in 1907. Hemchandra Goswami wrote 'Priyatamar chithi' (Letter from beloved) the first sonnet in the language. His 'Puva' (The dawn), first published in the Jonaki, may be literally about renaissance but it actually celebrates a deeper awakening of consciousness in man. The string of images suggest light, flowering and movement with a human spirit truly attuned to creativity.

Three of the poets who were contemporaries of Chandrakumar Agarwalla and Laksminath Bezbarua but stood away from the mainstream are Padmanath Gohain Barua (1871-1946) Anandachandra Agarwalla (1874-1904) and Hiteswaar Barbarooah (1876-1939). Durgeswar Sarma (1882-1961) and Nalini Bala Devi (1898-1978) initiated a kind of mysticism with a depth of personal feeling, the former definitely the more original in his controlled descriptions of Nature parallel to the meditative or mystical states of mind. Durgeswar Sarma's 'Anjali' (Offering 1910) and 'Nivedan' (Submission, 1915) and Nalini Bala Devi's 'Sandhyar Sur' (The evening tune) and 'Saponar sur' (Dream melody) have also to be mentioned in a discussion of the lyric in Assamese.

Raghunath Choudhary (1879-1966) who wrote a number of good lyrics was perhaps not exposed to western influences in his poetry. He used the evocation of some aspects of Nature, mainly the recurring images of a particular bird or a flower to express personal feelings in poetry. Poems like the 'Keteki' (The nightingale) and 'Golap' (The rose) have an enduring appeal while a poem like 'Fula sajja' (Bridal night) achieves a personal poignancy. Ambikagiri Ray Choudhury (1858-1967) departs from the path of the early romantics but it is a measure of his originality that he emerges as one of the most important poets in Assamese. His personality and imagination were fired by a kind of restless energy and the poetic experience which covered a wide spectrum from the emotion and anguish of 'Anubhuti' (feeling), mystical love in 'Tumi' (You) to the revolutionary idealism of poems eulogising political freedom and patriotism. Ambikagiri added a new dimension to the poetry of love, his powerful personality leaving an indelible mark on even shorter poems which must be reckoned amongst the best in the language.

Ratnakanta Barkakati (1897-1963) was greatly influenced by Rabindranath Tagore and as a poet he belongs basically to the purer stream of romanticism of Chandrakumar Agarwalla and Laksminath Bezbarua. Barkakati's lyrics echo Rabindranath and are variations on the theme of creativity and imagination built around a very human (and world-affirming) comprehension of reality. His collected poems, Sewali (1932), testify to the poet's fine sensibility—his originality as well as his deep response to Tagore's poetry and vision. Jatindranath Dowerah (1892-1964) who translated Fitzgerald's Rubaiyats of Omar Khayyam into Assamese in an inimitable style made the celebration of romantic love the main theme in his poetry. His two important collections of poems are Apan sur (Sweet melody, 1938) and Banphool (Wild flower, 1952). A fine lyrical flow is the hallmark of Jatindranath Dowerah and a delicate sense of cadence invests the muted sense of sadness in his poems with a human significance.

Among Barkakati and Dowerah's contemporaries, the contributions of Sailadhar Rajkhowa (1892-1968) Kamalananda Bhattacharyya (1894-1951), Surya Kumar Bhuyan (1894-1964) and Dimbeswar Neog (1900-1966) serve to indicate the range and variety achieved.

Padmadhar Chaliha (1895-1968) and Binandachandra Barua (b. 1901) develop the patriotic themes also as personal themes in their poetry. Padmadhar Chaliha was also noted for his lyrical song compositions inspired by the struggle for freedom. Anandachandra Barua (1908-1984) and Kamaleswar Chaliha (b. 1904) wrote on the themes of love and of beauty in a muted form, the former coming under the influence of Sufism and the latter, of Rabindranath Tagore. Some aspects of the weakness of Assamese romantic poetry are to be seen in Ganesh Gogoi (1905-1938) a poet of adolescence rather than maturity. Devakanta Barua (b. 1914) a more virile poet influenced considerably by Robert Browning of the dramatic monologues marks an important point of departure in Assamese poetry. In point of colloquial verve and bold thematic outline, his Sagor dekhisha (Have you seen the ocean, 1945) poems are quite remarkable. But one does feel that the absence of a deeper coherence of perception and feeling is sometimes compensated for by rhetoric or mellifluous cadence.

Two poets, Jyotiprasad Agarwalla (1903-1948) and Parvatiprasad Barua (1907-1964) deserve special mention for their natural felicity as well as freshness and originality and significantly, both were poet composers who enriched the lyric tradition by bringing in the linguistic as well as the musical resources of language into their poems. Jyotiprasad reinterpreted the conceptual framework of Love, Beauty and Humanism. His lyrical imagination was influenced by Chandrakumar Agarwalla and Laksminath Bezbarua, while Parvatiprasad absorbed the influence of Rabindranath Tagore directly in his lyrics and his creative inspiration sought to combine Tagore's humanist outlook with the embedded richness of the Assamese folk tradition.

There is no doubt that the lyric which was the dominant form till the twenties, became attenuated in the thirties and suffered gradually in terms of creative excellence—the organic relationship with the latent resources of language was never, for instance, established in the same way again. This change can be partly traced to the deference in the cultural situation, in the divergence in the philosophical insights and poetic sensibilities between those of the earlier generation and the later generation of the thirties and forties.

During the last few decades, there has been a weaning away from the humanist tradition resulting in a loss in terms of creative possibilities in language and literature. Lyrical poetry tended to be personal in a narrow sense or became the external projection of the poet's need to express his ideas in verse. This kind of situation has also made evaluation of poetry a rather difficult task in the last few decades including the post-war period.

LYRIC (Bengali). The word 'lyric' originally meant only a song sung to the accompaniment of a lyre but in course of time it came to mean any poetical composition that expressed an intense personal emotion in words evocative of the poet's subjective state of mind. In a modern lyric the song element may or may not be there but that is of minor consideration.

In the mediaeval period a lyrical composition was almost always associated with religious sentiments. Baudha Sahajiya couplets, Vaishnava and Sakta padas and Baul songs were the chief varieties that comprised the lyrical poetry of mediaeval Bengal. But with the advent of modernism in Bengali poetry mainly due to its contact with western literature and its impact thereon, modern Bengali lyric was shorn of what may be called a strong religious and spiritual streak and turned to be more mundane and humanistic. In the domain of modern Bengali poetry the classical element is by and large overshadowed by that of the lyric and this process continues unhampered. Unlike in some other Indian languages, lyric is the most predominant if not the all-pervasive form in modern Bengali poetry.

The historians of Bengali literature are unanimous in their opinion that the English romantic poetry had some vital part to play in the germination and sprouting of the seed of 'lyric' in the 19th century Bengali poetry. The publication of the Lyrical Ballads jointly by Wordsworth and Coleridge in 1798 in a sense set the pace for the growth of modern Bengali lyrical poetry. The English poets of the Romantic Revival like Wordsworth, Coleridge, Scott, Byron, Shelley, Keats and others made a direct appeal to the imagination of a group of Bengali poets. They were Michael Madhusudan Datta (1824-1873), Rangalal Banerjee (1827-1887), Hemchandra Banerjee (1838-1903), Dwijendranath Tagore (1840-1926), Nabinchandra Sen (1847-1909), Akshay Chaudhuri (1850-1898) and others. But even if some of them were highly gifted sons of the Muse they could not fully develop the lyric as their attention was divided between the classical and the romantic, the narrative and the lyric, the objective and the subjective, in almost an equal measure. They were as much interested in composing poems on a massive scale (mahakavya) as in creating fragile pieces (gitikavya). Bengali poetry in this respect did not follow exactly the pattern followed by the English romantic poetry of the early nineteenth century. In English poetry romantic revival had set in after the decline of Neoclassicism. But here classicism and romanticism went side by side for a considerable stretch of time until 1862 when with two lyrical pieces from the pen of Madhusudan, 'Atmabilap' (Self-reproach) and 'Bangabhasar prati' (To the Bengali language) the stage was set for the emergence of lyric poetry in its true spirit.

Judging critically, the real credit for ushering romantic lyric poetry in the Bengali language must go to Biharlal Chakravarti (1835-1894) followed by such others as Surendranath Majumdar (1838-1878), Devendranath Sen (1852-1920), Govindachandra Das (1854-1918), Girindramohini Dasi (1857-1924), Akshaykumar Baral (1860-1919), Rabindranath Tagore (1861-1941), Manikumari Basu (1863-1943) and Kamini Roy (1864-1933).

Biharlal struck entirely a new note in Bengali poetry by injecting a deeply felt personal emotion in the body of the poem. His Bangasundari (1870), Premprabani (1871), Saradamangal (1879), Sadher asan (1888-1889) and other books of poems—all point to this particular characteristic of writing hitherto unperceived in Bengali poetry. Saradamangal in which the poet invoked the goddess of learning in a new way was the most representative of his poetical collections. Surendranath in his Mahila kavya (Part I 1880, Part II 1883) eulogized the ideal womanhood as manifested in the role of a mother or that of a spouse. He had a mind to depict woman as a sister and a daughter but he died before he could complete this cycle of poetical images giving a full picture of the Indian womanhood. Akshaykumar Baral in his most famous kavya Esha (1912) bemoaned the death of his wife in such a plaintive strain that in his scheme of poetry love, beauty and nature were intermingled in a very harmonious blend. Devendranath Sen patterned his lyrical poems after Madhusudan and Hemchandra. Romantic theme such as nature, love, woman and woman's beauty permeated his whole poetical outlook which was marked by a sense of joyous wonder at the variegatedness of life and universe. Gobinda Das was a worshipper of sensuous beauty in woman. A poet who had suffered enormously at the hands of a cruel fate and undergone extreme poverty would also be remembered for some of his intensely felt patriotic verses.

Among the women poets Kamini Roy was undoubtedly the most powerful of the group. Her Alo o chhaya (Light and shade) was at one time very avidly read by the poetry lovers of Bengal. Girindramohini Dasi (Datta) was best known for her Ashrutana (1887), an elegiac poem written in memory of her husband who had died prematurely. Mankumari Basu, a niece of Michael Madhusudan Datta, enjoyed considerable popularity in her day for her poems which express deep pathos and sympathy for human sufferings, particularly the woes of womenfolk in our society.

Tagore was undoubtedly the greatest lyrical genius of this century. His lyrics breathe at once an intense love of Nature, love of God and human love in its various shades of feeling and subtle sensibilities. At one stage of his poetical career he wrote quite a large number of partriotic poems and songs. While his earlier poems written in the eighties and nineties of the preceding century like those contained in his Manasi (1890), Sonar tari (1893), Chitra (1895), Chaitali (1896) and others were marked by a facile imagination and spontaneity of expression, in his later poems, especially in those composed during and after the First World War, he seems to be inclined to invest his poetry with more and more intellectual content. In between these two periods, that is, in the years from the beginning of this century to the onset of the First World War, Tagore's poems were saturated with religious emotions and intense devotional longings in the best tradition of the Upanishads as evidenced in the poems collected in Naibedya (1901) and those gleaned together in Gitanjali (1910).

A number of lesser poets but nevertheless each one distinctive in his or her own sphere of creation, flourished under the shadow of Tagore and were directly imbued with his poetical principles. They were: Priyambada Devi (1871-1935), Karunanidhan Banerjee (1877-1955), Jatindramohan Bagchi (1878-1948), Satyendranath Datta (1882-1922), Kumudranjan Mallik (1882-1970), Kirandhan Chatterjee (1887-1931), Kalidas Roy (1889-1975) and others. Of them Satyendranath Datta was decisively the best both from the point of view of output as well as the variegated nature of his verses and metrical experiments both in his original and translated poems. His most well known books of lyrical verse include Benu o bina (1906), Phuler phasal (1911), Kuhu o keka (1912), Tulir likhan (1914) and Abhra abir (1917).

Karunanidhan is a romantic poet of high merit with a passion for sonorous rhythm. His collection of poems entitled Satanari compiled by Hemchandra Bagchi and Trayi compiled by Sajanikanto Das bear unmistakable evidence of his fine lyrical sensibility. Both Kumudranjan and Kalidas hail from a region of the district of Burdwan known for its Vaishnavite background and perhaps this is one of the reasons why their poems are full of the aroma of the Vaishnava lyrics. Also they have in common a pronounced streak of nostalgic love for the countryside which marks them out from the urbanized group of the post-Tagorean poets. Ujani is the most representative of Kumudranjan's books, while Kalidas Roy's Brabajenu points to his Vaishnavite affiliations. Jatindramohan Bagchi was chiefly known for his composition with a rural theme as well as those dealing with the commonplaces of the town-dwelling middle-class people. Simplicity of expression and command over metre and diction were among his other characteristics. Nagkeshar is his most representative book of lyrical verse.

Kirandhan Chatterjee's singular collection of lyrics Nutan khata (1923) centres round domestic life and conjugal love. Though the output of the poet is meagre there is a ring of sincerity in whatever he wrote and that accounts for his fame in spite of the quantitative thinness of his poetry.

Priyambada Devi wrote only subjective lyrics. The premature death of her husband and then of her only son at the age of twelve account for the sadness which permeates through her works such as Renu (1900), Tara (1907), Patralekha (1911) and Angshu (1927).

About the same time three very powerful poets reacted against the Tagorean mode of writing and struck a new note in poetry. Jatindranath Sengupta (1887-1954) in his books of verses like Marichika, Marumaya and Marushikha (one could note here the names of the titles of the three compilations all evocative of the dreariness of an arid desert) set pessimism as the most dominant fact of the reality of life as against the optimism of Tagore. Mohitlal Majumdar (1888-1952) attacked Tagore from another direction by opposing the latter's mysticism with his emphasis on the sensuous aspect of human love and raptures of the body. His well known collections are Swapan pasari (1912) and Bismarani (1926). The third was Kazi Nazrul Islam (1899-1976), a rebel poet in the true sense of the term, who mounted a deliberate attack on what might be called the middle class values and conventions and upheld the dignity of the toiling masses so long neglected and kept out of our literature. His first book of poems, Agnibina (1922), struck a highly strident note in an otherwise placid and tranquil atmosphere of Bengali poetry.

In the wake of these three there emerged on the poetic scene an impressive band of new poets with a new outlook who ushered in revolutionary changes not only in the content of the lyric but in its form as well. The foremost among them were Jibanananda Das (1899-1954), Amiya Chakrabarti (1901-1985), Sudhindranath Datta (1901-1960), Achintyakumar Sengupta (1903-1976), Premendra Mitra (1904-1988), Buddhadev Basu (1908-1974), Bishnu De (1909-1982), Sanjay Bhattacharya (1909-1969), Bimalchandra Ghosh (1910-1981), Dinesh Das (1913-1985), Samar Sen (1916-1987) and lastly Sukanta Bhattacharya (1921-1948).

LYRIC-DOGRI

The fact to be noted is that lyric poetry has taken newer forms and textures in the hands of later exponents of the genre. Birendranath Chatterjee, Manishankar Bhattacharya, Subhas Mukherjee, Shakti Chatterjee, Sunil Ganguli, Shankho Ghose, Alokranjan Dasgupta and numberless poets of the many little magazines either under their influence or in protest against their style of writing, have kept the lyrical stream in full flow and vigour with their ceaseless poetic efforts.

LYRIC (Dogri). Lyrics or 'gitas' form quite a substantial part of Dogri poetry. They spring directly from, and have their roots in the rich tradition of Dogri folk-songs. Kavi Datta (18th century) is known to have been the first Dogri lyricist and his 8-line lyric entitled 'Sikkh deyan miki devi datta' which describes graphically the hard joyless life of a bride of Gangatha, has found a place in almost all anthologies of Dogri poetry. Taunted by her in-laws and afraid of being exposed to scandal if she talks to anyone, she stops going alone to the village well to fetch water.

In the thirties of the present century, there was the Dogri poet, Hardatt Shastri, whose lyrics, modelled on some popular Punjabi and Dogri folk-songs, are compiled in two parts of Dogri bhajanmala. These lyrics carry prominently subjects like deteriorating plight of Duggar and Bharatdes, social evils, narrow-mindedness and communalism, the curse of changing times, etc. All this has been called by the lyric writer as disgraceful for the Dogras. Hardatt himself made these lyrics popular amongst the Dogras who assembled in large number to listen to his religious discourses. By exhorting the lethargic people of Duggar, Hardatt puts this question: "O Dogra Desha, kiyan gujara tera hog?" (Oh Dogra land, how would you get on in the world?). He also wrote some devotional lyrics.

Numerous lyrics in Dogri have been composed by Krishan Samailpuri. These lyrics are compiled in his book entitled Mere Dogri gita which was given the Sahitya Academy Award in 1975. Samailpuri started composing lyrics in Dogri in 1947 with the installation of a Radio station in Jammu. The lyrics of Samailpuri are brief and simple with a folk touch in them.

The hero and the heroine of the lyrics of Samailpuri are Chandu and Chainchlo respectively. 'Apna gai chitta tunda chor', 'Chanduji, kite de koul mabhane chainchlo', 'Jammuye di rat,' 'Aa galen laggeyai rochal,' 'Bitteya chambe da,' 'Chainchalo de hasse,' 'Chambe di lari' are some of the outstanding lyrics of Samailpuri.

Parmanand Almast is another lyricist who wrote a number of beautiful lyrics in Dogri. Many of Almast's lyrics are love-lyrics. Almast himself used to sing them in a peculiar style of his own in 'mushairas.' A greyhaired Almast, whenever he sang his famous lyric, namely, 'Joban dhal bo jana, O jinde mari bo jana' (Youth is short-lived, every one is to die), thousands of listeners were seen moving their heads with the rhythm. In his lyrics, he has described the life of the people of the hills, the beauty of nature, the flowers, hill-sides, moonlight, birds, cool breeze, changing seasons, etc. In his own life time, his lyrics were mistaken as folk-lyrics. Almast's successful love-lyrics are those which depict separation of the lover from his beloved, like Yaksha of the Meghaduta by Kalidasa. 'Odhanu rangi de lalariya, odhanu range de lalariya' is another excellent lyric of Almast which has been sung by Lata Mangeshkar. Certain lyrics of Almast are quite surrealistic where sense is entirely subordinated to verbal music.

Dinubhai Pant, Ramnath Shastri, K.S. Madhukar and Padma Sachdev, who are basically writers of other types of poems have also written some lyrics. But it is in Yash Sharma and Pradyumna Singh that the Dogri lyric has found beautiful expression. Both Yash and Pradyumna Singh are singer poets of Dogri and they have presented their lyrics in their own melodious voice and conquered the hearts of the Dogri audiences. Early lyrics of Yash carry patriotic mood. The influence of Hindi poet Bacchan is evidenced in the lyrics of Yash. His notable lyrics are; (a) 'Sanjan ghirdian chitta kalmi janda', (b) 'Tere baja pradesia kiyan jina?', (c) 'Koyi badali gasa chohayee hama nein dardi', (d) 'Chaj barai di chanani rata, tunte meri jana lagadi.'

In some of his lyrics, folk spirit is prominently seen. Recently, Yash has written some five symbolic lyrics.

Pradyumna Singh Jindrahiya is another noted lyricist of Dogri who started writing lyrics in early seventies. His collection of forty-four lyrics and seven devotional lyrics entitled Phuهران in 111 pages has its place in the verse-store of Dogri. Notations of the lyrics have also been given in Phuهران. The language of these lyrics is fresh, musical and homely. His lyrics have a certain musical flow as in 'Chhala chhala chhala chharuke kannai chhali bedale'.

Pradyumna is the first lyric poet of Dogri who has obtained training in music from the world-renowned santoorist, Shivkumar Sharma and his father Umadutt Sharma. When a musician and a poet are combined in one person, as in Yash and Pradyumna Singh Jindrahiya, 'the lyric is a set at liberty'. Pradyumna's lyrics are unaffected by film songs and are nearer the folk-lyric. His lyric lines like 'Dhara dhara paundian phuهران meri jana/Manai da pakheru lai chhualan meri jana' have mass appeal.

Two important strands of Pradyumna's lyrics are romance and patriotism as exemplified in lines like these: 'Barakha di peyi geyi phuهران jane meriye/Jayan nein tun kutai dura para jane meriye' and 'Tun andra di rakhi kareyan mein sima para jana/Sima para mein karataba dassan uccha nama kamana'.

LYRIC-ENGLISH

Devotional lyrics in a very simple language and in folk style have been composed by an uneducated farmer lyricist, namely, Ramlal Papiha. His three collections of lyrics are known by the titles: Laihran, Papiha di pukar and Prem rasa. Renunciation of worldly pleasures forms the main theme of these lyrics which are marked by simplicity of expression.

There are several other Dogri poets who have written good lyrics, which though not published in separate books, have been broadcast from Radio Kashmir and Jammu. Some of these poets are Jitendra Udhamपुरi, Kuldip Singh, Brijmohan, Padamden Singh, Nirdosh, Joginder Pardesi and Champa Sharma.

LYRIC (English). Indian English poetry began with Henry Derozio (1809-1831). It is not surprising, therefore, that the traditional lyric with its different structural forms—the sonnet, elegy or ode—should have engaged the talents of almost all the early Indo-English poets. Besides Derozio himself, these include Michael Madhusudan Dutt (1824-1873), Toru Dutt (1856-1877), Manmohan Ghose (1869-1924), Sri Aurobindo (1872-1949) and Sarojini Naidu (1879-1949).

The advent of the moderns meant a slackening, if not total disappearance, of the conventional lyric structures. But the lyrical sensibility continues. Therefore, “the primordial form of the song” involving musicality is no longer accorded primacy in identifying the lyric. It has come to signify a complex spectrum of motifs ranging from the purely personal or confessional to the most abstractly philosophical.

In examining the lyric in Indian English poetry a more viable approach, therefore, is to use some kind of a thematic categorisation rather than a chronological structure-wise listing. The approach suggested by James William Johnson in his essay on ‘Lyric’ in the Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, (Macmillan, 1975, ed. Alex Preminger) seems helpful.

The first category is the lyric of vision or emblem. Strictly, this is Pound’s “Ideogram” using “the pictorial element of print” to represent the idea or object sought to be evoked. Obviously, Indian English poetry is virtually exempt from any attempt of this kind. However, if we take the pictorial element in the larger sense of descriptive skill, we will notice that many Indian English poets figure prominently in this category.

Toru Dutt had a fine narrative gift in addition to the descriptive (“The Lotus”, “Baugmare”, “Our Gasuarina Tree”) and Sarojini Naidu, with remarkable lyrical gifts, possessed also what R. Parthasarathy has described as “the finest among Indian poets for the sound of English”. Similar talent for description is evident in Kasisprosad Ghose (‘The Moon in September’), Michael Madhusudan Dutt (‘To a Star during a Cloudy Night’), Man Mohan Ghose (‘April’), Aurobindo (‘Invitation’, ‘The Tiger and the Deer’).

Much of this poetry appears meretricious today and description often degenerates into inane cataloguing. Contemporary Indian English poetry, shows, however, remarkable virtuosity in the personalized description of an usually urban landscape. Nissim Ezekiel and Adil Jussawalla evoke the urban landscape with great involvement, while Jayanta Mahapatra and Keki N. Daruwalla excel in ironic evocation of naturalistic detail (Daruwalla’s ‘Ghaghara in Spate’ is a fine example). These poets offer an antidote to the romantic gush with which the earlier poets evoked India. However, for an exact, unblinking eye for the revealing detail rendered in all its objectivity which itself is a critique—one has to cite several of the poems in Arun Kolatkar’s Jejuri (1976).

Evidence of the emergence of the lyric as a real pictorial emblem is to be found in the recent poetry of Nissim Ezekiel entitled Poster Poems and some of the poetry volumes by Pritish Nandy.

The second category is the lyric of thought or idea. This is “the lyrically expository verse”, often involving the didactic strain. This is found in plenty in the earlier poets such as Govin Dutt (“Romance”) Henry Derozio (‘A Walk by Moonlight’), Swami Vivekananda (‘Kali, the Mother’). The most significant example is, however, The Quest Eternal (1936) by Brajendranath Seal. Even in the modern context we have several poets such as Narmadeshwar Prasad, Amaresh Datta, Nirodbaran, H.D. Sethna, Ananda Acharya, Nolini Kanta Gupta, and to a certain extent Harindranath Chattopadhyaya. The supreme example of the didactic poet, however, is Sri Aurobindo who, besides Savitri (considered in the third category), wrote several didactic poems such as the ‘Rose of God’, ‘A Dream of Surreal Silence’.

Finally, we have the lyric proper, the lyric of emotion and feeling involving three categories; the sensual, the imaginative which “intellectualizes emotional states” and the mystical or the visionary. Among these the sensual, reflecting intensity of emotion and feeling, is the most popular genre and it assumed several forms such as the song (or lay), elegy, ode and ballad. As early as 1849 we have the lyrical narrative The Captive Ladie by Michael Madhusudan Dutt trying his hand at evocation of emotion. The strain continues in Toru Dutt’s Ancient Ballads and Legends of Hindustan (1885), Romesh Chunder Dutt’s Lays of Ancient India (1894). Surpassing these in intensity of passion is Manmohan Ghose whose Love songs and Elegies (1898) contains, in spite of its decadent romanticism, a genuine elegiac strain. Finally, we have Sarojini Naidu whose forte is description but who can occasionally evidence authentic sensuousness as in The Bird of Time (1912) and The Broken Wing (1917). (The supreme lyricist is of course Rabindranath Tagore but since much of his poetry in English is translation he is not considered here).

LYRIC-GUJARATI-LYRIC-HINDI

If, however, sensuousness may be taken as basically the expression of a powerful personal emotion usually rooted in love then some of the most memorable sensuous poetry appeared only in the twentieth century. Kamala Das is an outstanding example but it is R. Parthasarathy's Rough Passage (particularly the second section 'The Trial') that contains some of the finest lyricism of Indo-English poetry. Similar intensity is found in some of A.K. Ramanujan's poems, such as "Still Another View of Grace" and "Of Mothers, Among Other Things".

Of the imaginative lyric which "intellectualizes emotional states" the most significant example is Nissim Ezekiel. He is intellectual without being cerebral and even when abstract retains the core of personal emotion as is evident in, notably, 'Enterprise', 'Poet, Lover, Birdwatcher', 'Philosophy', 'Tribute to the Upanishads'. A comparable talent for intellectual contemplation—particularly of the 'usable past' impinging on familial relations—is evident in A.K. Ramanujan. In Adil Jussawalla this strain is predominant often, tending to dislocate the very roots of one's being.

Finally, the authentic visionary or mystical lyric is very rare in Indian English poetry. If a poet such as Blake can be regarded as a paradigm in this category, then such a poet is yet to appear. However, many critics like K.R. Srinivasa Iyengar regard Sri Aurobindo's Savitri as the finest example of visionary poetry. This is controverted fiercely by the modernists. Without being partisan, one can state without any reservations that Savitri shows talent for visionary poetry but much of this talent remains potential and does not get actualized in the body of the poem.

LYRIC (Gujarati). The bulk of medieval Gujarati poetry is lyrical in its immense range and variety. The subject matter is, however, mainly of religious and devotional nature. Nevertheless, the medieval lyric, which is very close to the generic essence in its own way, can never be dissociated from singing, for it is deeply rooted in the religious ceremonies and ritualistic activity. Exhilarating in this mood, the forms such as 'prabhatiya', 'pada', 'garbi' and 'kafi' demonstrate various lyrical modes and cadences. Narasinh Mehta, Mirabai and Dayaram are, beyond doubt, the master-lyricists in their spontaneously melodic expressions. These poets are, in the first place, devotees of the Krishna-cult. What they sing in exclusive devotion effortlessly and accidentally turns into poetic moulds. Thus, throughout the medieval times, one can see the intense exposition in the first few lines, the rest of the material, though vibrantly passionate, rarely gets the architectural touch.

But modern Gujarati lyric differs entirely from the medieval lyric; the former does not evolve out of the latter. On the contrary, it is transplanted from the English soil, as a result of the Renaissance spirit infused under the British regime. Now the poet is aware of his poetic consciousness, the 'psychological' has taken the place of the 'metaphysical' and the poet remains absorbed in the former, the poem reflects the personality and subjectivity of the poet, the imagery is fresh and the technique of presentation has undergone tremendous changes.

From Narmad's initial crudities and Narasinhrao Divetia's imitating the English romantic models, to Nanalal's excellence in flexibility of techniques, the lyric assuredly shows some development. Further, B.K. Thakor and Gandhian poets like Umashankar Joshi and Sundaram attempt to add a few more dimensions of universal awareness. Here after some exotic forms such as sonnet, elegy, ghazal, haiku, ode and epistle take their firm roots in Gujarati soil. Even Rabindra music exerts a great influence on songsters like Prahlad Parekh, Rajendra Shah and Niranjan Bhagat.

The modern lyric in Gujarati initially affected by the English influences alone, lays itself open finally to consume all European and American poetic modes, since 1960. Lyric has not remained merely a vehicle for conveying emotions, but it has become the very object of emotions. Labhshankar Thakar, Anil Joshi, Rajendra Shukla and a few others are making efforts to enrich contemporary lyrics in different ways.

LYRIC (Hindi) as it is found today, can neither be associated with the Vedic hymnal tradition, with its variety of musical instruments—such a aghani, tuna, kandhavina and nada—that were played on the occasion of yajna and ritual, nor with the mellifluous poetry of the blind poet Homer sung in the accompaniment of the Greek musical instrument lyre.

Though the word 'lyric' denotes a song or a composition to be sung, the age-long tradition of lyric poetry has not confined its meaning to a melodious composition. It has abandoned or subordinated its direct link with music and has made way for other verbal features, with intricately interwoven patterns of sound, haunting music of vowels and consonants, and phrases beautiful enough to produce singing quality.

Today lyric is such a queer mixture of western song or lyric and various poetic forms beginning from Vedic hymn-singing that it is almost impossible to correlate it to its original sources.

It would not be difficult to trace, in outline, its uninterrupted tradition right from the Vedic period. Having originated from Usha-hymns and self-expressive of Indrani and Shachi in the Rigveda and the mellifluous songs of the samaveda, the lyric makes its way through the inward expressions of Buddhist nuns in Ther or Theri gathas, the occasional overflow of melodious poetry in the Ramayana of Valmiki, the lyrical grace of Kalidasa, particularly in Meghaduta, the mellifluous music of Piyushvarshi (nectar-showering) Jayadeva's Gitagovinda, the cantos of Kanvaja samaya and Bari larai ke samaya in Chand Bardai's Prithviraj raso, Narpati Nalha's Bisaldev raso, the melodious couplets of Vidyapati, especially those related to Radha-Krishna, Shiva and the Ganges, the padas of the saint poets Kabir, Dadu, Sundardas, Malukdas and Darya Sahab, the padas of the devotional poets of Rama and Krishna cults such as Tulsidas, Surdas, Mira, etc. It comprehends a wide variety and complexity of verbal and sonorous beauty and enters the modern age with the towering and epoch-making personality of Bharatendu Harishchandra.

Bharatendu, on the one hand, wrote padas in Brajbhasha following the pattern of the devotional poets and, on the other, composed beautiful songs in his plays like Chandravali. In this very age Pratapnarayan Mishra, Premghan, Radhakrishnadas and Shridhar Pathak made a happy beginning by writing songs on social themes such as social uplift, glorification of the motherland and patriotism.

After Bharatendu the poets of the Dwivedi era such as Mahavirprasad Dwivedi ('Vidhi ki vidambana'), Nathuram Shankar Sharma ('Panch ki pukar') Gayaprasad Shukla 'Sanehi' ('Ahimsa Sangram'), Matihilisharan Gupta ('Sukavi kirtan'), Mannan Dwivedi ('Chameli'), Ramcharit Upadhyaya ('Kanhaiya') as also Ayodhya Singh Upadhyaya 'Hariaudh', Badarinarayan Bhatt, Madhav Shukla, Anup, Gopalsharan Singh and Mukut-dhar Pande continued its stream by writing stray songs with occasional touches of lyric grace. But the fact remains that after Kalidasa, Jayadeva and Vidyapati, while the poets of Bhakti (devotional) period such as Kabir, Sur, Tulsi, Mira, etc. were able to depict through this poetic form the innermost feelings of their hearts in all their totality and complexity, in the poets of Bharatendu and Dwivedi eras it was reduced to a monotonous and narrative media marked with a crudeness of art and expression—though, of course, they were able to draw it out from the slime of sensuality of Riti Kal, i.e. the later medieval period, which preceded the modern age.

In the first decade of the present century Lochanprasad Pandey was the first to use the term 'gita-kavya' in the introduction to Kavita-kusum-mala. In the second decade, Jayshankar Prasad and Makhanlal Chaturvedi published their poems. A few of them attracted the minds of the readers by the new quality of content and craft which was, on the one hand, the beginning of a new poetic tendency called 'Chhayavad' and on the other a reaction against the superficial and matter-of-fact poetry of the Dwivedi era. The poems of the Chhayavadi era formed a happy synthesis between the English romantic poetry and the well-known native folk-songs like Viraha, dadra, Kajari and Lavani. They were looked upon as a subtle and sharp poetic reaction against the narrative mode of the preceding era.

The lyric poetry of Chhayavad provided a philosophical status to the visible, the external life and the world around us. Here the spiritual experience, futility of life, worldly union and separation, individual happiness and melancholia, hope and dejection, loneliness, nationalism, attribution of personal character to objects of nature, experience of an invisible power in nature, a feeling of sympathy mixed with pathos towards the lower strata of society, experience of physical and transcendental love, continuous association with nature and invocation of man were represented in a new metre and diction marked with exquisitely tender imagination, unusual images, symbols and figures, transferred epithets, superhuman visions and profound spiritual ecstacy. We feel its tremendous power, its speed and energy, all achieved with a sure hand of the artist having a firm control over the language and thought. In the Chhayavad era the Hindi lyric poetry achieved new heights, and its richness, in content as well as form, can only be combated with the exuberance of the lyrical poetry of Bhakti Period.

In this period besides subjective songs, odes, elegies, national songs, awakening songs, march songs and epistles, a number of poetic dramas and sonnets were also written, providing an exquisite artistic dignity to the lyric poetry. These various forms of lyric-composition can be found in Jayashanker Prasad's Kanan Kusum, Jharana, Ansu and Lahar; Suryakant Tripathi Nirala's Parimal, Gitika, Anamika, Apara, Vanvela, Nae patte, Kukurmuta and Yamuna Ke Prati; Sumitranandan Pant's Gunjan, Pallav, Vina, Parivartan, Gramya, Swarna-Kiran and Swarna-dhuli; Mahadevi Verma's Nihar, Rashmi, Nirja, Sandhyagita and Dipashikha; Ramkumar Verma's Chit-rarekha and Akash-ganga; Makhanlal Chaturvedi's Hima-Kiritini, Hima tarangini and Venu to Gunji dhara; Maithilisharan Gupta's Jhankar; Narendra Sharma's Karnaphool, Shool phool, Prabhat pheri, Palash van, Mitti aur phool, Pravasi ke gita; Rameshwar Shukla Anchal's Madhulika, Aparajita, Kiran-vela, Karil, Lal-chuner and Pratyush ki thataki kiran yayavari; Bhagwaticharan Verma's Madhukana; Udayashanker Bhatt's Amrit Visha, Yugadipta and Yathartha aur kalpana; Sohanlal Dwivedi's Bhairavi, Jharna and vasna; Shivmangal Singh Suman's Hillola and Jivan ke gan; Ram Dhari Singh Dinker's Rasvanti, Dwandwa gita, Hunkar and Renuka; Subhadra-kumari Chauhan's Mukul; Siyaramsharan Gupta's Durvadal and Duragat ke gan; Gopalsharan Singh's Kadambini; Kedarnath Mishra Prabhat's Kaleje ke tukre; Janardan Jha Dwija's Tuta hiya har; Harivansharai Bachchan's Nisha Nimantrana, Ekant Sangita and Akul antar; Sumit-rakumari Sinha's Vihag, Asha parv and Panthini; Rameshwari Devi Chakori's Kinjalk and Makarand, and the stray verses of Hari Krishna Premi, Balkrishna Rao and Prabhakar Machwe.

By the fourth decade the contradictions of the Chhayavad school of poetry began to appear. Its apathy to realities of life, manifested in the tendencies of excessive imagination, idealism, mysticism, airy aesthetic vision, its tailor-made and attractive realism (Markat dibbe sa Khula gram—Pant), etc., led to disillusionment in the poets of the later generation and consequently they composed either romantic poems predominantly subjective or realistic metrical compositions cast in a naturalistic mould or free verse with an experimental bias in form as well as content.

After Chhayavad Hindi poetry divided itself into two streams: metrical and non-metrical. Between the two, the poets of nonmetrical or free verse, were, in course of time, called experimentalists and then poets of Nai Kavita i.e. new poetry. Almost all of them started their career by writing songs or lyrics and they continued to compose excellent literary and artistic lyrics. In most of the poets of this school some common characteristics are discernible, chief among them being the new method of expression, fresh sensibility, spontaneous and direct attitude towards love, merger of the individual's ego into society, vivid and sensual depiction of nature, freshness of folk life, loneliness, ennui, melancholy, and inner agony of the individual, intellectual sensitivity to suffering, natural representation of primordial experiences of human mind, influence of the pressure of changed circumstances on the mind, the untouched scenes of family life, feeling of fear and insecurity in modern man, artistic depiction of impenetrable moments of proletariat life, personifying many aspects of nature by the circumstances of real life and depiction of various light and dark shades of the life of the people. With these characteristics we can also notice in the freedom from the metrical conventions of rhyme, refrain, caesura, rhythm, pause, etc., freshness of language well-suited to the content, newness of imagery, symbols, and objects of comparison. Among the poets who have composed songs with full creative fidelity mention can be made of Ajneya (Ityalam, Bavra Aheri, Hari ghas par Chhana bhar, Ari o Karuna Prabhamaya, etc.), Trilochan Shastri (Dharti, Tap ke tac hue din, Shabda), Nagarjun (Satarange pankhon wali, etc.), Girijakumar Mathur (Manjir, Nasha aur nirmana; Dhoop ke dhan, Shilapankh chamkile, Jo bandha nahin saka), Bhawaniprasad Mishra (Gita farosh, Chakita hai dukha), Naresh Mehta (Vanpakhi suno, Bolne do chira ko, Mera samarpit ekant), Dharmvir Bharati (Thanda loha; Sat gita varsha) Sambhunath Singh (Madhyam mein, Samaya ki shila par, Jahan dard nila hai), Thakurprasad Singh (Vanshi aur madal), Kedarnath Singh (Abhi bilkul abhi, Tisra saptak), Sarveshwardayal Saksena (Bans ka pul, Jungle ka dard, Ek suni nav, Garm havaen, kuno nodi and Rajendraprasad Singh Aao khuli bayar, Bhari sarak par, Rat ankh mundkar jagi) etc.

Among the poets who confirmed their creativity to writing lyrics, the first group is of those lyricists who wrote lyrics in the true sense of the term and who brought the modern lyric poetry into direct relation with the happiness and miseries of the real life of man after liberating it from the mist of Chhayavad. These poets, transmitted the Hindi lyric poetry to the very heart of the common man without causing any injury to its artistic level. With lyricists like Jankiballabh Shastri, Bachchan, Balkrishna Sharma 'Navin', Narendra Sharma, Shambhunath Singh, Shripal Singh Kshem, Shivmangal Singh Suman, Roopnarayan Tripathy, Ramanath Avasthy, Hanskumar Tiwari, Virendra Mishra and Bharatbhushan Agrawal the basic elements of lyric composition—subjectivity, spontaneous expression, warmth of heart, wholeness of experience, unity of effect, precision, movement, natural melody and artistic expression—were of prime importance rather than public taste, lure of fame, or greed of money. On the contrary, Gopalsingh Nepali, Gopaldas Neeraj, Ramavatar Tyagi, Ramanand Doshi, Devraj Dinesh, Mukut Bihari Saroj, Ramkumar Chaturvedi 'Chanchal', and other stage poets composed lyrics according to the dictates of the stage and popular taste neglecting the basic conditions of lyric composition. Thus they brought lyric down to the level of cheap sentimentality, shallow love, didacticism, poetastay, exaggerated expression of human sufferings, provocative depiction of contemporary problems, affected patriotism, jugglery of language and craft and made it a commodity to be bought and sold, changing its form according to the demand of the market.

In 1960 as a consequence of historical necessity some talented poets who had a sense of time and a confidence in the power and possibilities of the lyric, came forward and reestablished this form with a new vigour. First of all in Gitanjini, a poetry magazine edited by Rajendraprasad Singh, it was postulated that Hindi song would culminate into navgita i.e. new song. Then in Vasanti, a magazine edited by Mahendra Shanker, the changing form of song in consonance with changing time was represented. In 1964 Om Prabhakar edited Kavita-64 as a "first co-operative collection of Hindi navgita" in which these stray song-streams were given a unified shape. Through the lyrics collected in this volume while, on the one hand, the composition of 'navgita' was related to the later poems of Nirala, a theoretical analysis of its achievements and possibilities was also included in it along with its history and critical evaluation of its major signatures. Thus, the change that came about in the form and content of the lyric around 1960, was given a particular name—Navgita—through this collection. In this connection in 1982, '83 and '84 Shambhunath Singh published a series of three collections, entitled Navgita Dashak-1, Navgita Dashak-2 and Navgita Dashak-3, including ten poets in each collection.

Originated in the sixth decade of the present century, Navgita is a further development of Hindi poetry. It is both committal and non-committal simultaneously. These poets committed to their genuine experience and environment and non-committal to a particular ideology while composing their poems. They adopt any form which is suitable to their personal environment and particular experience. They are also unbiased towards any particular form of poetic language. They consider themselves neither divorced from the tradition nor its destroyer. They give cognizance to the ever-changing, ever-developing present form of tradition which includes the best creative elements of the past. But they are not traditionalists. These lyricists take object rather than imposed reality as the subject of their poetry in whatever form it is available. In the view of a composer of Navgita the national identity is much more important than modernity and internationalism, for they are its genuine spokesmen. They are of the view that poetry neither was, nor is, nor can ever be, identical with prose. Therefore, they favour the view that music and rhythm are essential to poetry, though metrical conventions are irrelevant to it. The new lyricists are performing an important function of concretising with a unique singlemindedness the changed rhythm, aim and beauty of life. In the Navgita we have spontaneity, a direct love of national life, a metre emerging out of the pressure of emotion, fresh images, symbols and objects of comparison, a new language well suited to the content and artistic expression of the pressure of time effecting the individual mind. They are giving expression to the real experiences of life in all its complexity and that too with an admirable compression, getting the maximum of meaning into the minimum of space.

The tendencies of the new lyric are best represented in the songs of Shambhunath Singh, Thakurprasad Singh, Ramdarash Mishra (Berang benam chitthiyan), Ravindra Bhramar (Ravindra bhramar ke gita), Virendra Mishra (Aviram chal madhuvarti), Umakant Malviya (Mehandi aur mahavar, Subah rakta palasha ki), Devendra Sharma Indra (Patharile shor mein, Pankhakati meharaven, Kuhre ki pratyancha), Shivbahadur Singh Bhadauria (Shinjani, Purwa jo dol gai), Ramesh Ranjak (Gita bihag utara, Harapan nahin Tutega, mithi bolti hai, Ithiye dubara likho), Naim (Patharai ankhen), Om Prabhakar (Pushpa charit), Bhagwan Swarup (Mati Ki Parten), Maheshwar Tiwari (Jalte shahar mein), Kumar Shiv (Shankh...Ret ke chehre), Anup Ashesa (Latua aenge sagun panchhi), Shrikrishna Tiwari (Sannate ki jheel), Nachiketa (Adam oad khabren), Vinod Nigam (Jari hain lekin yatraen), Buddhi Nath Mishra (Jal phenk re machhere), Chandramauli Upadhyaya (Kiran gandhari), Radha (Sarayu kachharon ki hinni), Dinesh Singh (Purvabhasa) as also in the stray lyrics of Mahendra Shanker, Devendra Kumar, Shyamsunder Ghosh, Som Thakur, Shalabh Shriram Singh, Naresh Saxena, Premshanker Raghuvanshi, Gulab Singh, Ram Sengar and Zaheer Qureshi.

LYRIC (Kannada) as a literary form came to Kannada as part of the influence of English literature. In Kannada, the vachana of the 12th century Shaivites and the Kirtanas of the 16th century Vaishnavites were the corresponding forms for the lyric. The main difference was that Kannada poetry was essentially religious till the end of the 19th century. In the late 19th century the first attempts to adapt the lyric to Kannada were made by writers like S G Narasimhachar, Panje Mangesha Rao and Hattangadi Narayana Rao.

In the first two decades of the 20th century Kannada poetry had its rebirth in three centres, Mysore, Dharwad and Mangalore. By 1914, B M Srikantiah, a Professor of English, wrote a couple of original lyrics in Kannada, but he exerted a great influence through his English gitagalu (1926) which contained his translations of some lyrics from Palgrave's Golden Treasury. He set the trend for the Kannada lyric, and a host of poets followed his example. K V Puttappa (Kuvempu), Masti Venkatesha Iyengar, P T Narasimhachar, V Seetharamiah, K S Narasimhaswamy and G P Rajaratnam developed the lyric on the lines set by Srikantiah.

While the early translators had employed the old metres and diction of earlier poetry Srikantiah made permutations and combinations of the familiar metrical feet, and he used the spoken language of the Mysore region. Without ignoring the genius of the Kannada language, he tried to bring in the variety of themes and treatment found in English Romantic Poetry. Following his models, Puttappa wrote about the beauties of Nature, the joys and sorrows of simple folk, and about freedom and love. P T Narasimhachar wrote about mystical longings; there is a pronounced intellectual element in some of his lyrics. V Seetharamiah's lyrics show a strong awareness of the contemporary world. Narasimhaswamy (whose Mysuru mallige had record sales) was the poet of happy conjugal love. In Ratnana padagalu Rajaratnam created the 'persona' of a drunkard, Ratna, who belongs to the lower strata of society. Through this character Rajaratnam voiced his social protest and personal predilections. These poets extended the range of Kannada poetry. The plight of the country which was engaged in a grim struggle for freedom inspired a number of poets.

In Mangalore, Panje Mangesha Rao, Govinda Pai and Kadengodlu Shankara Bhatta imbibed the influence of the Romantic poets and established the lyric on a firm footing in Kannada. In Dharwad, D.R. Bendre received the influence of English Romantic poets through Marathi poets like Keshavsut, Vinayak and Govindagraj. Dharwad was then a part of Bombay province; Bendre's mother tongue was Marathi, and he studied at Poona. It was but natural that Kannada poetry came under the influence of Marathi poetry. Bendre also learnt from the experiments of earlier Kannada poets like Sharif Shishunil and Shantakavi. He gathered around him a number of young poets and the group came to be called 'Geleyara gumpu'. (Among its members were Madhura Chenna, R S Mugali and V K Gokak.) Bendre is the lyrical poet par excellence. In his ecstatic, magical and melodious lyrics he conveys a profound sense of the unity of mankind, a sense of oneness with Nature, and offers profound glimpses of the forces behind the mysteries of creation. His influence has been acknowledged by poets like Gopalakrishna Adiga. This region of Karnataka gave lyric poets like Betageri Krishna Sharma, R S Mugali, D S Karki and Siddhiah Puranika. These poets brought to Kannada forms of the lyric like the sonnet, the ode and the elegy.

In the 'forties the Pan-Indian Progressive movement entered Karnataka and the emphasis was on the miseries of the poverty-stricken masses. These writers did not choose the medium of the lyric. In the 'fifties modernism came to Kannada literature through the experimental poetry of Gopalakrishna Adiga. Adiga who had written some lovely lyrics changed to the dramatic-allusive-ironic mode and the lyric suffered again. In the seventies the Progressive Movement reappeared as Bandaya; the only poet who struck a new note was Siddalingaih. He is a representative of the downtrodden people who sings about oppression and exploitation, and the will of the oppressed to gain their brithright as human beings. In the eighties a new lyricism qualified by modernism has been trying to assert itself. Most of the lyrics of the first generation of poets like Bendre, Kuvempu, P.T. Narasimhachar and V.Seetharamaiah lent themselves to singing. The modernists frowned on this fusion of poetry and music. In recent years once again lyrics which can be set to musical tunes are being composed.

LYRIC (Kashmiri). Short, simple, musical and emotional poems of personal note which have generally been written by poets right from Lal Ded (14th century), the first outstanding poetess of the language, to the present day, form a valuable portion of Kashmir's lyric poetry. Its forms are various and they include vakh, shrukh, vachun, pad, gazal, sonnet, poems including blank and free verse.

The vakhs of Lal Ded and the Shrukh of Noor Din (1377-1438) which generally consist of lines between four and nine, occasionally even more, are not only didactic but highly personal, emotional, musical and, at times, even suggestive. The shrukhs of Noon Din include the early form of vachum—a form which has stanzas of three lines with a fourth line serving as a refrain. This form finds its development at the hands of Haba Khatoon (1551-1606), a peasant girl who rose to the position of a queen. She was an adept musician and a poetess as well. Her lyrical outbursts, tragic in tone and mundane in character as they are, bring to surface the shocks she had received during her life time. Among the recurrent motifs of her verse are pastoral landscape, adolescent reminiscences, conjugal insecurity, pining for reciprocation, appeal to parental solicitude, complaints of callous treatment by the husband and his mother, dread of estrangement, hankering after amorous fulfilment, distrust of destiny etc. Time has done no damage to these lyrical and impassioned outbursts so far and our women-folk sing these on occasions and relish them. After her appears Arnimal who was a gifted lyricist of highly sensuous appeal, rich in deep pathos welling up from personal experience of unrequited love. Her parents had named her Hi (White jessamine), while her in-laws gave her the name Arnimal (yellow jessamine garland). She was married in early childhood to a celebrated Persian poet, Bhavani Das Kachur Niku, patronised by the Afghan Governor's court. She tried her best to win his heart captivated by a court dancer; yet her guileless talent as a songstress proved no match for her rival's blandishments. Callously spurned and forsaken, she went back to her parents' village house for good; and confided her tuneful woes to her reciprocative spinning wheel:

'Mumble not, my dainty spinning wheel,
I'll lubricate your straw-earlobes with flower-scent.
Hyacinth, raise your head above the mud:
Narcissus with cup upheld is biding you.
Jessamine-shrub, abloom am I;
Shall I bloom over again?'

Arnimal's outpouring is inspired by a hankering after conjugal love, but (unlike her queenly predecessor, Haba Khatoon) Arnimal enjoyed not a single moment of hearty acceptance. Yet the recurring motifs of her verse are variations on the theme of endless waiting for a thaw. We find her voicing bewilderment, suing for mercy, seeking redress, pleading for reconciliation, soliciting the favour of a single glimpse, praying for the wellbeing of the callous forsaker, and resolving to remain steadfast in love even onesidedly.

'On the dark eve of dawn he left me desolate in the riverside wind;/To whom should I confide this misfortune of mine?/ Ardently for love have I filled many a cup of me;/Invite him to me, for my sake; O, won't you?/... Dandelion's abloom on watersides;/ 'tis time you come, you come./To your feet I consecrate my head; O, just a glimpse,/O child-mate, O my friend.....

Arnimal's language is quite rich in local colour, as is Haba Khatoon's; and her diction sounds equally intimate (though more poignant) in tune with the intensity of her distraught restlessness as in:

'When will he come to me, a Padmini?/My tears are agush./He grills me in the faggot-fire;/My food is tear-soak'd/...

'Opening out my heart shall I show it to you;/Like autumn-leave of shrubs shall I drop off, shall I drop off./Like a bracelet, yet, shall I hold on to you./No wink of sleep is mine.

Like Haba, again, Arnimal was an accomplished composer, and a number of her lyrics are preserved in the traditional anthologies of musical composition called Sufiana kalam.

LYRIC-KASHMIRI

The wholesome earthiness of Arnimal's lyrics provides a refreshing contrast to the mystical drone often resounding in the late 18th century verse. It is all the more remarkable in view of the fact that most of her contemporaries unnerved by socio-political turmoil of the times had shut themselves up in the innermost citadel of the soul.

In between Haba Khatoon and Mahmood appear a few poets among whom Souch Kral (19th century) is outstanding. He gives a new direction to the vachun of Haba Khatoon. He makes it the vehicle of his mystic visions. Word music, fresh symbols and metaphors and apparently enigmatic refrains create a new atmosphere in it. One cannot avoid singing them in spite of their being highly suggestive. Between his death and the independence of 1947 there passes a period of more than a century. This long period gives us a cluster of talented poets whose lyric poetry can be divided, on the basis of its content, into mystic love and devotional poetry. Among mystic poets are Parmanand, Nama Sahib, Rahman Dar, Shamas Faqir, Wahab Khar, Samad Mir and Ahad Zargar. Among love poets Mahmood Gami, Rasul Mir, Maqbool Kralwari and Mahjoor are outstanding. Among devotional poets Parmanand and Abdul Ahad Nadim deserve mention.

The mystic poets follow, by and large, the structure of form given to poetry by Sauch Kral. Nonetheless, they introduce, as demanded by their experience, new symbols, similes, metaphors and expressions and thus they stand distinguished from one another. However, what binds them together is their approach to life and its creator. This approach is that of a mystic in that it believes in the spiritual intuitions of truths which cannot be achieved by understanding based on reason alone and lectures delivered by priests and pandits in public. Disciplined spiritual exercises are believed to lead one to its attainment. Samad Mir gives expression to this truth in a highly impassioned and emotive tone:

Real knowledge is one that comes intuitively
Dispelling my doubts
It came to me from my within,
I had none to impart it,
My love perfected me.

The individual characteristics of the poets give variety to a subject and an experience all of them share in common. Sweet is their humanism and so is the expression that presents it to us. It aims at ennobling the reader. Shams Faqir and Parmanand are, at times, allegorical and obscure but Samad Mir, Wahab Khar, Nama Saheb and Ahad Zargar appear subtle. But all of them appear enjoying the magic of words and their musicality. Words help them in giving shape to something etherial and metaphysical.

The love poets do not dive deep into the boundless ocean of mind. They float on its surface with a safe dive here and there. Generally, they are occupied in describing physical beauty of love when it is in its full bloom. Mortality of man, awareness of death, pangs of separation, desire for union, pleasant complaints also arrest their attention. However, preference and expressive verve vary from poet to poet. Unlike roaring and lusty Rasul Mir, Rahman Dar appears impetuous and restless, Maqbool sad and Mahjoor soft and sweet. The lyricism of this poetry draws its strength from its being highly subjective, imaginative, emotional and romantic. Besides its form has a stanza of three lines with fourth as a refrain, a form which is helpful in creating an atmosphere of music, when handled by an adept artist. Their gazals and pads also retain these characteristics.

The devotional poems of Abdul Ahad Nadim and Parmanand form a rich part of our lyric poetry. The lyrics of Nadim are noted for their charm, grace and freshness of language. There is a sustained flow of ideas in them which is the result of the unshakable faith of the poet in Islam and love for Prophet Mohammad. The beautiful word music, popular metre, less ornate language, mythmaking power and impassioned involvement of the poet form the constituents of these lyrics. Contrary to Nadim, Parmanand uses a language which is Sanskritised but it does not stand in the word music which our ears hear. There is a spontaneity in his devotional poetry and a rhythm which sustains the reader.

Mention must be made of a sizeable portion of elegies which are recited on occasions but which have yet to be printed. Almost all of them revolve round Hussain, his family members, disciples and their unexpected tragic death at Karbala in Iraq. The wail of these elegies gushes out of the unshakable faith and sincerity of the poet whose imagination finds vast horizons for higher flights. There are other elegies occasioned by the death of near and dear ones; these are marked by impassioned outbursts. The elegies written on the death of Mahjoor belong to this group of elegies. In them the poets, not all, find an opportunity to project their view point on the various ills of the society and the cruel death itself.

Abdul Ahad Azad (1903-1948) and Ghulam Ahmad Mahjoor (1885-1952) dominate the literary scene of the first half of the twentieth century. Both of them introduced into Kashmiri poetry a temperament which is modern. Azad sings of revolution and change and is didactic. His revolutionary view point, immune from doubt and conflict, give rhythm and a spontaneity to what he versified. Mahjoor gives shape to a multitude of tiny poems most of which have love for their theme—love which is mundane, devoid of inner conflict and romantic in essence and even traditional. However, there is a singing atmosphere in them.

The lyrical poetry of the modern poets is different from that of the poets of the past in its form and expression and tone. One can feel in it the ethos of the contemporary life. It is made of various elements. It is romantic, musical, prophetic, didactic. It talks of love and of its power. It turns satirical, ironical, optimistic. It is in traditional forms as well as in blank verse, free verse and even without regular metre. It is full of variety. Our modern poets are, at times, creatures of mood and impulse. Lyric has been receiving new dimensions at their hands. The fresh similes, metaphors, turns of expressions, symbols, brevity enrich not only the language but poetry as well. Dinanath Nadim, Ghulam Nabi Firaq, Amin Kamil, Rahman Rahi, Ghulam Rasul Santosh, Muzafar Azim and from among the young poets Rafis Raz are worth mentioning. Dinanath Nadim introduces blank verse, free verse and sonnet into poetry when his other contemporaries enrich and widen the scope of these forms.

P.N.P (Arniml)

LYRIC (Konkani). In its first phase the lyric in Konkani has developed from the tradition of song-writing which is supposed to be ten centuries old. The songs were mainly composed on the religious subjects. No wonder in the earliest writing of Konkani lyrics, the moral tone was the dominating note. They were essentially indigenous in rhythm and music.

Though the movement of Konkani renaissance began in this century, this genre of literature was not actively pursued. It was a time for more of development than of achievement. Mostly poems and songs were written in a lyrical strain. A few had literary merit and a few could be called distinctly Goan in their subject matter or point of view. This was to be expected. Colonial uncertainty is reflected in derivativeness and poor quality of lyric. Yet some poets did contribute to the establishment of the tradition and a few achieved a lasting significance.

The poetic form in Konkani was shaped by Bayabhar (Naik Shridhar Kashinath, 1897-1983). The real upsurge of Konkani poetry started with Goa's freedom struggle initiated by Ram Manohar Lohia in 1946. At this time the major lyricist was B.B. Borkar (1910-1984), who was a versatile genius and a poet of high calibre. He infused vitality into Konkani poetry. He used numerous old and new Marathi metres and forged some new ones. Of more importance is his publication of poems Pamyjanam (Anklets, 1960). The collection displays that the lyric has acquired a truly Goan voice. It includes forty poems of various metrical patterns covering themes like love, nature, Goa, domestic felicity and above all patriotism. The collection contains some of the best lyrics of the language.

The title poem 'Pamyjanam' is an exquisite piece of poetry. The patriotic poems written before Goa's liberation express an inspiring optimism. In 'Navem Yug' the poet says "Goans, we are seven lakh strong. We shall usher in a new age, the hymns that lie stifled will now burst into full-throated song."

'Pavitr he Manglar' (This Tuesday is a holy day) has a special significance. It was composed and recited on the 18th June 1946, the day when Lohia sounded the clarion call of Goa's freedom struggle. There are some philosophical and devotional lyrics. 'Mhajem gorum charum' (Let my calf graze) is a mystic poem in which the calf symbolises man's aspirations for self-knowledge. Borkar seems to have exerted more influence in shaping first notions of lyric in Konkani poetry than any other poet.

This genre of literature has been actively pursued by Manoharrai Sardesai (b.1925). He has followed Borkar and his early lyrics are in the traditional metre. He has brought an increased variety to Konkani lyric. His lyrics evoke the landscapes of native land. Influenced by the Marathi poets B.R. Tambe, and Madhav Julian, he has written lyrical poems which have widened the audience of Konkani poetry. It is said that his lyrics are read even by those for whom poetry is otherwise repellent. In his first collection Goya tuja moga khatir (1961), lyricism is coupled with patriotism and also with longing for home, as the poet was several thousands miles away from the native land. Some lyrics show his tormented mind and inner urge to help liberate the motherland from the foreign rule. The collection offers exquisitely composed poems on the enchanting nature of Goa and on the Goan rustic life—the perfumed smile of champa flowers, "the pumpkin creepers lazily lying about on the thatched roofs", "the white silk cotton coming out of its shell widely laughing at the naked love between the drumstick tree and the betel creeper!" There are love poems as well as poems of a meditative character in this collection. It has been acknowledged by the critics that this collection is an important event in the evolution of Konkani poetry.

Sardesai's next collection of poems Jayat jage (1964) also abounds in lyrical intensity. Written after liberation, this collection contains poems written in an optimistic vein. Here the poet dwells on the same beautiful landscape. He wants the people "to be awake to guard the freedom". He instructs them to be secular, to maintain communal harmony. The moral tone and didacticism is evident in most of the lyrics. The lyrics in this collection indicate that the imagery of lyrical poetry has undergone some fundamental change.

The arrival of R.V. Pandit (b.1917) on the scene of Konkani poetry in 1963 with his five collections of poems, has brought poetic fervour. He has gathered a larger general audience than any other poet. His works have been translated into many foreign languages. He breaks all the traditional norms of poetry and creates a new rhythm and a new vocabulary.

In the seventies many poets turned to free verse, though a few turned to lyrical poems. However, their work failed to match the work of their immediate predecessors. One of the significant collections of poems is Pandharinath Lotlikar's (b. 1944) Amachi bhui (Our land). Most of the lyrics in this collection lack technical competence. At this time the modernist credo was becoming popular. However, some poets are seen practising the past poetic tradition. In Dharmik gitam (1978) M.J.S. De Souza writes in the tradition of old Christian religious songs.

The veteran poet Borkar's second collection of poems Sasay (Holy presence) in 1980 brings a rich variety in lyric poetry. However, now the poet writes in a pessimistic vein. Konkani kavya sangraha (published by Sahitya Akademi), edited by B.B. Borkar, does not contribute much to the lyrics in Konkani. Very few poets in this collection show the technical skill in writing lyrics. The collection shows an increased interest in representing the region—the landscapes of the native land—which is the characteristic of the post-liberation lyric.

Among the several lyricists of this time, the most distinguished is Gajanan Raikar (b.1935). In fact, he has been writing lyrics since 1960's. But he collected his lyrics first in the book form in 1975, entitled Sunwari. He has been recognised as a poet and a reciter. It should be noted that he has not turned tardily to the writing of poetry, as at his back are many years of persistent and compelling devotion to his art. His own most severe critic, Raikar, carefully winnowed out so many of his early poems and selected a few for the first collection. His aim is song. Most of the songs have been broadcast from the All India Radio, Bombay and Panaji. His next collection Banvad (1981) consists of more mature lyrics. It has been hailed as a significant contribution to Konkani lyric poetry. His lyrics of Goan life and legend possess a facile charm. He presents the calm of the country life. His lyrics are marked by a skilful control of rhythm and sound. Taken as a whole, there is a nice variety of thought, mood, stanzaic structure and rhythm. Several of the lyrics achieve an individuality through the skilful modulations and a substitution in the basic metrical pattern. He has absorbed and assimilated the spirit of folk-music and pastoral poetry.

Another significant contribution to Konkani lyric after 1980 is Uday Bhembre's (b.1939) collection, entitled Chann neache rati (1986). It is a collection of some of his old poems with a few new lyrics. The lyric after which the collection is titled is indeed a remarkable one. It is marked by appropriate imagery and evocative words. The ability to capture an atmosphere to merge inner feeling with outer landscape has been turned to excellent advantage with much variety in several lyrics by Uday Bhembre. It appears that the poet believes in the famous line of English poet Shelley, "Where music and moonlight and feeling are one."

Olivinho Gomes and Prabhakar Tendulkar are two more lyricists in Konkani. Their lyrics exhibit a strong social awareness, exposing injustice and sham. There are many minor poets like Yusuf Shaikh, Bharat Naik, J.L. Goes and Alex Goes. They have been writing lyrics which are limited in range. They are nonetheless remarkable for descriptive precision and emotional restraint. They tend to display a sameness of thought.

Bhikaji Ghanekar's Haves (1986) and Sanjeev Verenkar's Bhavzumbhar (1986), though written in the same vein, are varied in approach. Dilip Kumar Chari's Kann'nam chun'nam (berries) and Ramkrishna Zuwar-kar's Aboleancho jhelo contain many poems steeped in lyricism. The collection entitled Kavitha 83, 84,85 lacks wide appeal since many poems are written on common themes. The only collection in recent years to have enriched Konkani lyric is Lino De Sa's Addambe (1986).

Though many lyrics are written on the theme of exotic love and the beautiful nature of Goa, there are some lyrics written in a contemplative vein which compel the reader to ponder. All in all there are a few lyrics of lasting literary merit in Konkani literature. Concentration upon personal emotion and upon nature, while it made for an easier success, meant a serious narrowing of range and sometimes thinning of substance. The Goan poets are yet to write for audiences outside their region.

LYRIC (Maithili). There is no other form of poetry which has been so long cultivated and which reached such heights as the lyric. Earlier and till the twentieth century it was indistinguishable from songs; indeed, it was imperative for a lyric to be musical (i.e. set to particular raga, ragini and tala). There were 'song metres' used in the early period. But gradually the music of the dominant type of lyric and a general harmoniousness along with it came to be essential. It was Bhuvaneshwara Singh 'Bhuvan' (1907-1945) who made an open declaration against traditional lyrics in the preface to his collection of poems called Akharha (1936). The writing of new lyrics had begun earlier. Chanda Jha (1830-1907) and Sitarama Jha (1890-1975) had begun writing modern lyrics. Similarly, the traditional lyrics did not die out; they are still very common and a good Maithili poet has to have a discerning eye for the various melodies (called 'Bhasa') associated with, say, 'Matara' and 'Basanta', or with 'Tirahuti' and 'Samadauni'.

One great factor in studying the growth and development of the lyric to be kept in mind is the inherent communion between the folk and literary forms or the traditional lyric. This is particularly important in some forms which have in the course of years been used on one occasion or the other, such as, marriages or religious ceremonies or fasts and festivals.

The traditional lyrics are usually found inscribed in Gitaka kapi (an anthology of songs and lyrics) which most ladies maintained as family documents to be handed down from generation to generation. Even some musicians, traditional folk 'natua-mandalis' (group of performers) headed by their 'nayakas' (leaders) also did this.

The traditional lyrics which are most easily distinguished by their melodies are also capable of being classified from the viewpoint of their subject-matter and a few minor technical devices. They are broadly of two kinds, viz. 'Rasa-pakshaka gita' (Secular or erotic songs) and 'Bhaktipakshaka gita' (devotional songs). The most famous of the secular lyrics is, of course, 'Tirhuti' which as the name itself reveals is Mithila's speciality. 'Tirhuti' were famous even in the days of Ain-i-Akbari which describes them as 'songs of passion.' It comprises both songs of separation and of union. There are infinite varieties of love songs. The 'batagamani' primarily represents the 'nayika' (heroine) going to meet her lover; the 'mana' explores the attempts of man or woman to please his or her beloved; the 'baramasa' tries to portray the love-lorn 'nayika' (heroine) during the twelve months of the year.

Krishna's sports with the gopis provide two special types of lyrics, the 'Goalari' (Krishna's pranks in the company of gopis) and the 'Rasa' (Krishna's famous dance with Radha and gopis).

Similarly, the 'sohar' songs are connected with the birth of Krishna and Rama and are meant to celebrate a happy occasion in the family. As popular as the 'sohar' but more typically Maithili lyrics of great literary charm are 'joga', 'uchiti' and 'samadauni' songs, all connected in folklore with marriage, but in literature they represent representative sentiments of lovers' union with their beloveds through magic, words of respect to the guest and sentiments of sadness at the time when the bride leaves her parents' home.

More numerous and perhaps most used by the greatest writers in Maithili are devotional types chiefly, 'nachari', 'maheshavani', 'Bhagwatika gita' and 'Devidevata ka gita'.

In recent years new kinds of lyric influenced by the lyrics in English literature, just short poems expressing personal or even popular religious and political sentiments, sonnets, odes and literary ballads as well as several innovations have become popular.

Broadly, in early and medieval periods there were two types of lyrics in literature—one in the dramas and the other outside or even independent of the dramas. There are several anthologies of verse in Nepal and Mithila as well as Bengal, Orissa and Assam which have not yet been fully seen. The infinite possibilities of the Maithili lyric are best illustrated in these.

The earliest lyrics in the language are found in the ancient Charyapadas (8th-11th centuries). More developed lyrics came to be written when Jayadeva's Gitagovinda caught the imagination of the people; the first such lyrics were written by Jyotirishwara Thakur. And his lyrics were dramatic lyrics as found in Mathili dhurtasamagama (1324). Then came the great Vidyapati (1360-1448) and his contemporaries and successors.

There was a change in the tradition of writing poetry at the end of the 18th century. Manabodha and Nandipati began writing. During the nineteenth century Maithili lyrics continued to be traditional; only a great deal of stress came to be given on devotional lyrics such as 'Prabhati (Prati)', 'Vishnupada', 'Udasi' and 'Maheshavani'. 'Udasi' in particular was a class of songs which followed the symbolic language of the 'Dadhush' and preached a pseudo-philosophical Vedantic philosophy, the philosophy of detachment and wantlessness.

In modern times Chanda Jha (1830-1907), Sitarama Jha (1890-1975), Bhuvaneshwara Singh 'Bhuvan' (1907-1945) and Kashikanta Mishra 'Madhupa' (b. 1906) set the fashion for modern western type of lyrics, though Chanda Jha and Madhupa also wrote them in the traditional lyrical form. One traditional but newly cultivated type which was, however, exploited to the best advantage was cultivated by Bhavapritanand Ojha (1886-1973) of Deoghar, the 'Jhumari'. Tantranatha Jha (1909-1984) paved the way for sonnets and odes; Rabindranatha Thakur (b. 1936) introduced excellent types called by him 'navagiti', 'atigita', 'sujita' 'pragita', etc. as well as modernized versions of folk types. 'Yatri' (b. 1911) made lyrics in free verse popular; Vibhuti Anand, Kamalanand Bhatt, Ram Chaitanya Dhiraj and Somadev have established the 'ghazal' as a distinct and fruitful development. A host of others, such as Maithiliputra 'Pradeep', have written charming devotional and patriotic lyrics, e.g., Raghavacharya patriotic, and Gopalji Jha 'Gopesh' humorous and satirical lyrics (particularly verse-letters).

At the end it may be pointed out that in the early and middle ages lyrics could be written independently as well as part of Maithili dramas used at appropriate moments, particularly festive and ceremonial ones. But they are equally capable of being read, sung and enjoyed as independent 'lyrics'. It is like modern film songs which can be enjoyed independently as well as part of the film. Some of the dramatic lyrics were written in the tradition of Sanskrit, or just meant to describe the progress of the action of the drama. They did not have much literary beauty or merit.

LYRIC (Malayalam). Though the term 'lyric' became familiar in Malayalam poetry only after its contact with English literature, lyrical qualities are seen even in the poems of ancient times. The origin of lyric in Malayalam has to be traced back to the ancient popular songs and the anonymous ballads like the one which begins:

O! tiny flower, red flower!
Where did you go till this day?

LYRIC-MALAYALAM

Sanskrit literature was not unknown to Malayalam even before English came here, and beautiful lyrics, were in abundance in Sanskrit even in the remote past. A.B. Keith in his History of Sanskrit Literature records that the ancient poets in India were unrivalled in lyric. And the works of Valmiki, Bhartrihari, Kalidasa, etc. were not unfamiliar to the ancient Malayalam poets.

But the first poet who composed a lyric in the proper sense of the term was V.C. Balakrishna Panicker, whose 'Oru vilapam' (Lament) and 'Vishwarupam' (Cosmic vision) were published in the last decade of the 19th century. In him we hear the enchanted melody of Kalidasa. His 'Oru vilapam' contains only twenty-seven quatrains. It is the lament of a husband over the death of his beloved. The poet follows none of the accepted principles of an elegy. A single blaze of the sorrow aflame; a glaring smile looking at the snow-white face of Death—and there ends the poem. Here the poet was really inaugurating a new age in Malayalam poetry. If we feel the upsurge of the uncontrolled and tumultuous personal emotions expressed very powerfully in the 'Oru vilapam', it is fully controlled and elevated self-consciousness of a grand mind that we experience in Panicker's 'Vishwarupam'. Some of his other lyrics bear the stamp of the Indian Independence Movement.

In the history of lyric in Malayalam, the age of Vallattol is very important. During this period the established form of poetry was that of semi-epics (Khanda kavyas), though they had many of the basic qualities of lyric. All the khanda kavyas need not necessarily be lyrics, though a lyric may be a khanda kavya. The major poets of the age were Vallattol Narayana Menon, N. Kumaran Asan and Ulloor S. Parameswara Iyer; and a majority of the works of these great poets was khanda kavyas. Asan's 'Veenapoovu' (The fallen flower), which marks a turning point in his poetic career, inaugurates this particular phase in the history of Malayalam lyric. The harmonious blending of the Upanishad-culture and the Buddhist philosophy moulds the poetic character of Asan which provides him the vision to realise in the fallen flower that human life is fleeting and futile. In 'Veenapoovu', the poet delineates enchantingly the quintessence of the oriental philosophy. Asan's other masterpieces like 'Nalini', 'Leela', 'Karuna', 'Chandalabhikshuki', 'Chintavishayaya Sita', etc. are glorious romantic khanda kavyas. Though they contain beautiful lyrical flights, they are not perfect lyrics. There are some good lyrical pieces compiled in the collections Manimala and Vanamala. His 'Gramavrikshattile kuyil' (The cuckoo on the village tree) gives expression to his heart-felt revolt against the 'high-ups' in the society who kept Asan away as he was born in a low caste. It contains the powerful and deep personal feelings of the poet; and as a lyric it stands with the Veena poovu.

It was with Vallattol that lyric in Malayalam attained greater dimensions and diversity. For him, life was something pleasant, cheerful and to be enjoyed. In the preceding decades Malayalam poetry was overloaded with verbosity, artificiality and other structural peculiarities. It was in Vallattol that it blossoms fully with the real colour, fragrance and beauty. With the publication of the poem 'Badhiravilapam' (A lament of the deaf), Vallattol established himself as a poet. The poet became stone-deaf in his youthful years. The mental agony caused by this tragedy, the resultant dejection, the warm love of life that one is capable of extracting even from this dark dejection, the sweet honey of inner urge towards happiness and above all the compactness of the content and the well-knit structure make 'Badhiravilapam' a real masterpiece. The spring-time of the lyrics of Vallattol comes a decade hence when he wrote the poems compiled later in the various volumes titled Sahityamanjari. There are about two hundred poems in these volumes and also in the other two collections Veerashringhala and Vishukkani. All the salient features of a perfect lyric can be traced in some of these poems; but all of them do possess a deep tinge of lyrical grandeur. The lyrics like 'Oru bhavana', 'Prabhata-gitam', 'Kavita', 'Somagrahanam', 'Greeshamantattile oru ratri', 'Nirvanamadalam', etc. contain the soaring imagination of an ardent devotee of Divine Beauty. A deep lover of beauty and wordly enjoyments, Vallattol seldom favours philosophical intricacies, and bothers himself about the mystery of life and death. Though 'Jnanam', 'Innale', 'Pakai', etc. are some good lyrics in which the poet's thoughts are tinged with Vedanta, the philosophy in 'Pakai' takes the poet to certain occasional flights of Shakespearean thoughts. Cynicism and hatred of life were not in tune with his mental strings. He believed that man was solely responsible for all his misfortunes and that he alone could overcome them with his own efforts. Poems like 'Mappu', 'Toniyaatra', 'Onassadya', 'Kozhi', etc. contain ideas of social revolution. The poet who was an idealist, gradually developed into a nationalist, internationalist and a humanist and his great lyrics like 'Veti konta pakshi', 'Kaikkumpil', 'Matrivandanam', 'Karmabhoomiyute pinchukal', 'Ente gurunathan', 'Choratilakkanam', 'Ativrtishti', etc. clearly delineate this gradual blossoming. The real touchstones of his poetic greatness, 'Sandhyapranamam', 'Kirattalayana', etc. are everlasting laurels to the poet.

To the development of lyric, Ulloor has contributed very little. Ulloor was a scholar poet and in general he was a classicist. His poems were more scholastic than emotional. That there are only very few lyrics among his numerous works, may be attributed to this. But when we take stock of the great lyrics in Malayalam, his 'Premasangitam', 'Mazhattulli', 'Periyarinotu', 'Kanyakumariyile sooryodayam', 'Divyadarsanam', etc. have naturally to be taken into account.

In the firmament of Malayalam poetry, Nalappat Narayana Menon was a star that dwelt apart. The lyric became strong in sinews with him. The poets of the 'Vallattol School' had misunderstood the grandeur of poetry to be external rhythm and formal beauty and they tried to make their poems appealing by being honey-tongued. During this period it was Nalappat who, by maintaining some sort of philosophic grandeur, saved poetry from gradual decay. His 'Kannunirttulli' (Drop of tears), an elegy moaning his wife's death, is a remarkable lyric, though it is fairly long. Along with him we have to consider K.K. Raja also, who instilled into Malayalam poetry the divine fragrance of the culture of ancient 'Rishis' of India. The expectation that this world will once again become divine, the restlessness and indignation felt when this remains unfulfilled and also the relentless soaring of the soul towards the Universal Light are the main strands of his lyrics, and his immortal work is 'Bashpanjali', and elegy, as grand as 'Kannuneerttulli' of Nalappat. In their elegies, these poets have successfully endeavoured to strike proper balance between emotion and philosophy.

There is a critical opinion that Vallattol is not a lyricist in the sense in which the term is used to refer to later poetry. The lyric in Malayalam achieves its ultimate perfection only in a later period which can be described as 'the Age of G'. But during the age of Vallattol, no poet other than he made that much considerable contribution to the progress of the lyric. During the Age of G. Sankara Kurup, the lyric has changed much. The importance till then given to the verbal melody and external rhythm gradually gave way to the music of ideas and the internal rhythm. The natural consequence was the development of lyric into the most effective and powerful vehicle for the expression of varied and intense feelings in a most concentrated way. Here the lyric in Malayalam makes use of the entire possibilities of all the horizons and attains maximum perfection, the architect of which is G. Sankara Kurup. He had already written some of his best lyrics when Edappalli Raghavan Pillai and Changampuzha Krishna Pillai, two young romantic poets, came out with their unbridled outpourings of powerful emotions in mellifluous words and tunes. All that they sang was about themselves. And every song of theirs was melancholic in tone. This exuberance of lyricism was unprecedented in Malayalam. But it was short-lived. Edappalli committed suicide because of an unrequited love and Changampuzha died of consumption very young.

G. Sankara Kurup expanded the horizon of lyric to its full by writing a number of lyrics, grand and sublime. There is a strand of Wordsworthian pantheism in his early poems in particular. The unbounded sky, the expanse of the universe and its ever-expanding nature have been a perennial source of inspiration to him almost throughout his life. This, in its youthful vigour, is manifested in his early poems like 'Pushpagitam', 'Pankajagitam', 'Suryakanti', 'Sakshatkaram', etc. and this trend attains its fullness of maturity and bloom in his great masterpieces like 'Vishwadarshanam', 'Shivathandavam', etc. Till Kurup we find that in lyrics the poet and the characters delineated stand apart, though in the emotional sphere there will be no duality in feelings. But in his lyrics nothing separates the poet and the idea expressed. The poet does not sing imbibing the spirit of the characters, but the characters sing through the poet. He is just the 'flute' through which the universal phenomenon sings. The poet himself has once stated that it is in his famous poem 'Sooryakantri' that he reaches the nearest point of lyrical perfection. His later poems like 'Nimisham', 'Peruntachchan', 'Antardaham', 'Chitalekham', 'Nizhalukal neelunnu', 'Jeevana sangitam', 'Viswadarshanam' also have the same lyrical charm.

The poets like Vylopilli Sreedhara Menon, Edassery Govindan Nair, N.V. Krishna Warrior, N. Balamani Amma, P. Kunjiraman Nair, etc. with their contributions have widened the horizon of Malayalam lyric. 'Sahyante makan', 'Onappattukar', 'Lillippukkal', 'Kannirppadam', 'Kutiyozhikkal', etc. are Vyloppilli's great masterpieces. He has firm faith in the progress and goodness of humanity even in the disappointingly degenerated society. In Edassery, Malayalam lyric achieves the verve and vigour of rural roughness which awakens the society from slumber and sluggishness. Ignoring the external charm, Malayalam poetry achieves the beauty and grandeur of internal perfection, harsh and sinewy structural design and a profound depth of ideas in the poems of N.V. Krishna Warrior. 'Africa', 'Elikal', 'Jeevitavum maranavum', 'Gandhiyum Godseyum', etc. are unique examples of lyrical grandeur which resound with the deep echo of the age. Almost all the poems of P. Kunjiraman Nair which abound with an exuberance of imagination are perfect lyrics. N. Balamani Amma offers the lyric the tenderness and sweetness of a mother's love with a tinge of philosophical glamour.

Akkitham Achutan Namboodiri, Olappamanna, O.N.V. Kurup, G.Kumara Pillai, N.N. Kakkad, Sugathakumari, Vishnu Narayanan Namboodiri, K.V. Ramakrishnan and a host of others still go on writing adding glories and new dimensions to the Malayalam lyric.

LYRIC (Manipuri). The Manipuris, who have a long history, a rich culture and who live in a lush green valley surrounded by deep blue hills, naturally sang for ages about the beauty of nature, love and heroism. Handed down orally through generations these lyrics are sung till today. These beautiful lyrics, though their dates of composition are unknown and their writers are anonymous, bear the mark of exquisite craftsmanship in matters of diction, imagery and suggestiveness. Village folk and local priests still sing them on ceremonial occasions. To begin with, here is 'Yakeiba' which is rendered to the accompaniment of a 'pena', a musical instrument to awaken the king or the deity in the morning during the Lai harsoba festival:

O Lord of all,
Arise, the day breaks.

Yonder in the east,
From behind the gold-tinged mountain,
Resplendent with its rays
The sun slowly rises.
And the blue sky is brightly lit up.

In the strongly guarded chamber of yours
You had a good slumber the night before
To have propitious dreams for the coming day
And now is the time to tell of them.

Lo! the sun is gradually coming up.
And his piercing rays are all around.
Indeed the gold curtain has been gently drawn apart.

The spring is painted in the Manuscript 'Leiron' as:

The swamp now presents a spectacle of teeming tender grass
The field is painted green with young shoots.....

Similarly there are enchanting poems on love and separation or love and heroism. These short lilting compositions are marked by 5 to 7 syllables in each line. They are occasionally rhymed and have sometimes syllabic refrains of se de or o at the end of each short stanza composed of three or four lines.

With the advance of the Middle Period of Manipuri literature, writing of such lyrics echoing the nature sentiments of the natives was no longer encouraged. Strangely enough, local poets wrote in this period many a Vaishnava pada in Brajabuli or in Bengali.

At the turn of the twentieth century, Chaoba revived this genre and his pen bestows a pleasing tenderness on nature, love and romantic incidents. It also can convey movingly many a plaintive note.

The following is the translation of 'Chinggi leirangamada', one of his oft-recited lyrics:

Tell us of you
O flower, smiling so happily
On the outstretched branch
Of the thorny kyamlei tree
That grows alone on the hill-slope.

Is that your desire to escape
From the threadbare world
And pass your days lonely and quietly?
O mute friend of mine
How can I endure to see you perish
Unseen and uncared for, high on the bough?

Listen, my beloved companion!
I blossom here lonely

For I cherish no praise nor nurse any envy
As human beings do.
I would put on no apparel of apparent honesty.
I only pray for parity in thought and deed.

His contemporaries, Mayurdhwaja, Anganghal and Kamal too sang of love, nature and the past glory of this land and its people. The verses of the last stand out for their melody and tenderness. After a long lull, Laisram Samarendra comes up with his hand on the torch and his first composition 'Leilangba' in the late 40's with its music and nostalgic appeal of what was once Manipur swept the Manipuris off their feet. At present sweet cadenced compositions of Kh. Pramodini Devi (Manglangi khorjei) and of the younger writers like the Sarat Arambam (100 songs: Kenlaba samjigi leirangni), Birmani Heisnamba (Tellaba punsigi eesei) and Jayantakumar Sarma (Nongdon thakki laija), not only make a distinctive contribution to modern Manipuri literature, but also fulfil the pressing demands of the stage, film and the radio. As the songs cover the whole gamut of human sentiments, they are on the lips of the old and the young alike.

C.M.S.

LYRIC (Marathi). The music and poetry were interlinked in the Indian tradition. In Marathi, too, early saint-poets wrote 'Gatha' (from Sanskrit root 'gai' to sing) and their 'Abhangas' were sung in temples and congregations. These religious hymns were called 'padas' or 'bhajanas', used in 'kirtanas'. The secular lyric came to the fore in the form of 'lavanis' in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries under the Peshwa regime.

After the introduction of English education, the subjective lyric and personification of objects in nature became common and songs were written by all the romantic poets including 'Bee', Balkavi, Govindagraj (R. G. Gadkari), B. R. Tambe, B. B. Borkar, N. G. Deshpande, G. D. Madgulkar, Shanta Shelke and others. A new name was to be invented to demarcate it from the traditional spiritual-metaphysical lyric. Some invented a word 'vainik' (from Vina as the synonym of lyre), but it could not gain currency; and so a new term was introduced 'bhava gita'. A class of light music practitioners was further popularized by the gramophone record companies. Composers of theatrical 'natya sangit' and film songs, like Raja Badhe, Jagdish Kheludkar, P.V. Darvekar and Vidyadhar Gokhale came forward to replace the old-liners like Khadilkar and Gadkari. But a dramatic lyric was not considered a genre by critics of poetry per se, because it was written to suit the situation on the stage or the silver screen and now T.V.

The great lyricists in the modern Marathi poetic tradition were Tambe and Borkar. Tambe has frankly admitted his debt to Tagore, and so also has Borkar. The mystic-romantic lyric was strongly opposed by the practitioners of free verse (mukta chhanda). The pada writer was even ridiculed as a rhymester using childish gimmicks. The 'modernist' poets almost discarded and derided this verse-form. Yet the lyric survived in the form of a folk-song. In Marathi, they are called 'janapada git'. In this genre lyrics of Yeshwant and Sopandev Chaudhary, G. L. Thokal and Mahanor were popularized by many singers. In brief, as music and poetry had their own separate, exclusive, well-demarcated spheres, the traditional lyric has suffered and is confined to children's literature, 'stri giten' (women's songs), or the songs of the fishermen or farmers. The subjective lyrical quality, however, finds expression more in verse libre than in regular metrical form in modern poetry.

P.M.

LYRIC (Oriya). The lyric strain in Oriya poetry can be traced to its Apabhramsha Charya origin. But for positive lyrical temper and spirit one has to wait for the Vaishnava and Shakta poets of the 15th century who wrote their devotional songs with all the ardour and devotion of the committed devotees. These songs, meant mainly for singing, were known as bhajana or janana. The Panchasakhas, the famous five poets of the 16th century—Balaram, Jagannath, Achyuta, Yashobanta and Ananta—not only maintained but also added substantially to the tradition of the devotional poetry with the passionate outpouring of their mystic experience. Their poems, centred mainly on Lord Jagannatha, and written in lucid and simple language and often presented in folk metre made their lyrical utterance instantly appealing to their readers. Though the devotional-lyrical poetry continued to be written for centuries thereafter, many new personal elements were also added to this form. And poets who wrote fine lyrics of different kinds are Dhananjay Bhanja (1677-1701), Upendra Bhanja (1676-1720), Dinabandhu Haricharan (17th century), Banamali Das (18th century), Narisingha Pathak (18th century), Kavisurya Gopal Krishna (1785-1862), Kavisurya Baladev Ruth (1789-1856), Gauracharan Adhikari (1814-1890) and others. During this long period lyrical temper and strain found expression in different types of poetry. Some of these important types are 'chautisa', 'sodasa', 'koili', 'padi' or 'padia', 'boli', 'chaitu'. Most of the important poets of this period used some or all of these forms in their own characteristic way. 'Baramasi' is yet another form which expresses poignantly the feeling of separation. The form 'bachanika' written as dialogues also contains some lyrical elements. Similarly 'mangalgita' sung usually by women, or 'poi' which is a bunch of poems written on one theme, also projects personal feelings in a poetic form.

But during the last quarter of the nineteenth century, when Indian literature began to change direction under the influence of English literature, the lyric acquired a new orientation both in form and content. It was no longer poetry to be sung and its content was intimately personal feeling of diverse kind on diverse themes. Oriya poets of the age got naturally influenced by this new trend and wrote their works in the new manner. Some of the well-known lyric poets of the age were: Radhanath Ray (1884-1908), Madhusudan Rao (1853-1912), Nandakishore Baba (1875-1928), Gopalbandhu Das (1877-1928) and Padmacharan Patnaik (1885-1949).

In the beginning of the 20th century, some of the new poets tried to make the form more accommodative in content and varied in form. Important among these poets are Kanlala Kumar Sabat (1900-1938), Mayadhar Mansingha (1905-1973) and Sachi Rautray (b.1918). Since then lyric poetry in Oriya has grown in different directions with new frills and ideas. From the 50's most of the poets have expressed themselves in lyrics and it has almost become the staple form. Apart from Sachi Rautray, Guruprasad Mohanty (b. 1924), Ramakanta Rath (b. 1934), Silakanta Mahapatra (b. 1936), Jagannathprasad Das, Soubhagya Misra, Harihar Misra and such others have explored many new areas of experience in their lyric poems. The exploration still continues and some of the poets who have made their mark are Dipak Misra, Benudhar Raut, Brajanath Ratha, Chintamani Behara, Pratibha Satpathy, Prafulla Tripathi, Saurendra Barik, Haraprasad Das, Bibekananda Jena, Prasanna Palasani and others.

LYRIC (Prakrit). Lyric means poetry of blank verse intended to be set to music and be sung. Rhythm easily retains in memory. It is the tradition of India where rhythmic stanzas were introduced from the very past. Rhythm is inherent in human nature. Deep, strong passions quite often are expressed in verses. Thus lyric is undoubtedly very ancient in Indian poetical composition. It starts from Vedic chantings. The Ushas-hymns, love-spell ballads and the hymns of war magic in the Atharvaveda are the living examples of lyrics. Lyrics were not only written in the Sanskrit language but it is found in the other popular languages also. That is why the major parts of the Indian lyric poetry belongs to Prakrit literature. In ancient Indian literature, a few traces of real folk-songs are preserved in Prakrit lyric poems. A major part of lyrical poems in Prakrit depends on Sanskrit lyrical poems. The Prakrit poetry was mainly written in the simple 'arya' or 'gatha' metre. This is the actual metre for melodious songs.

Maharashtri is the language of the Prakrit lyrics. From an early date Maharashtri is used for the purposes of kavyas.

The most famous work for the study of Maharashtri lyric is the Sattasai (Saptashati) or the 'Seven Hundred Stanzas' of Hala Satavahana. This is an anthology, a collection of Prakrit songs. These quatrains were intended to be sung. All the landscapes, the seasons and the pleasure and pain of weather play their part; but there is always the urging of the heart. Feelings that are most tender and most sensuous are often frankly expressed; the tender feeling dominates. It is not a man who often speaks, but it is a female voice that we hear in it more and more; the women who speak are old, young, friend, mother, daughter and aunt. They speak to young men and girls who are in love, to other girls or to their own selves. They talk about so many things, yet the theme of the talk is always love.

There are numbers of brief precepts in the Sattasai, such as, narration of a miser utilising his wealth to the same extent as a wanderer his own shadow. Other sayings describe the evils of the world. The praises of deaf and dumb are seen in a song.

dhanna bahira andhate chch jianti manuse loe/na sunanti pisunavaanam khalana riddhim na pekkhanti//

Happy are the deaf and the blind, who alone truly live in the world;
Since they hear not any harsh words
And do not see the prosperity of the ignoble

Many verses in the Sattasai have been brought from the other contexts, namely, the love between Krishna and Radha or between Shiva and Parvati.

With the unique characteristics of these songs, it can be said that Hala gave to the stanzas the final poetical form with his skilled hand. So it is an appropriate saying about Hala's Sattasai:

Satta Sattaim Kaivachchhalena kodia majjhaarammi./
Halena viraiam salamkarana gahanam//

From innumerable musical strophes, Hala, the friend of poets, has made the collection of seven hundred beautiful (literally provided with alamkaras or means of adornment) stanzas.

Bana's attribution to Hala is reflected in his Harshacharita: "Satavahana (i.e. Hala) with his beautiful songs composed in 101 faultless metres has built up an imperishable charming store, as (a king, an exhaustible treasure, not collected from villages) with diamonds (of unadulterated purity)". Peterson thinks that Hala himself composed the stanzas of the Sattasai. According to tradition the king truly made a collection of the songs from the mouth of the people. He selected seven hundred stanzas out of them and gave them a literary form. Different commentaries in later centuries mention the names of writers of individual stanzas. The commentaries of the Vulgata give one hundred and twelve names, Bhuvanapala gives three hundred and eighty-four. The varieties of recensions differ very much in the distribution of the verses. Besides Hala there are a few names known from the other sources. Rajashekhara's Karpuramanjari mentions the names as Hariuddha, Nandiuddha and Pottisa.

The Sattasai had great popularity, as a large number of quotations from Hala are found in the works of poetics. Anandavardhana, a famous rhetorician selects his examples for suggested meaning, irony etc. from the Sattasai.

It is mentioned in the dramas and anthologies that Prakrit lyrics existed also in later times. Many beautiful little stanzas are available in the Prakrit Grammar of Hemachandra in the Apabhramsha dialect. The period of composition of these stanzas is uncertain. These stanzas are different from the songs of Sattasai. The examples are given as follows:

bittie mai bhaniya tuhum ma karu vanki ditthi/putti sakanni bhalli jiva marai haii paitthi//

"O girl, I told you do not send side-glances at me; for those glances entering into the heart (of others) kill them as a spear with sharp bent edge". Another example is,

Viasu maharisi eu bhanai jai suisatthupamanu/
mayaham chalanavanantaham divi ivi naharfu bhanu//

"Vyasa, the great sage, says that if the Vedas and sastras are to be regarded as authoritative, then those who salute the feet of their mothers get the merit of bathing in the Ganga everyday "

Besides the Sattasai, there is another anthology entitled Vajjalagga of Prakrit lyrics. It was compiled by the Svetambara Jaina Jayavallabha. He is also called Javallaha. The work is a collection of stanzas. It probably contains seven hundred stanzas like the Sattasai. The two available recensions maintain 682 and 652 stanzas respectively. It was composed in the arya metre in Jaina Maharastri. The stanzas are arranged in chapters (i.e. Vajja) according to their subject-matter. The idea of this work is the collection of the sayings of great poets on matters regarding the aims of life (dharma, artha and kama). One third of the verses has the nature of the gnomic verse. It relates to the aims of life. Two-thirds are erotic. The stanzas as a whole contain details about Jainism.

LYRIC (Punjabi) is as old in Punjabi as its earliest extant poetry. Sheikh Farid's couplets have a strong lyrical tone, but his three other poems available in the Guru Granth are veritable lyrics, and, indeed, to this day are sung to instrumental accompaniment as the Greek lyric was sung. No doubt their intent is devotional, but the theme of divine love is as sensuous as can be found in any love lyric in a Western language.

Guru Nanak's verses are of three kinds: the philosophical-doctrinal, the socio-cultural and the lyrical. His 'Bara maha' (the calendar) is a rare lyrical construction in which the separated wife yearning for union with her lover-husband (symbols respectively of man and God) presses into service all the wealth of the Punjabi countryside—the flowers in wood and waste, the lightning with its terrifying flashes, the winter cold making the limbs ache for the embrace of divine passion. Equally replete with lyricism are his pieces in 'Raga Bilawal' in one of which the wife yearns for the 'fortunate return of sleep' in which she may see again the lover who comes to her only in dreams and then, in the utter despair of the Indian psyche, turning and twisting under the scourge of Turkish invasions accompanied by rapine and slaughter on a wide scale, he asks:

If somebody brings my Lord's word what shall I do?
I'll cut my head off to make a stool for him and serve him with it.
Why not die, give up this breath, when the Lord has become alien?

These are the pieces registering the traumatic experience of Babur's invasion when those used to wearing of pearly necklaces were led away with halters, and those who had lived in palaces were not allowed to sit on the floor in the lordly presence.

The Sufis of the seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries were lyricists par excellence, who sang and danced to their exuberant and yet poignant experiential lyrics, such as this poem of Shah Hussaini:

To entertain you, my friend I have boiled my heart's blood, I have chopped into pieces my liver,
And if it is not to your taste,
I can only beg you to swallow it with a cup of water.

and Bulleh Shah singing:

The court of Ranjah is across the river
Despite storm and flood, I must reach there

But the devotional trend then began to be mixed with romantic verse narratives so that by the end of the nineteenth century, the lyrical passion in Punjabi had died altogether. It was Bhai Vir Singh who revived it, again mixed with devotional conceits like that of the English metaphysical poets of the seventeenth century, as for instance in:

You came to me in a dream and I sprang up to embrace you.
All light, but you could not be grasped
And my arms kept trembling in vain.

The Punjabi lyric attained its present heights almost thirty years later, in the thirties of the present century in the poetry of Mohan Singh and Amrita Pritam. In 'Morning after 1947', Mohan Singh sang:

In the east rises the milky dust of the chariot of the sun Whose rays kiss the lips of the dew-drenched blades and leaves of grass
In the huts of the refugees new youth begins to stir,
No matter if the scythe of Death has mown some ripening stems and Amrita Pritam:

O the wheats have sprouted
But the tales of my woes are longer than even my woes.

O hoeings have been given to the wheats
But the shadows on my skies are as dark as ever

Another poet of the next generation, Prabhjot Kaur, is more tense like the string of the lute, because she is more afflicted experientially:

The pull of the earth was strong
But different is your pull
And to your pull I'll make over
This invaluable life.

Pritam Singh Safir, for all his philosophic moods and pretences, can wax lyrical with a rare expressiveness, and Harbhajan Singh, who is now an existentialist-structuralist, poet-philosopher of fixed dimensions, started as a lyricist of much aesthetic excellence. But none can beat Shiv Kumar whose despair is more lyrical than that of any romantic:

I am a thorny cactus, my love growing in the waste,
None has ever watered me, none has raised a fence.

Of late, lyricism in Punjabi poetry has weakened under the stress of poetic as well as political ideologies, both existentialist-structuralist and communist-militant, but still the voice of Surjit Patar can be heard in the midst of this clash of pens:

You passed through the stalks like the wind
I was left behind, a sigh of the tree.
On your footprints my leaves fall
Long and far like the songs of spring
Do meet me sometimes in a human way,
Why pass me like water sometimes or wind?
When you met me you were of my age, dark and lovely,
And then you left me, like God Himself

There is in this the delicacy of the Persian ghazal and the anguish of the modern soul, for Patar is at heart an existentialist. The modern poets of Punjabi are drifting away from intensely personal expression into the ghazal form which being alien to the genius of the Punjabi language, can seldom become truly lyrical.

LYRIC-RAJASTHANI-LYRIC-SANSKRIT

LYRIC (Rajasthani). The genre has not been unknown to the traditional Rajasthani poetry. The commemorative songs of the bards and the devotional songs of the saints did contain some of the lyrical elements. None of them, however, reaches the realms of a perfect lyric. While the commemorative songs possess the spontaneity of expression, singleness of emotion and the conciseness and the brevity combined with some of the metrical music, they lack in subjectivity, the variety of forms and the haunting loneliness which defies all definitions. So is the case with the devotional songs, except that they are subjective too.

The modern period had also given us plenty of lyrics in its initial stages, which are now gradually losing their melodic quality under the wave of prosaic poetry. Though the subjectivity is there, all other elements, such as the singleness of emotion, intrinsic musical quality, etc. are lacking. It was the age of romanticism in Hindi poetry that cast its reflections on the early modern Rajasthani poems. This influence gave us some good lyricists like K.K. Kanta, M.G. Sharma and S.P. Joshi. 'Olum' (longing for the loved one) is a form of lyric resembling the ode, which has been handed down as cultural heritage. It is the kind of a folk-song also sung on the occasion of parting with the dear one. N. Singh Bhati and Teja Singh Jodha have given us two books under this title. Smaller odes have also been attempted which contain haunting loneliness and longings for the bygone splendour, grandeur and sweetness. Pashana Sundari by N. Singh Bhati and Sovana Machhali by S.P. Joshi are two such odes. Elegy is yet another form which existed solely in the traditional literature. The emotional subjectivity of the modern poet seems to be more self-centred, as he has no time or mood to make his heart cry, lamenting over the sad demise of any one, howsoever dear he/she might have been. Marsia songs of the old bards are the only elegies in the true sense of the term. Inspired by the richness of raga (tune) and verbal music contained in the folk songs, the poets took to composing the songs of natural beauty of the country side and the emotional and romantic relationship of the simple rustic life. The ovation received by them for such songs enabled them to stand undeterred in the face of stronger currents of the intelligent poetry. Prominent among these poets are Gajanan Varma, Revatadan Kalpita, Kalyansinha Rajawat, Raghurajsinha Hada, Duragadansinha Gauda, Madhava Sharma, Bhima Pandiya and Lakshmansinha Rasavant. Their songs are as varied in form and as musical and emotional in content as has been the cultural life of our masses. Next to those of natural beauty are the erotic songs. Leaving apart a few sensual songs, many lyrics written by other poets can also be considered as works of art. Manohar Sharma has excelled all others in this particular aspect in his Ruthi rani (The displeased queen). The chorus and duet in lyrics have been the privilege of Ganeshlal Vyas 'Ustada'. His only drawback is that his lyrics lack subjectivity and are more didactic than emotional. However, his metrical music and spontanecity amply compensate the drawback and transport the reader to the lyrical world.

Even now, when the modern poetry has projected new dimensions and all other forms are being discarded as obsolete and unrealistic, lyric still reigns supreme in most of the literary gatherings and relieves one of the routine tension and drudgery.

Whether the latest trends in modern poetry will result in eliminating this genre is an open question. The emotions of man shall see no death so long as he lives and, maybe, the lyric will survive the onslaughts of the modern trends for this reason.

LYRIC (Sanskrit). The lyric in Western poetics is used to cover a wide range of compositions in verse, viz. poems having the form and musical quality of a song, short subjective poems with song-like outburst of the poets' innermost thoughts and feelings, and non-narrative, non-dramatic poetry in general. The musical character of a lyric is indicated by the derivation of this term from Greek 'lyra', a musical instrument. It is also suggested that the Greeks defined a lyric as a song to be sung to the accompaniment of a lyre. The Greek term for lyric, 'melic', is derived from 'mele', which means air and melody. In Sanskrit poetics there is no precisely equivalent term for lyric. The terms 'muktaka', 'sandanitaka', 'visheshaka', 'kalapaka' and 'kulaka', meaning one verse, cluster of two, three, four and five or six verses respectively, might often serve the purpose. Rudrata (9th cent.) mentions two broad varieties of poetry, viz. 'mahakavya' (extended narrative poems) and 'laghukavya' (shorter poem). The latter deals with only one of the four goals of life (purusharthas) and delineates only one sentiment or a few of the sentiments. Some of the Sanskrit lyrics may conform to this variety. Another genre called 'samghata' is said to have one continuous theme (ekartha) and only one author. The Meghaduta and the Suryashataka are given as examples of this type and both are reckoned as lyrics by modern authorities. Incidentally in the Meghaduta (II. 25) itself there is a reference to a song sung to the accompaniment of a lute (vina).

In fact lyric in Sanskrit dates from the Vedas, where most of the hymns are beautiful lyric poems addressed to the gods and goddesses. Such hymns are the poets' reaction to the agreeable and awful aspects of nature in expressions laden with rich imageries. Some such lyrics are the hymns addressed to Ratri (the spirit of the night), Aranyani (the spirit of the forest) and Ushas (the goddess of the dawn). Ushas is portrayed as the beloved of the sun, e.g. in the Rigveda, I. 115.2: "The sun follows the resplendent Goddess Ushas, as a youth following a young maiden." This imagery may remind one of a similar situation in Keat's 'Ode on a Grecian Urn'.

LYRIC-SANSKRIT

Lyrics of classical Sanskrit literature are broadly divided into three types, viz., love lyrics, didactic lyrics and devotional lyrics.

Kalidasa was the author of at least two lyrical poems, viz. The Meghaduta and the Ritusamhara. The former may be called a lyric because of being a laghukavya and the outburst of the feelings of the character who is suffering from the pangs of separation, and because of being concerned with one continuous theme. The Ritusamhara is likewise a laghukavya with one continuous theme of describing the seasons in the form of a lover's reactions to the change of seasons. The poem is passionate utterance of one character, each and every word of the poem being addressed to the female partner of love.

Bhartrihari composed three collections of lyrics of hundred verses each called the Nitishataka (Century on wise conduct), the Vairagyashataka (Century on spirit of renunciation) and the Shringarashataka (Century on love), where each stanza normally stands by itself and assumes the form of an independent small poem. The Shringarashataka faithfully delineates the beauty of women and the psychological effects of love as in the following:

When we do not see our beloved ones, we desire simply to have a view; when seen, we desire only to have the pleasure of a close embrace; and when the large-eyed beloved is clasped, we hope for a blending of the two bodies

But the same Shringarashataka in its later part emphasizes the undesirability of getting infatuated by love of women and on the desirability of taking to the path of renunciation.

O traveller in the form of my mind, you must not stray into the forest in the form of the body of the fair damsel where movement is hazardous due to the presence of mountains in the form of breasts, and because there resides the robber in the form of passion

The Amarushataka (A century by Amaru) of Amaru (c. 650 A.D.), however, deals exclusively with love and relation between lovers. Amaru's verses are very rich in the erotic sentiment, and Anandavardhana, in the Dhvanyaloka (ch. 3), holds that Amaru's muktakas (single stanzas) by virtue their ability to give the relish of the erotic sentiment may read like miniature poems. In many of the verses of Amaru, it is the poet who describes the state of mind of the lover or his affairs; but some of the verses are outpourings of the lover's own feelings as in one of the muktakas, which may be rendered as follows:

O my friend! in sham anger I just happened to say 'go away', and the hard-hearted one suddenly left the bed and really went away. But my shameless heart again pines for that unkind one who has so rashly destroyed our love, and what can I do?

The Chaurapanchashika of Bilhana presents fifty (panchashat) verses in the form of the outburst of the longing heart of a lover. The hero had secret love affairs with a princess. For this offence the king sentenced him to death. While awaiting the capital punishment that would come by the close of the day, the lover composed fifty verses to describe how fondly he had been recollecting the joys of his past dalliances with his beloved. The king being highly impressed by these love poems released the lover and allowed his union with the princess. In one of the earlier verses the lover says:

Even today I recollect her with my mind as resting her face on her hand and looking intently on my path while in reality I remain concealed by myself invisibly behind the nearby door, and as trying to sing with a sweet small voice some song containing my own name

In a later verse he says:

Even today by the close of the day if I could once again see my beloved who possesses the eyes of a gazelle and bears the pair of nectar-white pitcherlike breasts, I would part with the joys of kingship of a prosperous kingdom, of heaven, and of final emancipation.

Jayadeva's (12th century) Gitagovinda is a book of songs (gita) relating to the cowherd god Krishna (Govinda). The poem is divided into twelve cantos, and it consists of twenty-four songs interspersed with some recitative verses. The poet indicates the 'raga' (melody) and 'tala' (beat) of each song concerned. The poem depicts love of Krishna and Radha in its various phases. With songs, and occasionally with recitatives, Krishna and Radha give vent to their feelings of love, and the faithful female friend of Radha describes the state of mind of Radha to Krishna, and that of Krishna to Radha. Thus it is a love lyric. But there are certain utterances of the poet steeped in devotion for lord Krishna and his beloved, which make the poem also a devotional lyric of no mean order. The songs mostly have eight stanzas each, and hence the whole poem is also called 'Ashtapadi'. While the recitative verses are in usual metres measured by syllables, the songs are in an exceptional metre based on the quantity of vowels. All the songs are characterised by profuse use of rhyme. Each of the songs and stanzas may be reckoned as a miniature poem of exquisite beauty. The poem is characterised by a singular beauty of words and a rare degree of harmony of sound and sense so much so that any translation of this poem would hardly be able to give a proper idea of the beauty of the original. "... if to be untranslatable is a proof of the attainment of the highest poetry, Jayadeva has certainly claim to that rank", observes A.B. Keith.

The Gitagovinda depicts various aspects of love such as intense longing, hope of union, despair, anger against the unfaithful love, reconciliation and the joys of union.

LYRIC-SANSKRIT

Love lyrics in Prakrit are profusely quoted in works on poetics. The Sattasai (Seven centuries), also known as Gathasaptashati, of Hala of unknown date is a mine of Prakrit love lyrics. Govardhana (12th cent.) composed the Aryasaptashati (Seven centuries of verses in Arya metre) on the model of Hala to present some amusing verses on love.

Didactic lyrics in Sanskrit are innumerable. In mukta-kas, i.e. single verses recognised as lyrics, wise and noble ideas are conveyed in 'a highly finished and noble poetic garb.' In Sanskrit instructive verses are called 'niti-shlokas'. 'Niti' precisely means polity, but loosely also ethics and practical wisdom. The Mahabharata contains a lot of such didactic verses, e.g. the niti-shlokas of Vidura. The independent books of didactic verses make a legion, and they have a wide range of subjects so much so that while in one end there is the Mohamudgara of Shankaracharya, which teaches highly moral principles of non-attachment, on the other end there is also the Kuttanimata of Damodaragupta, where a hetaira teaches a young girl the art of gaining money through flattery and feigned love.

The Nitishataka of Bhartrihari contains some verses which are more gnomic than lyrical; but as a whole this book is one of the most celebrated anthologies of didactic lyrics. One of the lyrics of this century may be rendered into English as follows:

Whatever little or large wealth is granted by Fate will be surely gained even in the desert and not an iota more even in the Mt. Meru. Hence be patient, don't seek the sympathy of the wealthy. Look, the pitcher will collect only as much water from the ocean as from the well.

The Vairagyashataka of Bhartrihari aims at generating the spirit of renunciation in the mind of the reader by various devices like emphasising on the transitoriness of life.

The Vairagyashataka is didactic because it deals with ethical matters. But in fact all the three centuries of Bhartrihari are didactic insofar as the Shringarashataka also closes with a didactic strain.

Shankaracharya's Mohamudgara is similar to the Vairagyashataka because of having a similar ethical vein. But Mohamudgara is more lyric because of its wealth of rhyming.

Besides the works of individual authors like Bhallata and Shilhana, there are innumerable anthologies where didactic verses are presented in a classified manner. Some important names in the area of anthologies are Subhashitaratnakosha of Vidyakara, Saduktikarnamrita of Shridharadasa (1205), Suktimuktavali of Jalhana (13th cent.), Sharngadharapaddhati of Sharngadhara (1363) and so on.

Poems, technically called 'anyokti' or 'anyapadesha', were much appreciated because of being rich in symbolism. This is warranted by innumerable centuries or collections with titles Anyoktishataka and Anyapadeshashataka. Some of the stanzas collected in these shatakas are good lyric poems.

Devotional lyrics are most appealing because they are composed with a rare degree of emotional fervour. These are really regularly recited by a large number of Indians as prayer songs even today. These songs addressed to various gods and goddesses are called 'stava', 'stuti' or 'stotra', all the terms being derived from the root 'stu', to pray. The stotra literature dates from the Vedic literature, where there are beautiful prayers, e.g., the hymns of the Rudradhyaya of the Yajurveda. The great epics also contain some occasional stutis, e.g. the prayer addressed by Arjuna to Krishna in the Bhagavadgita (ch. XI). The puranas are an inexhaustible source of prayer songs, e.g. prayer of Brahma addressed to Krishna in the Bhagavatapurana (X. 14) and the prayer of gods addressed to Durga in the Durgasaptashati (XI. 2-35), which is a part of the Markandeya-purana. Amongst the innumerable poems composed by known individual poets, Mahimnahstotra of Pushpadanta (9th cent.), Suryashataka of Mayura (7th cent.), Chandishataka of Bana (7th cent.), Bhaktamaras-totra of Manatungacharya, and numerous others deserve mention. There are also hundreds of modern anthologies containing thousands of prayer songs, e.g. the Brihatstotaratanakara, the Stotrarnava, the Stavakusumanjali, the Stavakavachamala. Of all the individual poets, Shankaracharya ranks foremost in respect of musical beauty and emotional appeal of the poems addressed to various gods and goddesses such as Shiva, Vishnu and Annapurna in various metres of which Bhujangaprayata is most frequently employed. The tradition of composing devotional lyrics in Sanskrit has continued till the present decade.

Lyrics expressing the feeling of respect and admiration are addressed also to kings, patrons and teachers. Such poems are called 'prashastis'. Epigraphical records often contain prashastis addressed to kings.

It is noteworthy that the Indian tradition of composing lyrics of devotional type has inspired some Western Sanskritists also to apply their talents in this direction. For instance, six Sanskrit verses occur as the Editor's Preface to the English translation of the Atharvaveda-samhita of W.D. Whitney, edited by C.R. Lanman (Harvard University, 1905), wherein the editor pays homage to his teacher Whitney.

LYRIC-SINDHI-LYRIC-TAMIL

LYRIC (Sindhi). Originally a recitable musical item like a Samavedic hymn, the lyric was later associated with the lyre, a string instrument like 'ektara'. It was set to other instruments much later. It can do without any instrumental accompaniment today, for it has become once again a recitable melody which is not intended to be sung, but has sweet sound and rhythm and also repetitious syntax conducive to the expressions of intense joy, sorrow or contemplative thought.

The lyric in Sindhi which came to be evolved around 1000, had mainly been devotional until the onset of the modern age. An eleventh century Sindhi example is the 'ginan' (Skt. Jnan) of Sayyid Nuruddin, popularly known as Satguru Nur, who came from Egypt to Sindh in 1079 to help spread Islam and tried to win over Hindus by his devotional songs in Sindhi.

Pir Shams Multani (1180-1267) kept up this Isma'ili tradition, but it was Pir Sadruddin (1290-1409) who showed signs of maturity in the early form of the Sindhi 'vai' lyric, which was perceptible on the level of using the devices of lyricism, if not on the level of thought which remained essentially orthodox.

After the Isma'ili propagators of Islam, the sufi poets appeared on the scene; their lyric poems, usually short and compact, each depicting a single mood, were called the 'vais.' With the vai songs of Miyan Shah Inat and Shah Abdul Latif, the Sindhi lyric became secular in outlook and sensuous in thought content behind it. Their vai songs in various 'suruds' and 'surs' have often been described as of the rigid classical character, which they were not. Mirza Qalich Beg, in his Shah Abdul Latif Bhitai jo ahwal (A biography of Shah Abdul Latif of Bhit, 1910), H.M. Gurbuxani in his 'Introduction' to the Shah jo Risalo (1923) and H.T. Sorley in his Shah Abdul Latif of Bhit (1940), have seen in these suruds or surs, the melodic forms of classical music, and have also hinted at the suitable timings of the year and the day when these 'ragas' and 'raginis', be practised. But the suruds and surs are not the ragas or raginis proper, they are based on words and meaning of 'bayts' and vais unlike the classical ragas and raginis which are expressed by rhythm and melody of sounds. The vai songs come under the category of the 'loka-ragas' which are sung to the accompaniment of a drone instrument by minstrels, 'faqirs' and members of the religious sects, and these loka-ragas prefer simple rural speeches to complex, urban languages. The songs of Chandidasa, Surdasa, Tulasidasa, Vidyapati, Mira, Kabir, Dadu, Nanak, Shah Inat, Shah Abdul Latif, etc., are the 'laukika-vinoda', or the music produced by experts for the pleasure of common people.

A bayt from a 'dastana', or many bayts from the respective dastanas preceding the vai compositions, when musically recited or chanted, arouse the musical consciousness and create the ethos for the vai songs. S. Amjad Ali describes the manner of singing the Sindhi lokaragas thus: "First, one person sings a 'dohira', or 'doha,' in a free and easy style, in a loud and sonorous voice, without taking care of 'tala' or time. There is no instrumental accompaniment except the 'ek-tara,' which produces only one key note, as a droning background. Then the party of singers, sometimes four or five, presents the vai.

From the serious philosophical theme and dignified manner of singing of the dohira, to the light and lyrical song of the vai is a welcome change, and the one sets off the other."

The vai continues to be a popular lyric form in Sindhi even today. Sheikh Ayaz, Bardo Sindhi and Tanvir Abbasi in Pakistan and Hundraj Dukhayal, Hari Dilgir and Narayan Shyam in India have been among its successful practitioners. But the modern lyric in Sindhi, as elsewhere, is more complex, at times lending itself to contrastive themes, but all the time keeping to its emotional mode. Isolated, intensely-felt moments in the life of a poet encourage him to use the first person and bring in vivid images in rhythm and rhyme which are at once part of the lyric and yet transcending it.

Mo.J.

LYRIC (Tamil) can be divided into three kinds: Ancient lyric, medieval lyric and modern lyric.

The poems of Sangam period (B.C. 300 A.D. 200) belong to the ancient period. They are of two kinds, viz. Akam (erotic) and Puram (heroic). The Akam lyrics have love as their theme; and all the other poems are Puram. These poems were written according to the strict rules enunciated by the grammarians like Tolkappiyar (B.C. 700). These poems were included in Ettuttokai (Eight anthologies) and most of them are short pieces of beautiful poetry.

Of the 2381 Sangam poems, 1862 belong to Akam. The union of the lovers, the longings, the waits, the frustrations and the separation are vividly expressed in the Akam poems. Non-naming of the characters is a sine qua non in this kind of poem. The lady-love, talaivi (heroine), is full of beauty and virtue; the hero, talaivan, is brave and kind; the companion (tozhi) of the heroine helps them in their love-affair by acting as a go-between.

The Akam lyrics are dramatic monologues. They are subjective by nature. The poets numbering more than 400 used all the important techniques of poetry to present the theme of love in a beautiful and fitting manner. Similes and metaphors drawn from life and nature enriched the quality of the verses and have given them an immortal life. The poets have also described the moods and passions of the lovers with telling effect. The strict and conventional rules did not stand in the way of creative talent. The detailed descriptions of the flora and fauna give a relevant background to the situation of love and contribute to the excellence of the poem.

With the honey of the black-stemmed
Kurinchi flowers (Kuruntokai, verse 3)

This poem which depicts the ideal love of the hero and the heroine is a brilliant piece; the words are of the heroine in praise of the hero when her companion had blamed him for not marrying her till then; all the while the hero is standing behind the fence of the house.

The Puram lyrics are included in the anthologies, Purananuru and Patirruppattu. The former contains 400 stray verses sung on kings, chieftains and benefactors on various occasions. The views of the poets on virtue are also a part of Puram. The poets have shown the right path to the kings and also to the people whenever the occasion demanded. The lyrics in Purananuru depict the life of the cross-section of Tamils of those days.

"Every country is ours; all people are our kinsmen" "those who provide food are the life-givers", "The purpose of having wealth is to give; if one decides to enjoy, then the disappointments will be many" are some of the sayings from Purananuru.

In the medieval period (between A.D. 600 and A.D. 1200), there were thousands of lyrics, mostly hymns. They were sung by the great Nayanmars of the Shaiva religion and the equally great Alvars of Vaishnava religion. They went from place to place to have the 'darshan' of the deities, and sang devotional lyrics with lilting music in them. The songs of the Shaiva Nayanmars were collected by Nampiyantar Nampi, and they are in twelve 'tirumurai' (volumes); those of the Vaishnava saints were collected by Nata Muni and they are called Nalayira divya prabandham (four thousand devotional songs.)

The experiences which the saints had at various centres of worship made them sing lyrics of great beauty. There are songs with Akam theme, but in praise of God, in these lyrics. In this type of lyrics, God is the talaivan and the soul is talaivi; the compassion (Arul) of the Lord is tozhi. For the lyrical beauty of the hymns, the following one will suffice: A lady is losing weight and colour day by day because of love-sickness. She addresses her pet-bird revealing her plight: "You are to blame, O small bird, Puvai. I told you to convey my sickness to Lord Tirumal; you bluntly refused to do so. Now I have lost my grace and my beautiful colour. You may now leave me in search of another to feed you" (Nalayiram, 2715). The lady is on the brink of death; so she requests the bird to find some other girl for food and protection.

There are thousands of lyrics written by hundreds of poets after 1300 and before 1900. Some of them are collected and published under the title Tanippatal tirattu (Collection of stray verses). Some other poems are included in Nanak kovai and some more in Peruntirattu.

The lyrics in these collections are of different periods and of different nature. There are no set rules of conventions; the poets were free to choose any topic and sing. However interesting they may be, they could not match the earlier poems in quality. Humour and satire have an important place in these lyrics; of the poets who have sung under this category, Avvaiyar (a poetess of later date) and Kalamegam excel others.

Twentieth century is a period of lyrics. Poets from Subramanya Bharati to Kavinar Kannadasan have written at least one or two volumes of verses, most of which are lyrics.

Bharati wrote lyrics which kindled the spirit of freedom among Tamils; through these poems, simple and direct, Bharati has conveyed his ideas on language, freedom, God and society. Kaviman Desikavinayakam Pillai, Namakkal Kavinar V. Ramalingam Pillai, Suddhanada Bharati, S.D.S. Yogi, S.D. Sundaram and scores of others followed Bharati and wrote lyrics of beauty.

Poet Bharatidasan, who had inspiration from Bharati, but deviated from him in many ideals, introduced another type of lyric. He and his followers wrote poems which had social relevance. These poems brought out the ills of the society such as the plight of the widows, the worries of the labourers, the curse of the caste system, etc. They wrote about the Tamil language and Tamil people. Various types of rhymes and metres are used by the modern poets.

Lyrics in Tamil have a history of more than two thousand years and they differ in quality and quantity in successive periods. Tamil lyric existed in one shape or other and was used by poets down the centuries with varying degrees of skill and success.

LYRIC (Telugu). In a poem a spontaneous overflow of powerful subjective feelings assumes the form of a lyric which has an emotional intensity and musical quality. In Telugu, folk-songs transmitted and preserved by oral tradition may be regarded as the earliest poems with lyrical elements in them. They deal with a variety of subjects; though the authorship may not be known, some of the folk-songs move us by their lilt and sentiment.

The words 'bhavagitam', 'bhavakavita', 'geyam', 'padam', and 'kirtana' are used as synonyms for the term lyric. The devotional songs of Annamacharya (1408-1503), the erotic songs of Kshetravaya (17th century), the songs of Ramadas of Bhadrachalam (17th century), the devotional songs of Tyagaraja (18th century) may be regarded as lyrics which attained a literary status.

The Shataka literature (Hundred verses) may be regarded as a native form of lyric poetry. Spirit of devotion, didacticism, and criticism of life abound in this type of literature. Vamana shatakam (16th century), Dasharathi shatakam (17th century) and Andhranayaka shatakam (18th century) may be cited as good specimens of this lyrical form which was later smothered by convention and which slowly lost its original intensity and impassioned utterance.

As a result of the influence of English poetry, lyric made headway during the modern period. Inspired by English poets of the nineteenth century as well as by the melodies of folk songs, Gurajada Apparao (1861-1915) fashioned a supple and simple stanza of four lines with the fourth shorter than the rest. He named it 'mutyalasaram' (Garland of pearls) and used it to narrate the touching tales of Purnamma, Kanyaka, etc.

Rayaprolu Subbarao (b. 1892), besides composing many lyrics inspiring patriotism and love, for the first time introduced a quality of freshness and tenderness into this verse form. His tender poems 'Lalita', 'Snehalata' and 'Trina kankanam' (Bracelet of grass) marked the beginning of bhava kavita which is predominantly lyrical. He described the beauties of Nature with keen observation and glorified love as a unifying cosmic force. The new poetry like the lyrics of the English romantics relied more upon natural emotion and feeling than on the rational analytical intellect.

The lyrics of Kavikondala Venkatarao (1892-1960) focus attention on the beauties that lie unnoticed on the dusty wayside of humdrum life. His lyrics display Wordsworthian simplicity and love of Nature.

Basavaraju Apparao (1894-1933) poured forth his agonies and exultations in his bhavagitams without any restraint. His struggles against misfortune, his bereavements and his frustrations found impassioned expression in his lyrics. He dreamt of death as an escape from the miseries of life and desired to fade away while singing like the dying swan. We find the influence of Gurajada in language, form and treatment when we examine his lyrics in his Selayeti patalu (Songs of a brook). He wrote a memorable lyric describing Gandhi's Dandi Satyagraha wherein he describes the impact of the historic Salt Satyagraha. Adivi Bapiraju (1895-1952) was very much influenced by folk song, dance and art. He, being a painter, portrayed in words the shifting scenes of life. His visions of beauty, his impassioned yearning for untainted love found apt expression in his lyrical sequence Shashikala. He portrayed rural life with all its fascination in some of his lyrics written in the rural idiom and rhythm. His finest lyric describes the steps leading to the shrine of the Lord of Seven Hills and reveals his vivid imagination.

In his popular lyrical sequence entitled Yenki patalu, Nanduri Subbarao (1895-1958) celebrated and exalted the rustic love of Nayudu Bava and Yenki with admirable melody and suggestiveness.

Jashuva's (1895-1970) khandakavyas reveal another bright facet of lyric poetry. Besides his Firdausi, Mumtaz and Gabbilam, the poems display lively imagination, profound feeling and felicity of diction. Highest flights are occasioned by trivial subjects like a sparrow's nest, an ant, a pet dog and spider's web proving that all is grist to the poet's mill.

The highest pinnacles of lyrical poetry were scaled by Devulapalli Krishna Sastri (1897-1980). His Krishna paksham, Urvashi, Pravasam (Exile) Mahati, and musical plays like Sharmishtha, Venukunjam (Bamboo bush) Vidyapati, Janmashtami and Guha represent lyrical poetry at its best. His ceaseless quest for beauty, freedom, love and truth find expression in memorable lyrics. They display a rich variety of mood and treatment. Through the simplest phrases he communicates feelings which are too deep for tears. Besides expressing the deep longings of his spirit pining for the bliss of the vision divine, he celebrates the simple joys and sorrows of the common folk in their own idiom. The musical charm of his diction is matchless, as it combines the fire of Shelley and the consummate craftsmanship of Keats.

The progressive poets headed by Sri Sri (b.1910) employed the lyric as a powerful instrument to project the vision of a new order. Balagangadhar Tilak's (1921-1966) lyrics offer a blend of romanticism and progressive ideology. Anisetti Subbarao's (1922-80) lyrics have a popular appeal besides political fervour.

Poets like Dasharathi (b. 1927) and C.Narayana Reddi (b. 1931) continue to write lilting lyrics and they have already established reputation as lyricists for the film-world.

As an intensely fascinating form, the lyric continues to hold its ground since all art is ultimately the expression of subjective feelings and thoughts.

MI

MA (Bengali) is a novel by Anurupa Devi published in 1920. It glorifies motherhood as it deals with the problem of polygamy in the Hindu society of the early part of the twentieth century. Arabinda, an educated well-to-do young man deserts his wife, Manorama, because she comes from a family which has a lower social status. He then marries Brajarani, a beautiful daughter of a rich man. The first half of the story describes the household of Arabinda-Brajarani and that of Manorama and her son, Ajit. As the story moves on it becomes apparent that though Brajarani has all the worldly comforts she is unhappy and lonely. She is childless and has not had the love and affection of her husband. Her yearning to become a mother turns her into a jealous, almost a hysteric woman. In contrast, Manorama, in spite of her poverty, is much happier as she has the love and affection of her husband indirectly and that of her son directly. As Ajit grows up he feels a strong attachment to as also an aversion for his father who has wronged him and his mother so cruelly. He leaves his studies, gives up all hopes for a bright future and follows his father secretly like a ghost. At the end of the story he accepts Brajarani as his mother at the instance of the dying Manorama.

Ma is probably the most popular novel of Anurupa Devi. The main drawback of the novel is that it continually hangs on sentimentality. The author lacks detachment and burdens her readers with long comments at times unconnected with the main story. The allusion to Sita's desertion by Rama recurs like an oppressive refrain. The plot is loosely woven with incidents which seem contrived and improbable. The behavior of the characters borders on improbability. The best that could be said about the novel is that Anurupa Devi provides a lively description of the orthodox Bengali household, its day to day life, and its festivals and customs.

MAAK BHINA RAABELA (Sindhi): published by Ajanta Publication, Ajmer, in 1964, is a collection of poems by Narayan Shyam. In this collection, Shyam has experimented in different poetic forms, revamping the old ones, and innovating the new ones. The strength of his poems included in the collection lies in his prosodically perfect lines of the classical 'bahars' and 'chhandas'. One finds here poems in 'wai' form as also 'haiku', 'doha', 'sortha', 'bayt', 'ghazal', 'rubai', 'nazm', 'triolet', 'sonnet' forms.

The entire lyrical poetry in the collection is romantic in spirit and the poems keep opening windows to all the seasons one by one. It is a romance with Nature, his mind registering sensory impressions and, transform them from sensual to sensuous. His search, poem after poem, for discovering a blue flower that blossoms somewhere in the blue sky, but somehow cannot be had continues, and he tries to hold the blue of the sky in his bare hands. His power of imagination holds the reader's mind and the magic spell permeates his entire being. Here the pure reason seems irrelevant. The time stands still. The aura of timelessness envelops the reader. With his mind and soul in loneliness, like a wanderer, the poet is set on a search for a new world, a new life, a new self—the poet hates the things simple and straight. He avoids the light of the day so that at the time of dusk his imagination plays with the arcs of the twilight—in the process he tries to make the reader ride a parabola and drags him within the realms of those romantic feelings that give him a feel of the infinite.

It is interesting to note that while experimenting in the field of forms in this particular collection, the poet takes to these forms as easily as a baby duck takes to water. Maak bhina raabela (Jasmine flowers moistened with dews) is indeed an endearing work of art.

MACDONELL, ARTHUR ANTHONY (Sanskrit; b. 1854, d. 1930), was born at Muzaffarpur in North Bihar, as the eldest son of Colonel Alexander Anthony Macdonell of the 40 Bengal Native Infantry. He was sent to England with his mother in 1861 and was admitted to a school in Dresden (1866-69), Germany. After four years at the Gottingen gymnasium, he matriculated (1875) from the University of that city and under Professor Theoder Benfey, began a study of Sanskrit and Comparative Philology.

Later, at Oxford, as an exhibitor (1876) of Corpus Christic College, Macdonell obtained a second class in honours moderations (1878) and a third class in literae humanix (1880). He also won the Taylorian Scholarship in German (1876), the Davis Chinese Scholarship (1877) and the Boden Sanskrit Scholarship (1878).

Macdonell revisited Germany for the purpose of reading with the distinguished Vedic scholar, R. Roth and obtained a doctorate degree of the Leipzig University.

In 1888 Macdonell was appointed deputy to Sir Monier Williams, the Boden Professor of Sanskrit and Keeper of Indian Institute. Upon that scholar's death in 1899, Macdonell was appointed his successor in both these offices, and also to a fellowship at Balliol College.

Retiring in 1926, Macdonell received the title of Emeritus Professor; and in 1928, he was elected as Honorary Fellow of Balliol and in 1906 was elected FBA and represented it on a committee of the International Union of Academies concerned with promoting a critical edition of the Mahabharata. Macdonell was on the Council of the Royal Asiatic Society, and served as its Vice President (1921-24). In the Triennial International Congress of Orientalists, Macdonell was a participant from 1881 to 1912 and its Oxford Session in 1928 was organised by him.

Macdonell made two visits to India. The first (1907-1908) led to the acquisition, by the Bodelian Library, of a large collection of Sanskrit manuscripts which with hundreds of photographs were later presented to the Indian Institute. These inspired some comprehensive views regarding Indian temple architecture and iconography which Macdonell expounded in lectures (1909) before the British Academy and the Royal Society of Arts. The second visit (1922-23) was for the purpose of delivering in the Calcutta University a course of 'Stephanos Nirmalendu' Lectures on Comparative Religion. In 1904 Macdonell had participated at a Congress of Arts and Sciences at St. Louis, Missouri and in 1912, visited Canada. Macdonell was a recipient of several honorary distinctions and degrees. In 1913 he was awarded the Campbell prize by the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society.

Macdonell was foremost a Sanskrit scholar. He worked chiefly in the Vedic field to which belong his most important contributions. Among these are the following: Sarvanukramani (1886) and Brihaddevata (Harvard Oriental Series. 2 vols. 1904); a comprehensive and thorough monograph, Vedic Mythology (Grundriss Series, Leipzig, (1897) and a masterly Vedic Grammar (Grundriss Series, Leipzig, 1910). In collaboration with A.B. Keith, he published A Vedic Index of Names and Subjects (1912). But he became a widely read author by his lively and interesting general books, viz. History of Sanskrit Literature (1900), India's Past, a Study of Literatures, Languages, Religions and Antiquities (1927) and Lectures on Comparative Religion published by the Calcutta University.

Macdonell lived in Oxford after his retirement in 1926 till his death.

MACHAMA (Kashmiri) is the collection of eight radio and stage plays of the Machama series written by Pushkar Bhan. The book appeared in 1975 and won the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1976.

Eight plays of the series printed in the book include 'Hero machama', 'Machamani wutal buje', 'Bhaktu bod machama', 'Machama drav safaras', 'Machamun fitan', 'Maosikar machama', 'Shahkapas' and 'Sindbad machama'. Out of these eight plays only two, 'Hero machama' and 'Sindbad machama', are stage plays and have been performed a number of times by Akashvani Club, Kala Kendra and Theatre Federation.

Plays included in the book have been selected out of seventy instalments of this serial broadcast from All India Radio, Srinagar, from 1950 at 1970.

Machama was the most popular satirical serial broadcast by Radio Kashmir, Srinagar, in its history. Its popularity can well be judged by the fact that when an instalment of this serial was broadcast, it became the talk of the town for weeks together. Machama, Rehman Dada and Sula Gota are household nicknames in Kashmir. Any body who acts in an eccentric way is called a Machama even today. These characters have a permanent place in the history of Kashmiri literature. By writing this series of dramas, Pushkar made up a big deficiency in our literature. It is the great achievement of Pushkar that he makes us laugh at our own follies, because all of us are Machamas on the cross-roads of life. Machama becomes a butt of ridicule because he is not a hypocrite. He gives vent to what he feels and acts in accordance with his worth and wisdom. He suffers humiliation, defeat and neglect but he has the capacity to laugh when he is under odds. We wordly-wise hypocrites laugh at Machama because he is a straight-forward person who wants to live and enjoy the life to its full, but when some calamity befalls our lot we weep and suffer wearing a mask of fortitude and forbearance.

Machama, the main character of this series of plays, is a middle class youth of average calibre and education, but has very high aspirations and longings. He takes to many trades, but is rejected. He takes everything lightly and assures his wife time and again that he will surely make his mark some day. His mother and father suffer the pangs of poverty and neglect because their only son Machama is unable to achieve anything and help them in old age. Machama's father and mother, Kak and Kak Ded, represent a class which is gradually slipping out of our sight. These two characters represent the traits of the feudal age and live more in the past than in the present. They cherish the values of old society, and when something is done against their established values, they raise their voice against it.

Every instalment of this serial of plays has an independent entity. Excepting the leading characters, Sula Gota, Rehman Dada and Khatiji, there is nothing common in these episodes. It is the presence of the characters alone which is a binding factor between the various instalments of this series of plays.

Rehman Dada and Sula Gota are the two friends of Machama, who always stand by him and abide by his dictates. In sun and shower, they follow him and help him to attain his goal. They suffer and laugh with him. Even in difficulties they do not betray their friend who is a simple bundle of contradictions like all middle class people who try to attain the heights of prosperity, but always return in disappointment and suffer the neglect, starvation and humiliation. In search of prosperity and fame, Machama tries his best to do something to attain some standing, and his two friends are always there to help him and follow in his steps. But like Machama, his two friends also meet the same fate. After every defeat, they start afresh and see the dream of a sweet world and follow another path to attain it.

Khatiji, the wife of Machama, is a typical woman under the control of her mother-in-law and father-in-law. She has every reason to complain and she complains whenever the opportunity comes her way. In presence of her mother-in-law, she maintains her reticence. She represents the Hindustani woman who would laugh when rebuked.

This serial of plays has covered almost all the aspects of contemporary life. It depicts the tragedy of the present day middle class man. The author's skill lies in the presentation which nowhere gives an inkling to the middle class people that the story relates to them.

MACHWE, PRABHAKAR BALWANT-MADAHA AND MUNJAT

Pushkar owes his popularity largely to this serial of plays and he will always be remembered for writing such a popular series.

MADAHA AND MUNAJAT (Sindhi) are the forms of devotional folk-poetry. Madaha (pl. Madahun) is derived from the Arabic word 'madh' meaning praise, eulogism, commendation. In Arabic poetry, madh may be a panegyric, an eulogy or an encomium composed to please some one (may be God, saint, king, chieftain, etc.); but madaha in Sindhi is necessarily a laudatory poem inspired by faith and composed only in the praise of God or the prophet or his companions and revered saints. The 'munajat' (pl. munajatun, the word literally means 'prayer') also is a laudatory poem akin to madaha, having the same subject-matter. The difference between the two forms is that in madaha the element of admiration and praise is predominant, while in munajata, the supplication of the poet becomes the main theme of the poem. The composer of munajata prays to God, or the Prophet and his companions, or to the revered saints, seeking blessings to get rid of his troubles and miseries.

As regards the form and the technique, both the madaha and the munajata are long laudatory poems generally composed in indigenous Sindhi metres with uniformity of rhyme in the entire poem or in its stanzas. Some poems are composed according to rules of the Persian prosody. To an extent 'qasida', a form of Arabic poetry, influenced the technique of these Sindhi poems.

The earliest madaha in Sindhi which has come to light so far, is composed by Juman Charanu (d. 1738). It gained popularity throughout Sindh due to its theme and artistic composition. Madaha composed by Miyan Muhammad Sarfaraz Khan while in captivity (1774), is considered to be one of the best poems in Sindhi. It is popular for its pathos and metre containing a refrain:

"Bhala jama, hina ghulama sando sawalu, suniji tun"
(O Benevolent Sir! please listen to a prayer of this slave).

Selected Sindhi madaha and munajata poems have been compiled by N.A. Baloch under the project of Sindhi folklore and literature. The compilation is the first book in this series published in 1959. It contains 101 poems, out of which 48 are madaha poems and 53 munajat compositions. The madaha and munajat compositions are sung on various religious occasions. These form an important section of devotional poetry in Sindhi and are being written by a good many poets to this day.

MADAN, INDRANATH (Hindi; b. 1910), born in Shahpur district of pre-partition Punjab, entered the field of literary criticism at a time when the post-Independence literary scene was totally confused and marred by slogans and personal indictments. There were champions of different brands of poetry, viz. 'Sanatan Sarvodaya Kavita', 'Yuyutsavada Kavita', 'Aswikrit Kavita', 'Akavita', 'Beat Kavita', 'Tazi Kavita', 'Pratibaddha Kavita' and of course, 'Nai Kavita' which was declared to be on its way out. It was at this juncture that some sensible lovers and connoisseurs of literature made a determined bid for the resurrection of poetry. Madan was one of the supporters of the movement which made an effort to rediscover poetry. It was an effort to re-establish poetry as an expression of realistic experience and social sensibility.

A very significant development in the post-Independence literary criticism was that critics condescended to step down from the high pedestal of poetry's evaluation and took up the criticism of other literary genres. They had till then considered only poetry fit enough for their consideration and were oblivious of the fact that fiction had actually advanced far enough, representing social activity and relationships in a rapidly changing world. Madan was conscious of this reality and concentrated on modern literature, specially fiction. He had the advantage of not being parochial in his approach to literature as he did not expect literature to tilt deliberately towards one worldview or the other. He believed that the critic had only one commitment and that was to literature that made us aware of our social environment and sharpened our response to the aspirations of the people. Madan proceeds with this commendable objective, though he does not always succeed in delving deep into the experiences and mental processes of his authors. His assessments therefore sometimes tend to be superficial and cursory.

Madan's name should also find mention amongst the critical essayists of the fifties and sixties. They reveal a free and uninhibited assessment of the creative effort unhindered by extraneous considerations. Madan had also the advantage of being in a position to use both Hindi and English as the media of expression and helped in apprising the English-knowing readership of the literary activity and achievements of Hindi writers. His major works are: Modern Hindi Literature (1939, in English), Hindi kalakar (1947), Premchand (1951), Sharatchandra Chatterji (1954, in English), Kahani aur kahani, Alochna aur sahitya, Naye Hindi upanyas.

MADDU PALANI (Telugu; b. 18th century) was a famous courtesan and poetess of Telugu in the court of Pratapa-simha (1740-62). Brilliant, beautiful and accomplished, she was the author of a rare kavita called Radhikasantvanam. Herself a poetess of no mean merit, she encouraged artists by her gifts of gold and land. Many poets are said to have dedicated their works to her. Being a disciple of the great Vaishnavite preceptor, Tatadharya, she was credited with a deep sense of devotion too. She had wrongly been credited with the authorship of Saptapadulu (Telugu translations of some ten 'pasurams' (songs) of Tamil Tiruppavai of Goda Devi). Her fame rests on the Radhikasantvanam or Iladeviyam. The theme of Krishna's love for his paternal aunt Radha was stock in trade with the poets of the Southern school. Dharanidevula Ramayya, Chintalapudi Yellana, Velidindla Venkatapati, Samukham Venkata Krishnappa and others had treated the theme with competence before but she excelled them all by virtue of her scholarship, her superb mastery of native idiom, metre and diction, and above all by her rare psychological insight into the moods and minds of the two women characters, Radha and Ila, whom she created with unique skill. In four Cantos, she describes how Radha, a married woman much senior to him, desperately falls in love with her nephew, Lord Krishna, even in his infancy; how his later marriage with Ila, her own 'adopted daughter', makes her mad with grief; how she sends a message to Krishna through her pet parrot; how Krishna comes back to her only to be taunted and teased by her; and how ultimately he wins her with his words of consolation, 'santvanavachanas.' It is the story of Radha from start to finish, though Ila is there as a foil. In her passionate jealousy, she reminds us of Shakespeare's Cleopatra. Full of seductive beauty, the book was banned by the British on moral grounds. It became more and more popular after Independence. C.P. Brown who discovered the text first saw an alien hand in it, while later critics and editors brought the charge of plagiarism against her. She was said to have incorporated some eighty verses of Samukham's Radhika santvanam into her book. In recent years, Arudra denied any plagiarism on her part, saying that Samukham's text was but a fake production. Arudra's statement is based on pure conjecture. The problem of plagiarism can be solved finally only by future research.

MADGULKAR, GAJANAN DIGAMBAR (Marathi; b. 1919, d. 1977). Widely known as a poet, lyricist, short story writer and screenplay-writer, Madgulkar belonged to a land-owning family from Madgul (dist. Satara). His schooling stopped in the seventh standard. He was connected with the film industry from 1938 onwards. He started as a minor actor in Master Vinayak's Huns Pictures. His first screenplay assignment as well as acting debut proper was in V. Shantaram and Baburao Painter's film Ramjoshi (1946). He first wrote lyrics for Vishram Bedekar's Pahila palna (1941).

Madgulkar was a prolific writer in all the genres he touched. His Gitramayana (1957), written for the radio and sung initially by his long-standing colleague Sudhir Phadke, was very well received by the people. The lyrical adaptation of the Ramayana was developed by him through dramatic incidents in verse marked by unique naturalness and evocative power.

Later, Madgulkar wrote Gitagopal (1970) in the same style on the life and exploits of Krishna.

Madgulkar as a young man was involved in the freedom struggle of 1942. Reflections of experiences of this involvement are seen in the inspiring patriotic Chinese invasion in 1962.

Sugandhi veena (1949), Jogiya (1956) and Chaitraban (1961) are his collections of poetry. The texture of his poetry is formed by a blend of his rural moorings and his urban experience. There is a romantic narrative strain in his poems. It also has a distinctive touch of the dramatic element. His lyrics are rich in imagery. Madgulkar's other works include the play Yuddhachya savlya (1944), the opera-type plays Char sangitika (1956), Doan nrityanatika (1969), Geetsoubhadra (An extension and musical re-orientation of Kirloskar's classic play Sangit soubhadra, 1968) and Kavyakatha (1962).

Between Ramjoshi (1946), and Devakinandan Gopala (1977) Madgulkar wrote scripts for more than 100 Marathi and Hindi films. Such published scripts as Tin chitrakatha (1963) and Ramjoshi (in Gadima, 1969) speak of his command of the medium. The literary quality of these scripts is proved by mythologicals such as Mayabajar, socials such as Oonpaus and Prapancha, and those based on rural experience like Jashas tase and Pudhche paul, comedies like Pedgaonche shahane and Lakhachi goshta and scripts based on the lives of old-time shahirs such as Ramjoshi and Shahir Parshuram. Many of these films celebrated jubilees although a few, despite their quality, failed at the box office (e.g., Oonpaus).

Chaitraban contains 278 lyrics of Madgulkar, representing a selection from his entire work. He was perhaps the first Marathi lyricist to invest in film lyric with literary flavour. The words bear a strong link with Marathi verse tradition. They derive, as and when needed, the special qualities of the lavni, the ovi, the abhang and other forms of Marathi lyric writing. These lyrics have a sensuous texture. At the same time they are steeped in an authentic emotion and plays with more than one rasa in a facile manner. Madgulkar's lines from the films, sung by some of our finest playback singers, have long ago become proverbial household songs.

Madgulkar was also a leading short story writer who adopted his own style and did not surrender to any ruling vogue. Such short story collections of his as Laplela oagh (1952), Bolka shankh (1960), Krishnachi karangali (1962), Bandhavarlya babhli (1963), Thorli pati (1963) and Tupacha nandadeep (1966) primarily stress the fact that he was gifted with the narrative vein of a born raconteur. Madgulkar, as in his film writing, is equally at ease in creating a sense of pathos as well as a comic verve. The characters he creates not only come alive but appear to be rooted in their particular milieu, whether rural or urban. The stories, like his poems and lyrics, cannot escape romanticism. This was, indeed, the base of Madgulkar's personality as a writer. Madgulkar's novels, Abhalachi phale (basis of the film Prapanch, 1960) and Ubhe dhage adwe dhage (1972) reflect the same qualities of dramatic projection as his stories.

Madgulkar has contributed quite a lot to belles-lettres too. He has described elaborately the travel he undertook for location hunting in Mysore with film director V. Shantaram and his colleagues. His collection of pen-portraits is called Aundhacha raja, while his light essays are included in Bamnacha patra. More remarkable is the autobiographical Mantarlele divas (1962) in which one learns about his early boyhood in difficult circumstances and about the formative influences in his life. Another of his collections of pen-portraits called Til ani tandul (1980) makes interesting reading. This book contains a moving essay called 'Hello, Mister Death' expressing premonitions of the encounter with death.

The cream of Madgulkar's writing is to be found in Gadima sahitya navanit published on his 50th birthday in 1969. Honoured with the 'Padmashri' for his contribution to literature, he was a member of the Maharashtra State Vidhan Parishad, President of the Marathi Natya Sammelan at Yavatmal (1973). Madgulkar lived a full life always dreaming of his poetry and composing it at record speed.

MADGULKAR, VYANKATESH DIGAMBAR (Marathi. b. 1923), a short story writer, novelist and essayist, was born at Madgul, a small village in the erstwhile princely state of Aundh, now in Sangli district.

Madgulkar first came in the limelight when, along with Gangadhar Gadgil, he shared the first prize in a short story competition conducted by one of the most prominent and avant-garde monthly, Abhiruchi, in 1946. The story was entitled 'Kalya tondachi'. Since then, he has blossomed into a versatile and excellent writer trying his hand at screenplay writing (17 films), novels, plays and literary essays about nature often embellished with his very impressive line drawings. Madgulkar has also distinguished himself as a good narrator of his stories. He has worked for All India Radio (Pune) as producer of rural programmes.

Before the 1940s until Madgulkar started publishing his short stories, novels and poetry with the rural Maharashtra as their locale, the kind of 'rural' stories (and novels and poetry, too) that were written, were, almost without exception, artificial in form, language and content. The authors of these stories, obviously, could not identify themselves with the rural ethos. Although stories written by Shripad Mahadeo Mate (Upekshitanche antarnaga) showed some promise they could be said to have anticipated the advent of writers like Madgulkar, who could handle their themes with a touch of reality and aesthetic understanding. Madgulkar's stories are, in fact, deeply rooted in the soil of Mandesh, the locale he has chosen for the purpose. That is, perhaps, when they have been brimful with genuine portraits not of superfluous characters but of human beings destined to live (and die) in an unknown village like Mandesh. Madgulkar speaks the language of these people to express the beauty and the ugliness of their experience of life.

Madgulkar's stories are remarkable for their simplicity and innocence. They deal directly and without any inhibition with the essence of life they try to depict. Madgulkar himself belongs totally to this rural milieu and his own life there has moulded his personality enabling him to get an in-depth view of the local Man and to express, in real artistic terms, his simplicity, endurance, obstinacy along with the dynamics of the ways of his life. This Man would rarely be found complaining about the god-given poverty and making even a lean attempt to resist and rebel. He accepts life as it is—with all its mysteries and surprises. He has come to accept guilt, misery and suffering as an unavoidable part of his destiny he willingly and unhesitatingly prefers to suffer.

Like his own personality and his themes, Madgulkar's language is also simple and almost devoid of clichés and figurative decorum. It is at once exact, sharp, suggestive, vivid and graphic. His novel Sattantar got him the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1983.

As rightly pointed out by Gangadhar Gadgil, who has written an essay on Madgulkar, Madgulkar's novels, especially his most talked-about novel, 'Bangarwadi', have, however, failed to make a mark in that they have not been able to assume the true form of novel as such. Although readable and significant, they apparently are an album of varied portraits and landscapes of the rural region.

Madgulkar has written a few plays and has also adapted some western plays. They, however, have failed to click for one reason or other. Madgulkar presided over regional literary conferences at Goa and Solapur (1974 and 1953), he was a member of the Maharashtra Rajya Censor Board for Marathi Drama scripts, 1974-80 and also a member of the Advisory Board for Marathi, Sahitya Akademi for a few years.

Madgulkar's works include 14 short story collection, 5 novels, 2 belles lettres, 5 plays and 1 travelogue. Main works: Manadesi manasan, Gawakadchya goshti, Banagarwadi, Too gora kumbhar, Statee, Nagazira, Pan- dhryawar kale, Pandhri mendharan hirwee kurnc, Kovale diwas, Karunashtak.

His novels, Banagarwadi and Vavatal have been translated in English and Danish. Several of his short stories are included in anthologies in English and German.

MADHABI (Manipuri), a novel by L. Kamal Singh, is said to be the greatest Manipuri novel of modern times. It was published in 1930 and reprinted several times. It is made of two parallel stories of love: one centering round Urirei's love for Rajkumar Birendra Singh and the other centering round Madhabi and Dhirendra Singh. The locale is Kanchipur. Urirei's love is characterized by her possessiveness and by her pre-occupation with self. Madhabi, on the other hand, is an epitome of real love, self-negating and self-sacrificing.

The plot is weak but this weakness is redeemed by the noble sentiments and the poetic suggestiveness of Kamal's exquisite prose. The characters are skilfully drawn and Kamal shows a descriptive power that is matchless. The novel has been translated into English and Hindi.

MADHAV ACHWAL (Marathi; b. 1925, d. 1980). was an architect by profession who discovered his aptitude for writing at a later stage of his life. His first book Kimaya (1961) is a collection of essays mainly on various facets of architecture and other visual arts. Achwal thinks that these insulated surroundings do not forgive us for unaesthetic emphasis on utility-oriented architecture.

His other major work Rasaswad (1972) is about art appreciation, though not in theoretical terms. Achwal relies more on intuition, though he is aware of the conceptual aspect of this discipline and believes that appreciation of arts is also a creative process. To elaborate this point further, he discusses a novel Ranangan by Vishram Bedekar and the great achievement of Indian architecture—the Taj. Earlier the aesthetic thought in Marathi was limited to literature only. Though Achwal is not the first Marathi critic to write about the plastic craft, he is certainly the first one to write with such deep sensitivity, feel for the medium and awareness of inter-relationship of arts. Though not a formalist by temperament, he gives the form its due. He does not forget the emotional and other associations but retaining the psychological distance, tries to analyse the plastic qualities of the masterpiece objectively. He has made a short film too on the Taj.

Achwal has tried his hand at creative writing also, particularly the drama. Sumitra, Abdul-gabdul and Natak are his full-length plays. Sumitra was staged but all of them are unpublished. Two collections of his one-act plays Chitra and Dark room are published. There are a few other one-act plays which are not included in these collections but published in different periodicals. Though some of them are appreciated, he is better known as a critic than as a playwright.

He has published quite a few papers and also a book on low-cost housing in English. In 1979 he delivered a series of 3 lectures on architecture, sculpture and painting from the Tagore Chair of Poona University. He chose 3 artists from the respective fields for case-study. He wanted to publish them in Marathi but he could not complete this assignment. It could have been an important addition to this less explored field of Marathi literature.

MADHAVA VARIYAR, MADASSERI (Malayalam; b.1910, d.1979) was a novelist and critic. Born in Harippad, after his college education, he joined the Forest Department as a clerk, and retired as Office Manager. He was a prolific writer. He has written novels, stories, plays and critical essays. Though he is the author of thirty-three works he can be regarded only as a minor writer. Madhavante mahakavyam, Kavita kunchan vare, Kunchante shesham and Kuttikalute sahitya charitam are some of his important works.

MADHAVACHARYA (Sanskrit), a 14th century statesman, literary doyen and spiritual leader, is highly esteemed not only for his valuable contributions to different branches of Sanskrit or Indological learning—such as philosophy, literature, Hindu law, astrology, grammar and specially Advaita conforming to the Vivarana school, but also for his active participation in the fields of politics and religion for the consolidation of Hinduism.

He was born in Golconda. His father was Mayana; mother, Shrimati. He was the elder brother of Sayanacharya, the celebrated commentator of the Vedas, who is popularly known by his family name 'Sayana'. An ardent pursuer of wisdom, he became a disciple of three gurus—Shankarananda, Vidyatirtha and Bharatitirtha successively. Assuming the name Vidvaranya Muni he became a sannyasin (mendicant) of the Shankara order.

He possessed a magnificent personality. He was a unique combination of many rare qualities, an embodiment of nationalism, a Hindu knight whose arms held both the sword and the pen; a successful statesman, a charismatic religious leader, and a thinker of profound wisdom.

Though he was the chief minister of Harihara I and Bukka, the first two rulers of Vijayanagara, still he is regarded as the founder of the Vijayanagar kingdom (Karnataka-simhasana-sthanacharya); and under his leadership Vijayanagara witnessed a Golden Era—it rose up to a powerful state which was an invincible impediment to the spread of the ten foreign power (ruling in North India) to South India. As a general he drove away the Turkish invaders from Gomantaka (modern Goa).

Aiming at the orientation of Hinduism which in his time was in doldrums, he became the author of Sarvadarshanasangraha, Parasharamadhava, Kalanirnaya, etc. He was a polymath indeed. Moreover, it is he at the advice of whom King Bukka appointed Sayanacharya for writing commentaries on the Vedas whose essence was obscure at that time, and which was extremely essential for the revival of Hinduism. Even at the advanced age he became the Shankaracharya (pontiff) of the Shringeri Matha, and as a foremost religious leader, he wrote Panchadashi, Vivaranaprimeyasangraha, Jivanmuktiviveka, etc. And it is the field of learning where he excels by leaving a permanent influence on Indic psyche, specially through Panchadashi, Sarvadarshanasangraha, which for their popularity secure him a leading place in the cultural history of India.

Some of his works are follows:

- (1) Sarvadarshanasangraha is an authoritative compendium of Indian philosophy embracing the doctrines of fifteen classical schools. It has fairly retained the balance in presenting and interpreting different philosophical schools.
- (2) Panchadashi is a verse compendium, in 15 chapters of Advaita presenting the viewpoints of the Vivarana school. For lucidity, in the traditional teaching of Advaita it has successfully retained its popularity till today.
- (3) Vivaranaprimeyasangraha is an interpretation of Prakashtman's Panchapadikavivarana, in which the author has elaborated the latter's arguments in more effective manner, furnishing more scholastic flavour. Herein the fundamental doctrines of the Vivarana school of Advaita, propounded by Prakashtman against the Bhamati school of Vachaspati Mishra, have been described with great care.
- (4) Brihadaranyakavarttikasara is a summary of Sureshvara's Brihadaranya-bhashyavarttika, an exegesis of Shankaracharya's commentary on the Brihadaranyakopanishad.
- (5) Jivanmuktiviveka is a treatise on the doctrines of salvation in the living state of a human being (jivanmukti). It presents ethical and psychological viewpoints of Advaita.
- (6) Shankaradigvijaya is a verse hagiography of Shankaracharya, the celebrated exponent of Advaita. Apart from its poetic merits it presents an account of the life and mission of Shankaracharya for which it occupies an esteemed rank in the tradition.

Vedic commentaries: From traditional sources it is learnt that Madhavacharya himself wrote commentaries of the Vedas. Of them following two are extant: (1) commentary on the Samaveda (edited by K. Kunhan Raja and published by the Adyar Library, Madras, in 1941). (2) Commentary on the Taittiriya samhita (edited by Roer and published in 1884-1889).

FURTHER WORKS: Following works are also attributed to Madhavacharya. Ekakshararatnamala (a monosyllabic dictionary).

Sangitasara (a digest on Karnatic music), Anubhutiprakasha (a treatise on Advaita), Aparokshanubhutiika, Aitareyopanishaddipika (a summary of the Aitareyopanishad) Taittiriyaopanishaddipika; (a summary of the Taittiriyaopanishad) Chhandogyopanishaddipika (a summary of the Chhandogyopanishad) Sutasamhitatika (a commentary on the Sutasamhita portion of the Skandapurana)

MADHAVADEVA (Assamese; b.1489, d.1596) occupies, in the hierarchy of the Vaishnava saints and poets of Assam, a position next only to Shankaradeva. He was the most prominent of Shankaradeva's disciples and became the head of the Vaishnava community after his death. He was born in a Kayastha family towards the beginning of the last decade of the 16th century. His father's name was Govindagiri and his mother, Manorama, was distantly related to Shankaradeva. Govindagiri died when Madhava had not yet attained manhood. In spite of poverty and hardship during the early years of his life, he managed to acquire a thorough knowledge of Sanskrit. He was a sincere devotee of goddess Durga at this stage of his life. But a meeting with Shankaradeva in a religious dispute radically transformed his religious outlook and belief. He became a disciple of Shandaradeva and a devout Vaishnava. Henceforth he identified himself completely with the mission of propagating the 'Ekta-Sarana Dharma' preached by his guru. He observed perpetual celibacy and served his guru with such zeal and earnestness that within a short time, he became the most trusted and faithful follower of Shankaradeva. His scholarship, organizational ability and unflinching faith immensely impressed his guru who nominated him as his successor to lead the newly founded Assamese Vaishnavite community. He guided the destiny of the new religious community for twenty-eight years after the death of Shankaradeva. He passed away at Bhela-duar, Cooch Behar, in 1596.

Madhavadeva, like Shankaradeva, was not merely a religious reformer; he was also an accomplished poet and musician. His literary works may be classified into four categories, viz., akhyana kavya, devotional compilations, plays and lyrics. Balakanda (Ramayana) and Rajasuya-kavya fall in the first category. Bhaktiratnavali, Nama-malika, Janma-rahasya and Nama-ghosha belong to the second category. Madhavadeva's name occurs in as many as nine devotional plays, but the Vaishnavite tradition and scholars acknowledge only five extant plays as his genuine works. They are Arjuna-bhanjana, Chordhara, Pimparguchuwa, Bhojana-vihar and Bhumi-letowa. Biographies of the medieval period mention two more plays which he enacted during his life time but they are not available now.

His plays known as Jhumura, based on the childish pranks and cleverness of child Krishna lack well-developed plots or stories: they depict some funny situations. The plays are marked by lightness of touch and gay humour. Madhavadeva's Balakanda is not an exact verbatim translation of Valmiki's work; it is a metrical summary of the first Canto of the epic. The translation identifies Rama with Vishnu and therefore endows him with all the adorable qualities of a loving deity. His Rajasuya-kavya, which is based on the episode of the Rajasuya sacrifice of Yudhisthira described in the Sabhaparvan of the Mahabharata testifies to the narrative genius of Madhavadeva. The bare outline of the epic has been stuffed, varnished and ornamented by the poet to make it an enjoyable kavya.

Among the devotional works, Bhakti-ratnavali and Nama-malika are metrical translations of devotional compilations by Vishnupuri and Purusottama Gajapati of Orissa respectively. There was little scope in these works for showing the originality or the poetic creativity of the translator. Madhava's magnum opus is no doubt Nama-ghosa, an intensely devotional work of one thousand verses (psalms) partly translated and partly original.

Another important form of his writing may be seen in his lyrics generally known as Bargita (noble songs) which are sublime in theme, intensely devotional in treatment and singularly free from the erotic sentiment characterising the lyrics of Vidyapati and poets of the Gaudiya Vaishnava School of Bengal. While Shankaradeva excelled in expressing the sentiment of 'dasya' in relation to God, Madhava preferred to depict the juvenile sports of Krishna and his filial relation to Nanda and Yashoda. These lyrics may favourably compare with those of Surdas and Tukaram.

MADHAVAN PILLAI, C. (Malayalam; b. 1906, d.1980) became involved in the struggle for existence even while he was a college student. After completing his high school education he had to shift from one college to another and undertake all kinds of jobs before obtaining his B.A. degree. He was a signboard painter, typist, newspaper editor and journalist and gathered varied experiences during those days of struggle. He earned reputation as a novelist even when he was a college student. He was the editor and publisher of a popular humorous magazine entitled Vijayabhanu and was considered a gifted humorist. His novels like Desasevini, Jnanambika yachakamohini became best-sellers; and Janambika became the second film in Malayalam. Besides novels he wrote plays which were enacted by professional drama troupes in Kerala. Madhavan Pillai's greatest contribution is the English-Malayalam dictionary for which he worked hard for several years. Being proficient both in English and in Malayalam he undertook the heavy task of compiling a bi-lingual dictionary and completed it in 1966. To date it is the biggest English-Malayalam dictionary and has gone into several editions. Ten years later he compiled a Malayalam English Dictionary, a counter part of the other. These two works will remain a standing monument to his memory even if his novels and plays do not stand the test of time.

N.R.S.K.

MADHAVANAL KAMKANDALA (Rajasthani), is a love story written in amorous verses by Ganapati Kayastha, resident of Amod village in Gujarat, in 1527, depicting the ideal romance of a couple of middle class society. Composed in the matchless epic style, its language is Old Rajasthani or Maru-Gurjar mixed with Apabhramsha. Its 2565 couplets are grouped in eight parts: Kam-Janma, Kamkandala Janma, Rudra Mahadevi prasang, Pita milan prasang, Madhava Kamkandala prem prasang, Kamkandala virah prasang, Madhava Kamkandala milan prasang, Madhava kamkandala vilas. The work is interwoven with a charming portrayal of 'viraha' (separation) and 'milan' (communion) of the lovers and candid thoughts, riddles, preachings, social customs, wishful prayers to deities, and glimpses of the contemporaneous costumes, household articles court and urban lives, etc. The story finds an important place in fiction of Indian classical languages and may be summed up as follows:

After his release from the bondage of Yakshi and brought up by the Purohit Raja of Gardindechandra of Pusperhi Madhavanal grew up to be a youth of irresistible charms, and a renowned scholar. He journeyed through many lands and was welcomed by charming women all along and this resulted in furious kings queens ordering his expulsions. Finally he arrived at Kamavatipuri and was welcomed by the king for his excellence in music. One day, as he watched a dancing girl Kamkandala's performance and was deeply impressed by the endurance exhibited by her when he saw a black bee rested on her Kanchuki (brassiers) and stung her breast. In token he gave her the betel-leaf which was given to him by the king as a mark of honour. It offended the king, who ordered his immediate expulsion from his country. After spending one night with Kamkandala, he went to Ujjain and inscribed the story of his distressed love on the walls of Mahakal temple. King Vikramaditya traced him and listened to his tale of woes.

To test her love, Vikramaditya proposed marriage to Kamkandala with himself. On her refusal, he told her that Madhavanal had died. She immediately fainted and died. Vikramaditya conveyed the news to Madhavanlal and he too died of the shock. As a penance for bringing down tragedy on the true lovers, he also tried to commit suicide, but was prevented from doing so by Vir Vaital, who brought Madhavanal and Kamkandala back to life. Vikram had them married and the couple lived happily thereafter.

MADHAVARAMA SARMA, JAMMALAMADAKA (Telugu; b. 1907) is one of the outstanding personalities in the field of Telugu literature. He is a scholar, orator, critic, writer, and an authority 'alankara shastra'. He was born in Kodi Tadiparru of Guntur District in Andhra Pradesh. His father Subrahmanya Sastry was an orthodox Brahmin teaching Sanskrit to the students in the traditional way. Madhava Rama Sarma developed interest in 'tarka shastra' and alankara shastra due to his father's influence. At the age of fifteen he learned tarka shastra from Kuruganti Sri Rama Sastry of Vemur, near Tenali and got acquainted with the great scholar Kuraganti Pitichaiiah Sastry. Then he went to Banaras the seat of Sanskrit scholars to learn shastras and kavyas. He was there for about 6 years, and he was brought to Vizianagaram by his friend Seetharamasastry to learn alankara shastra from Tata Subba Raya Sastri, a renowned scholar of those days. Sarma was there for about five years and learnt tarka, vyakarana, Vedanta and the dharmasastras. This foundation made Sarma one of the greatest scholars in Indian aesthetics.

From Vizianagaram he came to Tenali and served as a Lecturer in several colleges. At the age of 70, he retired.

Sarma is an outstanding orator both in Sanskrit and Telugu. He has participated nearly in four thousand meetings and has given lectures on Hindu tradition and culture, philosophy, alamkarashastra, etc. He also founded the Bhuvanavijaya Sabha, the literary forum reminiscent of the days of Sri Krishna Devaraya of the 16th century. Sarma's performance as Timmarusu excels, and it creates a literary and scholarly atmosphere throughout the meeting. He is the man who popularised this type of literary activity in Andhra State through which literature reaches the common man. As Timmarusu he has given nearly one hundred performances.

Madhava Rama Sarma has given the running commentary for the Sita Rama kalyanam at Bhadrachalam on Sri Rama Navami. Sarma is also a follower of the Vedanta.

Sarma is the author of 30 published books out of which 22 are translations from Sanskrit. Many of these are on alamkarashastra. Those books were published by Andhra Pradesh Sangeeta Nataka Academy. Some of these are Natya shastra of Bharata, Rasagangadhara of Jagannatha Pandita Rayalu, Kavya prakasha of Mammata, Auchitya vichara charcha, Sringara prakasha, Vakrokti jivita, Mahimadarpana, and other great works on alankarashastra Sarma is ardent devotee of Sri Satyasaibaba of Puttaparthi and has written a book on him called Satyasai puranam which has thirty thousand shlokas. He has written another book called Satyasai darshanam. He has given nearly 100 radio talks, and written, hundred essays on various topics and also 100 prefaces to the books of different authors.

Sarma was felicitated by A.P. Sangeeta Nataka Akademi, Sahitya Akademi and other reputed organisations in the country. He was honoured with many titles like Mahamahopadhaya, Darshana Acharya and Abhinava Bharati.

Nagarjuna University honoured him with the honorary degree of Doctor of Literature (D. Litt).

MADHAVIAH (English; Tamil; b.1872, d.1925) has the distinction of being considered one of the first three novelists of the Tamil language. Educated at the Miller College (Christian College), Madras, he became an officer in the Excise Department, but his first love was writing. He wrote a series of novels in Tamil and in English. His novel, Thillai Govindan, was published in England with an Introduction by Frederic Harrison M P (Williams and Norgato 1912). He portrays in it a young Indian visiting the prostitute of the town armed with J.S. Mill's On Liberty and Herbert Spencer's First Principles. Equally interested in social reform and women's education and uplift, his novels portray the handicaps of women through not being educated and through being subjugated to men. He pleads, in novel after novel, for higher modern education for women.

His first novel Padmavati charitram was in Tamil when he was 24. It was written in 1896, contemporary with the second novel in Tamil, B.R. Rajam Iyer's Kamalam-bal charitram. Whereas the latter was interested in Vedanta, Madhaviah was interested in social reform. He lectures the readers on the advantages of educating women and liberating them. He was interested in shades of evil and good; he was interested in painting characters, more as he had observed them in actual life. He looked up to William Makepeace Thackeray as his model in novel writing. He advocated English education for men and women, the practice of equality between them. He was charmed by small town life but he was also not averse to city life. His chief characters are men and women growing old, not in the continued tradition, but drifting somewhat away from it, striking their own individual paths. He also advocated the cause of widow remarriage. His widows are pitiable creatures who would have been better if they had been allowed to remarry.

Madhaviah's first novel Padmavati charitram is considered his best though that claim might be questioned. His tale portrays the life of the affluent in rural parts or small town, the affluent riding in two bullock carts with a runner following the cart as bodyguard. The second part of the novel which takes place in Madras portrays the high social life of the heroine, with all the miseries of the lowly and the poor depicted as the background. Narration is realistic, often mixing the real and the imagined. For instance, a fire which destroyed a theatre in Tirunelveli in his days is described in the novel in accurate detail. The characters are credible, though sometimes comically exaggerated in the manner of Thackeray.

The second novel he wrote in Tamil entitled Vi-jayamartandam is a portrait of the life of the Marava clans of Tirunelveli. The claim to marry the aunt's daughter is stressed. Keeping faith in work and deed was one of the tenets of Marava life. Not betraying another to others is another trait which is made much of, but with no poetic license.

The third novel of Madhaviah Muttuminakshi deals with widow remarriage. The heroine is 9 years old, but she suffers at the hand of her stepmother who is only 13. A friend of a brother insists that she educate herself and she does it, defying her father and stepmother. When her husband dies, she is made to wear widow's clothes but her brother's friend comes forward to marry her. They are ostracized by the brahmins and they leave the brahmin street.

Among his English novels mention may be made of Tillai Govindam which seeks to describe the changes that English education brings to the Indian youth. Clorinda, a historical novel, describes how a highborn kshatria lady born in a princely family in Thanjavur is illtreated by her relatives, how she is widowed, how she is converted to Christianity and wins her freedom, marrying an English soldier. She is a fully realised historical character, such a lay having really existed in the 18th century who later in her life, moved to Tirunelveli, endowed churches and made charities. Lieutenant Panju, and other English novels have not been so popular as these.

Madhaviah was a writer with a missionary zeal. He would stop the narration halfway and descant on the evils of a superstitious faith in astrology or on the low state of the under-privileged among us or on the necessity for English education, both for men and women. He was against indigenous systems of medicine, fully advocating the use of the apothecary and the western medical knowledge which had just come into India. He introduces William Miller, the Madras educationist in his novels, making him advise his characters as he well might have advised his students in his college. Conversion, especially to Christianity, was one of the obsessions with Madhaviah; many of his novels treat of the subject and quite a few of his characters speak both for and against it. It will be difficult to conclude whether the author himself was for conversion or not. But he wanted to make his readers fully aware of the new liberties in store for the liberal among them.

MADHAVIKKUTTY-MADHUKAR, KEHARI SINGH

Madhaviah was also a poet. In fact in a poetry competition he won the first prize when a poem submitted by Subramania Bharati was found not fit for the prize but only a mention as meritorious. Bharati has however survived as a poet, but not Madhaviah; his poetry was meticulously traditional.

Madhaviah, after retirement from the Excise Department, edited a magazine Panchamirtham in the midtwenties for a couple of years. He wrote stories in them, some of which are collected in three volumes entitled Kusikar kutti kathaigal (short stories of Kusikar). The stories are devoted to social reform and often carry a punch that is telling and effective. A girl is on her death bed; an old woman offers prayers, a second person administers water over which mantras have been uttered, and the father sends for the English apothecary who gives her noxious drafts. The girl, surprisingly, recovers; and all three claim that their remedy only saved her. Quite an amusing story. There is another in which a girl growing weary of her parents being put to trouble in finding a husband for her and the dowry to pay commits suicide. In almost all stories of Kusika, he introduces an astrologer who has a widowed daughter. There is another story in which a man dreams that the women of the place have formed themselves into an association to liberate men, to offset the men who are engaged in liberating women. Truly, Madhaviah's stories deserve an audience even today.

The first novel in Tamil Vedanayakam Pillai's Pratapamudaliar charitram derived from the English comic tradition of the 18th century as well as from Don Quixote; whereas Madhaviah derived his comic English manner from William Makepeace Thackeray of the 19th century. Of the pioneer novelists that could be mentioned, Madhaviah was the one who wrote a considerable second novel in Tamil, in addition to his first one. He was interested in educational reform and was associated with the Madras University for a number of years. In fact, he died of heart failure when he was addressing a Syndicate meeting of the University.

MADHAVIKKUTTY (Malayalam; b. 1934) is the pen name of Kamala Das, who was born at Punnayoorkulam as the daughter of V.M. Nair and Nalappattu Balamani Amma, the well known poetess and short story writer.

The short stories of Madhavikkutty have been published under the titles Matilukal (The walls, 1955), Pattu kathakal (Ten stories, 1958), Tarishunilam (The waste land, 1962), Ente snehita Aruna (My friend Aruna, 1963) Pakshiyude manam (The smell of the bird, 1964), Chuvannapavata (The red skirt, 1964) Thanuppu (Coldness, 1967), Rajavinte premabhajanam (The king's lover, 1969) and Premattinte vilapakavyam (An elegy on love, 1971).

Madhavikkutty's favourite theme is the mind caught up in a distressing circumstance. She can delineate even the subtlest shades of feeling in the human heart. In Matilukal she presents a bank manager. He expresses his wish to resign and return to his native place. It is not because he is fed up with his official life, but because he has differences of opinion with his son, Manohar, who is a sales manager and also with Ramachandran, the assistant manager of the bank. So his move for voluntary retirement is aimed at escaping from his son and the assistant manager.

Some of Madhavikkutty's stories have a poetic touch. They reveal mental realities pertaining to the twilight dreamworld between one's consciousness and unconsciousness. She depicts the human mind by a few touches here and there rather than elaborately describe events. Except Doctorude maranam (The death of the doctor) all the stories in the collection Pattu kathakal are about the feminine mind. In 'Ratriyil' (In the night) Sumati, an immoral woman, gets self-purification as a result of her deep anxiety over the severe illness of her son. On the contrary in 'Ammu', Jayan, an immoral man, confesses his past misdeeds before the solemnity and innocence of Ammu and decides to lead a calm and peaceful life with her.

Madhavikkutty has made the short story a powerful medium to explain the inner truths. She looks into the deeper realities from personal experience. The story 'Driksakshi' (Eye-witness) illustrates the fear, anguish and anxiety of a child who is threatened to be killed because he happens to be a witness of the murder of a poor man by a group of persons engaged in making and selling illicit liquor in Bombay. 'Kuttiyum achchanum' (The child and his father), 'Manushyan pavanamu' (Man is innocent) 'Malancherivukalil' (In the valleys), etc. are stories that end in exciting situations.

Madhavikkutty is also one of India's leading poets writing in the English language. As a poetess she uses the name Kamala Das. Her autobiography Ente katha (My story, 1976) has won wide acclaim. She has won the Asian poetry Award sponsored by P.E.N., Manila (1963), Kerala Sahitya Akademi award for stories (1967), Chimanlal award for fearless journalism (1971) and the Asian world Prize for Literature as well as the Sahitya Akademi Award (1985).

MADHUKAR, KEHARI SINGH (Dogri; b. 1929) is a Dogri poet. Born in a family of soldiers and landowning farmers, Madhukar has not had a regular job except for a period during which he worked as an editor of Shiraza, a

MADHUSHALA-MADHUSUDANA SARASVATI

Dogri literary journal of the Jammu and Kashmir Academy of Art, Culture and Languages. In that capacity he also edited some selections of Dogri literature and collections of Dogri folklore. He started his literary activity with Urdu poems while still at school. He was inspired and encouraged to write in Dogri by the elder poets like Ramnath Shastri, Vedpal 'Deep' and Yash Sharma, and he began reading his Dogri poems in the rural programme of All India Radio, Jammu. His very first collection of Dogri poems called Namiyan munjaran put him among the most promising poets of Dogri and he came to be in great demand at the poets' gatherings. Poetry came to him naturally, and according to him, poetry is something to be spoken and not written; and if it is to be written, it should be articulated first and then written. Music and rhythm are special characteristics of his poems, and it has been his view that this creation and the life itself are a matter of rhythm and beat. He later translated 101 poems of Rabindranath Tagore. His own work thereafter was greatly influenced by Tagore; this is reflected in his second book of poems Dola kun thappea which is a collection of 38 poems. His third work, a collection of 28 poems, brought together under the title Menh mele ra janun, won him the Sahitya Akademi award for 1977. He has also written a musical drama, Lehran, based on the popular love legend of Kunju and Chainchalo. Being a landowning farmer himself, and, therefore, close to the earth and nature, he is sensitive to nature and its moods, and the problems of the tillers of the soil. He has not hesitated to attack the feudal systems and the stranglehold of tradition, and raised his voice against exploitation, hunger, poverty and injustice. His poetry covers a broad canvas of socio-political scene, romantic love, different moods of nature caught in memorable imagery, mystic brooding, march of history and humanity and touching vignettes of Dogra life and the Dogra female, fairs and festivals, tender girls at play, predicament of the bride and of a widow. Humanism, optimism, music and rich imagery mark most of his work. He is presently engaged in writing an epic celebrating the event of 1940-1980—a period of momentous changes not only in Dogra society, but in the entire world.

MADHUSHALA (Hindi), literally 'House of Mead', is a rhapsody on wine and joy of living. It is one of the earliest poems by Harivansh Rai 'Bachchan', written under the spell of Omar Khayyam's Rubaiyat, and forms, as it were, a trilogy with Madhubala (1936) and Madhukalash (1937). Being the earliest, it is the freshest and perhaps the least contrived of the three poems. It consists, in its finished form, of 135 quatrains, employing a series of images and metaphors, particularly those of wine and tavern, in the manner of Persian poetry. The poem moves through a succession of moods, each wrought with a certain delicacy of feeling, striking now a note of rich sensuality and now that of intense longing. The erotic clangour of its rolling quatrains was something unique in Hindi poetry, and it established Bachchan as one of the most popular poets of the age. The poem was a craze at 'Kavi Sammelan'.

The drink Madhushala offers is drawn from the vintage of the poet's inmost feelings. The beauty of the beloved is ruby wine and her face the cup of gold. The drink is primeval, churned out of the depths of the sea by the joint strength of gods and demons. The daughter of Rambha, the celestial dancer, is the cup-bearer; the ocean the jar; the earth the cup; the sun the eternal vendor. The cosmic tavern is filled with rapture, and one's own drunkenness is the measure, and the validity, of the power of the cup.

Though Omar Khayyam is the dominant influence on Madhushala, Bachchan writes, in the main, impelled by his own inspiration. He had already translated Khayyam, and was now trying to seek his own self-expression. There is, however, an essential difference in the outlooks of the two poets. The eleventh-century Persian poet muses pessimistically on the transience of life and the vanity of worldly glories, asking the beloved to fill the cup and be merry while they can. In Bachchan also we have a pronounced streak of Epicureanism and even a note of melancholic fatalism, but his central concern is the joy of living. His desires do not grow pale at the thought of death; the wine he, a teetotaler, asks for is the elan vital of life. Bachchan himself remarked that when he wrote Madhushala he tried to seek a catharsis of his hopes and despair, his struggles and failure, and for a time it seemed to him that he achieved it in the elixir of the poem.

The poet of Madhushala is no conscious artist. There is no straining after effect in the poem. No other work, he said, gave him greater joy of expression than this, none greater self-fulfilment. Over the decades Bachchan moved away far from the sensuous longings of Madhushala, but for a vast number of his readers the magic of this poem is as fresh as ever and for them the poet lives by its mead alone.

MADHUSUDANA SARASVATI (Sanskrit; b. 1565 d. 1665). His life is symbolic of the Brahminic ideal in the sense that it was totally dedicated to the quest of intellectual and spiritual growth. Madhusudan was the third son of Purandaracharya, whose ancestors had settled in Kotalipara, in the district of Faridpur, now in Bangladesh, by the end of the 12th century. Prior to joining the monastic order Madhusudana's name was Kamalajanayana. He studied Nyaya in Naladwip and became an accomplished scholar.

It was customary for the local ruler to endow such a person with a land grant. But in spite of his awareness of the outstanding accomplishment of Kamalajanayana the local ruler did not offer him any such reward. As a protest against this injustice, Kamalajanayana sought to become a renunciant, and after obtaining his father's permission entered a monastic order, founded by Shankaracharya.

During his life time Madhusudana Sarasvati became a great intellectual exponent of the Advaita School of Vedanta. His outstanding scholarship and personality led the Mughal Emperor Akbar to bestow special honour on him.

Madhusudana's principal work the Advaitasiddhi, upholds the doctrine of monistic idealism and repudiates the theory of dualistic monism as expounded by Vyasatirtha in his treatise entitled the Nyayamrita. Even though Madhusudana employs the technique of Navyanyaya, to rebut the contention of the Nyayamrita, his writing is characterized by a brilliant literary style. The following are same of the commentaries available on the Advaitasiddhi: 1. Laghuchandrika and Guruchandrika by Gaudabrahmananda, 2. Sharachchandrika by Sadasuta, 3. Advaitachandrika by Balabhata, 4. Advaitasiddhisadhaka by Purushottama, et. al.

The next important work of Madhusudana is the Gudharthadipika, an elaborate commentary on the Bhagavadgita. Madhusudana Sarasvati was a prolific writer. Among his many works, mention must be made of the Advaitarakshang, Siddhantabindu and Bhagavadbhaktirasayana. One of the foremost exponents of the Advaita school as he was, he introduced some elements of devotion (bhakti) to his works on philosophy. He devoted at least two works to the exposition of the doctrine of Bhakti. His language and style are characterised by a refined literary flavour. Most probably he did some creative writings also. The Krishnakutuhalanataka, a Sanskrit drama is ascribed to his name.

MADHVA (Sanskrit), also known as Purnaprajne or Purnaprajne or Anandatirtha, is the founder exponent of the celebrated Dvaita school of Hindu philosophy, who by means of religious and spiritual teachings has left an enormous impact on the socio-cultural heritage of India, which has provided an impetus to the literary creativity of his contemporary society as well as of his followers. Though himself was mainly a religious leader and spiritual exponent, not a litterateur, he has shown his literary mastery in polemic acumen, power of shastric communication, and in exuberance of devotional fervour of his tiny but significant poems. Nevertheless his contribution as a catalyst for an enormous outburst of literary creativity causing literary and musical revolution especially in Bengal through the Chaitanya school of Vaishnavism and in Karnataka through the Haridasas makes his name immemorable in the history of Indian literature.

Pakaja village, 8 miles south east of the town of Udupi, South Karnataka, was his birthplace. His purvashrama (household) name is Vasudeva, family name was Naddantillaya. Totantiltaya was his upanayana guru (teacher), and Achyutaprajna (while New catalogus catalogorum, V. I, p. 104, identifies him as Achyutaprekshacharya) was dikshaguru (spiritual teacher). He was son of Madhyageha Bhatta who lived in the city of Rajatapitha.

About his date there is dispute. From the internal evidence of his Mahabharata-tatoryanirnaya his date of birth may be ascertained as 1199. While in the geneochronological tables of the Uttaradi and other ancient Mathas he is dated as of 1040-1120 Shaka era. Again, on the basis of the Shrikumaram Inscription of Narachari Tirtha his span of life may be ascertained as 1238-1316.

However, under the name of Purnaprajna he became a sannyasin, and assuming the name of Anandatirtha which because of spiritual reasons later on was substituted by the name of Madhva, he became the pontiff of the Achyutapreksha Matha.

His collected works, generally known as Sarvamulagrantha may be categorised as below:

Commentaries: 19

Two commentaries on the Gita.: Four commentaries on the Brahmasutra.; Ten commentaries on the Upanishada.: Commentary on the Mahabharata.; Commentary of the Bhagavatapurana.; Prakaranas or treatises: 10; Liturgical works: 4.

Stotras:4;

The Mahabharatatatparyanirnaya (in 6000 grantha) is a verse epitome in 32 chapters; presents historical, allegorical and metaphysical interpretation of the great epic, e.g. (i) historical (Astikadip: the main theme; (ii) allegorical (Manvadi): was between the Kurus and the Pandavas is bit conflict between the good and evil forces; (iii) metaphysical (Uparicharadi): spiritual doctrines, nature of the Supreme Being, etc. This is the earliest datable commentary on the Mahabharata.

His Bhagavatatatparyanirnaya (in 3600 granthas) is a commentary on the 1600 verses (out of more than 18,000 verses) of the Bhagavatapurana, Hindu mythological text.

The Yamakabharata (in 81 verses) is a devotional poem describing the exploits of Krishna to salvage the Pandavas; it demonstrates the use of yamaka, a Sanskrit figure of speech, in various metres.

The Dvadashastotra (in 126 verses) is a lyrical hymn, in chapters to the image of Krishna enshrined at the Udupi Matha, Karnataka.

The Krishnamritamaharnava (in 242 verses) is an anthology of verses in praise of Vishnu, Hindu deity; verses attributed to Shiva, Narada, Pulastya, Dharma, Brahma, Markandeya, Marice, Atri, etc are, included.

His style of writing in general is very terse. Though it is simple, without any ornament and flourish, and the expression is direct, still his works are difficult to understand without the help of a commentary. However in composing poems he has shown mastery over diction alongwith the spirit of stately dignity, loftiness of ideas and serenity of expression. Above all he has introduced a unique style of writing commentary: to comment on the required words or passages, with elaborate citations, with necessary interpretations, from various authoritative sources. It is his quotations alone wherefrom we get information about many works which are no more extant.

His introduction of the doctrine of devotion on the basis of the Bhagavatapurana, the fountainhead of Vaishnavite fundamentals, has a remarkable contribution to the development of Indic medieval literature in Sanskrit as well as in vernaculars: an abundant treasure of Vaishnavite literature presenting the cults of Krishna and Rama was created as a result of the influence of his theory of devotion.

MADHWAMUNI (Marathi; b. 17th century), also called Madhwamunishwara and Madhwanatha, was an eminent saint-poet of early 18th century. Like many other writers of the middle ages, Madhwamuni's birth date and other particulars about his early life are not available. But we can safely say that he was born in the last decades of 17th century at Nasik, and was named Tryambaku. This was paradoxical and was resented by his Vaishnavite relatives and friends. So they brought in Madhwacharya, the then occupant of that famous 'Matha', to test his religious integrity. The Acharya was fully convinced of his identity with Advaita Vedanta and named him Madhwamunishwara. The little boy grew into a devotee of Krishna. He became a gifted Kirtana-kara or Haridasa, had many talented young people for his disciples, among whom Amritaraya was the most gifted one. Madhwamuni died ripe in age, while attending one of the Kirtanas of Amritaraya.

Madhwamuni was eventually recognized as a major Vaishnavite poet, who could write sweet enchanting lyrics about Krishna and Radha. He was probably influenced by the lyrical outbursts of the great saint-poet Eknatha. His short lyrics reach the height of his poetic excellence in his restrained portrait of Radha and her pining love for Lord Krishna. Madhwamuni is one poet who could manifest with proper restraint the true spirit of 'Madhura' type of Vaishnava 'Bhakti'. Scores of his lyrical compositions could be cited as illustrations of this achievement. Significantly enough these songs have become part and parcel of the repertory of the Bhajana-singing groups of Maharashtra One of his longer poems, in which Krishna exhorts Uddhava to go to the pining Gopis of Braja to pacify them, had become a part of the 'stree-geete' or the middle class female folklore songs. As an authority of the Vaishnava cult, he has very strongly criticized the unseemly ways of Haridasas and other Vaishnava people. Himself a master of the musical and the lyrical creation, he strongly resented the Kiratana-style of the contemporary Haridasas, as these Kirtanas often turned into veritable musical concerts, instead of being the expression of deep devotion to the Lord. In this connection he has referred to clever types of some literary compositions and the singing of Ragas in the Khyal and Tappa styles. According to him the musical tunes must not supercede the devotional fervour of the occasion. A narrative poem, called 'Cholaraja Katha' or 'Dhaneshwara Charitra' is also credited to him. It is found in two versions—one in the Abhanga form and the other in the 'Grantha Ovi' style of narration. Poet Madhwamuni is mainly remembered for his lyrical fervour, abundantly witnessed in his songs and lyrics.

MADIA, CHUNILAL KALIDAS (Gujarati; b. 1922, d.1968), was a Gujarati writer, journalist and critic. After matriculation he joined the H.L. College of Commerce in Ahmedabad in 1939, and later got his degree in Commerce from Sydneham College, Bombay, in 1945. During his college years, he read widely in literature. This, together with his genial and frank temperament earned him the friendship of Vadilal Dagli, Umashankar Joshi and Niranjan Bhagat, among others. Madia had a vein for satiric banter, and this helped him earn a few lasting enmities as well.

Having worked for a few years on the editorial staff of Janmabhumi, a leading Gujarati daily published from Bombay, Madia joined the Gujarati section of the United States Information Service in 1950 and worked there for the next twelve years. In 1963, he started a literary monthly Ruchi. He travelled widely in America and on the Continent, and attended the thirty-fifth International Conference of the P.E.N. held at Abidjan, Africa, in 1967. His death in 1968, cut short a career which held rich promise.

Madia made his debut on the Gujarati literary scene as a short story writer. His first collection Ghooghavatan pur (The roaring floods, 1945) made an impact which justified the title. Madia lent, through his ten collections, a new vigour and vitality to Gujarati short story. With the rare acumen for realistic narration he succeeded with situations against both rural as well as urban setting.

Madia wrote twelve novels, most of which were first serialized in popular dailies. Vyajano varas (1946) is a much discussed social novel. Kumkum ane ashka (1962) is a political satire. He has also a collection of short essays, and a few poems, including one sonnet, on death, to his credit. Media enriched Gujarati drama by contributing numerous one-act plays and three full-length plays. In the plays, his sense of comedy finds a memorable expression. Humour, after all, was Madia's forte.

MADKHOLKAR, GAJANAN TRYAMBAK-MAFFEI FR. A.F. SAVERIO

As a critic, Madia was known for his forthright rejection of academic criticism.

A man of large sympathies, and at the same time, one who was well-informed and aware of and sensitive to newer trends, Madia earned a good deal of recognition during his life-time. He was awarded the 'Narmad Suvarnachandrak' in 1951, and the 'Ranjitram Suvarnachandrak' in 1957.

MADKHOLKAR, GAJANAN TRYAMBAK (Marathi; b. 1899; d. 1976) was a renowned Marathi critic, novelist and journalist. His literary career began almost in his teens. He attained stature later on as a versatile writer of distinction. He decided on making a career in literature and for some time he worked as an assistant to N.C. Kelkar a renowned figure in literature, the then editor of Kesari. In his early twenties he had already written and published Adhunik Kavipanchaka (1912), a critical study of five major modern Marathi poets, and it helped establish his reputation as a promising young, literary critic.

He was also a member of the then well-known poet's group 'Ravikiran Mandal' and he had contributed many poems to this Mandal's earlier publications. At the same time he had joined the editorial staff of a popular Marathi daily Jnyanprakash and started editing its Sunday literary page, which carried his column of book-reviews. These book reviews earned him fame as a literary critic. At the same time, perhaps unknowingly, he had on his lifelong career as a journalist.

After a short spell in Pune, he moved to Nagpur (1924) and joined the editorial staff of a local popular weekly Maharashtra. His column of book-reviews Maharashtra attracted wide attention, and his reputation as a literary critic was firmly established. In 1944 he became the editor of the new daily Tarun Bharat. Nagpur was then the capital of Madhya Pradesh, and long association with these two prominent journals was responsible for his singular influence in political circles.

Madkholkar's career as a journalist coincided with his career as a novelist and critic. His very first novel Muktatma (1933) portrayed the life-styles of prominent Bombay personalities, and the readers were intrigued by these sketches of well-known figures from different walks of life. This kind of fiction was bound to be controversial. Muktatma was written in the distinctive style of a Sanskrit

Pandit, but at the same time it had striking resemblance to Sanskrit poetry. Then followed Bhanglele Deoul (Disintegrated temple, 1934), a novel which advocated the cause of divorce for incompatible couples. The main characters in this remarkable novel were literary picked up from real life. The typical Madkholkar novel thenceforth followed the same lively pattern, except that some of his novels like Kanta and Mukhavate dealt with the then current political events and people involved therein. Only one of the his novels Chandanwadi paints a picture of pastoral countryside, and the last of his novels Renuka deals with the mythological story of Parashurama.

In the meantime Madkholkar did not neglect criticism, and his critical essay dealing with his literary mentors Kelkar and Kolhatkar along with Chiplunkar deserves respectful mention. His Vilapika (1927) offers a very meticulous study of the elegy form. His Don Tapa (1946) and Nirvastachi Kahani (1949) are autobiographical in content. In due recognition of such literary achievements he was elected to preside over the Marathi Sahitya Sammelana held in Belgaum in 1946 and in his presidential address he made the very first appeal for Sanyukta Maharashtra.

MAFFEI, FR. AGNELD F. SAVERIO (Konkani; b. 1844, d. 1899) was a grammarian and lexicographer. He took a Doctorate from the Gregorian University, and was a member of the first Italian missionary batch that landed at Mangalore. Professor and Principal at St. Aloysius College, and Fellow of Madras University, Maffei had a special aptitude for learning languages. He is known to have learnt Konkani, Kannada, Malayalam, Tamil, Marathi and Sanskrit. His Konkani Grammar (1882) written mainly for the benefit of foreign missionaries, is a good attempt. The book is modelled on the style and structure of Latin and Greek grammars, containing many exercises concerning morphology and syntax. The translated Proverbs, the first chapters of Genesis and St. Luke are written in an easy and flowing style. Some idiomatic phrases in Konkani are given at the end of the volume. Maffei made a fervent plea for the development of Konkani in Mangalore through his brochure (now lost) Ranantlo Tallo (Cry in the wilderness), brought out after the publication of his Konkani grammar. He also wrote some simple guides to help the beginners study the Konkani language. He compiled the English-Konkani Dictionary (1883) and Konkani-English Dictionary (1885), in Roman and Kannada scripts, chiefly for the Italian missionaries. These are important studies of the Konkani dialect of Mangalore. The method used for Romanisation of the script is simple and easy. These being the earlier efforts at lexicography in Mangalorean style, their practical use was well acknowledged by the British authorities, and the then Governor of Madras, Mount-stuart Elphinstone Grant, thought it proper to give financial assistance to get them printed through the Mangalore Basel Mission in their press. A Fellow of University and an Examiner in History, Maffei collected a lot of material for the history of Kanara to be used later by Fr. More for his History of the Diocese of Mangalore.

MAGDALANAMARIYAM-MAGHA

MAGDALANAMARIYAM (Malayalam) A famous poem by Vallattol Narayana Menon, 'Magdalana Mariyam' or Mary Magdalene' (1921) has been aptly described as a nectar-rivulet of sweet songs. It is based on a Biblical story (Luke-7). A Pharisee invites Jesus to have dinner with him. Jesus goes to his house and sits down to eat. Hearing about the Lord's arrival, an ill-reputed woman living in the town brings an alabaster jar full of perfume and stands by his feet. She kisses the feet, wets them with her tears and pours the perfume over them. Jesus then says that her sins have already been forgiven. The woman becomes a staunch devotee of the Lord.

The story, as narrated by Vallattol, departs from the original in a few minor details. For example, there is no reference in it to the objection raised by the Pharisee to Jesus's acceptance of the prostitute's service.

The poem, written entirely in the metre 'Makanda-manjari' is divided into five sections. The first section deals with the elaborate reception arranged in Simon the Pharisee's house to welcome Jesus. The host does not show any special hospitality but only announces that dinner is ready. In the second section Mary's appearance is compared to a star that has accidentally fallen from the firmament or a flower blossoming on a rock. She is wonderstruck at the sight of the divine guest. The scene, charged with emotion, is further described in the next section. The long-awaited meeting between the woman and the son of God is the content of the fourth section. She repents of her sins and decides to turn a new leaf in accordance with the teachings of the Saviour. She wipes the tears falling on his feet with the charming locks of her hair and kisses them as a mark of total surrender. Overwhelmed by all this, Christ blesses her saying that she could live in peace.

Since the message of the poem is the effectiveness of repentance, the poem has also been called 'Paschattapame prayaschittam' by the poet himself. The spiritual significance of repentance is well brought out in the last four lines of the poem, in the words of Jesus, which run as follows. "My child, please go back without any sorrow. Your firm faith in the Lord has saved you. Your repentance has paved the way for expiation of all your sins in the past".

The poem was composed in response to a request by a renowned Christian priest named Pulickottil Youseph. But it was well received by non-Christians as well. However, another priest deplored certain comparisons involving Hindu gods such as Krishna and Shiva. It has later been pointed out by well-known critics that the divine nature of Christ is better brought out by such comparisons. The poem has been translated into English by Enk De Maury (London, Meridian Books Ltd, 1952).

MAGHA (Sanskrit; b. second half of the 7th century A.D. is the author of the Shishupala vadha. He was the son of Datta or Dattaka. His grandfather Suprabhaddeva was the minister of King Varmata, whose capital was the city of Srimala (Bhumamala) in Gujarat. King Varmata is mentioned in an epigraphic record dated 625 A.D. Magha refers to the two grammatical treatises, the Kasikavritti and its commentary, the 'Nyasa'. The Kasikavritti was the joint production of Jayaditya and Vamana. According to Itising Jayaditya died about 661 A.D. The date of Magha is therefore, later than the 7th century A.D. He is quoted by Vamana and Anandavardhana; hence he is earlier than the 9th century.

Ballala's Bhojacharita, Merutunga's Prabardha-chintamani and Prabachandra's Prabhavak charita, made him a protegee of King Bhoja of Dhara. It is said that pressed by want the poet sent his wife to that King's court with a verse (Shishupalavadha, XI 64), describing the rising Sun, but indirectly deploring the sports of chance. Delighted with its literary merit, the king gave her a present of some money. Or her way back the generous woman distributed it among the beggars, whose needs she thought were greater than her own. She returned home just as she left it, with a throng of beggars behind her. The poet saw the scene and became desperate. He cursed poverty in a few verses and dropped down dead on the spot. The king heard the story and with great grief himself performed the poet's funeral ceremonies. To preserve his memory he named the village Bhinnamala. It is on the boundary line between Gujarat and Rajasthan.

The only work of Magha that has come down to us is the Shishupalavadha the famous epic of twenty cantos. Bhimasena in his commentary Sudhasagara on the Kavyaprakasha says that Magha was a Vaishya and he purchased the authorship of the book from some poet who sold it for the sake of money. Shishupalavadha relates the episode in the Mahabharata of Krishna slaying Shishupala. The poet was a great grammarian and his knowledge of grammar and lexicon is often apparent in his poem. It is a saying that 'Not a single new (nava) word remains after reading nine nava cantos of Magha'.

MAHABANDHA (Prakrit), is the sixth khanda (section) of the great Siddhanta work Shatkhandaagama of Acharya Bhutabali. It is also known as Mahadhavala. The subject matter of this work is of a highly technical nature which could be interesting only to those who are adepts in Jain philosophy and who desire to probe into the Karma theory. The entire work is published in seven volumes. The Shatkhandaagama was reduced to writing just at the time when the whole Jain canon was on the point of being forgotten. In this connection it may be noted that according to the Digambara tradition all the twelve Angas have been lost except these portions of the last of them, i.e. Ditthivaya and a bit of the fifth Anga. According to the Shvetambaras, on the other hand, the first eleven are preserved though in a mutilated form, while the Ditthivaya is totally lost. The last and the 12th Angas of the Jain canon is available in the form of Shatkhandaagama only. The age of the Shatkhandaagama is 663 years after the Nirvana of Tirthankara Mahavira, i.e., 73-106 A.D.

The Mahabandha is the composite work on the special features of 'Karma' philosophy, and it was composed in forty thousand 'sutra' in Prakrit prose. The Prakrit of the sutras is Shauraseni influenced by the older Ardha Magadhi on the one hand and the Maharashtri on the other. This has also been called Jain Shaurasani by Pischel and subsequent writers. There is no doubt that the language of the work definitely belongs to the first century of the Christian era.

MAHABHARATA (Sanskrit), the greatest epic of India ascribed to Vyasa, has a unique place in world literature. Not only in its scope and appeal, but even in the matter of its sheer size, the Mahabharata occupies the foremost position among the epics of the world. In its accepted form, it has about 100000 verses, by far the longest poem ever written. It is larger and richer than the mythologies of Greece and Rome, being 8 times longer than the Illiad and the Odessey put together.

Many terms have been used to define this unique literary phenomenon, such as myth (purana) legend (itihasa), poem (kavya). It is neither history in the modern sense of the term, nor chronicle. But the Mahabharata stands in incomparable isolation, defying all definitions—it is all these and much more. It is a veritable encyclopacdia comprising heterogeneous material from all branches of knowledge. Taking the core-story of the feud between two branches of a royal family and the circumstances leading to a catastrophic war, several branches of knowledge including philosophy, law, ethics, statecraft, warfare, history, ethnology are embodied in its structure. Tradition claims that what is found in it may be found scattered in other books too, but what is not found in it will not be seen anywhere else. The saying 'Vyasochchhishtam jagat sarvam' (Everything in the world has been the left-over of Vyasa) also stresses this point.

There has been much discussion regarding the actual placing of the epic in history. Some scholars argue that the Mahabharata is purely mythical, and that the incidents narrated in the epic have no basis in actual history. For example, D.C.Sircar says that there is no mention of the war in Vedic literature. The literature before the 4th century B.C. does not refer to the incident of war. But other scholars have refuted this theory, including Niharangan Ray who sees it as "a historical fact being mythicized, and myth itself becoming part of history". Whether or not the question gets settled the epic is appealing for its humaneness and universality. The Mahabharata is a comment on the human condition with all its richness, complexity and subtlety.

There seems to be no consensus among scholars about the date of composition of the work. The Mahabharata shows evidence of having grown over a considerable span of time, perhaps several centuries. The Mahabharata in its evolved form does not seem to be the work of a single author. In the process of its growth and evolution, several poets seem to have added to the richness and variety of the text. The term 'Vyasa' in this sense perhaps does not refer to a single person, but a succession of compilers of considerable creative and imagination.

The fact that the Mahabharata has undergone several stages in its growth is clear from the several rescensions of the text. The beginning of the epic may be traced to narrative songs depicting the war between the Kauravas and the Pandavas, recited by guilds of court-singers called sutas. The first ever compilation of the epic encompassing this story was made by Krishna Dvaipayana, otherwise known as Veda Vyasa, at the beginning of the Kali age. This nucleus of the epic consisting of 8800 stanzas was called Jaya. Vyasa seems to have taught this original version of the poem to his son Shuka and Vaishampayana. Sage Vaishampayana revised this version and compiled Bharatasamhita having 24000 stanzas, and recited it to Janamejaya, the grandson of Arjuna, on the occasion of the Sarpa Satra (serpent sacrifice). Ugrashrava Sauti, who learnt this revised version from his father Lomaharshana recited the poem with his own revisions and this is the extant version and called the Mahabharata, comprising about 100,000 stanzas. So the Mahabharata in its present form is a composition from widely separated periods in history and with elements derived from a diversity of fields.

The Mahabharata, as it is found in the Bombay edition, is a long poem consisting of 95,826 stanzas, divided into 18 parvas, which are again divided into 2110 chapters. Harivamsha has also been added as a sequel to the Mahabharata in certain editions, because it is traditionally ascribed to Vyasa and also because of the fact that the legend of Krishna is embedded in the story of the epic. In the Mahabharata, the verses are composed mainly in Anushtubh metre, but sometimes, other metres like Vamshastha, Pushpitagra, Indravajra, Upendravajra and Vasantatilaka are also found in the poem. The style is simple and lucid, yet it is capable of conveying the richness and subtlety of the text.

The Mahabharata, in its evolved form, is a mass of heterogeneous material. An enormous mass of floating poetry has collected around the nucleus of the poem comprising the feud between the Kuru and Panchala races. Several myths, legends and poems dating back to the Vedic period, narrative ballads, lays on heroes, folk lore, moral narratives, gnomic verses from didactic poetry have all flowed into this vast story. The heroic lays include those on Nahusha, Yayati, Nala and Rama. Legends of Gods, mythological narratives, and episodes of supernatural origin also abound in the poem. There are snake legends, 'garuda' and 'matsya' upakhyanas (legends), parables, moral stories like those of Shibi, Pingala and Mudgala intended to illustrate niti (worldly justice) and dharma (morality). There are philosophical treatises like the Gita, Sanatsujatiya and Harivamsha, apart from lengthy discussions on philosophical thoughts. To put it simply, the Mahabharata is all-pervading in its scope and limitless in its range.

The Mahabharata offers the story of human beings caught up in live situations of attachment, jealousy, commitments, dilemmas and confrontations. The basic story revolves round the struggle for kingship between the Pandavas and the Kauravas, two branches of the royal family of Purus. Using this basic structure, the author presents a galaxy of mighty characters, drawn in all shades. The character of Yudhishtira stands in contrast to that of Duryodhana. Karna is one of the most unforgettable characters in the epic who symbolises the state of man in confrontation with his destiny, Arjuna, the mighty opponent of Karna, Bhima, the revengeful and invincible warrior, Bhishma, the elder statesman, Krishna, the manipulator of action, Draupadi, the Pandava queen—are all endowed with epic dimensions. Equally significant are the portraits of other characters like Dhritarashtra, Gandhari, Kunti, Vidura, Drona, Shakuni, and Ashvathama. Even relatively minor characters like Abhimanyu, Ghatotkacha, Kichaka and Uttara have decisive roles to play in the main story. All of them interact and are part of the grand design of plot conceived by Vyasa. Vyasa's characters are intensely alive and markedly distinguishable from one another as those found in real life.

In the Mahabharata, the seeds of the tragedy are sown at the very outset when Shantanu, the king of the Kurus, is attracted to Satyawati, the beautiful daughter of a fisher chieftain. But in order to give her in marriage, the chieftain insists that the rule of the country be bestowed on the sons who would be born to her, thus depriving the right of Devavrata, his son and heir-apparent, to the throne. Devavrata's great resolve to renounce both the kingdom and matrimony so that his father may fulfil his desire, earns for him the title 'Bhishma'. After Shantanu, down the next generation the race comes to the brink of extinction but is saved by resorting to unnatural and illegitimate means to procure progeny. The Kauravas and the Pandavas are both born out of levirational ancestors. Added to this fact is the professed divine paternity of the Pandavas, which renders their normal, straight-forward relationship suspicious. The jealousy and hatred between the Kauravas and the Pandavas who engaged in minor quarrels as children, gradually gets aggravated in the form of mutual feuds, spread its roots far and wide, later growing into global turmoil. After the basic forces are unleashed, there is a steady course of events that culminate in the great war. The trickery practised on Bhima by Duryodhana who throws him into the river Ganga, the deception of the incident of the lac house, the forgery and betrayal at the game of dice are only a few steps that lead to the catastrophe. The scene of Draupadi's humiliation is perhaps the highest point in the epic. Cruelly dragged to the court by the wicked Duhshasana, Draupadi takes a vow that she will not braid her dishevelled hair, till Bhima knots it with hands smeared with the blood of Duhshasana. From that point, Draupadi seems to act as a driving force, instigating the Pandavas for revenge. The memory of her humiliation sustains their fury and rekindles their wrath towards the Kauravas. At a certain point when all the Pandava brothers except Sahadeva—including even the mighty Bhima—want to avoid the war through some sort of reconciliation Draupadi gathers her dishevelled hair, confronts Krishna and implores justice. Ultimately the war begins, with strictly stipulated rules ordained by Bhishma at the very outset; but the rules are violated at every critical juncture during the course of the war, culminating in the destruction of the Kauravas and the demoniac massacre of the Pandava army by Ashvathama. The end of the war is significant, because though the Pandavas apparently win the war, no one emerges victorious. Unlike western epics, the Mahabharata is not intended to portray the valour of heroes primarily in war, but seems to highlight the fact that enmity cannot be countered with enmity. It has a universal appeal, because it offers a commentary on the ravages of war in human history.

The epic may be seen as an affirmation of 'Purusharthas' or the traditional Indian view on the goals of man. The Hindu formula of life insisted on a conceptual pattern of existence in this world, which constituted four focal points, namely 'dharma' (moralistic principles), 'artha' (material prosperity), 'kama' (desire for pleasure) and 'moksha' (emancipation from the cycle of birth and death). The concept of purusharthas enjoins that material wealth and pursuit of pleasure should be always subject to moral law (dharma); this is perhaps the reason for dharma preceding artha and kama. The character of Duryodhana stands as a symbol of vicious kama and craving for artha. But here again Vyasa portrays him in the round, as a man with a mixture of good and evil elements in his character. He affords Karna with status in society. He is a generous patron and able administrator. Vyasa has significantly bestowed two appellations, 'Duryodhana' and 'Suyodhana' on him with contrary meanings. His lust for power and jealousy towards the Pandavas ultimately leads to the destruction of the entire clan. Yudhishtira also becomes a victim of this lust, for a temporary period, during the game of dice, and he had to suffer the consequences of his action. Yudhishtira is the champion of dharma symbolically as well as contextually, because he happens to be the son of Dharmaraja, the presiding deity of Justice and Morality. The war-ground of Kurukshetra is described by Vyasa as 'dharmakshetra' (in spite of the fact that the codes of conduct in the war were broken several times during the course of the war). When the war is about to commence, Duryodhana seeks the blessings of Gandhari, his mother, when the lady puts it very tersely and succinctly: 'Yato dharmastato jayah' (where there is dharma, there is success). In fact, references to dharma occur throughout the epic in several contexts. But all the struggles between the opposing forces of nature ultimately get reconciled in the final stage of the epic. Here man liberates himself from the influence of violent passions, to take a calm and lucid survey of all that surrounds him, to rise to a level where successes and failures in life do not matter any more. He transcends tragedy in the ordinary sense of the term, and attains a level of serene calmness (shanti). Yudhishtira as he is seen in the last phase of the epic best embodies this spirit. This is perhaps the essence of the state of moksha as enjoined in Indian philosophy.

Discussions on philosophy abound in the Mahabharata. The Bhagavadgita, or Gita as it is known otherwise, conceived as a dialogue between Arjuna and Krishna, is a discourse on analytical philosophy. The Gita dwells at length on man's existential dilemma, the emphasis on action and man's striving to transcend temporality of time and space. Gita seems to be very much a part and parcel of the epic, and not an alien element that somehow wandered into it, because it also acts as a dramatic necessity.

At a time when Arjuna faces the moral dilemma whether he is justified in fighting his own friends and relatives Krishna instils courage in him and exhorts him to action.

The conception of the figure of Krishna is an illustration of the central principle underlying the epic. Krishna as is seen in the Mahabharata is deeply rooted in affairs of the world around him. He manipulates the action and seems to manoeuvre the occasion several times in such a way as to suit the interest of the Pandavas. Yet it is with his full knowledge that the scene of annihilation was enacted at the Pandava camp by Ashvattahama. When Gandhari curses him with destruction of his own race, he replies with a smile that it was his own intention that she spoke. Thus, beneath the adherence to life, there is absolute detachment, and this gives a unique dimension to his personality. He is an embodiment of the postulates he himself prescribes in Gita. This is perhaps the reason why Krishna is deified in the Mahabharata, as well as in other mythological legends; he incarnates the basic feature that moulds Indian philosophy.

The Mahabharata has had a great tenacity through different ages and cultural changes. It is a story that India has never ceased to rethink and retell. The epic has been one of the main carriers of Indian culture. In India there is no area of life that has not been influenced by the Mahabharata. In the field of arts, the influence of the Mahabharata has been profound and multi-faceted. It has been extensively recited, sculpted and performed all over India as well as abroad. In short the Mahabharata is one of the perennial springs of Indian culture.

MAHABHARATAM (Malayalam) The translation of the Mahabharata, the greatest epic, perhaps, in world literature, is the most valuable contribution of Kunjikkuttan Tampuran. Translating the Mahabharata, a work that contains one lakh and twentyfive thousand shlokas divided into two thousand adhyayas and eighteen parvas, is such a Herculean task that it requires inconceivable courage to venture into it. That Kunjikkuttan Tampuran completed this task single-handed in eight hundred and seventyfour days is to be appreciated as one of the wonders of world literature.

What promoted Tampuran to think of such an adventure is quite interesting. A verbatim translation of the Mahabharata in Dravidian metres was planned in 1893 under the leadership of C.P. Achutha Menon. The translation work was to be published periodically and completed within five years. Accordingly the selection of poets and the allotment of Parvas also were completed. A letter in verse, written by Kunjikuttan Thampuran to Naduvath Achchhan Nambudiri, a famous poet, bears testimony to this. Though started with such varied arrangements and planning, the work did not materialise. The Parvas apportioned to Kunjikuttan Thampuran were duly translated. But it was not published. After about ten years, Kadathanat Udaya Varma Thampuran started publishing every month the Bharatamanjari of Kshemendra, getting it translated by different poets. In this scheme, the translation of the 'Drona Parva' was entrusted to Kunjikuttan Thampuran, which he completed within a few days. This scheme also was left incomplete. But this rekindled in Kunjikuttan Thampuran the thirst he had for the Mahabharata, and naturally his adventurous heart might have dreamt of translating the Mahabharata all by himself. Still the dreadful and oceanic vastness of the epic left him dubious and diffident. Commenting on this, Joseph Mundassery says that Kunjikuttan Thampuran is to be appreciated not for the fact that he translated the Mahabharata, but that he had the courage to decide to translate it. Often his work has been described as super-human.

According to his decision, Thampuran started his work in June 1904. Devote the early hours up to 9 AM everyday and translate fifty shlokas was his original plan, so that he could complete the work in five or six years. But when the work proceeded, it took momentum and the number of shlokas translated every day steadily increased, though there was no change in time. Originally he used to read the original, think and then compose the translation. But as days went by, this three-phased task was carried out simultaneously. While his eyes read the original Sanskrit shlokas, his mind would think and lips would utter the translation. The scribes sitting around to take down, often found it difficult to cope with the computer-speed of the poet. It is said that if any scribe asked the poet to repeat any line of the verse in case he did not take down the whole, Thampuran gave him an entirely new translation for the whole shloka. Thus he completed the work much earlier than he had originally planned, and immediately after the completion, he wrote a letter to Kottarattil Sankunni, in which the dates of starting and ending the work have been clearly indicated. It was because of this translation that Kunjikuttan Thampuran was saluted as 'Kerala Vyasa'. Ulloor has pointed out that those wonderful services that Thampuran did for enriching Malayalam language could have been done by some other poets also, to a certain extent, with some effort, but no other poet could have completed the translation of the Mahabharata, the gigantic work which Vyasa himself took, as is believed, three years to complete, within so short a period as of 874 days.

The translation is quite simple, lucid, direct, powerful and unstrained. Poetry bloomed in him as naturally as leaves to a tree; it flowed from him as uninterruptedly as water from a spring; it spread from him as heartily as the sweet scent from a blossoming flower.

The translation is word for word and metre for metre. Sanskrit is a language with unlimited possibilities and gifted poets who write in Sanskrit can do wonders. Malayalam cannot claim to be so rich as to vie with Sanskrit in this respect and no poet in normal course will dare to translate Sanskrit verse into Malayalam word for word and metre for metre. A proper evaluation of Thampuran's translation of the Mahabharata in this perspective will leave everybody dumbfounded, though he who wants to find out flaws alone may sometimes be able to point out some insignificant imperfections here or there. Sometimes the metrical defects in the original will be seen very strictly and quite interestingly followed by the poet in the translation also, just because he wanted to translate metre for metre. But in general the translation is magnificent.

It was in 1906 that this Malayalam translation was printed and published first. After 46 years, in 1952, the second edition was taken up, to be published in the form of a magazine, and it was completed in 1958. These two editions contained so many mistakes caused by the carelessness of the scribes and the proof-readers. All these errors, as far as possible, were rectified in the next edition brought out by the Sahitya Pravarthaka Co-operative Society, Kottayam, in 1965, which was prepared and edited very carefully by a set of scholars. The Society brought out a new edition in 1981.

MAHADAMBA (Marathi; b. 1228, d. 1303), the first woman poet in old Marathi literature, was originally called Rupai. It is because of Nagadevacharya, who was her cousin, that she turned to the Mahanubhav sect. With Nagadevacharya she met Chakradhar and she joined the Mahanubhav sect. Her bent of mind had turned ascetic because of her untimely widowhood. In Chakradhar's company it was strengthened further; quest for knowledge, bright intelligence, skill in argument and high sensitivity helped her rise in Chakradhar's esteem. She became his favourite disciple and spent the rest of her life in his noble company.

It is her imagination that distinguishes her from the rest of Chakradhar's disciples. Her imagination was combined with spiritual inclination. The result was her book Shri Chakradhar Nirupit Shrikrishnacharitra. It includes Chakradhar's answers to all the questions and doubts about Shrikrishna's life raised by Mahadamba. Mhaimbhat in one sense seems to acknowledge Mahadamba's contribution to Chakradhar's Lilacharitra composed by him, where we find frequent references to her name. Impressed by her sensitivity and brilliance, Chakradhar called her 'Mahadaisa'. Later, the sanskritised form of her name 'Mahadamba' is found in Keshobasa's book Ratnamatrstotram.

Mahadamba's reputation mainly rests on her verses called 'dhavalas' found in her book Rukhmini svayamvar. It is a saga of Rukhmini's marriage written in verse. Mahadamba seems to be immensely impressed by Krishna's glorious life, which became the subject of her constant reflection. Again, in Krishna's life it is the story of Rukhmini's marriage which fascinated her the most. She narrates the life of Krishna with great emotional intensity.

After Chakradhar's death when she moved to Govindprabhu's ashram at Ridhipur, she started composing her 'dhavalas'. In 1280, Govindprabhu decided to get married. On the eve of the marriage, Govindprabhu asked Mahadamba to sing the composition of Rukhmini's marriage. Spontaneously Mahadamba started reciting the verses. Thus began the composition of 'dhavalas' and Mahadamba became the first woman poet in Marathi.

The story of Rukhmini's marriage had been popular among the masses since long, and Mahadamba had listened to its traditional recitation. Its effect was further intensified by Chakradhar's inspiring commentary on the story. The first part of the story concludes when Shrikrishna elopes with Rukhmini defeating Shishupal, Jarasandh and Rukmi. Such a pause shows great aesthetic sense and propriety. The spontaneity makes this first part appear more creative than reproductive. Live characters, dramatic presentation of the events and rare flights of imagination make the book effective. The original story of Rukhmini's marriage in the Bhagwata becomes more colourful with the subtle feminine touches of Mahadamba's imagination.

The second part of the story reflects the strains of a not-so-willing imagination. Utter despair engrossed Mahadamba after the death of Chakradhar and Govindprabhu. The gap of 20 to 22 years was another discouraging factor. In the same way the story had its natural termination after Krishna-Rukhmini elopement. She composed the verses of the second part only when she was pressed hard by Mhaimbhat and Laxmibhat.

Dhavale is originally a type of traditional song. According to the famous Jain scholar, Hemachandra, dhavale is a song to be sung in the honour of a king. Book Mahadambeche dhavale was published in 1977 with an elaborate introduction by Suhasini Irlekar.

Matruki Rukhmini svayamvar is another book by Mahadamba. As compared to the dhavalas, it is more compact and has a dynamic narrative style. The book is called 'Matruki' as every verse-couplet ('Ovi') begins with a Matruk. The Garbhakand Ovis composed by Mahadamba are also remarkable.

MAHADEV BHAINI DIARY (Gujarati). Mahadev Desai, (b. 1892, d. 1942) had the prestigious status of being the personal secretary of Mahatma Gandhi for 25 years from 1917 to 1942. He noted in the diaries the day to day activities of Gandhiji, which included his informal conversations with his inmates, his interviews with people from different walks of life, his correspondence, his views on various problems of life, inner working of his mind; and thus the diaries provide an encyclopaedic information about the Father of the nation. Hence the diary acquires a special status for itself because the writer is not the central figure. There are nineteen parts of the diaries of which eighteen have been already published. The first part was published in 1948. The first six parts were edited by Narhari Parikh, a close associate of Gandhiji and bosom friend of Mahadev Desai. The other parts are edited by Chandulal Dalal. The diaries provide most precious material to the students of history, political science and sociology as the period covered in the diaries witnessed three satyagraha movements of Gandhiji, his Harijan movement, his constructive programme and his view point on every major event of the period.

The diaries give a glimpse of the multi-dimensional personality of Gandhiji, and contrary to a popular belief that Gandhiji was a staunch idealist and was impractical, they present a different picture. The Harijan boys studying in the nationalist institutions started by Gandhiji wanted to appear for matriculation examination conducted by universities established by the British Government. When Gandhiji was asked as to what could be done in the matter, he at once replied, "We must give them the facility they desire. Where there is not an iota of education when we want to lead them from darkness to light, what is the use of talking of ideals? We must put before them, the things which they are yearning for." Thus Gandhiji was always objective in his approach. Once somebody wrote to him, "You must prevent the persons who are your hosts from indulging in unfair activities". To which Gandhiji replied, "I am ready to write to the hosts if you give some evidence. My being their guest is a different thing. I do not believe myself to be a righteous person that I would decline to be a guest of a person whom people consider as bad. I am the first bad person because I became the guest of bad person; then it does not become of me to be a judge of others”.

Before Gandhiji launched the anti-untouchability movement from Yervada jail, he studied all the Hindu scriptures and discussed untouchability with Sanskrit Pundits and proved that untouchability had no sanction of scriptures. He studied the scriptures for ten to twelve hours a day which shows his penchant for perfection.

Besides Gandhiji, the diaries give a glimpse of the personality of Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel, who was known as an iron man, who by his characteristic wit and humour presents his hitherto unknown facet of life. He cracks jokes with Gandhiji, and at the same time he discusses with Gandhiji serious problems on equal terms.

The impression about Mahadevbhai that we get from these diaries is that here is a person, completely dedicated to Gandhi, one who kept himself busy, every second of his life serving his master, massaging his body, noting down the personal impressions of Gandhiji, writing letters, taking dictation, writing diary, recording Gandhiji's conversations, nursing Gandhiji, and finding time to read books on various subjects, literature, politics, sociology, philosophy, economics, etc. Besides these activities, he was also writing books and translating Gandhiji's articles from Gujarati and Hindi into English, and Jawaharlal Nehru's Glimpses of world history, and Autobiography into Gujarati.

Thus Mahadevbhaini Diary which received the Sahitya Akademi award is a monumental work in Indian literature.

MAHAKSHATRIYA (Kannada) is a novel by Devudu Narasimha Sastry, which received the Sahitya Akademi Award (1962). The great kshatriya who gives the novel its title is Nahusha, whose story is narrated in the Aranya Parva of the Mahabharata. But Devudu has made significant changes. Nahusha here is not a lustful ruler of heaven who covets Shachi and insults Agastya and is hurled to the earth as a python. He conducts himself with such dignity and integrity that even the gods respect him. He invites his doom so that Indra might return to heaven as its ruler. Devudu recreates the world of mythology with amazing concreteness and precision. The action takes place in a world vividly realized, and governed by stringent laws. Narrating the story of the asuras, men and gods, Devudu established the greatness of man who has the opportunity to choose and establish his life on self-imposed values. Nahusha's character is complex and reveals new facts as the novel progresses. The work has often been described as a prose epic.

MAHAMMAD SAHIDULLAH (Bengali, b. 1885, d. 1969) was a well-known linguist, educationist and scholar. He passed his B.A. examination of the Calcutta University with honours in Sanskrit, and M.A. Examination in Comparative philology in 1912, having also done B.L. He practised as lawyer for some time. Later on, he joined the Dacca University as a lecturer in Bengali and Sanskrit. In 1926, on study leave for two years, Sahidullah studied the Vedic language, old Persian, Tibetan and Comparative Philology at the Paris University. He earned the D. Litt. degree of the University in 1928 for his thesis on the Buddhist Tantric literature. He also obtained a diploma in Phonetics for his research on Bengali Phonetics. During his stay in Europe he also studied the Prakrit and Arabic languages at the Freiburg University (now W. Germany). Returning to India in 1928 Sahidullah rejoined his post at the Dacca University. In 1937 Sahidullah became the Head of the Department of Bengali in the University. After retirement from the post in 1944, Sahidullah served as Principal of the Azizul Huq College at Bogra (East Pakistan, now Bangladesh) till the end of 1944. In subsequent years he worked as Head of the Department of Bengali at Dacca University, Head of the Department of Bengali and Sanskrit at the Rajshahi University, and Secretary of the Urdu Board (Karachi). In 1967 he was made an Emeritus Professor of the Dacca University. Sahidullah was one of the pioneers in the field of studies in Bengali grammar, phonetics, folklore, Buddhist proto-Bengali lyrics (Charya padas), and mediaeval Vaishnavite lyrical literature. He was also well-known as an able Bengali translator of works of Hafiz, Omar Khayyam and Iqbal.

As a teacher Sahidullah inspired a large number of his pupils to love and cultivate Bengali literature which was the mother tongue of the people of East Bengal, renamed East Pakistan after the partition in 1947. It was mainly due to his influence and inspiration that the language movement grew in East Pakistan which compelled the then Pakistani rulers to accept Bengali also as a national language of Pakistan. He also pleaded that Hindus and Muslims, despite their different religious faiths, shared the same heritage. Sahidullah had also enriched the Bengali literature through his Islamic studies in the Bengali language.

MAHAMMAD, SUFI GHULAM (Kashmiri; b. 1931) was born in a middle-class Muslim family. He took to journalism just after completing F.A. He worked on the staff of the daily Khidmat, Srinagar, for more than a decade. He started his own Urdu daily, Srinagar Times, in 1969, which is presently a leading daily of the State, he being its chief editor. Sufi's career as a short story writer started in the late fifties. His very first short story 'Tsunitsur' (coal smuggler) attracted the attention of the critics. 'Ajab Malik ta Nosh Lab', 'Maal dyad' and 'Tsunitsur' are some of his remarkable short stories. He published two collections of short stories, Loesyma'ty tarakh (Stars drowned in the deep) and Shisha ta sangistan (Mirror and the vale of stones) in 1962.

In the short stories of Sufi we see more stress on the depiction of characters; and because of this stress his indifference to plot surfaces in his fiction. Sometimes the way of his writing is traditional, but he is one of the important short story writers of the second generation of Kashmiri fiction.

In addition to the short stories, he has also written some very good Radio plays, features and articles.

He has command over the Kashmiri language and is also capable enough to write in Urdu and English also.

Presently Sufi devotes all his attention to journalism.

MAHAN NAMBUTHIRIPAD, VENMANI (Malayalam; b. 1844, d. 1893), the eminent poet, was the son of Venmani Achchhan Nambuthiripad, a renowned poet. Kadamban was his name though in the literary world he was known as "Venmani Mahan". He did not get any formal education, particularly in Sanskrit, worth noting. His father was his only Guru, whom he held in high esteem. Being the son of a renowned poet, he had a deep and inborn poetic talent. This was naturally cultivated to its perfection by his stay in the Kodungalloor Palace, which was a famous seat of poetry and learning then. Unique was his intellectual faculty which enabled him to memorise not only his poems but all that he heard. That he left incomplete the innumerable poems he wrote, except a few, is due to his inborn laziness. Consequently he did not engage himself in any particular vocation. He spent his days roaming about, particularly in places of celebrations or temple festivals, enjoying the company of his poet-friends and often starting new poems, never caring to finish them. During his stay at Kodungalloor Palace, he used to be honoured as the Guru of the Malayalam poets there in the absence of his father. This habit of wandering gave him an opportunity to get acquainted with many of the famous contemporary literary luminaries.

He had been a sickly man almost all his life. But when he died in 1893 it was of small pox. Even on his death-bed he composed a poem.

He was one of the founders of the 'Venmani Movement' in Malayalam poetry. Owing to the overwhelming influence of Sanskrit and the over-enthusiasm of the lovers of Sanskrit, Malayalam poetry had then reached such a stage that necessitated a thorough change, both in form and in content, particularly in language. The overloading of Sanskrit words kept the common man away from poetry. So the innovators of the Venmani Movement felt the dire need of a thorough revolution and they decided to chasten the language used in poetry by avoiding the unnecessary influence of Sanskrit and to take the poetry to the common man, avoiding all sorts of obscurities and giving the reader every chance to laugh heartily. Sometimes they went to the extreme of even providing a touch of obscenity, just for the sake of laughter. It helped to discard the disdain that Sanskrit scholars had for Malayalam poetry. In short, poetry became more popular with the advent of the 'Venmani Movement'.

Puraprabandham (The story of a temple festival known as Puram), Ambopadesham (Mother's advice), Bhutibhushacharitam (The story of Bhutibhusha), Kamatilakam bhanam, etc. are some of the important works of Mahan Nambuthiripad. In these he has conscientiously tried to free Malayalam poetry from the clutches of scholasticism and adorn it with the exuberance of pleasant humour. The exact date of composition of none of these is available. Chelanat Achutha Menon has edited and published the complete works of Venmani Nambuthiripad in 1894. Yogakshema Sabha has published the works of Venmani in four volumes. (Vols. I and II—1925; Volumes III and IV—1931). Puraprabandham was written about the famous Trichur Pooram of 1873. The poet's idea was to write one thousand shlokas (quatrains) and hence he used to add quatrains to it whenever he felt like. Here his aim was only to entertain the readers.

Bhutibhushacharitam tells the story of Bhutibhusha, an imaginary prince. The story as such is insignificant. But the grandeur of the work depends on the chiselled beauty of the form, the excellence of diction and unbridled humour. Kamatilakam bhanam also is in the same spirit.

That he tried to attract his readers by a tinge of obscenity in his poems was the chief criticism levelled against the poet. Admitting it, Ulloor defends the poet saying that his only aim was to make his readers burst into laughter. Ulloor says: "Venmani's shringara was really humour presented with a background of shringara". His ideas, language, style, etc. were quite suited to that. He has been aptly called "the only Mahakavi of the common men of that time".

Venmani had some inborn talent for painting also, though he did not develop it to any remarkable extent.

In his Sahitya charitram, Ulloor gives a long list of 22 books by Venmani Mahan, of which many remain incomplete.

MAHANATAKA OR HANUMANNATAKA (Sanskrit) is a Sanskrit drama, ascribed to various authors. The Bhojaprabandha says that the Sanskrit play, Hanumannataka was composed by the monkeygod Hanumat who was instructed by Valmiki himself. Hanumat engraved the words with his nails on stone-slabs; but after Valmiki heard the drama, he grew jealous and was afraid that his own epic would be neglected in favour of this play. Hence at his request Hanumat threw the slabs into the ocean. The story goes on to say that king Bhoja. Vikramaditya had the text salvaged by divers but the whole text could not be rescued. So a later poet, Madhusudan Mishra (or Damodara Mishra, according to some) culled appropriate verses from the Ramayana, Raghuvamsha, Mahaviracharita, Uttaramacharita, Anargharaghava, Udattaraghava, Chhalitarama, Balaramayana, etc. and composed some himself, arranging it all in the form of a play.

The play is actually found in two different recensions: (a) the West Indian version called the Hanumannataka in 14 acts and 548 verses found in the older Bombay editions in which it is ascribed to Damodara Mishra, the most famous commentator of the text. The other East Indian text (b), called the Mahanataka in 9 acts and 720 verses is virtually the same as (a) with some more verses. The colophons in (b) at the end of the acts are short prose passages indicating the end of acts, as also the redactor's name, the number of the act and mention of the salvage of the text by Vikrama. Of both versions the redactor is Madhusudana Mishra who seems to have modelled his text on the earlier version of Damodara Mishra.

'Mahanataka' is the name of genre (mentioned by works of dramaturgy) which has at least ten acts, all the four 'patakashthanas' (intimation of episodic incidents) and all the recognised dramatic sentiments. The Hanumannataka does not fulfil these conditions (which may be why the Sahityadarpana's example of mahanataka is not this text but the Balaramayana.)

The style is predominantly Vaidarbhi, although Gaudi is also occasionally employed, especially in the short prose directions. There is no Prakrit in the play which employs only Sanskrit for all characters. Neither is there a 'prastavana' (prologue); after the benedictory verse by the sutradhara (alone, without his companion, the nati) the main action is abruptly introduced. Stage directions are brief and sometimes in verse, presumably to be recited from behind to supply a cut to the actors on the stage as also to enlighten the audience regarding the course of action. Inordinate exaggeration, alliteration, periphrastic and euphemistic expressions, cryptic and enigmatic phrases characterize the style. One redeeming feature is the restrained use of rhetoric, although frequent long compounds and boundless alliterations which often introduces obscure words, mar the style. The poetic power rarely derives from experience of life, for the most part the verses betray dull virtuosity affording the poet occasions for displaying literary skill. Very rarely we have some verses palpitating with warm human emotions. There are some stanzas of wisdom and observations on life which claim our attention and admiration.

The play fails as a drama if only because action is conspicuously absent. There is no innovation in the plot or subplots beyond a descriptive account of selected episodes from the Ramayana, characterization is neither aimed nor achieved. From the strange stage directions, sometimes in verse from the derivative nature of the dramatic sentiments the play seems to be to a unique genre, possibly one in which the verses accompanied puppet shows, shadow plays or dumb tableaux like mimic action of some king on the stage.

MAHANAY PRAKASH (Kashmiri) is the earliest book written in Kashmiri, which has come down to us. The author of this book is Shatikanth, a Shaiva scholar of the 13th century, who, according to the latest findings, hailed from Padampore (present Pampore). There have been two persons of this name, both of them writers hailing from Kashmir. The author of Mahanay prakash belongs to the 13th century, while Shatikanth, the author of Bal-bodhini avesta, belongs to the 15th century. Due to some misunderstanding, George Abraham Grierson has mistaken the authors of both the books as one and has observed that Mahanay prakash is a book of the 15th century, when Hassan Shah ruled Kashmir. The internal evidence of Mahanay prakash reveals that it was composed at the instance of Maharaja Jaisingh. This evidence is sufficient to prove that the work was created in the 13th century.

The language of Mahanay prakash represents the earliest available specimen of Kashmiri. It is full of Sanskrit 'tatsam' and 'tadbhav' words, expressions and technical terms. The mode of the language in Mahanay prakash shows that Sanskrit was dominant in Kashmir at that time. It is corroborated by the author's statement also who wrote that he composed the book in the prevailing 'desh bhasha', the language of the common people. We cannot ignore the fact that Sanskrit was the court language of Kashmir up to the middle of the 14th century.

So far as the linguistic importance of the book is concerned, it is an important mile-stone in the history of Kashmiri language and literature. The history of Kashmiri language opens with Mahanay prakash. Its linguistic study can help the linguists to understand and unfold the peculiarities of an important phase of Kashmiri language.

So far as the contents of this book are concerned, these can be divided into two parts. The versified portions (vakhs) are the earliest specimen of Kashmiri, and the commentary of the vakhs is in Sanskrit. The language of vakhs is archaic and very difficult to understand. Even if the reader understands some words in a vakh, he fails to make out anything of the entire text of the vakh. The same is the case with the commentary, which is very difficult, and the reputed scholars have failed to understand the text of the explanation.

It is noteworthy that the language of this book is 700 years old. During this long period, Kashmiri has undergone tremendous changes and a wide gulf has emerged between that language and that of our times.

Mahanay prakash is concerned with 'tantrayoga', a branch of Kashmiri Shaivism also known as 'Kaula'. It constitutes an important aspect of 'trika' philosophy. During the Hindu period, tantric way was an important religious cult here. This form of yoga is very much helpful in understanding the secrets of existence and meaning of creation. The practice of this system of yoga helps in attaining the spiritual goal and, at the same time, awakens the faculties buried in the conscious and subconscious mind of the practitioner.

Mahanay prakash proves yet another fact that 'vakh', as a form of poetry, was prevalent in the Kashmiri language long before Lal Ded appeared on the scene. The total number of vakhs in Mahanay prakash is 94. The original manuscript is written in 'Sharda' script, a way of writing which, besides Kashmiri, was used for writing Sanskrit. This book was seen through the press by the State Research and Publication Department in 1919. Under the editorship of Mukundram Shastri, Research Department has published the book in Devanagari and its original manuscript in Sharda script is preserved in the library of the Institute of Central Asian Studies, Kashmir University, Srinagar.

The fact is that a detailed study of this book is yet to be undertaken by a competent Sanskrit scholar. It is not the literary value of this book that makes it an important document, but it is its historical and linguistic importance which can be neither denied nor overlooked.

Mahanay prakash is a commendable work because it is the first attempt of its kind to make the Kashmiri language a vehicle of philosophical discussion and metaphysical speculation.

MAHANDRODAYAM (Telugu) by Dasharathi, the present poet-laurate, consists of twenty short poems and songs published in prominent periodicals. They were collected together and published in book form in 1955. Most of them had a political purpose which was the formation of one state for all the Telugu speaking people in Telangana, then under the rule of the Nizam. The dawn of this state, 'Mahandrodayam', was a subject that inspired many poets, great and small. Dasharathi's poems and songs inspired large audiences

Dasharathi identified himself with the political movement for the overthrow of the feudal tyranny of the Nizam whose exploitation of the people of Telangana roused his righteous indignation and protest to utter some soul-stirring strains. Telangana and Telangana Vimukti, Telangana Talli and Kotigontulu make an emotional appeal to the people to realise the past greatness and glory of Andhra and fight for the unification of lands historically separated but linguistically and culturally one. He calls Telangana a multi-diamond studded 'Vina' which made the dumb millions sing and which gave strength and vigour to his pen. He addresses the Nizam as cobwebs collected over generations and asserts that Telangana belongs only to its peasants. Though these poems had a political purpose and emotional appeal they are rich in content and reflect Dasharathi's poetic genius. They recapture the past glory of the Telugu people in melodious verses colourful in imagery.

'Shilpi', of a different theme, purely artistic, is an ode to the sculptor who chiselled beautiful forms on stone in Ellora and the temples. He is said to sprinkle nectar on stone and create life out of it. The sculptor is regarded as Brahma. The stones deplore the hammer blows and are willing to take any form the sculptor wishes them to. The sculptor seems to put heart into the stone to create new melodies. 'Shilpi' is one of Dasharathi's greatest poetic achievements and is a masterpiece of statuesque beauty and perfection.

In 'Nataswami' Dasharathi describes the cosmic dance of Lord Shiva in rhythmic verses. 'Gundelodipalu' is a proud assertion by the poet to light the lamps of love and friendship in the hearts of the people. 'Pulalojwalalu' is a sensitive and profound expression of the poet's romantic feelings in contradistinction.

In 'Paushalakshmira' a typical poem reflecting the beauty of nature, Pausha, one of the months of the Telugu lunar calendar is described as a goddess. The season's beauty, gaiety, variegated flowers, the festive mood of the people and the mirth, secret and open, of the young married women express in variety and depth the atmosphere of the Sankranti festival. Conventional thoughts are expressed with new enthusiasm in 'Madhu ratham' and 'Madhuri'. Realistic observations are mixed with the poet's personal reflections striking an optimistic note; the poet asks whether the nectar of spring does not rain after the fall.

'Ragabandham' is an expression of Dasharathi's strong desire on the Telugu New Year's day for the strengthening of the bonds of love among the people. In epigrammatic style he says this age is of the people and of the poets. If there is no poetry there is no youth, if there is no youth there is no novelty, if there is no novelty there is no civilisation, if there is no civilisation there is no country. The poet feels how millions of words spring forth from his heart to inspire the people. He regards religion, castes, economic inequalities, the cult of the sword, the king and the slave as falsehood, and the truth as only the bond of love.

In 'Murchana' Dasharathi declares his aim to play revolutionary songs of the starving poor on the Rudra Vina. 'Kapoti Sandesham' is a message of peace conveyed by the dove which assures the poet that it has sown seeds of peace all over the world to save it from a nuclear holocaust

'Manjira', on which the Nizam Sagar project was constructed, is deified as a goddess who brought prosperity and plenty to the lands over which it flows. 'Majira' is undoubtedly one of the finest odes on a river in Telugu, for the verses flow majestically like the waters of the river.

'Kashmamurti' in which Gandhi is revered as a god is an exhortation to the people to follow his path of peace and non-violence.

Kapayanayakudu who liberated Warrangal from Tuglak in 1336 gets the highest praise from Dasharathi for his heroism, patriotism, courage and qualities of leadership. In a long poem after the great hero's name Dasharathi makes an appeal to the Telugu people to remember the example set by Kapayanayakudu and forget their differences. 'Sahitya samrajyam' is a plea for the establishment of peace in the world, if not, at least in the realm of letters.

'Shilpi', 'Paushalakshmi', 'Ragabandham', and 'Kapotisandesham', are superb expressions of Dasharathi's romantic sensitivity, imaginative perception, lyrical exuberance and artistic craftsmanship.

G.S.R.

MAHANIRVAN (Marathi), is an unusual play written by Satish Alekar, a young playwright of great promise. His earlier play Micki ani memsahib was also an extraordinary play, given to deep psychological motivation. Mahanirvan deals with the unsavoury theme of death and its aftermath. The theme may sound unsavoury, but Alekar's play dealing with such an unsavoury theme, is satiric and sardonic in its humour.

The black humour is inherent in the body of the play, for the dead body itself is the hero of the play, and the one who occupied the dead body is not only alive and kicking, but is himself offering a sort of running commentary on the various Hindu rituals for cremation and its aftermath. The commentator, when he is alive, is a Kirtankar, and blessed with a rich sense of humour. So his observations are marked with satire, parody, ridicule and censure. Though bordering on bitterness, at times these observations turn out to be funny and provoke laughter.

The term Mahanirvan is generally applied to the death of either a saint or a person who is revered for his inherent divine qualities. But in this instance the dead person is an ordinary fellow and there is nothing whatsoever to equate his death with the passing of a Mahapurush. So the very name of the play spells parody, and whatever follows is narrated in the same vein of parody, which may turn to light satire.

In the first act of the play the man is seen lying dead, and the living spirit of his body may be his soul separated from the body, and it is this spirit or soul who is observing all the intricate rites, performed by the relations and neighbours. The dead man's son has not yet arrived on the scene, and all the people gathered around the dead body are anxiously awaiting his return. The dead father and the living son establish a sort of contact, and both of them observe and comment on all the funeral rites in a spirit of mockery.

Then there is a comic interlude, in which a dramatic situation props up to give a turning point to the story. The locale is orthodox Pune, and the time corresponds with the shifting of the crematorium from one place to another. The funeral procession reaches the place of the old crematorium and it has to wend its way to the new burning ghat. At this point the dead man obstinately refuses to move over to the new place for his last rites, and continues to stay on in his old haunt (his house). In the meantime the widow is haunted by the image of a mourner in a western suit wearing dark goggles, and the father and son conspire to probe into his mysterious identity.

This sombre play is a source of constant laughter from its beginning to the end, and has rightly become popular to suit the changing times and attitudes of the people towards old customs.

MAHANISHA (Fateful Night, Bengali) Is a domestic novel (1917) by Anurupa Devi, a powerful female novelist of nineteenth-twentieth century.

The plot of the novel is of episodic nature. One of the two episodes concerns the family of a millionaire widower, Muralidhar of Rangoon, father of the born-blind daughter Dhira, and the other relates to a rich but miserly village gentleman, Radhikaprassanna, in whose house his wretched widowed grand-daughter Soudamini had to take shelter along with her virgin daughter, Aparna. Nirmal is the link character between the two episodes.

The complicated relation between Dhira and Nirmal, Aparna and Behari, the faithful servant of Radhikaprassanna, has been nicely delineated. Brought up under father's care, Dhira could not obviously develop her feminine instinct. When eventually married to Nirmal, Aparna felt her deficiency and Nirmal's ceaseless efforts to afford sexless comforts only augmented her agony.

Although the themes of her novels were varied and she had a powerful pen, Anurupa Devi was interested more in propagating the magnanimity of Hindu religion and cultural tradition and in portraying the ideal of Indian womanhood rather than in displaying artistic nicety. This has sometimes made her fiction didactic. Her power of characterization is no doubt laudable. Besides the main characters, Braja, Aloknath, Kamakshyacharan, Patitpavani Kshetramoni and the female matchmaker are definitely well-portrayed characters.

Mahanisha had been dramatised by Jogesh Choudhury and it was staged at Rangmahal on 17th April, 1933.

MAHANTA, KESHAV (Assamese; b. 1926), a popular lyric poet and a composer of songs, was born in a lower middle-class family. Acquainted with chill penury, Keshav Mahanta came to play the progressive role of an artist through his social activities, lyrics and songs. Endowed with a broad human sympathy for the poor and the oppressed, Mahanta sings his tale of sorrow with a robust optimism and faith in the redemption of the individual. For participating in India's struggle for freedom from the British he was imprisoned twice in 1942–1943 and 1948–1951 with consequent disruption of his studies and to the distress of his poor family. But overcoming all sorts of individual and political onslaughts he was able to obtain his M.A. in Assamese from the Gauhati University in 1964. On release from prison in 1951 he had to run from pillar to post for livelihood. After serving several high schools as a teacher, he joined the Department of Publication of the Gauhati University in 1959 and ultimately became its Publication Officer. While serving the University he was invited to Calcutta in 1961 by the USSR Consulate to join as the Chief Editor of the Soviet Desh (Assamese) where he served on lien for a period of two years.

Keshav Mahanta came in contact with the epoch-making progressive artists like Jyotiprasad Agarwalla and Bishnuprasad Rava. His outlook on life and his poetic philosophy were profoundly influenced by the progressive ideas of these artists. Besides cherishing a deep human sympathy for the poor and the oppressed, Keshav Mahanta has a genuine love for the rich cultural heritage of the Assamese. An inimitable idiomatic style of composition and a magic of rhythmic music woven into the tales of pleasure and pain, hope and despair of the human heart add immortal touches to Mahanta's lyric compositions. Several Assamese films produced in the sixties and the seventies became popular mainly because of Mahanta's musical compositions. As an accepted lyric poet of the All India Radio, Gauhati, Mahanta continues to please the listeners with his lyrics, musical features and radioplays.

As a progressive artist Keshav Mahanta had lifelong association with several progressive artists organisations. He was a leading member of the Indian People's Theatre Association till 1958. He was also elected General Secretary (1982) of the Assam Progressive Writers and

MAHANTA, MITRADEVA–MAHANTA, RAGHUNATH

Artists Association affiliated to the National Federation of Progressive Writers. He presided over the Poets' Conference organised by the Asam Sahitya Sabha in its Titabar Session in 1975.

Keshav Mahanta's contributions to the treasury of Assamese literature are : Amar prithivi (1946), Rod jikimiki (1960), Agantuk (1962), Kunwali atari ja (1964), Dis dhavali baran (1970) and Omala ghar. His translated works are: Yogayog of Rabindranath Tagore, published by the Sahitya Akademi, Kavi of Tarashankar Banerjee and Kinu Gowler gali of Santoshkumar Ghosh, both published by the National Book Trust, Manav jatir shatru published by the WHO and also a series of Soviet children's literature. The periodicals and journals which he edited are: Milan (1947), Prabah, Luit and Natun sahitya.

MAHANTA, MITRADEVA (Assamese; b. 1894), a noted state actor, playwright and lyric poet, was born and brought up in the spiritual atmosphere of a satra (a centre of Assamese Vaishnavita religion and culture). He read upto the I.A. standard at Cotton College in Gauhati, did a Teachers' training course in Dacca and became a devoted teacher. He taught at various schools like Jorhat Government High School, Jorhat Normal School, Golaghat Government High School and Golaghat Teachers' Training Institute. Later, he became the Satradhikar (the spiritual head) of the Letugram Satra and spent a life of spiritual devotion.

Mitradeva produced a series of farces which became popular. Some of his farces are meant for pure pleasure. In some his aim is to correct individual and social follies. Some again aim at educating people through projection of incongruities, fun and laughter. His simplicity, colloquialism and idiomatic expression befit his character-sketches. The most popular ones in the series are: Kukurikanar athmangala (The reception of the purblind son-in-law, 1918) and Biya biparyaya (The marriage debacle, 1925). Some others of the series are: Chencha jvar (1915), Lech-lau-lani (1915), Etachurat (1925), Nikoka raja (1928), Tengar-bhengar (1935), Meltari (1943), Bom-phatka (1955), Achin kathar thora (1955), Bhurukat hati (1970), Tengari aita (1970), Bhotar ragar, Tip-chahi, Sura sansar and Dhodar Ali. Many of his farces like Amba, Jilmil, Srimati, Basanta vijay, Hati datehati date, Ghocharmar jari remain unpublished.

Mitradeva wrote a few serious plays too, taking themes from the Indian epics and the Bhagavata. These plays, interspersed with some mirthful scenes, are the depiction of the realisation of highly spiritual and moral ideals of man. In this series of plays he made some innovation in the stage technique combining the old and the new. This series includes Charan dhuli (The dust of the feet, 1955), Prachhanna pandavas (The pandavas in disguise, 1956) and Baidehi biyog (The rejection of Baidehi, 1960).

Mitradeva's popular anthologies of songs are: Giti satadal (1959) and Ran-rangini. His contributions to the children's literature are: Mau-Mahabharat (1925), Dhru-ba, Chenehar jari and Junguni (1964). For the last two he received an award from the Central Government.

Mitradeva's fame spread not only as a popular playwright but also as a highly successful stage actor. In just recognition of his services the Sangeet Natak Akademi honoured him with an award in 1961. A life-long devotee of the Assam Sahitya Sabha, Mitradeva was elected its President in 1964. A song by him with the line 'Chira chenehi mor bhasa janani' has been accepted as the anthem of the Assam Sahitya Sabha. And this song, superb in its texture and tune, shall keep Mitradeva evergreen in the memory of the Assamese. It is in the fitness of things that the Assam Sahitya Sabha honoured him with the highest literary title, Sahityacharya, in 1982.

MAHANTA, RAGHUNATH (Assamese) was a great prose writer of the post-Vaishnavite period after the decline of poetry centring round the genius of Shankaradeva. He came from the illustrious family of Barbhakat Satananda who had been initiated into Vaishnavism by Shankaradeva himself. It is believed that Raghunath wrote a series of prose-works in old Assamese narrating various episodes of the Ramayana. Only three of his works have been discovered. They are: Satrunjoy (1736), Adbhut Ramayan and Katha Ramayana (1781).

Chronologically Satrunjoy appears to be Raghunath's first prose-work. It relates the heroic exploits of Bali, the mighty king of the monkey clan. Narakasur, the mighty ruler of Kamarpura, appears as his close associate. The episode of the book is not borrowed from Valmiki's Ramayana. It is perhaps taken from some other version of the Ramayana.

Next comes the Adbhut-Ramayana which is not an Assamese version of the Sanskrit Ramayana of the same name. Sita Devi's strange and superhuman actions in the nether world have been differently described in the two Ramayanas. The source-material of the book is not yet known.

Raghunath's Katha Ramayana is a work of the later period of his life and is considered to be his best. The entire book has not survived; only four Kandas (Chapters) of the book have been retrieved. The material of the book is borrowed from the Ramayana of Madhab Kandali, the great predecessor of Sri Shankaradeva. There have been noticeable impacts of both Madhab Kandali and Sri Shankaradeva on the book with regard to its content and its prose-style. As a prose version of the Ramayana the book has its place of pride in the entire range of the Ramayana literature of Northern India.

MAHANUBHAV LITERATURE (Marathi). The Mahanubhav sampradaya, a religious sect of Maharashtra, was established by Chakradharswami in the thirteenth century. This sect is also called 'Para-marg', 'Bhat-marg, Achyut-panth', etc. In the north, it is known as 'Jaikrishni sampradaya'.

This sect believes in 'Dwait' philosophy based on four fundamental 'Padarthas', viz. jiva, Devata, Prapanch and Parameshwar. It does not believe in the 'Chaturvarnya' system and hence it had to face great criticism during the medieval period in Maharashtra. It also advocates 'Sanyasa' for women and hence it was criticised by the followers of the other religious sects of Maharashtra. Chakradharswami believed that knowledge of the religion be given in the language of the common man. Hence, he advocated the cause of Marathi language and asked all his disciples to write in it. This helped to enrich the language.

This sect worships Panch-Krishnas, i.e. five avatars of Lord Krishna. Krishna is considered to be the Purnavata, the other four avatars are Shri Datta, Shri ChangaDev Raul, Shri Chakradharswami and Shri Govindprabhu. Lila charitra is the most important and significant work, which is the biography of Chakradharswami. It is divided into three parts, viz. ekank. purvardh and uttarardh. Mhaimbhat compiled all the incidents of the Swami's life. With great pains, he reconstructed the biography of the founder of the sect. The principles stated in the Lila charitra became the fundamental principles of the Mahanubhav sampradaya. These principles or 'Siddhantas' have been compiled in the book Siddhantsutrapath. Chakradharswami explained the principles of his religious philosophy with the help of certain examples, which were called Drishtantas. The collection and compilation of these Drishtantas is known as Drishtantpath. A compilation of the places visited by Chakradharswami was also done. It is called Sthanpothi. All these holy books are very much respected by the followers of the sect.

Following seven books or 'Sati granth' are also respected by the Mahanubhav: Vachaharan by Damodar Pandit (1278); Rukmini swayamwar by Narendra (1292); Shishupal vadh and Uddhav gita by Bhaskarbhatta Borikar (1308); Jnan prabodh by Vishwanath Balapurkar (1331); Sahyadri varnan by Ravalo Vyas (1333); Ruddhipurvarnan by Narovyas Bahaliye (1363).

Mahanubhav poets have written epics like Mahabharat. Mahanubhav version of the famous epic Mahabharat is somewhat different and it contains some events which are not depicted in the traditional Mahabharat. Navras Naryan of the sixteenth century is one such poet who has written Mahabharat. His Shalyaparva is published and it throws light on the Mahanubhav aspect of the Mahabharat. Narendra's Rukmini swayamwar is also considered to be an epic. Mahanubhav writers have also written narrative poetry. Vachaharan by Damodar Pandit, Shishupal vadh by Bhaskarbhatt Borikar, Sahyadri varnan by Ravalo Vyas, Ruddhipur varnan by Narovyas, Vatsala swayamwar by Raghav, Ruddhipur mahatmya by Dimbh are some prominent examples of narrative poetry written by Mahanubhav poets.

Biographical literature written by earlier Mahanubhav writers is also rich. Lilacharitra by Mhaimbhat (13 century), already mentioned earlier, is one such work. The same author has written Govindprabhu charitra, the biography of another avatar of the sect, Shri Govindprabhu. Smritisthal written by Parashram Bas depicts the life of Nagdevacharya, the first acharya of the sect.

Dhavale by poetess Mahadamba (13th century) forms an important part of the Mahanubhav literature. The word dhavale means a song to be sung at the time of marriage. These songs, were sung by Mahadamba, a disciple of Chakradharswami and Govindprabhu. These songs depict the incident of marriage of Shrikrishna with Rukmini. They were sung at the instance of Shri Govindprabhu. These songs are written in the folk-language of Maharashtra and they possess lyrical quality.

There is a long tradition of commentaries amongst the Mahanubhav writers. These writers have written commentaries on the Gita and the Bhagawata. Gopaldasi and Bhingarkari are two important commentaries on the Gita. Jnanprabodh by Pandit Vishwanath Balapurkar is an important commentary on the Gita, which is included in the 'Satigranth' of Mahanubhavas. Mahanubhav writers have written 125 commentaries on the Gita. Uddhavgita is a commentary on the eleventh chapter of the Bhagwata written by Bhaskar Bhatt Borikar (1308). Sanket Gita by Nrisinha Pandit is also one of the important Mahanubhav commentaries on the Gita.

Mahanubhav writers have also compiled Tipgranthas which explain the terms occurring in their important works. This literature is very useful for studying Mahanubhav literature.

Anvaya sthalas of the Mahanubhavas give important information about the sect. Ababas are the lists of important things relevant to a particular religious subject, e.g. Charitra-abab gives lists of things related to Chakradharswami.

Mahanubhavas were opposed by the followers of other religious sects in Maharashtra and they were considered to be anti-Vedas. Hence, they tried to protect their religious literature in different Code-Script, viz., 'Sakal', 'Sundar', 'Parimandalya', 'Anka', 'Subhadra', 'Hans', etc. These scripts were prepared on the basis of substitution method.

Mahanubhav literature is very rich. So many works of the Mahanubhavas still remain unpublished. V.B. Kolate, Ann Feldhaus, Raeside, H.N. Nene, W.N. Deshpande, S.C. Tulpule and R.C. Dhere are some of the important scholars who have critically edited and published the works of the Mahanubhavas.

Mahanubhav manuscripts are preserved in the Marathi Department of Marathwada University, Aurangabad; Gopiraj Mahant library, Rudhipur (District Amravati), Mahanubhav Ashram, Aurangabad, and Shrikrishna Gitaashram, Hyderabad (Andhra Pradesh).

MAHAPATRA, CHAKRADHAR (Oriya; b. 1908), literary critic, compiler of folk literature, and editor of the works of old anonymous writers, was born in an aristocratic family. In 1928 he wrote his first novel Gobara gotei, which, with its preoccupation with social problems, created a sensation. He collected the folk songs of Orissa and published an anthology named Utkala gauli gita. He has to his credit about sixty works which include novels, plays, poems and critical essays. So far only twenty of these works have been published. Some of them are Baneshwar, Balangir, Radang Baxi, Bohunka sukha dukhara gitika, Utkala itihasara eka agyanta adhyaya and Kuntalakumari jivaracharita. Chakradhar Mahapatra was associated with the Jnanakosha Sankalana Samiti of Utkal Univeristy and with the Gitagovinda Sankalana Samiti of the Department of the Cultural Affairs of Orissa.

MAHAPATRA, GODABARISHA (Oriya; b. 1898 d. 1965), poet, short story writer and novelist, was one of the most widely read writers in Orissa. He began with writing poems, following Radhanath Ray, a nineteenth century poet and Godabarish Mishra, a poet of the Satyabadi group. Banpur (1918), Prabhata kusuma (1920) and Je phula phuti thila are the collections of his early poems. Later he distinguished himself as a satirist and attracted the readers with his rich sense of humour. He began to edit a satirical magazine called Niankhunta. Collections of his later poems include He mora kalama (Oh, my pen, 1951), Handisalar biplaba (Revolt in the kitchen, 1952), Kanta o phula (Thorns and flowers, 1958), Pahachatalara ghasa (Grass blades under the feet), Utha kankala (Rise Oh, skeleton, 1961) and Banka o sidha (The crooked and the straight, 1964). Banka o sidha won him posthumously the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1966. His satirical poems are about the socio-political aspects of contemporary life. His literary satires are at times too personal to be more than lampoons. But his poems, 'Pecha' (The owl), 'Chati', 'Shaguna' (The vulture) and 'Garibara Durgastaba' (A poor man's prayer to Goddess Durga) are effective and do have qualities of literary satires. In 'Utha kankala' he tried to awaken patriotic feelings in the heart of his countrymen by recounting the glory of ancient Orissa. In the realm of Oriya short story also his contribution is remarkable. Short stories like 'Mu dine mantri thili' (Once I was a minister), 'Magunira sagada' (A bullock cart of Maguni) and 'Nila Mastrani' (Nila, the school mistress) are some of the best short stories in Oriya. The problems of rural life are dealt with in his short stories with a satirical note. His novels like Rajadrohi and Prema pathe are also remarkable. Moreover, Godabarisha Mohapatra was the only litterateur in Orissa who succeeded in making his writing a vocation by itself.

When Oriya became a medium of instruction in schools and colleges he distinguished himself by writing textbooks of science for students. His language is simple for which reason his works are very popular. He is perhaps the most distinguished writer of science fiction in Oriya

MAHAPATRA, HARIHAR (Oriya; b. 1904), poet and a member of the Sabuja Sahitya Samiti, was educated at Ravenshaw College and studied English for his M.A. He also studied Law, started his career as a lawyer and later became a Justice of the Patna High Court. He is now President of the Orisa Sangeet Natak Akademi. His poems, 'Ya yatri' (Proceed, Oh traveller), 'Bhagna bina' (The broken lyre), 'Aji go' (Today, my dear), 'Mu' (Myself), 'Paichi' (I have got it), 'Phula sakhi' (Flower darling) 'Bhara nai kule' (By the flooded river), noted for their simplicity and romantic sentiments, were placed in the anthology of Sabuja Kabita. He was Chairman of the Sabuja Samiti and edited their hand-written magazines Abakasha and Sadhana (subsequently, Saktisadhana). He was a co-writer of the novel Basanti. He edited Yugabina (1933), the sole periodical of the Sabuja writers. This periodical brought a new epoch in Oriya short stories and essays. Harihara is a great organiser and is associated with the Prajatantra Prachara Samiti, the Kalabikasha Kendra and the Utkal Sahitya Samaja—three outstanding cultural institutions of Orissa.

MAHAPATRA, JADHUMANI (Oriya; b. 1781. d. 1886), born in a poor carpenter family, was educated in the traditional Sanskrit school and qualified himself as a brilliant scholar in the Sanskrit and Oriya literatures. He was a great literary artist and a wit like Birbal. His best work is Prabandha purnachandra in which he narrates the episode of Krishna's marriage with Rukhmini. This poem is modelled after the 'riti' style of the Ornate Age of Oriya literature. Another such poem is Raghava bilasa. Both these poems exhibit Oriya 'alankara' (rhetorics). He also composed more than a hundred humorous poems.

Most of his witty and humorous utterances have been compiled and published as Jadumani rahasya (Humour of Jadumani).

The poet was bold enough to make satirical jokes about his patron kings. He never cared if he was liked or disliked for his straight-forwardness. His devotional poems and songs are also equally popular like his witty sayings. He was a favourite courtier of the kings of Nayagarh, Khandpara, and some other princely states of Orissa for his wit, extraordinary scholarship and his ability to compose humorous poems instantly.

Do. S.

MAHAPATRA, JAYANTA (English, b. 1928), was educated at Ravenshaw college, Cuttack, and Science College, Patna. He teaches Physics at Shaibabala Women's College in Cuttack (Orissa). He started writing poems rather late but once he started, recognition came pouring in. In 1970, Mahapatra received the second prize in a poetical contest held by the International Who's Who in poetry in London for the poem "The Report Card". In 1975, he was awarded the Jacob Glatstein Memorial Prize from Poetry (Chicago) for a group of his poems published in Poetry. In 1976 he attended the International writing program at the University of Iowa (U.S.A.) as a visiting writer from India. From 1978 to 1985, he visited Australia, Japan and the U.S.S.R. on various cultural awards and in 1986 was a Resident Poet in Italy on a Rockefeller Foundation Award.

His two collections of poems Close the Sky, Ten by Ten (1971) and Svayamvara and Other Poems (1971) show the travail of the poet struggling with his poems and achieving poetic effect largely in playing with words and images. His attempts at precision are unsteady, and consequently words and phrases border on incoherence.

A Father's Hours (1976) is a slim volume of four poems. A Rain of Rites (1976) and Waiting (1979) have poems which show the ripening of Mahapatra's talents and the sharpening of his sensibility. Much of the mist associated with earlier volumes is cleared. There is more concretization, better perception and more maturity in craftsmanship. Now words are employed with restraint and economy. His images and language are natural and organised. The poems have Indian settings, usually in and around Orissa, and carry striking details of common-places, touching the core of the reader's heart.

The False Start (1980) contains some reflective lyrics relating to the poet's life both in India and abroad. They unfold the poet's characteristic meditateness and are less experimental. Here Mahapatra depicts nature to reflect human conditions.

Relationship (1980) won Mahapatra the Sahitya Akademi Award of 1981. It is an epic poem in twelve sections with some striking symbols and metaphors. The poem shows his relationship to his country, its history, its landscape, its religion and culture, its rituals and traditions—and to the shaping myths and monuments of Orissa. The poem has, what the Sahitya Akademi citation says, "awareness of Indian heritage, evocative description, significant reflection and linking of personal reminiscence with race memory." Here poetry seems to come naturally to Mahapatra even if its technique and scope are ambitious. The poem is remarkable for its contemplative mood, its verbal pattern and its sound effects.

Life Signs (1983), Dispossessed Nests (1986) and Burden of Waves and Fruit (1987) show Mahapatra's growing concern with man and his environment communicated quite forcefully. Selected Poems (1987) is a collection of his poems already published in earlier volumes.

He translated a number of poems from Oriya which have been published in volumes: Countermeasures (1973), Wings of the Past (1976) and Song of Kubja and Other Poems (1981). In 1977, he was awarded Bisuva Milana Award for Poetry by the Prajatantra for his translation of Oriya poems into English. His book Orissa (1987) is of a general nature.

Considered in totality, Mahapatra's poetry is quite balanced without having verbal or emotional excesses. With his mastery over the medium, and his clear perception, his images and epithets become more effective. His commitment to the place makes his distinctly Indian voice more pronounced. The Oriya landscape, its temple and ruins are an inexhaustible source of his inspiration—the very life-blood of his poetry. As Mahapatra said: "To

MAHAPATRA, KEDARNATH-MAHAPATRA, NITYANANDA

Orissa, to this land in which my roots lie and lies my past, and in which lie my beginning and end...I acknowledge my debt and relationship."

MAHAPATRA, KEDARNATH (Oriya, b. 1912), well-known historian and an editor of manuscripts, graduated with Honours in History from the Patna University and joined the Archaeology Department of the then princely State of Balangir, Patna. He then became the Curator of the Orissa State Museum and edited the descriptive catalogue of the Sanskrit manuscripts of the Museum, the Smriti manuscripts, and a number of other miscellaneous manuscripts. MAHAPATRA, LAKSHMIKANTA (Oriya, b. 1888, d. 1953) was born in Cuttack and educated at Ravenshaw College, Cuttack, and Ripon College, Calcutta. Soon after his graduation, he fell a victim to leprosy and for about half a century he led a crippled life, full of trials and tribulations. Nevertheless, reading, writing and music remained his main pursuit. He was initiated by a Vaishnava saint called Ramdas Babaji and he spent most of his life in his village at Talapada and Bhadrak. At Talapada he organised a Gopinath Sangeet Samaj. He wrote operas and plays on both mythological and historical themes for performance by this samaj. The institution was active for five years and most of his works were successfully staged by them.

In 1929 he set up a printing press at Bhadrak and in 1936 brought out a monthly journal of humour named Dagaro. The magazine was his prime concern and in it most of his writings were published. He usually wrote under a pseudonym. His works included poems, short stories and political and social satires. Only a few of his writings were published in book form when he was alive. All his writings, however, were published in 1964 in two volumes of Kanta sahityamala.

Though a cripple, he was a vivacious man and an indefatigable writer. He wrote novels, short stories, dramas, stories for children, essays, kirtans, padavalis, social and political satires, etc. He was known particularly as a writer of devotional and patriotic songs. The novel, Kanamamu, was his last novel.

He knew Bengali, Hindi and English, besides Oriya. He is popularly known as Kantakabi and his songs are known as Kanta sangeeta. As a writer of parody, he is second to none. Imitating the bunch of poems Kishore chandrananda champu of Kavisurya Baladev he composed Chatak chandrasahas champu.

MAHAPATRA, NITYANANDA (Oriya, b. 1912), had no formal education but is well-versed in Vaishnava philosophy and in Hindi, Bengali and Oriya literatures. He joined the freedom movement in 1930, and was imprisoned several times. In 1936 he became the Editor of Dagaro and in 1945 of the Dainik asha. His Swaraj pala (1930) and Swaraj samhita (1948), political in content and traditional in literary form, were instrumental in infusing patriotic feelings among people. The former and also his story 'Mausi' (1934) were proscribed by the British Government. Panchajana (1947) and Kalaradi (1954), two of his verse collections were also written in the same political and patriotic vein. His only collection of love-lyrics Marama (1948) deals with subtle feelings of a love-lorn heart. He also wrote a play, Harijan mandir-prabesh (1955), and a collection of short biographies Bharat bhagya bidhata (1957). His ability to write successful belle lettres in Oriya is displayed in Patra o pratima (The epistle and the idol, 1956) and Kabipriyasu (To the poet's beloved, 1964). But it is in prose-fiction that his artistic ability finds full and better expression. The themes of his novels and stories are varied and his style different. Psychological aspects of love and human relationships are depicted in his novels like Bhul (Mistake, 1935), Jianta manish (Men alive, 1947), and Pirati patha khasada (Slippery is love's path, 1949). A real picture of social change during the pre-Independence and post-Independence days has been drawn in his trilogy, Hiamati (1948), Bhanga hara (Broken bones, 1955) and Gharadiha (Homestead land, 1975) for which he won the Sahitya Akademi award. Jibanar lakshya (The aim of life, 1946) and Sukhara sandhane (In quest of happiness, 1948), although they are like fantasies, express an idealistic view of life. His latest novel is hagiographical, Naham tisthami baikunthe (I am not in the Vaikuntha, 1977). Four of the story-collections are well-known: Egarata (Eleven stories, 1947), Kshanika (Transients, 1948), Dhala gara kala gara (White line black line, 1976) and Akhi nahin kana nahin (Blindfold, no fault of mine, 1978).

MAHAPATRA, SITAKANTA—MAHAPRASTHANAM

MAHAPATRA, SITAKANTA (Oriya; b. 1937) poet, essayist and translator, obtained his M.A. in Political Science from the University of Allahabad and joined the Indian Administrative Service in 1961. He then studied at Cambridge University. He also held a Homi Bhabha Fellowship (1975-77) for studying the modernisation process of the primitive communities of Orissa. Presently he is Home Commissioner to the Government of Orissa. He published his first collection of poems, Dipti o dyuti (Radiance and glow) in 1963. It contains some well-known poems like 'Basra darpanare suryasta' and 'Jarasabarara sangita'. Ashtapadi (1967) comprises eight long poems which draw heavily on Indian and world mythology in respect of their imagery and insights. The model is obviously T.S. Eliot. Similar efforts in Modern Oriya poetry had been made before by Guruprasad Mohanti in his 'Kalapurusha' and other poems. Several passages in Ashtapadi bear close resemblance, both thematic and rhythmic, to passages in Guruprasad's poems.

The success of Ashtapadi, therefore, does not consist in any technical innovation on the part of the poet. Rather it relates to the fund of scholarship the poet brought into modern Oriya poetry, a scholarship which is impressive in its range and variety. Secondly, Ashtapadi made the writing of long poems quite fashionable. The book, however, is the first elaborate statement of Sitakanta's themes: Time, Death, Redemption. His next Sabdara akash (Sky of words) won him the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1974. It explores these themes with characteristic vigour. The Eliotian death-in-life condition is still the poet's major concern. But a faint gleam of hope is already visible in the surrounding darkness. The poems in Sabdara akash are relatively free from the verbosity of Ashtapadi and are formally better executed. In Samudra (Sea, 1977) and Chitranadi (Painted river, 1979) the hope of man's redemption is more pronounced. In these two collections the thematic concerns of the poem 'Solon' in Ashtapadi are further elaborated. The speaker, very much the lonely man on an island like Solon, seeks to establish a meaningful relationship with the sea, the symbol of the welter of human experiences, in a bid to transcend it. He struggles to conquer time in time. The sea is also the symbol of the depth and power of individual consciousness. But the world of Sitakanta is so much steeped in myth and rituals that the familiar world, the one in time, is lost sight of. Instead of experiencing a sense of release the reader feels as if he has been led into a blind alley. The language and the imagery are repetitive. The same is the drawback of Chitranadi but for its replacement of the sea metaphor by the river. The old man who appears again and again on the scene is no other than Solon.

S.K.M.

MAHAPRASTHANAM (Telugu), published originally in 1950, is a collection of modernist progressive poems composed by 'Sri Sri', the spearhead of Progressive Movement in Telugu poetry. These poems composed between June 1933 and June 1947 had been popular long before they appeared in the anthology and earned for him the honorific of 'Mahakavi' even before a single work appeared. Starting under the influence of romantic poets like Krishna Sastry, Sri Sri soon emerged from imitation of models to the originality of poetic creation. The first modernist poem, 'Jayabheri', was composed in 1933. The forty odd poems included in the volume are indicative of a new urge and a new spirit in Telugu poetry.

In 'Jayabheri' the poet announces the triumph of modernism over the traditional and the romantic. The 'I' of the poem is symbolic of the worker who has shaped the world over the centuries, laying a piece of sacred wood in the fire of the world, shedding a lone teardrop for the cosmic downpour and living through the heat of the summer and the cold of the winter. The poet finally declares that the worker will in the future flower like the white petal of the lily of the world, and rise like the banner of the mansion of the world.

In the prosody (Mythala saralu) used and the unequivocal preference for the forces of future, Sri Sri truly turns modern. In another poem, 'Oka Ratri', composed after a bout of typhoid, the poet expresses a sense of personal fear. The moonlight, which delighted countless romantic poets, appears in his mental state to frighten him to no end. The modernism in the poem expresses itself in the use of strikingly original imagery. The moonlight appears to spread like smoke, suggestive of the smoke of the cemetery. The motionless mountain is like the carcass of an elephant and the moon is like a lone legless camel. The poet adopts the technique of projecting his mental condition into the manifestations of nature described by I.A. Richards as empathy.

In the early stages of his works, Sri Sri was deeply influenced by the poets of the Symbolist movement like Baudelaire; in fact, he once described Baudelaire, Maupassant and Poe as his literary trinity. He was also impressed by the skilful manipulation of sound in the works of Poe and Swinburne. In this volume are included transcreations of Poe's 'The Bells' ('Gantalu'), Swinburne's 'A Match' ('Aswaitam') and Emile Verhaeren's 'Les Pauvres' ('Pedalu'). Sri Sri also wrote a poem in praise of Swinburne (1936). When the Soviet Air France went into action in 1941, during World War II, Sri Sri wrote a plain panegyric, 'Garchinchu Russia' which is matchless. An introspective poem, 'Deni koraku', presents the poet as a seeker of truths overlooked by the majority of people. Short pieces like 'Ah!', 'Chedu pata', 'Nijamgana', 'Asadtalu' and 'Midhyavadi', portray the changing moods of the poet.

The enduring popularity of the poet with the masses and his exalted reputation with the critics are based on no more than ten pieces of poetry included in this collection. The best of his poems were written before he was forty, and during the three decades after the publication of the collection, he became a celebrity, a rallying point for poets with a social purpose and commitment. Among his more lasting poems mention may be made of the first modernist poem, 'Jayabheri', in which he symbolically indicated the emergence of new forces and a new world order. His vigorous song of revolution 'Mahaparaasthanam', was composed on April 12, 1934. His restless soul had searched for a modern theme and modern prosody to express the economic anarchy in the world. During the formative period he was influenced by his wide reading in literatures of the world, like the poems of Robert Burns, Alexander Blol's 'The Twelve', Harindranath Chattopadhyay's 'Shuru hua hai', Sishtla's 'Maro maro' Gurazada's 'Mutyalu saralu', Shankara Acharya's 'Bhaja Govindam' and more importantly, Nazrul Islam's marching song, 'Chal chal'. Both in theme and in prosody, Sri Sri certainly drew from the poems mentioned but his poem possesses a vigour, a verve and force all its own. He gave a clarion call in the song to the millhand and the farmhand to unite and forge ahead for establishing a classless society. Setting himself spiritedly against vested interests and scorning the old decaying order, he urged the youth, full of the strength and energy to march forward. He also called upon the downtrodden to notice.

"The sheen of the crown of fire the dazzle of the Red Flag and the glow of the Sacrificial Fire..."

For the other world, while he was undoubtedly progressivist in his attitude by taking the side of 'the betrayed brother' in society, the poet employed traditional symbols to serve a modern purpose. The poem is replete with the symbols of the sacred thread, the suffering of blood, the buffalo of Yama, the seven horses of the Sun, the dancing Shiva, all of which appear to raise the urge for revolution above the immediacy of the political context to the timelessness of human aspiration for equality. The traditional symbolism comes to the fore again in 'Avataram' (1934). Owing to a certain confusion in the poet's mind about the precise significance of the symbols employed, they came to be interpreted at least in three different ways, but the ultimate symbol refers to the birth of the New Order.

'Rukkulu', 'Kavita o kavita' and 'Nava kavita' lay down the poetic credo of Sri Sri in announcing that everything—including used up soapcake,—is a fit subject for poesy. The pathetic plight of a lone traveller in the soulless city is portrayed in 'Batasari'. In 'I', a poem written under the influence of a poem by Nazrul, the poet declares himself as a spirit supernal, a sacred thread, suggesting that he is a blend of the modern and the traditional. In 'Pratijna' he declared his resolve to till the land and extract gold from it and ensure suitable distribution of wealth. 'Dshacharitrulu' is a poetic paraphrase of the Marxist interpretation of history as a story of exploitation, drenched in bloodshed and human tears. He pointedly questions, 'Pray, who are the common folk that lifted stones for the construction of the Taj?' In 'Jagannatha ratha chakralu' (1947), he announced the arrival of the chariot of the Lord to redress economic imbalances.

The other poems in the volume are of varying quality. 'Keka' (1939) is a disturbing cry of the lonely human soul, full of pathos and anguish. The sense of loneliness in this poem and the first lines of 'Akasha dipam', 'No one in the room; the reign of silence'—recall the Baudelairean sense of isolation. 'Nidalu' is symbolic of the shadows of misery in the lives of the common folk: 'Vyatyasam', 'Vaddu' and 'Parajitulu' describe the gulf between the rich and the poor and the plight of the miserable. Bhikshuyarshiyasi (1934) is a pulsating portrait of an old, helpless woman, whose death touches no human heart and is a picture of grief. The last poem is one of the dedication, written in memory of the poet's friend and mentor, K. Janardana Rao, in which he expresses his discontent with the crass insolence of a callous world. 'Mithyavadi' is a satire on the escapists who dismiss the world as illusion.

In spite of the varying artistic quality of the poems in the volume, the poems stirred the imagination of the young, and roused them to purposive action to end exploitation. But it would be erroneous to treat Sri Sri merely as a practitioner of applied poetry, his sole concern being with the content of poetry. A passionate votary of the art of expression and the aesthetics of articulation, Sri Sri described man as the worshipper of beauty—beauty in poetry, in sculpture, in worm and flower as well. The poet does not need any props. In his best pieces, he is able to achieve that fusion of the medium and the message, which is the crown and glory of all poetic quest.

The anthology first published in 1950 from Machilipatnam, with a certificate of Merit from Chalam, ran into sixteen editions brought out by Vishalandhara Publishing

MAHAPURANA-MAHARAJA AJITSINHA

House, the latest being the edition brought out in June 1981. An exhaustive criticism on the work appears in Miriyala Ramakrishna's doctoral work on the poet; Sri Sri kavitvam (1980).

MAHAPURANA (Sanskrit), also known as Trishashtilakshanamahapurana-sangraha, is a great epic composed by Jinasena, 9th century Digambara Jaina mendicant, and his disciple Gunabhadra who completed it after his guru's death.

Mahapurana is mainly a hagiographical poem which narrates the lives of sixty-three 'Shataka-purushas' (Outstanding personalities) viz. twenty-four Tirthankaras, twelve Chakravartins, nine Balabhadras, nine Narayanas, and nine Pratinarayanans; it is also a purana, an encyclopaedic work about the 'ancients', and 'moderns', a Jaina encyclopaedia dealing with a vast variety of subject-matters, such as aesthetics, psychology of dream, town planning, statecraft, ritualistic doctrines for Jaina sacramental rites, religious and ethical dogmas and sermons for Jaina laity and mendicants, philosophical expositions and polemics, etc. It is also a storehouse of Jaina legends and mythology and history: rich in description of the major Jaina characters—Tirthankaras, Kulakaras, Chakravartins, etc.—and also popular legends of Rama and Ravana, Krishna and the Pandavas, Bahubati, Brahmadata, Jivandhara, Vasu, Narada, and many others.

Mahapurana is comprised of seventy-six 'parvans' (chapters) divided into two parts, viz., the Adipurana, comprising forty-seven parvans, dealing with the life of Rishabha, the first Tirthankara, narrating his birth, childhood, reign, expeditions, political judiciousness, spiritual aspirations and preaching of early Jaina fundamentals as an ascetic, as well as the life of his son Bharata, the first Chakravartin, who, following the religious and sociopolitical principles of his father, strengthened the empire as well as the foundation of the early Jaina faith by providing it patronage; and the Uttarapurana comprising the rest, i.e. parvans 48-76, narrating the lives of twenty-three Tirthankaras beginning with Ajitanatha, 11 Chakravartins, 9 Balabhadras, 9 Narayanas, and 9 Pratinarayanans. Uttarapurana is brief: out of the total extant 19207 granthas it includes 7778 granthas only, and Adipurana comprises 11429. Lives of the 8th, 16th, 22nd-24th Tirthankaras are narrated in some details while the narratives about the others are very brief. Jinasena is the author of the parvas 1-43.3 of the Adipurana; while Gunabhadra composed the rest of the Adipurana, i.e. parvas 43.4-47, and the Uttarapurana.

Mahapurana enjoys the authority of a 'secondary canon' to the Digambaras. For its social as well as literary merits it holds the foremost position among the purana and the charita literatures of the Digambaras and the Shvetambaras respectively.

Mahapurana plays a significant social role by advocating for Jaina adoption of Brahmanical culture, which ultimately reduces the theoretical conflicts between the two traditions. With this aim Jinasena prescribes Jaina version of Brahmanical rites, specially those of sacramental nature like 'upanayana' (sacred thread) rite; and attempts to support his views with the attestation of the Vratasamskaras by Rishabha himself by practising which one Jaina becomes a dvija, twice-born.

In Mahapurana the poetic art of Jinasena excels that of Gunabhadra. Jinasena's poetry is of a higher order and often equals if not surpasses the beauty of Kalidasa's expressions. His diction is simple, elegant and vivid. He is a consummate master of versification; nearly sixty different kinds of metres including some new ones (probably his creations) have been used by him. His deft use of poetic ornaments, alankaras—he even has composed verses demonstrating his mastery over the 'chitralankaras' (sketch poetry)—and harmonious deployment of the qualities, viz., prasada, ojas and madhurya, and sentiments and modes have made his work enviable. Specially in his description of nature and in devotional poems, stotras, one can witness his outstanding poetic traits—spontaneous overflow of imagination, his love and dedication. But Jinabhadra believed that an ideal piece of literature should aim at propagation of dharma, not mere display of imaginary fabrications and jugglery of words or poetical pedantry. It glitters with the gems of gnomic expressions embedded in the work.

In 1047 A.D. another Mahapurana was written by Mallishena in Sanskrit, and in 10th century an Apabhramsha Mahapurana was composed by Pushpadanta.

MAHARAJA AJITSINHA (Rajasthani; b. 1678, d. 1724). The following works of Maharaja Ajitsinha of Jodhpur are known to us: Gunasar, Bhava virahi, Gaja Uddhar grantha and Durgapatha bhasa. Out of these, Durgapatha is said to be a poetic recreation of Durga saptashati written in Rajasthani mixed with Brajabhasha, during the year 1709, but it is unfortunately not available at present. Gunasar is a compilation containing nine or ten works on various subjects, such as hymns in praise of the mother goddess assuming different forms, deeds of the goddess, destruction of Shumbha and Nishumbha, a thousand names of Bhavani, deeds of Shri Krishna—chiranhara, destruction of Kansa, and love of Radha and Krishna, didactic verses, love and renunciation, miscellaneous dohas depicting the futility and perishableness of the world and lastly, the imaginary love story on the pattern of folk-tales written both in prose and verse, Ratankanwar Ratanawati ri vata. Bhava virahi, too, is a compilation of miscellaneous compositions. The Maharaja had worked on these after the death of his Sisodiya wife. It expresses his thoughts on erotics, heroism and devotion and contains hymns in praise of the Hinglajdevi and the Ganga. Gaja uddhar grantha (published in Parampara, quarterly magazine, Part-17, Jodhpur 1963), is a Puranic work which is based on a similar narrative contained in the Bhagvata. It is in two parts from the point of view of subject matter: the reference of rescuing the elephant (from the beginning to verse No. 345) and the accompanying descriptions, such as the world, its origin, evolution and several other miscellaneous incidents depicting God's greatness. The poetic excellence of the work is contained in dialogues, reproaches, satires and pathetic requests showing helplessness which may be termed as the most impressive ones. Although the poet has shown his devotional feelings equally towards the pairs of Sita-Ram, Radha-Krishna and Shiva-Shakti, treating them as two indivisible parts of the one and the same supernatural and all powerful element, his obvious leanings are more towards the infinite energy in the form of the mother goddess and more especially to 'Hinglajadevi'. This fact stands corroborated from his expressions in favour of the 'Devi' at a number of places. The poet maintains that God does favour his devotee when pleased, but he also does so when annoyed or enraged. The canvas of the subjects of his works is fairly wide. He had a good command over Rajasthani, Braj and Sanskrit. He holds a palce of his own in the tradition of puranic compositions in Rajasthani poetry.

MAHARAJA MANSINHA (Rajasthani; b. 1783, d. 1843). Works composed by Maharaja Mansinha exist in the libraries in the manuscript form, stacked mostly in the Pustak Prakash Library, Jodhpur. The list of his works is a fairly lengthy one, and scholars differ regarding the authorship of some of them. Besides these, some musical compositions assigned to him are also popular. About 800 'padas' of this kind have been published in three parts under the title Man padya sangraha or Vyawaharik atma jnan (published by Shri Ramgopal Mohta of Bikaner).

His poems may be classified as the philosophy of the Nath sect and its devotional aspect, erotics, nature and deeds of Rama and Krishna. Broadly speaking, all his works, long and short, may be thus categorised from the point of view of subject:

(I) Works concerned with the Nath philosophy and devotion:

Shri Jalandharnathji ro charit grantha, Jalandhar chandrodaya, Nathcharita, Nath varnana granth, Man Pandit samvad, Man dasa kathan, Anubhava manjari, Siddha sampradaya granth, Siddha mukta phal, Tej manjari, Prashnottar granth, Panchavali, Siddhaganga, Sarupan ra doha, Kavitta sarupan ra, Doha paramarath ra, Nath kirtan, Sewa sar, Nath Artiyan, Nath stotra, Nathji stuti, Nath pada, Jalandharanathji or astaka, Pushpanjali, Aparadha kshama stotra, Shatackara, Jalandhar jnan sagar, Kavitta paramarath ra. (II) Erotic poetry (dealing with the union and separation of lovers): Doha sanjoga shringar-Desha bhasha mein, Doha Braja bhasha mein, Shringaru Baravai (a kind of metre), Kavitta shringar ra doha-Desha bhasha mein, Doha bhasha Hindustani Punjabi mein. Raga Ratnakar, Mansinha Sahaban ri banagata ra khyal tappa, Shrinagar pad (these have been published under the title—Rasilai Raj ra gita), in Parampara, quarterly journal, pts. 18-19 (Chaupasani, Jodhpur, 1964), Hori hilor, Bahar vatika, (III) Poems pertaining to Rama and Krishna:

Rama vilasa, Krishna vilasa (published by Marawada State Press, Jodhpur), Rasa chandrika. (IV) Nature poetry:

Udyan varnana, Shatartu varnana, (V) Dictionary in verse: Chausai padartha namavali grantha. (VI) Commentary: Vidvad manoranjan tika on Mandukyopanishad.

The following are his popular prose works: Shringar shiromani nam vartamaya, Arama Roshani, Ratana Hamir ri varta. This Rajasthani work has been published by Shri Venkateshwara Press, Bombay. Some scholars maintain that Uttamchand Bhandari authored it (Rajasthan Bharati, quarterly journal, Nos. 3-4; July, 1953, Bikaner). Further research is still needed in this connection. Mansinha is primarily a poet of Nath devotion, nature poetry and erotics. His compositions on Rama and Krishna are more by way of observance of poetic conventions. Devotional expressions of a high order do not find place in this poetry. It is well-known that he was a follower of the Nath sect and had surrendered completely to its devotional aspect. Traditionally speaking, his compositions dealing with the Nath sect are very important. His musical compositions are to set to music in various 'Ragas' and 'Raginis'. This musical aspect of his 'Padas' needs also to be evaluated.

MAHARASHTRA JIBAN PRABHAT (Bengali), published in 1878, is a novel by Rameshchandra Datta. It gives an account of the rise of the Marathas under Shivaji, of how he consolidated his strength by repelling the Mughal forces and of how he frustrated the conspiracy of Aurangzeb. Raghunath's adventurous missions and Jaysimha's role as one of the retinue of the Mughal emperor unfold the salient traits of the Rajput character. The love episode between Raghunath and Saraju, aspirations of Chandrarao and Chandrarao-Lakshmibai-Raghunath triangle, however concocted these might be, have been attuned to the historical string of the main theme.

Rameshchandra Dutta's discovery of the Indian mind (as Nivedita put it), reflected in his other works, also finds expression in this novel in which patriotic zeal and religious sentiments are subtly mixed. It is because of this inner urge that the author did not follow the pattern of English historical novels. He drew a large number of characters and spread the events on a wide canvas. These were intended not so much to develop into a fictional unity but into a pulsating feeling of national integration and zeal. The novelist must be accredited with the skill of depicting vividly the invasion of Simhaghat fort, Shivaji's escape from Delhi, etc. with utmost restraint and precision and sketching the personalities like Sitapati Goswami, Sayesta Khan, Ramasimha, Aurangzeb and others with artistic finish.

MAHARASTRA PURAN (Bengali) or the defeat of Bhaskara is an old Bengali text written in verse by Gangaram in Saka 1662 or 1750 of the Christian era. It was collected by Kedarnath Mazumdar in 1900 from Maymansingh and was published in 1906 by Byomkesh Mustafi in the journal of the Bangiya Sahitya Paraisad. An English translation along with the Bengali text was published by Tamonashchandra Dasgupta in the Journal of the Department of Letters, Vol. XX in 1930. Another

MAHATAB, HAREKRISHNA-MAHAVIRACHARIYA

English version was also published by Pratulchandra Gupta in collaboration with Edward C. Dimock.

The book provides an eye-witness's account of the Maratha raids in Bengal in the eighteenth century. Though the book is written in an old form of verse it is a highly valuable piece of historical writing with a geographical account of West Bengal. The Marathas, better known as the 'Bargis', invaded Bengal again and again. Here is a specimen of the vivid description that Gangaram provides:

The Bargis cut down the hands, noses and ears of their unhappy victims. They also killed many by inflicting deadly blows. The 'Bargis' tied the fingers and neck of fair women with ropes and a number of them caught hold of a single youthful woman and inhumanly treated her with brutal dishonour.

The poet concludes his first canto with an account of the defeat of Bhaskar and his death at Monokara. Whether the story was continued to other cantos is not known. There is a difference of opinion about the identity of Gangaram. Some are of the opinion that he was Gangaram Dutta of Narail in Murshidabad who rendered the Ramayana into Bengali and wrote Ushaharana and Sudam-chitra. Some again hold that he was a resident of Dhanishwar in Kishorgunj, Mymensingh, and that his name was Ganganarayan Dev. He was given the title Chaudhuri by his employer, the ancestor of Ishakhan.

Gangaram was a good poet. His lively, realistic, unemotional description, his restraint, his historical and geographical knowledge deserve praise. Maharashtra puran is invaluable as a document in modern historical research work pertaining to the mediaval period of Bengal.

MAHATAB, HAREKRISHNA (Oriya; b. 1899) is at once a novelist, a story writer, a playwright, a journalist, a poet, an essayist, and above all an eminent historian. He is the author of many books in Oriya and English. Two of his remarkable contributions to Oriya literature are the monthly magazine, Jhankar, and the annual cultural meet, 'Vishva Milana'.

Though brought up in the midst of luxury he was inspired by the ideals of Mahatma Gandhi and joined the Non-Co-operation movement in his youth. While continuing his studies in the College he edited an Oriya monthly, Malaya, and the English weekly, Dustbin. The publication of his Prajatanta began in 1923 as a weekly newspaper. But it was banned by the British Government as it supported Gandhiji's Non-cooperation movement. It was revived in 1947 after India achieved her Independence. During this period of the struggle for freedom, he also published an Oriya periodical, Rachana, and English periodical, Adventure. After Independence The Eastern Times, an English daily, was published under his patronage and it was at that time the only English daily newspaper in Orissa.

His works during this period, especially his novels, short stories and one-act plays, contain pictures of the contemporary society. His autobiography is the living history of modern Orissa. He wrote about the social, political, cultural and economic condition of Orissa in his 'Gan majlish'. This is written in a simple and colloquial language. Besides all these, his history of Orissa is a monumental work. It reveals his scholarship and deep insight into the various periods of the history of Orissa.

His publications include Pratibha, Ahyapara, Tutor, Charichakhyu, Palasi abasane, Atmadan, Shesha ashru, Sadhanar pathe, Nutana dharma, Jibana samasya, Chhayapathar jatri, Gandhiji o Orissa, Dasabarasara Orissa, Odisha itihasa, Tritiya parba, Gan majlish (Parts I and II), Swaggare emergency, Beginning of the End, History of Orissa, and Gandhi, the Political Leader.

MAHAVIRACHARIYA (Prakrit). Like all other 'charita kavyas' of the medieval Prakrit literature, the Mahavirachariya also narrates the life of Tirthankara Mahavira. There are two Mahavirachariyas which were composed in the Prakrit language in the same period. One of them was composed by Gunachandragani in 1082. It is an important piece of poetical composition as well as of folk literature. The later part of the work contains the story of Prince Naravikrama, who, separated from his wife and children, undergoes hardships and is ultimately united with them. This story is noticed in several versions of a Gujarati folk-tale known as 'Chandana-Malayagiri'.

The other Mahavirachariya was written by Nemichandrasuri in 1084. Akhyanamani Kosha, a great treasury of Prakrit stories was also composed by the same author. The text consists of a total number of 2,385 verses. The writer employs an attractive style and profound technique. He narrates all the previous twenty-seven births of the 24th Tirthankara Mahavira.

Previously at the time of the first Tirthankara Rishabhadeva, Mahavira in his 27th birth was living as an ordinary man by the name of Marichi in the city of Ayodhya. On hearing the prophecy of the first Tirthankara that he (Marichi) would be the last and 24th Tirthankara, Marichi began to dance in ecstasy. Owing to his false faith and pride he was caught in the cycle of life and death. He had to go through various sufferings and pains. In hell he was tormented by many infernal beings (fiends) who were his enemies in previous birth. He also suffered great afflictions. Being born amongst lower animals opposed to each other by birth, they had to undergo the gagging, piercing, beating, splitting of the body and the life. Even in human form, a man who is suppressed pines for freedom from anguish. Born in the world of gods, he is still envious of the lot of others, who are prosperous and happy. Marichi founded many sects and beliefs. He continued to lead this sort of life, till he was brought on the right faith and righteous life. Ultimately the right faith led him to life of eternal peace and true happiness. It is the attachment that involved him in mundane affairs.

The story begins with a householder. In the Videhakshetra there was the beautiful and prosperous city of Balihipura. Once the religious 'shravakas' of the city went out to collect wood from the forest by the order of the king. He saw there a Jainacharya with his pupils wandering here and there. They had been misled. The woodcutter guided them in the right direction to a village. The Jain saints blessed him and instructed him in the principles of righteous moral life. He began to practise the principles. In consequence in his next birth he was born as the son of the great emperor Bharata, after whom India is called 'Bharatavarsha'. The writer succeeds in his attempt to make the Mahavirachariya interesting. The theme is lively and moving, atmosphere colourful and characterisation convincing.

The Mahavirachariya of Gunachandragani consists of eight cantos (prastavas). The main theme of the work revolves round Tirthankara Mahavira. The stories of Harivarman, Satyashreshthi, Surendradatta, Vasavadatta, Jinapalita, Ravipala, Korantaka, Kamadeva, Sagardeva, Sagaradatta, Jinadasa and Sadhurakshita, etc. are secondary. These stories have been written with a view to bringing out the importance of 'vratas'. The descriptions of Kapila's and Marichi's deeds are vivid and the language employed is forceful. All of the stories are amusing and interesting. A network of complex and intricate events has been spread over the main theme. The work is successful from the point of view of plot-construction also. The various figures of speech and the appropriate metres employed in the work make it a perfect piece of art.

The main theme of both the works is to depict the life of Tirthankara Mahavira, but diverse stories have been knit together to make it a composite whole. These diverse stories depict great conflicts of different characters. At the end, the hero renounces the world and attains 'nirvana' (emancipation).

MAHAYATRA (Oriya) is an incomplete epic by Radhanath Rai. The first Canto of the epic first appeared in the journal, Utkala prava in 1892, and the complete work in the form of a book containing seven Cantos appeared in 1886.

This work is considered to be the masterpiece of the poet. The poem begins with an invocation to the Goddess of learning begging her to tell the poet what happened to Yudhisthira when he heard the news of the passing away of Shri Krishna after the destruction of the tribe of Jadu. Then the poet describes Yudhisthira's aversion to worldly affairs and his decision to set out on the last journey to the Himalayas. His four brothers and wife also accompany him in his visit to different sacred places of India before their departure from the mundane world.

In the second Canto we find the Pandavas' visit to places like Mathura, Prayag, Kashi, Ayodhya, Gaya, Rajgiri, Kalighat, Kamarup, Kapilashrama, starting from Hastinapura. At Puri, Agni, the God of fire, appears from the ocean before them and asks Arjuna to throw his famous bow and quiver into the ocean. Arjuna does as he is told. The Pandavas then set out towards the West along the bank of the river Mahanadi. The landscape is full of wonderful scenic beauty. They pass through dense forests and mountains and by gorges and waterfalls. The entire third Canto gives a beautiful description of the natural scenery of Orissa, covering the entire Mahanadi Valley and the table-land of Madhya Pradesh where the Pandavas visit the hermitages of saints. In course of the journey they cross the Satpura range and arrive near the shore of the Tapti, and reach the top of the Western Ghats where they rest.

With the help of Agni they are able to have the vision of the assembly of the gods where Righteousness, Bravery, Truth, Justice, Austerity, Forgiveness, Kindness, Purity, Renunciation and Simplicity personified along with the Goddess of Learning (Saraswati) and Wealth (Lakshmi) are seated. There Kali representing his Age arrives along with his associates viz., Lust, Anger, Greed, Vanity, Envy, Falsehood, Treachery, Quarrel and Idleness, who cause the moral degeneration of the Indians.

The last three Cantos centre round the history of India. By virtue of an ointment applied to their eyes by Lord Agni the Pandavas have a glimpse into the future of India. The poet describes how the downfall of India will be caused due to the fall of the Brahmins and the Kshatriyas. The incarnation of Lord Buddha to revive the lost glory of Hinduism and Ashoka's preaching of Buddha's Gospel also will not be effective. Quarrel among the Hindus will be the cause of their loss of independence and foreign rule will be the inevitable consequence.

In the sixth and seventh Cantos the poet describes the arrangement for the second Battle of Tirori arising out of the quarrel between Jayachandra and Prithwiraj in Delhi where warriors from different parts of India arrive. All the generals advise Prithwiraj to conclude a treaty with the invaders. This is vehemently opposed by Amar Singh, one of the Chieftains. Then the warriors are led to the battle-field.

A fierce battle takes place between the Aryans and the foreign powers and finally ends with the defeat of the Aryans. Here the poem comes to an end.

Though incomplete the work reveals the excellence of the imagination of the poet which combines the mythical and historical elements. The poet's patriotism and love for the beauty of nature have been very successfully expressed by means of an entirely new metrical system. This newly introduced metre called amitrakhyra chhanda (blank verse), reminds us of the blank verse Milton used in his Paradise Lost. His description of the beauty of nature is unique and shows his keen sense of observation and aesthetic sensibility. The incomplete epic is written in a highly Sanskritised diction and dignified style befitting the subject-matter.

MAHBUBANI, GOVERDHAN ASUMAL 'BHARATI' (Sindhi; b. 1929) is a poet and short story writer. He was born at the village Arazi in Western Sindh. He was brought up in an idealistic atmosphere in a family dedicated to the noble profession of teaching.

A couple of deaths occurred in his family, including that of his mother, when he was only six years old and this left a sense of sadness and melancholy in his mind, which is reflected in his writings throughout. "I have, therefore, carried with me all along a sense of self-denial and self-torment", he says.

At a very early age, the stage became his first love. It is really interesting to note that Govardhan and his five brothers among themselves formed a theatre group and produced plays on commercial basis. Young Goverdhan played both comic and serious roles.

The other influence that shaped the course of his life and thought was his great fascination for village festivals. On such occasions he enjoyed the Sindhi 'Bhagat' (a mix of folk-music, dance and story-narration) which has remained traditionally the most absorbing mode of entertainment of the folks.

The academic career of Goverdhan was brilliant. He matriculated from the Bombay University in the year 1946 with distinction, obtaining second rank in whole of Sindh. He obtained his B.A. degree from the Agra University subsequently.

Then a tragedy overtook him. While he was studying in the First Year Arts, the deadly disease tuberculosis, struck him. To his utter shock and dismay, he was advised to give up the stage.

The creative writer in him led him to a new medium of self-expression. He turned to literature. He read poetry in Hindi and Urdu and was inspired to compose poems.

After the partition, his family migrated to India and he settled down at Ajmer. As good luck would have it, he found himself in the company of two great literary personalities, Fatehchand Vaswani and Tirath Basant.

The first created in him love for his language and literature, and the other, an intellectual of high calibre and vast knowledge, radically influenced the young man and widened his literary horizon.

Goverdhan started writing poetry with patriotic fervour. His emotion-charged lucid and lyrical long poems first appeared in a local weekly, Hindu Bhumi, under a fictitious name "Bharati", which later on he adopted as his pen-name.

Love for poetry drew him to great poets like Kabir, Tulsidas, Sur, Mahadevi, Dinkar and others from whom he drew inspiration. Narayan Shyam, the foremost Sindhi poet, was also a source of inspiration to him, whom he considers as his mentor.

He took up a job in the Railway administration at Ajmer for his livelihood, but plunged in the literary and cultural field. He built up a cultural troupe which gave performances of music, dance, drama, mostly programmed and directed by him.

Goverdhan, basically a lyrical poet, is a versatile writer, who has ventured in fiction, drama, and even juvenile literature which has won him prizes. He has composed songs for at least eight Sindhi films. He has also written scripts for Radio and T.V.

Goverdhan Bharati's literary output is quite substantial—12 collections of poems, 2 collections of short stories, 2 books of dramas and 2 of children's literature. He has also written scripts of eleven dance ballets, directed and produced at least seventeen plays and acted in many of them.

He was awarded the Akhil Bharat Sindhi Boli Ain Sahit Sabha's Prize for 1987. His works include: Poetry: Katha Ud'eralaji (1947), Gula ain mukhriyun (1956), Utha Minha Malir (1966), Peke hali vendi sain, Kano bi aghano, Agriyuni ja agivana (1973), Ud'ur pakhi albella (1974), Lad'o lad'i anindo (1975), Latri lakhan ji (1976), Santan jo sardar Kanwar (1976); O! Rama Pir, Kauro dunhon ain tanhai (1980). Short Stories: Pilo chandu lal dagh (1966), Pandhu purano, wata naeen. Drama: Tufani Raat (1962), Bigriyal gharu (1972), Children's literature: Latiyun (Poems, 1958), Naeen basti (Stories, 1963).

MAHENDRA VIKRAMA VARMAN (Sanskrit; b. 580 A.D., d. 630 A.D.) was a king who belonged to the Pallava dynasty which ruled in South India. He was a person endowed with many talents. He was a great soldier, Sanskrit playwright, builder of cave-temples and author of inscriptions. In his own assessment he was a Vichitrachitta (endowed with a versatile mind). His Sanskrit play Mattavilasa prahasanam (A farce on the antics of the drunkard) is a hilarious piece in one Act, which nevertheless, is a critique of different religious sects which existed in the area at that time. The play ends with praise for the king who happens to be the royal author himself. The Mattavilasa was a part of the kutiyattam repertory of the Chakyars of Kerala. Tradition has it that Mahendra Vikrama was a Jain converted into a Shaivite. The Shaivite leanings of the play are obvious. The play partakes of the technical peculiarity of the South Indian Sanskrit play. The Mattavilasa is one of the two earliest Sanskrit plays from South India, the other being Bodhayana's Bhagavadajjukiyam.

MAHESHABANI (Maithili). The term 'Maheshabani' or its 'tatsama' form 'Maheshavani' means the 'vani' (sayings or songs) addressed to or relating to 'Mahesha' (the great Lord Shiva). It is a sort of a folk-song about the life of Shiva and his family. It usually ends with some benedictory remarks or prayers. On that account it may be assigned to the category of devotional songs. Yet it is said to differ from 'Nachari' in as much as it is more poetic than devotional.

The word Maheshabani is first noticed in Ushaharana natika of Ratnapani (1800-1860): "Banasurah paribhashika Maheshavaya Shankaram prarthayati". This indicates that this term had already assumed some technical meaning. But it is not clear whether the range of its meaning in coterminus with that of Nachari. Consequently an interesting controversy has gone on for long. Without going deep into the controversy, it can safely be said that originally Nachari included all types of dancing songs, devotional or erotic. Later on it was restricted to the dancing songs relating to Shiva and his family. Towards the end of the 17th century a new term Maheshabani came in vogue perhaps as a synonym for Nachari. It was perhaps Mahamahopadhyaya Umesh Mishra who propounded the difference between Nachari and Maheshabani, though a number of scholars as well as laymen take both the terms as synonymous. According to Jayakanta Mishra, however, there is really a marked distinction between the two. Nachari is directly devotional; the Maheshabani is merely a song about Shiva. Maheshabani is frequently addressed to Mena (called 'Manaini' in Maithili), the mother of Gauri, and represents songs in honour of the marriage of Shiva and Gauri or those of Shiva's family life. On the other hand, the Nacharis are distinguished as being direct prayers to Shiva. Whatever be the controversy, it seems certain that there are two distinct types of songs relating to Shiva as explained above, and we are free to use the two terms for the two types of songs.

Almost all elements in Maheshabani are drawn from the myths of Shiva. He bears Ganga, matted hair and crescent moon on his head. His third eye emits fire, snakes intertwine his body, smeared with ashes of burnt up bodies. He wraps himself up in a piece of elephant's or tiger's hide. He wears a necklace of human skulls. A trident and a wooden club (called khatvanga, Maithili 'khatang') are his weapons. He rides on an old bull. He lives in cemetery in the company of goblins. Poison and intoxicating drugs like aka, dhuthura, bhang and gaja are his food. He is an ascetic and lives on begging. Dancing in concert with damaru (string-drum) in his hobby. In his old age, he loved and married Gauri, daughter of the great mountain Himalaya and Mena (or Mainani). He loved Gauri so much so that he is said to have coalesced his body and soul with that of Gauri, resulting in a queer figure, half male and half female (called 'ardhanarishvara').

With these basic elements Maheshabani deals with a number of episodes in the amorous and curious life of Shiva and Gauri, such as premarital love, meeting in disguise, lamentation of Mena on the choice of such an odd bridegroom, accusations hurled on Narada who was instrumental in the marriage negotiation, awkward marital ceremonies and rituals, miseries suffered by Gauri owing to Shiva's poverty and lazy life, troubles created by unruly sons and domestic animals, etc.

The above elements have a long tradition right from

MAHESHVARASURI—MAHIMA DHARMA

Kalidasa to Tulsidas. Nevertheless, Maheshabani has ingredients peculiar to it only. During the writing of Maheshabani, the people of Mithila saw their own social and economic life reflected in the myth of Shiva. In Maheshabani, therefore, Shiva is treated as if he is a typical member of the contemporary Mithila community. The social evil of an uneven marriage is reflected in the marriage of youthful Gauri and old Shiva. Gauri alone was not a victim of poverty; all Mithila suffered from it. Besides, bhang and gaja were common evils in Mithila life. It is this affinity with the Shiva life that drew the poets of Mithila to Maheshabani.

MAHESHVARASURI (Prakrit; 11th century) was the pupil of Sajjana Upadhyaya, and author of Nanapanchamikahao in Prakrit. According to Acharya Jinavijaya Muni he also wrote Pupphavai Kaha. Nothing more about him and his life is known.

Nanapanchamikahao is the only work available on the strength of which his poetic gifts are assessed. He was a scholar and wielded a facile pen. His Prakrit is simple and yet forceful. He is a master of racy style and though he used only one matra, he handled it with skill and firmness. His punctilious use of grammar is also exemplary and his knowledge of the Jain canon profound.

Further, his defence of the institution of the fourfold Sangha, as established by Mahavira, is very effective. Besides, his plea for the use of Prakrit is spirited.

Maheshwari was born at Sriganganagar in the northern part of Rajasthan. After his school education, he moved to Calcutta where he studied and also taught for five years (1956-61) at Vidyasagar College for Women. Since 1961 he has been with the University Department of Hindi, Jaipur.

He is always at home among old books and old manuscripts. This native preference for them has led him to obtain his Ph.D. and also D.Litt in the areas which had hitherto remained the areas of darkness for the common reader. Through his new studies he brought to the fore the long-forgotten glories of Rajasthani language and its literature. On this count, his name has become inseparable from the literature of Rajasthan. Further, in association with Rawat Saraswat, and through their literary organisation, Rajasthan Bhasha Prachar Sabha, he has worked indefatigably for the promotion of this literature. He is also a well-known scholar of Hindi literature, particularly the old and medieval literature.

His indispensable scholarly trilogy in Hindi comprises: Rajasthani bhasha aur sahitya (1960), Jambhoji, Vishnoi sampradaya aur sahitya, 2nd volume (1970) and Jambhoji ki shabad vani: mool aur tika (1975). He strengthened his reputation further by writing History of Rajasthani Literature (1980), published by Sahitya Akademi, of which he has been a member of Executive Board for Rajasthani. His other works of importance are Jambhoji (Hindi, 1981) and Barhath Isardas (Hindi, 1985) published by Sahitya Akademi under the 'Makers of Indian Literature' series. A few well-known Rajasthani books edited by him or in collaboration are: Retro het (1986), Aaj ki kavitan (1987) and Sanskritika Rajasthan, Part-I (1982).

For his sterling services to Rajasthani literature, he has been honoured by the Rajasthan Sahitya Academy (Sangam), Udaipur Critic Circle of India, Calcutta, Satsahitya Prakashan, Calcutta, Sri Vishnoi (Bishnoi) Sabha, Hissar (Haryana) and several other bodies.

MAHIMA BHATTA (Sanskrit; b. 1000-1450) was the author of Vyaktiviveka. Though sometimes referred to as Mahimaka and Mahima, he is popularly known as 'Vyaktivivekakara' (author of the Vyaktiviveka). He was the son of Shridhariya and pupil of Shyamilaka. Besides being a poet, a literary connoisseur and critic, he was a great teacher who wrote Vyaktiviveka to enlighten his grand-children. He wrote one more work Tattvotikosh, termed as shastra, which dealt inter alia with the nature of creative genius, which is now lost.

Mahima's emergence represents a landmark in the history of Sanskrit literary criticism. He displayed extraordinary command over grammar, Nyaya, Mimamsa and poetics. He is known for his exposition of the inferential character of poetic meaning. He is a logician among poeticians. He closely follows Shankuka. Though mostly believed to be a logician of Naiyakika brand, modern scholars tend to take him as following Bhartrihari's school of grammarians or Kashmir Shaivism. In fairness, he shows unmistakable signs of his propensity towards monistic Shaivism of Kashmir. He exercised deep influence on the later writers, as is evident from the writings of Bhatta Gopala, a commentator of the Kavyaprakasha.

MAHIMA DHARMA (Oriya) or Satya Santan Mahima Dharma, as it is otherwise known, is basically a synthesis of Hinduism and Buddhism. Mahima Goswami was its founder. It is both satya (true) and sanatana (eternal). Mahima Goswami's teachings and principles have been powerfully embodied in the various writings and compositions of Bhim Bhoi, a devotee poet and also an ardent follower of Mahima Dharma.

MAHIYARIYA, NATHUSINHA-MAHJOOR, GHULAM AHMAD

It is said Mahima Goswami was born in the Himlayan region and lived there and practised Atmajoga Samadhi. Later on he travelled across Uttar Pradesh, Bihar and many other lands and lastly set his foot on Orissa and reached Puri. There is also another view that Mahima Goswami was an Oriya and he appeared first at Puri and was known as Achari Vaishnab in the beginning. After spending 12 years in Puri travelling over the adjoining places, Mahima Goswami came to Kapilas in Dhenkanal in 1938. Before leaving Puri, Mahima Goswami and Mukanda Das spent some years in Khandagiri near Bhubaneswar. From Khandagiri Mahima Goswami visited Cuttack and then started for Kapilas. Kapilas is one of the famous Shaiva pithas of Orissa, widely known for the worship of Chandrasekhar. The temple was built in 1335.

Here at Kapilas Mahima Goswami spent about 21 years, and this was the peak period of his spiritual experiments. Like Buddhism and Jainism Mahima Dharma also emerged as a reaction against the domination of Brahminism and it was against the worship of idols and dogmatic adherence to the religious rites. According to Mahima Dharma, the reality is an absolute nondual one. This ultimate reality transcends the sphere of forms of God. Several poetical works of Bhim Bhoi, a staunch practitioner of Mahima Dharma provides detailed analysis of Mahima Dharma. From Anama (unnamable) a great void (Sunya) was born. From this void Mahakashī fire, air and water were created. These elements manifested different 'gunas' like 'sattwa' 'raja' and 'tamas'. Even Rama, Krishna and Jagannath were created out of Anama. The Mahima Sanyasins are of two categories: one category renounces the world and forms the class of religious preachers, while the other category of Sanyashins leads a strict ethical life, moving from door to door and from village to village begging. Prayers both at the dawn and dusk and begging for their subsistence form their daily routine. Mahima Dharma prescribes devotion (Bhakti) as the most important path leading to liberation. Mahima Dharma puts emphasis on the ancient eternal belief in Karma. The ultimate reality is possible through bhakti (Devotion) only. The world is an illusion and Brahma is the only reality. Without complete surrender to the omniscient there is no other effective method of attaining liberation. Bhim Bhoi elaborately discussed the ethical essence of Mahima cult in his books Brahma Niripan gita and Stutichintamani. None can give the exact description of Alekh Brahma. Both Bhim Bhoi and Biswanath Baba mention that Brahma is Iswar (God). The question therefore arises as to how nirgun Brahma can at the same time be omniscient and omnipotent. It seems there is a contradiction in the Mahima Cult. Bhim Bhoi was perhaps aware of it; so he attributed this contradiction to Alekha Parama Brahma. The concept of liberation in Mahima Dharma is not isolated from the traditional Indian idea of salvation. In Mahima Dharma, the Brahma Abadhuta is expected to adopt a strict code of conduct: he should be heart and soul devoted to his Guru, restrain himself, should not entertain women, remain aloof from evil thoughts and surrender himself to Parama Brahma. Briefly speaking, Mahima Dharma is a religious cult. It became popular in some parts of Orissa particularly in Dhenkanal, its place of origin. At present there are a few places where Mahima Gadis are installed in Orissa. Annual gatherings are held at such places.

MAHIYARIYA, NATHUSINHA (Rajasthani; b. 1891, d. 1973), also known as 'Nathudan' as is usually the case with the majority of the charans, was born at Udaipur (Rajasthan). Nathusinha is well-known for his Vir satsai, an outstanding contribution to the conventional Dīngal literature. His definition of a hero in the modern sense of the term includes pioneers in politics as well as spiritual devotion. To elucidate the fact, he has rightly said, "Whosoever performs the arduous task of spiritual devotion and the duties of a true Rajput, devotion and chivalry will come to him even uninvited. Both these qualities cannot be claimed as ancestral property." Similarly, he has hailed Mahatma Gandhi as the bravest among the heroes. Though some scholars are of the opinion that Nathusinha has copied Suryamall Mishran, the giant scholar poet of the 19th century, both in spirit and substance, a close look will reveal that this allegation is not quite justified. He has developed his own style and tried to present new thoughts in the modern context. Besides Vir satsai (1933), he has given Hadi shatak (1969), Jhala mian shatak (1976), Karani shatak and Gandhi shatak. His Chunda shatak is still lying unpublished. Except Karani, the medieval deity of the charans and Mahatma Gandhi, the post-Independence subject of eulogy by many a poet, all others are Rajput heroes and heroines whom the charans have been appreciating for their chivalrous deeds for ages. Despite all these limitations, his Vir satsai stands foremost among the Dīngal writings of the present age.

MAHJOOR, GHULAM AHMAD (Kashmiri; b. 1885, d. 1952), the most popular Kashmiri poet of the 20th century, was born at Mitragam (Kashmiri) in a learned family. His father Abdullah Shah, a well-known Persian scholar, imparted him the rudimentary education, and later on sent him to another reputed Persian scholar and poet, Maulana Ali Ganai 'Ashaq' for further education. It was under the tutelage of Ashaq that Ghulam Ahmad Mahjoor developed a keen love for poetry. In 1904, he was admitted to a school in Srinagar where he passed his middle class examination. In 1905 he went to Amritsar where he had the fortune to become a pupil of Maulvi Abidullah 'Bismil'. Ghulam Ahmad then started composing poems in Persian and adopted the pen name 'Mahjoor'. At Amritsar, Mahjoor also met some other poets and scholars, especially the reputed Urdu writer Shibli. He returned from Amritsar, married in 1908 and in the same year he got a job of 'Patwari'. In 1927, Mahjoor abandoned Persian and wrote in Urdu, but shortly he realized the importance of his mother tongue as the most suitable medium of expression. He had already tried in Kashmiri, but it was in 1934 that he recited his first Kashmiri ghazal which won him immediate popularity. His early songs were not distinct from the poetic tradition obtaining then, but the indications of his later style are evident in his early poems. He was not fond of innovations, and was proud of his being a true imitator of Rasul Mir, a 19th century Kashmiri erotic poet. He says, "Rasul Mir has already unveiled the form of piognancy of love. Now he is reborn in Mahjoor". He was also deeply influenced by the amorous songs of Haba Khatoon, a 16th century Kashmiri poetess. He could, however, no longer remain a silent spectator of the turbulent conditions around him. He came out and joined the voices that were raised for the downtrodden. His revolutionary zeal increased after he made his acquaintance with Abul Ahad 'Azad'. His poem 'Gris kur' (A peasant girl) reveals his love for simplicity and unsophisticated aspects of rural life, a life brimmed with miseries, hardships and sorrows. The famous Bengali poet, Rabindranath Tagore, also praised the poem when he read its translation. Mahjoor was much influenced by the style of the famous Urdu poet Allama Iqbal with whom he had some kind of intimacy. Mahjoor is not important merely for his departure from the hackneyed themes, but for his creating a new language viable for expression of the new spirit. Mahjoor enjoyed an unparalleled fame during his life-time and he is the only Kashmiri poet whose funeral took place with the State honours.

MAHMAD MANKAD (Gujarati; b. 1928) is a well-known novelist and short story writer. His earlier novels Vanchita and Manorama are rather erotic. His later novels are psychoanalytical, wherein he employs various techniques normally found in a 'stream of consciousness' novel. He probes deep into the causes of various complexes, and manias. He has written twenty novels. He has been influenced by the psychoanalysis of Freud and Jung. His novel Velana vadhun tan earned him some awards. It deals with the mental agony of a boy who incidentally finds letters written by his deceased mother to her lover, and who comes to know that he is an illegitimate child. The author has been successful in throwing light on the unconscious and subconscious mind. His novel Dhhumas is based on existentialistic philosophy. He has also written some social novels such as Matini chadar, Heerni gath and Ek pag umbar bahar.

Six collections of his short stories have been published. The author has a knack of selecting the appropriate theme for the story and handling the plot in a delicate manner.

C.M.

MAHMUD GAMI (Kashmiri; b. 1765, d. 1855) was born in a well-known family of priests. He studied Persian and Arabic languages in a local school, and later on, continued to study Persian poetry, displaying enough precocity to imitate the styles of Persian poets like Jani and Nizami in his amateurish Persian poetry. Meanwhile, he was attracted and imperceptibly moved by the melodies and pathos of Kashmiri folk-poetry, which reflects the centuries old yearnings and repressed aspirations of the Kashmiri people suffering privations under the foreign rule. Without raising his voice against suppression, he, like a peculiar Kashmiri, gave vent to his fleeting emotions representing every Kashmiri man and woman in his lyrical poetry with a spontaneity, freshness and melliflousness of folk-poetry to the extent that it is not easy for a modern reader to find any difference. The sustained synthesis of pathos and rapture finding expression in a gracefully unconstrained and unmotivated idiom is the characteristic of Mahmud Gami. He was never allured by the pomposity and display of learning of mystic poetry. It was left to Mahmud Gami to develop and adapt all the inchoate genres of Kashmiri poetry. He wrote eleven masnavis in which he showed several daring departures from the Persian tradition. He chose Iranian and Arabic legends which had been quite familiar to Kashmiris since the advent of Islam. Shirin-Khusrau is said to be his first masnavi, and the lack of those stylistic features which are unmistakably Mahmud's and found amply in his other masnavis, is an internal evidence to support this view. Mahmud's tour de force is his masnavi Yusuf-Zulaikha, which is a part of the story given in 'Ahsan-ul-Qissas' of the Quran. Mahmud seems to have imbibed the force and grace of Jami's masnavi also. In order to avoid the monotony of the rigid metre, Mahmud shifted from one metre to another which he deemed appropriate to the situation. Excluding its prefatory portion, the masnavi is written in lucid and simple Kashmiri, so much so that it was considered to be one of the virtues possessed by a Kashmiri woman to memorise the whole poem. Women used to sing its sweetest portions on various festivals and during the holy month of Ramzan. The masnavi was translated into German by an orientalist, Burkhard, in 1894 and published along with the original text. Sheikh Sannan is Mahmud's shortest masnavi written in an unusually short and swift metre. Its kernel story has been borrowed from Mantaq-ul-Tayar of Attar. Lael (Laila)-Majnun is Mahmud's another famous masnavi. Its text had been very badly deformed by the traditional storytellers and the press; it was, therefore, considered to be Mahmud's artistic failure. But recently its original text has been re-established and it was revealed to be one of his most successful works. Besides its charming story, the masnavi is crammed with sweet songs which add to its effect. Mahmud has very skillfully provided it a unique setting which is peculiar to Kashmiri culture. Mansurnama, Mahmud Ghaznavi, Yak hikayat and Pahalnama are Mahmud's short masnavis. Mahmud established the Persian genres like 'naat', 'manaqabat' and 'ghazal' as the appropriate forms of Kashmiri poetry. Mahmud had perhaps a conscious intention of doing the things not attempted in Kashmiri poetry. It will not be an exaggeration to say that Mahmud exhausted the possibility of two forms, that is vatsun and masnavi, and his successors accepted all those traditions which Mahmud established and none of them escaped from his influence till 1947, when the patterns of Kashmiri poetry changed in its totality.

MAHRUM, TILOKCHAND (Urdu; b. 1887, d. 1966) was a Urdu poet. He served as the Headmaster, Cantonment Board School, Rawalpindi (1935-1942), Lecturer in Urdu, Gordon College, Rawalpindi (1942-1947) and Lecturer in Urdu, Punjab University, Camp College, New Delhi (1947-1958). Mahmud started composing poetry at a very early age and became a well-known poet before passing his matriculation examination. His first collection of poems, Kalam-i-Mahrum, Part-I (1916), which won applause from Akbar Allahabadi in the form of a quatrain, contains remarkable specimens of natural poetry. The book won an award from the then Government of NWFP. This was followed by Kalam-i-Mahrum, Part-II (1920), containing poems on national and patriotic subjects and Kalam-i-Mahrum, Part-III (1923) on themes of love.

Ganj-i-Maani (1932), the fourth collection of his poems, established Mahmud's position as one of the major Urdu poets of India. This collection presents some of the most outstanding poems of the period, such as 'Noor Jahan ka mazar' and 'Khwab-i-Jahangiri'. His fifth collection of poems, Mahrishi darshan (1937), contains poems on religious subjects. Rubaiyat-i-Mahrum (1947), as the title indicates, is a collection of quatrains. Another collection of poems, Nairang-i-Manni (1960), and collection of ghazals, Shola-i-Nawa (1960), were also well-received. Bahar-i-Tifli (1960) and Bachchon ki dunya (1964) are the collections of his poems for children.

A large number of Mahmud's poems are included in the school text books in India and Pakistan. A road called 'Mahrum Road' in his native place, Isakhel, is still keeping his memory alive in that country.

MAILA ANCHAL (Hindi), Phanishwarnath Renu's trend-setting novel, first published in 1954. The locale of the novel is Marygunj, a village in the Purnia district of Bihar. After the First World War, W.G. Martin, an indigo-cultivator, named the village after his wife Mary who had died for want of medical facilities there. Martin tried but failed to get a dispensary opened in his lifetime there. One of the large number of characters in the novel is Baldev, a blind follower of Mahatma Gandhi and the first Congressman of Marygunj. His devotion to the Congress ideology is perfect but his understanding limited as the times in which he lives seem to be moving fast. His own disciples, Kalicharan, Sundar and Vasudev, change their party loyalty, and the latter two ultimately join a dacoit, Chalittar Karmakar. There is a Rashtriya Swayam Sevak group also, along with the Socialist comrades, completing the political scenario of an underdeveloped village. The only hope of some orderly activity in the political life of Marygunj lies in the activities of Bavandas and Kalicharan. But what can one or two persons achieve in the face of vested interests? The erstwhile anti-nationals become Congress Presidents overnight. When Bavandas stands up against smuggling, he is killed mercilessly by the so-called Congressmen. Soon after Independence it is free for all to gain power by hook or by crook.

The most significant quality of Maila anchal is the exploration of regional life from within itself; nothing is superimposed from outside. The socio-cultural and religio-political sub-structures are analysed from first-hand experience. The life of the village is laid threadbare and nowhere does one feel the presence of an onlooker who is not a part of the setting or the environment. The flux of life in the village under the changing pressures of time has been brought out in a racy style by the author. No single character dominates the scene, but together they represent Marygunj. The rhythm of rural life, caught by the novelist, lends a new dimension to the technique of fiction hitherto exploited in Hindi. The language, the inflections, the very totality of the place, seem to come alive as the morning and evening sounds, the sounds of anger and mellowness, of squalor and beauty, are fused in a sympathy.

MAITRA, SURENDRANATH-MAITY, CHITTARANJAN

MAITRA, SURENDRANATH (Bengali; b. 1887, d. 1945) was a reputed teacher of science who taught at different colleges of Bengal. Although primarily a man of science Maitra had a deep love for literature and found delight in translating Western poetry into Bengali. His verse translations of Browning, Shelley and other nineteenth century English poets were at one time very popular. He excelled in the sonnet form of verse making and chiefly adopted this mode in the renderings of Browning which he named Browning panchashika in Bengali.

Among his publications Shelley sangraha and Browning panchashika were the more widely known. He was also the author of a number of other titles such as Apala, Antarsalila, Jonaki, Sataparni but these have by now been almost forgotten. He also wrote a book of criticism named Bangla kabitar nabajanma.

MAITREYA, AKSHAYKUMAR (Bengali; b. 1861, d. 1930), eminent historian, started his career as a lawyer at Rajsahi (now in Bangladesh). He wrote on subjects of history in various journals and wrote two dependable books on Sirajuddaula and Mirkasim, with which Akshaykumar paved the way for historical writing in Bengali on modern scientific lines. In 1912 Akshaykumar published Gauda-lekha mala a collection of copper plate and stone inscriptions issued by the Pala Kings of Bengal (8th to 12th century) with Bengali translations.

In 1899 Akshaykumar edited and published a historical quarterly named Aithihasikchitra in collaboration with Rabindranath Tagore. Akshaykumar was one of those who founded the Barendra Research Society with an Archaeological Museum at Rajsahi in 1910. Akshaykumar was awarded the title of C.I.E. and the Kaiser-I-Hind medal in recognition of his scholarship and public services by the Government of India.

MAITREYARAKSHITA (Sanskrit), also referred to simply as Maitreya or Rakshita, is a celebrated Buddhist grammarian of Bengal like Chandragomin, Jinendrabuddhi, Purushottamadev Saranadeva and Siradeva (S.V.). Steeped thoroughly in Patanjali's Mahabhashya and well conversant with the Kalapa and Chandra systems, Maitreyarakshita's profound scholarship, critical acumen and mature judgment are attested to by Sharanadeva, Shiradeva, Sayana and Bhattoji-Dikshita. As he cites from Kaiyata's Pradipa on the Mahabhashya and Dharmakriti's Rupavatara, and digs covertly at Kshirasvamin, and has been quoted by Saranadeva and Siradeva, Maitreyarakshita can be said to have flourished between 1075 and 1125.

Maitreyarakshita's Tantra-pradipa, an authoritative and elaborate comment on Jinendrabuddhi's Nyasa on the Kashika of Jayaditya and Vamans is held in high esteem for its originality. His Dhatupradipa (ed. S. Chakravarti, Rajshahi, 1919) is a short commentary (Laghuvrtti) on Panini's Dhatupath in the light of Bhimasena's comprehensive Dhatupatha.

Some passages of Maitreyarakshita's commentary on the Mahabhashya have been quoted by Shiradeva in his Paribhashavritti. But this commentary has not been discovered as yet.

MAITREYEE DEVI (Bengali; b. 1914), daughter of Surendranath Dasgupta, graduated from the Calcutta University. Her early works were poems; 'Udita' (1929), 'Chitta chhaya' (1938) and 'Hiranmoy pakhi'. She was associated with Tagore from childhood. In Mongpute Rabindranath (1943) she provides an account of Tagore's sojourn at Mangpu, a village in the district of Darjeeling, towards the later part of his life. In 1950 she wrote another book on Tagore called Kabi sarbabhouma. This book was followed by Rig veder debata o manus (1957). Rabindranath: grihe o bishwe, another monograph on Tagore appeared in 1976. Maitreyee Devi and her father, S.N. Dasgupta, received a number of letters from Tagore at the different stages of their lives. Swarger kachhakachhi (1981) contains some of these letters edited and annotated by her.

She visited the Republic of China twice and went also to Japan at the time of her second visit. Her Achena Chin and Chine o Japane (1980) are fine specimens of her understanding of the people of those countries. In 1974 she wrote a novel called Na hanyate which proved to be very controversial and created a lot of sensation among the readers. She was awarded the Sahitya Akademi prize for this novel in 1976.

MAITY, CHITTARANJAN (Bengali; b. 1926) graduated from P.K. College, Contai and in 1950 obtained his M.A. degree in Bengali literature and language from the University of Calcutta. As an undergraduate he won several prizes for his critical essays on Tagore. He has been for many years the Professor and Head of the Department of Bengali in Surendranath College for

MAJAZ, ASRARUL HAQ-MAJRUH SULTANPURI

Women in Calcutta. His works of fiction appear in leading Bengali journals and newspapers of Calcutta. He is an adept in Bengali, English, Hindi and Oriya.

An author of about sixty books, he is gifted with a rare insight into man in close association with nature and has a prose style that is inimitably poetic. Basically romantic, the novelist in Chittaranjan Maity is too often surpassed by the lyric poet in him. His sensibility and historical awareness make his men and women, especially those of the uplands, come alive with throbbing emotion and invest his landscape with a personality. The characters of his novels—most of all those who belong to the mountain and sea-beaches often remind us of Hardy's early romantic creations. His book of verse Rod bristi bhalobasa (1962) and the poetic play, Basanta bilap (1963) are intensely romantic and lyrical. His travelogue Shaila-puri Kumaon (1956) has its own peculiar charm.

Among his novels those that deserve notice are Agnikanya (1960), Doctor Jonsoner diary (1961), Hiranyagarer badhu (1968), Andhar periye (1972), Nirjone khela (1975), Mohini (1977), Kaler kallol (1978), Arjya anarjya (1980), Mahakaler bandar (1982) and Kaler rakhal (1982). His latest novels speak of his intense love for the land and the people of the Himalayas and his awareness of the tragedy of the highlands undergoing a rapid change. There is something truly classical about them.

MAJAZ, ASRARUL HAQ (Urdu; b.1911, d.1955) was an eminent Urdu poet. He was the son of Sirajul Haq, who was the first graduate of the town and served in Lucknow in the Registry. The family shifted to Lucknow and Majaz was educated at St. John's College, Agra, and graduated from Aligarh Muslim University, where he started his career as a poet and soon become popular in the University circles as a romantic poet. He joined as the first editor of the Urdu journal of All India Radio, the Awaz, Delhi, but soon relinquished the job, became an active member of the Progressive Writers' Movement, and with the collaboration of Sardar Jafri and Sibtey Hasan, started the most influential progressive literary monthly of the period, Naya Adab, from Lucknow. After its closure, he joined as Assistant Librarian, Harding Library, Delhi and collaborated with Fasihuddin Ahmad in editing the Adib, Delhi. Later on, he settled in Lucknow, spent sometime in Ranchi Mental Hospital for alcoholism, came back to Lucknow, where he died in 1955.

Majaz began as a romanticist and his poems like 'Nora' or 'Nazri-i-Aligarh', adopted as anthem of the students union there, earned him immediate popularity. But he soon extended the frontiers of his romantic sensibility by writing on themes of social significance. Being a nationalist to the core, he sang of the national independence and social justice. He wished to see a woman as a crusader, who could revolt against exploitation and injustice. While Josh Malihabadi was singing of the blood and brimstone, Majaz was writing about the tenderness of 'Revolution', and the blessings it will bring to mankind, and the splendour of the struggle for independence.

Being in the vanguard of progressive poetry, he always sang of social change and Revolution not so much as an economic need, or a historic necessity, but as an aesthetic requirement of a romantic personality yearning for fulfilment. He tried to blend a modern attitude with the classical diction and romantic temperament, and thus, gave lyrical qualities to revolutionary and socially significant poetry. His famous poem, 'Awara', is the embodiment of the yearnings of a modern youngman of a big city where money has become the sole passport to happiness. His hero finds himself at war with the system which sustains abject poverty and eternal deprivation for millions.

His collections of poems are: Ahang, Shab tab, and an extended edition of Ahang published posthumously.

MAJRUH SULTANPURI (Urdu; b. 1924), real name Asrar Hasan Khan, (pseud. Majruh), was born in Sultanpur (U.P.). After completion of the traditional education in Urdu, Persian and Arabic, he joined Aligarh, and later moved to Bombay to write for films as a poet and settled there. He wrote popular songs for many important films and won many awards for his poetic contribution to ghazal.

He published his collection of ghazals under the title Ghazal, and the same collection has reappeared many times with some additions.

Majruh has also written several geets and poems in his early days, but since 1945, he has concentrated on ghazal. Though an ardent supporter of the Progressive Writers Movement since 1945, he never agreed with the opponents of ghazal about the incapacity of the genre for expression of revolutionary ideas and concepts.

Majruh tried to give ghazal a new dimension by enlarging the scope of its symbolism and giving it a Marxian connotation. Although Majruh retains in his ghazals the conventional terms and the colourfulness of the classical heritage, yet he instils in the form a sense of human dignity and confidence to change the world despite innumerable hinderances.

In fact his poetry combines social awareness and political fervour into a new poetic mould.

MAJUMDAR, AMIYABHUSHAN-MAJUMDAR, HARINATH

MAJUMDAR, AMIYABHUSHAN (Bengali; b. 1918), born at Coochbehar, West Bengal, graduated with honours in English and joined the postal department. He became associated with the Trade Union Movement.

Amiyabhushan is not a professional writer. Indifferent to fame or money he does not write a single word for cheap entertainment. He has no connection with the much circulated and well-organised commercial journals. He is associated only with the little magazines. Naturally, the number of his readers is limited. But it is undeniable that he is a powerful writer and a source of inspiration to the young writers.

Amiyabhushan began to write short tales more than four decades ago. 'Pramilar biye', his first, was published in Purbasha, edited by Sanjoy Bhattacharya. A number of other works followed this: 'Sada makarsa', 'Rani Indumati', 'Mohit Sener upakhyān', 'Andhakar', 'Payrar khop', 'Swarna Sita', 'Mahiskura', 'Tantra siddhi', 'Mrinmayee opera', 'Tanti bau', 'Dularhinder upakatha', 'Avlaner sarai', 'Apes and Peacock', 'Saimiya Casia', 'Srilatar dwip', 'Nirmal Sinher apamrityu', 'Sat achar', 'Box-room', 'Ekti kuyor galpa', 'Ekti biplaber mrityu', 'Garad', 'Nil akas sabuj pahar', 'Virus', 'Rater alo', 'Sahid', 'Suniti' etc.

Some of Amiyabhushan's short stories are uncommon but not unreal. An idealist at bottom Amiyabhushan deals with various types of exploitation. He depends on his intellect rather than on his emotion. He intends to change the reader's attitude towards this world. He uses his intuition and understanding to discover a world which is more than real, where his characters appear in their inner selves.

Amiyabhushan wrote novels also some of which are: Nil bhuinya (1955), Gar Srikhanda (1957), Rajnagar (1984), Dukhiyar Kuthi, Nirbas, Udbastu, Mahiskurar upakatha, Bilas binay bandana, Chand bene etc.

Some of his novels are influenced more or less by history. Novels like Nil bhuinya, Gar Srikhanda, Rajnagar, Nirbas and Udbastu will support this statement, though they cannot be called historical. In Nil bhuinya and Rajnagar Amiyabhushan deals with the Indigo-planters of the nineteenth century. The last phase of the Second World War is the background of Gar Srikhanda. Nirbas and Udbastu are based on the partition of Bengal.

In his novels Amiyabhushan searches for the real man. His characters are wholly of this earth with their natural surroundings. The locale of his novels is a region which has the river Padma at one end, the mountain-peak of Kanchanjanga at the other. Amiyabhushan believes that a true writer cannot be indifferent to any kind humiliation or exploitation of man. He must show the right path to his society.

His prose-style is attractive for its transverse nature, intellectual appeal and a pervading sense of honour.

Amiyabhushan won the Sahitya Akademi Award and Bankim Puraskar in 1986 for his novel Rajnagar.

MAJUMDAR, KAMALKUMAR (Bengali, b. 1915, d. 1979) was a novelist, short story writer and poet. His first novel, Antarjali jatra, was published in 1960 and this was followed by two stories, 'Nim annapurna' and 'Aikam baikam'. Desh published two more stories named 'Matilal padri' and 'Tahader katha'. Among his other novels are Suhasinir pometom, published first in Krittibas, 'Pinjare basiya shuk', published in Ekshan, 'Shyam nauka', 'Khe-lar pratibha' 'Kayedkhana' and 'Rukshminikumar' published in various other little magazines. Among his short stories are 'Dansa Phakir', 'Khe-lar bichar', 'Anityer daibhag' 'Bagan daibahani' etc. Only a few of his works are available in print. Some of his short stories were collected and edited by Indranath Majumdar and published under the title, Galpa sangraha. Kamalkumar's only collection of poems was Shanaih but it is not available now. He wrote a few brilliant essays and they still lie scattered in small magazines. Besides, he edited Ushnish and Tadanta. Iswhwar kotir ranga-kautuk, a book on Sri Ramakrishna, was published in 1977.

Kamalkumar is probably the most unpopular of all Bengali writers. This is not because he lacked the qualities of a writer but because of the style of his prose. He was observant, keen, perceptive and endowed with a sparkling sense of humour. His wide interest covered literature, stagecraft, dance, music, painting and history. He was an excellent amateur director of plays and was a distinguished painter himself. He had deep sympathies for the poor and the deprived, whose lives he tried to portray in his stories and novels. And above all he had a rich imagination, and a breadth of culture acquired through wide reading. And yet only a very few of the Bengali reading public care to read his books. He is dismissed as 'obscure'. The more thoughtful of the readers tend to believe that he tried to impose the French syntax on Bengali thereby putting in complete disarray the warp and woof of a normal Bengali sentence.

But he did no such thing. In fact his wide reading in French literature and his deep knowledge of the French language had practically no direct bearing on his writings. What he did try was to discover a prose which would look as much unlike the spoken language as possible. And secondly, to achieve this he sought guidance not from French or any other foreign language which he knew but from old Bengali.

He starts his story 'Khe-lar bichar' with this prayer: "We are rustics and please god let us be able to express the incidents of our own lives in a simple way." What he was trying to achieve was not the simplicity of the language spoken by the common Bengalis but the simplicity of the language of his art which could express such complex images as the one with which Antarjali jatra ends: the image of the 'single, wooden' eye ('wooden' because it is painted on the boat), its reflection in the undulating black water, and the rippling water splashing over the side of the boat and wetting the wooden eye.

MAJUMDAR, KRISHNACHANDRA (Bengali; b. 1834, d. 1907), was born at Senhatri in the Khulna district (now in Bangladesh). His father Manikyachandra was not a well-to-do man. Krishnachandra did not get adequate guidance in his childhood. He studied Sanskrit and then Persian when he was in Dacca. He then became a teacher in a vernacular school in Dacca and began to contribute poems in Ishwarchandra Gupta's Sambad prabhakar. The moral and religious poems of his best known Sadbhaba shatak (1861) inspired by Persian poetry were written for this journal. Some of his moral verses became too well-known to be forgotten. He edited creditably a number of journals when he was in Dacca. In 1874 Krishnachandra became the Head Pundit at Jessore Zilla School. He retired in 1893.

His other books are Mohabbhog (1871) and Kaibaly-atattwa (1883). His autobiographical writing Raser itibrit-ta (1868) is a candid confession of his early life.

MAJUMDAR, MOHITLAL (Bengali; b. 1888, d. 1952), Bengali poet and critic, had his early education at Balagad, Hooghly. Poet Debendranath Sen, a distant relation of the family, and his father Nandalal's poetic temperament were his early inspiration. After graduation from Vidyasagar college, Calcutta, in 1908, Mohitlal worked as a school teacher. From 1935 till retirement he had been in Dacca university as a lecturer in Bengali.

Tentative early exercises apart, his poetic career started with his association with the Bharati and his regular contribution to the journal from 1919. Poems of this period show a gay, youthful fancy and jingle reminiscent of Satyendranath Datta. Alongside, he drew upon Persian vocabulary and themes in some poems. In Svapan-pasari (The dream-peddler, 1922), his first important book of poems, Mohitlal's individuality and personal idiom emerge. The poem 'Aghorpanthi' (The macabre ritualist) is a passionate celebration of life in defiance of the pervasive death. This attitude crystallizes into a poetic creed in the next two collections—Bismarani (Oblivion, 1929) and Smaragaral (The envenomed passion 1936). To make the best of a brief, sorrowful life through indulgence of the senses and sensuality is the dominant poetic mood here. In Hemantagodhuli (The autumnal twilight, 1941), the poet looks back to his youth. Chhandachaturdasi (1944) is a book of sonnets where the form admirably suits his slow, meditative vein.

Mohitlal's poetry is characterised by a bold, romantic temperament cast in a carefully controlled, disciplined mould.

As a literary critic, his range is wide and output substantial, his moral preoccupations notwithstanding. Mohitlal offered illuminating insight into the recesses of the creative mind. His writings on fundamental concepts like form, structure or style have enriched Bengali criticism. Mohitlal's critical volumes include: Adhunik bangla sahitya (1936), Sahitya-katha (1938), Sahitya-bitan (1942), Sri Madhusudan (1947), etc.

MAKHDOOM MOHIUDDIN (Urdu; b. 1908 d. 1969). Mohammed Makhdoom Mohiuddin Khudri, known as Makhdoom Mohiuddin, was born in a village, Andol, in Medak district of the erstwhile Hyderabad State, now in Andhra Pradesh. Makhdoom's grandfather, Rashiduddin, came from Azamgarh in U.P. along with the armies of Aurangzeb and settled in Hyderabad. Makhdoom died in Delhi after suffering a heart attack. His body was flown to Hyderabad and he was buried in Durgah Shah Khamosh in Nampally area of the Hyderabad city. Makhdoom was only four years old when his father Ghous Mohiuddin died. He did his matriculation from the high school in Sangareddy in 1929 and came to Hyderabad for higher studies. His uncle wanted him to become a priest. So he did his Munshi Diploma from a high school in Chelapura.

In those days he had to earn his livelihood as well as to continue his studies on his own. He did his M.A. from the Osmania University in 1937, and his dissertation was on the subject 'Drama in Urdu'. In 1939, he joined the City College as an Urdu teacher, which job he resigned in 1942 to become a whole time public worker. In 1939, he founded the Hyderabad City Unit of the then illegal Communist Party of India. In 1936, he founded the 'Anjumane Taraqqi-e-Urdu' (The Progressive Writers' Association) alongwith Sibte Hassan (who later migrated to Pakistan), Akhtar Hussain Raipuri and N.M. Jaisooriya. Sarojini Naidu and J.V. Narsing Rao, one time Deputy Chief Minister of Andhra Pradesh, used to attend the meetings that were held at Sarojini Naidu's residence, the Golden Threshold, which now houses the Hyderabad University.

Makhdoom was a dramatist and an actor, too. His first drama was 'Murshad-e Kamil' (The perfect priest) which was staged for raising funds for the sufferers of Quetta earthquake in 1936. Makhdoom, in collaboration with Mir Massan, translated Bernard Shaw's drama 'Widowers' House' under the title Hosh ke nakhun which was staged in 1935 in the presence of Sarojini Naidu and Gurdev Tagore. He actively associated himself with the then rising Trade Union movement in Hyderabad in the early forties and became the founding President of Hyderabad State Trade Union Congress in 1946.

In 1942, he was tried for an anti-British speech and sent to jail. He went underground in August 1946 during the anti-Nizam struggle. He came out of hiding for a while after the Police Action in November 1948, but went underground again. He was arrested in March 1951, but was released to participate in India's first general elections in 1952. Makhdoom was elected to the Hyderabad State Legislative Assembly in a bye-election from Huzurnagar in Nalgonda district in 1953. Later, he was elected to the Legislative Council of Andhra Pradesh in 1958. He remained the leader of the CPI group in the Council until his death.

MALABE KA MALIK (Hindi). The story “Malabe ka malik” (The owner of the Ruin) by Rakesh, published in Naye Badal (1957) is a powerful expression of the tragedy of the country's partition. Rakesh has written other stories also on human sufferings in the wake of the partition of India, but it is “Malbe ka malik” which presents so poignantly the tragic fate of man. It penetrates the consciousness of the reader by laying bare the ghastly suffering of life. All the characters in the story are part of the overall atmosphere that dominates the theme.

“Malabe ka Malik” is the cry of the central character whose entire family and belongings were consumed in the flames of communal riots. Those who left for Pakistan with a heavy heart could not forget India. After a lapse of seven and a half years a group of Muslims visit Amritsar and gaze at the old city which was once theirs. It is, in fact, a story of neither the break-down of family life, nor of the mere violence of partition, but of the collapse of human values.

The structure of the story, developed through symbols, is doubly knit. Unity and tolerance are torn to pieces by men like Rakkha, a stock character, representing the mob. even the ruins have a double meaning. Outwardly, it is the ruin of a building; inwardly, it is the break-down of the values of life. Amidst this ruin, sits a dog who barks, suggesting man's degradation. The ruin thus assumes the role of the protagonist in the story. Buried in it are the values of humanity. The question is: who is the owner of this ruin? Abdul Ghani, or Rakkha, or both? In fact, the ruin belongs to neither, since it is government property now. From within the planks of the ruined building emerges a worm, showing a way out. The whole story is interwoven in the texture of symbols and imagistic situations. Worm, door-frame, new building, dog, they are not separate entities, but merge into the total atmosphere of the story. The language on the creative level is highly suggestive and telling. In the New story movement this story is unique because of its content, sensibility, and innovation.

MALAIPATUKATAM (Tamil), is one of the idylls in Pattuppattu of the Sangam anthology in akaval metre by the poet Perunkausikan. the title of the poem means literally the secretion ('katam') oozing (patu) from the mountain ('malai'). The mountain resembles the elephant in heat, from which flows a secretion which here is metonymy for sound. The title means the sounds issuing from a mountainous region. This title is culled from a significant phrase found in the poem (347-348) where the echoes in the mountain region are compared to the noise made by roaring elephants in rut. The poem is also known as Kuttararruppatai, as in this panegyric poem the 'kuttars' (actors) are directed to a patron, Nannan to receive gifts from him.

The poem that runs into 583 lines, is mostly a description of the mountainous country of Nannan and of his qualities. It begins with a description of actors, their women and their various musical instruments, followed by a description of the beauty of the female singers in the troupe. Then comes the description of the virtues and valour of Nannan and also the greatness of his capital, followed by the description of the flora and fauna of his kingdom. Then the perils of the journey are explained after which an account of the hunters in the hills, various sounds which rose from the mountains, different tracts of land and the inhabitants therein is found. Then follows a description of the guarded palace gates and a graphic account of the tributes piled before Nannan's palace. The poem concludes with an account of the King's virtues, his able administration, his rich wealth, the gracious way in which the actors are treated and the generous gifts rewarded to them.

The poem celebrates music, musical instruments and musicians. The particulars of musical instruments and details of the life of the hill tribes found in the poem cannot be had elsewhere.

MALAPALLI (Telugu), the first sociological novel in Telugu by Unnava Lakshminarayana, was hailed by Kasinathuni Nageswara Rao, in his introduction to the novel, as a fictional presentation of the evolution of human society. Freeing Telugu writing and Telugu novel from fairy tales and mysteries adopted from Bengali, Unnava gave a new direction to the development of Telugu novel in choosing a contemporary theme. The author was no arm-chair idealist. He actively participated in the freedom struggle, first inspired by the teaching of Bal Gangadhar Tilak later under the leadership of Mahatma Gandhi. Besides, Unnava was a practical social reformer. After a brief association with the great social reformer, Kandukuri Veeresalingam, Unnava founded Sarada Niketan, where he performed remarriages of widows and arranged community eating with the so-called untouchables. The novel is a fictional construct of the social and political convictions of the author. The novel was written during the period of imprisonment at Vellore jail between 1921 and 1922. The first part was published in 1922 and the second part in 1923. The Government of Madras under the leadership of C.P. Ramaswamy Iyer, the then Law Member, banned the novel on May 14, 1923. After a heated discussion in the Assembly in which A. Kaleswara Rao and others participated, it was agreed that the ban would be lifted provided the author deleted a few passages which preached united action by workers to safeguard their interests from exploiting landlords. A revised edition was published in 1935, with a foreword by K. Nageswara Rao. The novel was prescribed the same year for study by the Andhra University. But the Government banned the novel, once again, in 1936, and under pressure from the Government it was deleted from syllabus. After the formation of the Congress ministry under Rajaji, the proscription was finally removed in 1937. The proscription of the novel was vehemently criticised by magazines like Swarajya, edited by T. Prakasam. An abridged edition of the novel was published by the Sahitya Akademi in 1976. The novel was adapted as a drama by Nagnamuni, in 1974, and presented successfully several times.

The author gave to the novel two titles—'Malapalli' (Hamlet of Untouchables) and 'Sangavijayamu' (Triumph of Sanga)—which indicates a certain ambivalence in his attitude to the central theme of the novel. As Steinbeck said of his ambitious novel, East of Eden, 'the story of me and the story of my land', this novel also may be described as the story of the hero and the story of the land. Actually, it is two novels rolled into one, with the author trying to hold them together, without quite succeeding always. The theme particular in the novel deals with the fortunes of the family of Ramadasu, a devout 'dasari' (an untouchable preacher). His two sons, Sangadasu and Venkatadasu (alias Takkella Jaggadu) represent two approaches to social and political problems—the evolutionary and the revolutionary respectively. Although occasionally the author is uncertain about the relevance of the violent approach (as when Ramadasu tells Venkatadasu, 'I cannot say that yours is not an approach. But we must wait and see how it turns out if everybody pursues it, the author finally appears to opt for the non-violent approach of Gandhi by naming his novel, 'Sanga Vijayamu'. As in 'Julius Caesar' the hero dies in the middle of the story; Actually, he is killed by the hired men of the villain in the village, Chaudarayya. But he appears to die into a more glorious life, as his death sets in motion the forces of justice; the impoverished workers unite and struggle together and translate into action Karl Marx's call to the workers of the world to unite. Jyoti, the daughter, represents elevated love, untainted by physical desire, unlike the passion of Kamala. The author showed consummate artistry in the portrayal of human character, especially of women. The evocation of the social atmos-pher in a village is authentic and purposeful. Though the author presents the unity forged by the workers as a force to meet the inhumanness of the exploiting class, Unnava ultimately retreats and leaves the triumph of the proletariat uncertain. After all the fret and fury, it is Ramadasu who survives and not the leaders of agitators, including Ramanaidu, a follower of Sangadasu. And Ramadasu retires from all strife reflecting the author's own attitude of resignation. An ending of this kind is certainly defeatistic. As a novel, too, the work is unsatisfactory, since it lacks compactness and unity. A critic observed, Malapalli may be a great novel, but Unnava is not a great novelist. He lacks artistry in plot construction and compactness of detail. Further, certain lengthy passages on social conditions, philosophical discussions and a rather confusing identification of Sangadasu with Radha minimise the artistic assets of the novel. The novel was praised in its day as a bold attempt at using the colloquial Telugu. But the style is occasionally awkward and uneven owing to the mixture of the literary and the colloquial.

In spite of a few flaws, the novel is a major work dealing with contemporary social and political reality. It is certainly an ambitious work, breaking the hold of traditional modes of Telugu writing. The novel celebrated the triumph of Sanga or more truly of Sangha (Society). The novel is also interpreted as the Odyssey of the Soul (of Ramadasu) through the physical, social and political stages to the spiritual realisation of the irrelevance of human strife. It is then that Malapalli appears like the hamlet of saints (Munipalle); regenerate. Kasinathuni interpreted the novel as an archetypal duel between the right and the wrong. C. R. Reddy described it as 'one of the very few works of undoubted genius in Telugu .. a genuine work of creative art and imagination.'

MALAR(Maithili). The word Malar means a particular melody of Hindustani music which is sung throughout India. The performance of this melody is very difficult for ordinary singers because it requires a very high pitch. So it needs a long vocal exercise. There are several varieties of it. Mithila has its own variety of folk style. The theme of the song is the melancholy of separation. It is generally sung in rainy season i.e. from June to September. Rainy season, therefore forms the background of Malar. The composition of the lyric is often interspersed with stanzas in a particular metre called 'chhand'. In Mithila, specially in the Brahman community, marriage is performed generally in the months of Jyestha and Ashadha. In the first trip, to the bride's home the bridegroom has to perform daily some post-marriage rites and rituals. During these performances Malar is sung in chorus in folk style by ladies. There is a proverb current in Mithila which means that one can sing Malar only when the mind is free from anxiety. It is a melody of joy.

MALATIMADHAVA (Sanskrit) is romantic social play of the 'prakarana' type in ten acts composed by Bhavabhuti, author of the famous Uttararamacharita and the Mahaviracharita, who flourished under the patronage of King Yashovarman of Kannauj in the eighth century A.D. The theme of the play is original and deals with the ordinary people of the society; though some of the incidents described here find a parallel in the story of Madiravali in the Kathasaritsagara based on Gunadhya's Brihatkatha. The plot centres round the love stories of Malati, daughter of the minister Bhurivasu and Madhava, son of another minister Dēvarata, and of Madhava's friend Makaranda and Malati's friend Madayantika. The two ministers who were classmates had come to an understanding at the end of their studies that if one of them had a son and the other a daughter they would effect the marriage between them. Later when the children grew up, Malati's father found that the queen's brother Nandana wanted to marry her and the king was also interested in the matter. Two ladies of the Buddhist monastic order, Kamandaki and her old student Saudamini, try to help the hero and the heroine and thwart the king's plan. Madhava's friend Makaranda is dressed as a girl and it sent as the heroine to the wedding of the King's brother-in-law; while the hero and heroine are taken to a Shiva temple for a secret marriage. A tiger dashes through the city frightening people and Makaranda saves Madayantika, and they fall in love with each other. The heroine Malati is kidnapped by Kapalakundala, disciple of Aghoracharya, to a mountain temple to be offered as a victim. The hero runs in pursuit; both become desperate and attempt at suicide. Madhava decides to offer his flesh to ghosts for attaining Malati; he hears a cry, rushes to the temple and saves Malati. Madhava comes in time with the good news, thus preventing Kamandaki and even Bhurivasu from committing suicide. Saudamini brings a letter from the king approving both the marriages. The plot has been so very subtly knit that it is a bit difficult to find the thread of the story. There are plenty of the exhibition of emotional outbursts, and the play is interesting even as poetry. Though love is the main emotion depicted other rasas like karuna, vira, bhayanaka and even bibhatsa are delineated sharply as subsidiary to it. Excellent descriptions of nature in her various moods, polished and chaste expressions and the unbridled originality of the poet's fancy are remarkable. There is no Vidushaka in any of the plays of Bhavabhuti, who seems to have taken life seriously.

It is generally believed that the Malatimadhava was written after the Mahaviracharita and before the Uttararamacharita. It contains the well-known challenge of the poet: "There may be people who talk disparagingly here, and they too may not be ignorant, but this work is not for them. There would arise some one, somewhere at some time who is similar to me in temperament. The world is wide and time is infinite." The play has been edited with Purnasarasvati's commentary in Trivandrum Sanskrit Series.

MALAVIKAGNIMITRA (Sanskrit), Kalidasa's first play in five acts, is the story of King Agnimitra's love for Malavika, an unknown beautiful girl living in the royal harem and an adept in music and dance. Agnimitra happened to see her in a group picture of the harem inmates. The senior queen Dharini, afraid of inconvenient developments, refused to disclose the girl's name, but her small sister innocently revealed the name. The king was eager to see Malavika in person. He asked his companion, the Vidushaka named Gautam, to arrange it. The Vidushaka instigated a quarrel between the two royal dance masters under whom Malavika and the younger queen Iravati were taking dance lessons. Parivrajika Pandita-Kausiki, a sober ascetic lady who was also living in the harem as the companion of Dharini, was appointed as an impartial judge to settle the dispute on the respective claim of superiority by the dance masters. She ruled that the performances of their pupils should determine the issue. An identical performance was to be given. Malavika's dance recital proved to be better. The performance gave Agnimitra an opportunity to observe Malavika's skill and beauty from close quarters and he fell in love with her.

Agnimitra then asked the Vidushaka to arrange a rendezvous with Malavika. Queen Dharini had a favourite golden Ashoka tree which had not blossomed. Gautama's rash trick made Dharini fall from a swing and hurt her foot. She therefore assigned the duty of fulfilling the longing (for flowers) of the Ashoka to Malavika and sent her to the 'Pramadavana', despatching the toilette materials and royal anklets with a maid. Malavika was to kick the tree gently with her left foot; and if it blossomed in five nights Dharini promised to grant her wish. Agnimitra was thus able to meet Malavika and took the opportunity to reveal his heart. But the lover's meeting was spoiled by the arrival of Iravati, whom the king had promised his company for a swing-ride in celebration of Spring and had forgotten about it. Iravati had witnessed the king's overtures of love; she refused to accept the king's apologies and left in terrible anger. She complained to the Senior Queen and Malavika and her companion maid were locked up in the cellar of Samudragriha.

Once again, Gautama found a way out of this predicament. He pretended that he was bitten by a serpent while picking flowers to visit the ailing Dharini. The royal physician was asked to say that a mantra-rite would be necessary to remove the poison for which he wanted an effigy of a serpent. All this was, of course, Gautama's strategy. But Dharini was alarmed at the thought of being an indirect cause of a Brahmin's death and promptly gave her signet-ring which bore a serpent's figure. Gautama showed the queen's ring to the female prison guard, told a few lies, and secured the release of Malavika and her companion. The lovers had their privacy again. But this tryst was also spoiled by the unexpected visit of Iravati who, repenting her haughty behavior in the Pramadavana, had come to make amends. Only an accident could save this situation. Dharini's small sister was frightened by a monkey and everybody rushed to and her aid to comfort the child.

By now, some favourable things had happened. The Ashoka had blossomed in unusual luxuriance and Dharini was ready to reward Malavika for the miracle. Dharini's eldest son, Prince Vasumitra, had won a difficult battle guarding the Ashvamedha horse. The dispute between the two royal cousins of Vidarbha, in which Agnimitra had rendered military assistance, was settled in favour of Madhavasena. It brought the revelation that Malavika was Madhavasena's sister, a Vidarbha princess. Parivrajika was the sister of Madhavasena's minister. Both had escaped during the war, had fallen in the hands of marauders, had escaped again and separately found refuge in Agnimitra's harem. With the revelation of Malavika's identity and the happy events, Dharini personally gave Malavika's hand to Agnimitra.

Some personalities in the play like Agnimitra and his father Senapati Pushyamitra are historical and belong to the Sunga dynasty (2nd century B.C.). Some events like Pushyamitra's Ashvamedha, the confrontation with Yavanas by the army of horse-guards, the political dispute in Vidarbha and Agnimitra's military intervention have also historical ring about them. But the principal story of love and his weaving of sub-episodes are an imaginative creation of the poet. Kalidasa creates in this play a type of court comedy of royal love, in which harem jealousies and court intrigues mingle to raise romantic situations of love, amusing scenes of confrontation and a merry, light-hearted air which are thoroughly enjoyable. The king-hero's 'minister of love affairs', the Vidushaka Gautama dominates the play. It is his ingenuity, skill and ability for scheming that enable Agnimitra to meet Malavika and finally win her as his wife and queen. In spite of his political direction in matters of State, Agnimitra appears as a passive hero, thoroughly dependent on the Vidushaka for the success of his love affair. The Sanskrit dramatic theory allows the passivity of a hero because the efforts done by his aides are supposed to reflect his own glory. But a mere sighing hero, giving expression to the torment of un-fulfilled love and pining for the heroine may not satisfy the popular conception of a real hero. The dignity of a royal hero may not be consistent with a portrait of a passive lover who is often caught in embarrassing and humiliating situations before his queens. It is to the credit of Kalidasa that he corrects these mistakes in his succeeding two plays, keeping the Vidushaka to his natural subordinate role of a humorous companion, and also avoids the hero's confrontation with his previous wives.

The Malavikagnimitra is an amusing play. Kalidasa's skill in creating dramatic situations is beyond doubt. The quarrel of the dance masters leads to an amusing tension with the sensitivity of the older master Ganadasa, Dharini's desperate efforts to stop further developments, and the Vidushaka's hilarious provocations. Vidushaka Gautama proves to be a superb actor too in his pretence of snake-bite and a resourceful schemer. Malavika's dance performance and the Ashoka-dohada scene have the charm of art, the lyrical element of love and poetry, to produce an appropriate emotional impact. Kalidasa's fine dialogue, occasional poetry and the pervading wit and humour add to the play's entertaining value. It should not be surprising that the play created a model which succeeding dramatists like Sri Harshavardhana or Rajasekhara could not help imitating.

MALAYAGIRI ACHARYA (Prakrit) was one of the greatest commentators of the Jain canonical literature. Nothing is known about him except that he was an acharya. He refers to Acharya Hemachandra as his guru in his Avashyakavrtti. So we can assume that he existed in the 12th century.

His commentaries not only explain the Prakrit text in Sanskrit clearly but also discusses religious issues rejecting them wherever they go against the Jain views. His commentaries are on the following Jain canons-Bhagavati

MALAYANIL-MALEGALALLI MADUMAGALU

(Sataka II), Rajaprashniya, Jivabhigama, Prajnapanana, Candraprajnapti, Nandi, Vyavaharabhasya, Brhatkal-pabhasya (incomplete), Avasyakavrtti (incomplete), Pindaniryukti and Jyotiskarandaka. Besides this, he has also commented on non-canonical works, such as Dharmasangrahani Karmaprakrti, Panchasangraha, Sadashiti, Saptatika, Brhat sangrahani, and Brhatksetrasamasa and he is also the author of Sabdanushasana, a Sanskrit grammar.

MALAYANIL (Gujarati; b. 1892, d. 1919), whose real name was Kanchanlal Vasudev Mehra, was a pioneer of short story in Gujarati.

Born in a Sathodara Nagar family of Ahmedabad, he studied literature and science for his B.A. degree from the University of Bombay. He graduated in law from the Bombay University in 1916. He worked for a match-box factory at Ahmedabad for some time and later, shifted to Bombay to work for a solicitor's firm.

Malayanil wrote his first short story 'Rajnun gaj' (Mountain out of a molehill), in 1913. More stories followed, but he wrote just for six to seven years, before his premature death.

The year 1918 proved to be a landmark in his writing career, and also in the history of the short story in Gujarati literature. In that year, his famous short story 'Govalani' (The milk maid), was published in the very famous and popular magazine Vismi sadi (The twentieth century). The publication of that story gave him reputation as the pioneer of the short story in Gujarati literature. Many short stories were, of course, written and published in the Gujarati language before this story of his, but it was in this story only that the form of the short story attained its artistic proportions. The story had humour, pathos, poetry and beauty. The milk-maid therein is a very endearing character. The man from the city appearing in it makes a fool of himself trying to make love to this village beauty, but in the process, he, too, endears himself to the readers. The denouement of the story is both and hilarious. No story before this one had all the formal and technical ingredients of a successful piece of art.

Unfortunately, Malayanil died before he could publish his stories in a book form. His wife Bhanumati got the stories published under the title Govalani ane bijji vato (The milk maid and other stories), in 1935.

MALBARI BEHERAMJI (Gujarati; b. 1853, d. 1912) belonged to a Parsi community. He is highly esteemed as a classical Gujarati poet. Having been deprived of father's care from his infancy, he struggled all alone against the hardships of life with diligence and achieved success both in life and literature.

Nitivinod (1875) is his first anthology which assimilates simultaneously the feelings of patriotism instilled by Narmad as well as, the didactic element propagated by Dalapatram. His poetry which deals with patriotic emotion, social reformation and didacticism, bears the stamp of his originality and individuality. Moreover, love, nature and devotion to God which are subjects of perennial value are elements of major importance in his poetry. His another anthology namely, Sansarika (1898) is noted for its artistic perfection and poetic presentation of subject-matters quite appropriate to the period of transition in literature. His new outlook of life finds a poetic expression in his famous poem Itihasni arasi. The poem depicts the dawn and dusk of human civilization.

Wilson viraha (1878) is an elegiac poem, written on his teacher Wilson. It broods over the poet's warm affection for him as well as his achievements in his life. Malbari's English anthology The Indian Muse in English Garb (1876) has been widely appreciated by Indian as well as English readers.

It is important to note that Malbari, wedded to impartial views and opinions as a journalist, won fame by editing The Indian Spectator weekly and East and West, a monthly.

MALEGALALLI MADUMAGALU (Kannada) is a novel (1967) by K.V. Puttappa. The novel portrays the manners and customs of the common people.

The basic theme of the novel is 'lust'. Longing for sex and the longing for life have free play here in their natural, raw state. The admirable trait of the characters is their sheer simplicity. They do not make the slightest attempt to disguise themselves and pretend to be what they are not. Moreover, the majority of them belong socially and economically to the lowest strata of society, and have accepted life just as it is. The notable feature of the characters is their naturalness, the closeness of their relationship to their environment. Mukundayya and Chinamma who come into conflict with their environment are a direct foil to the rest of the characters like Aita and Pinchalu, Gulti and Thimmi, Akkani and Pijina etc. and possess their own individual vitality.

A novel of almost seven hundred pages, it tells the story in an interesting manner. It presents what may seem to be the most trivial and insignificant events side by side with the most important ones. For example, the author juxtaposes in sharp contrast the elaborate artifice of a petty Christian missionary ceaselessly trying to convert Hindus to Christianity using every means, with the noble endeavour of Swami Vivekananda to hold up before all the world the sublime, universal principles of Hindu religion and Vedanta philosophy, without the least attempt to forcibly convert anyone of any faith.

MALELA JIV (Gujarati) is novel published in 1940 written by Pannalal Patel which gives a complete picture of the social, political, cultural, religious, geographical, ethical and economical environment of the north west region of Gujarat. It is the story of love between Kanji, a peasant and Jivi, a woman from barber caste. Due to the non-permissibility of inter-caste marriage in the prevalent social system, they cannot get married. Kanji is not prepared to displease the people of his caste nor is he prepared to leave Jivi. So, after conferring with his friend Hero, he gets Jivi married to a barber of his village, so that he can get a glimpse of Jivi off and on. Jivi not only agrees to Kanji's commands, but leaves her parents without even informing them. After her marriage, because of village atmosphere, jealousy of Jivi's husband and fear of blasphemy he avoids meeting Jivi who in turn is tortured by her husband doubting her fidelity. Unable to bear the agony of his beloved and due to his own helplessness, Kanji leaves the village. Jivi's cup of unhappiness is full, she mixes poison in her food to end her life but as ill-luck would have it, her husband by mistake takes the food and dies. Jivi is condemned by the village people as murderer and ultimately she goes mad. At the end Kanji when he returns to the village, tries to mend his mistake by taking Jivi with him to the city.

The plot is well knit. The characters are life like, inner conflict is effectively depicted and the style of narration is haunting. The novel is recommended for translation into all the Indian languages under Sahitya Akademi programme and has already been translated into some of them.

MALGONKAR, MANOHAR (English; b. 1913), one of the best known and most successful novelists in English, comes from an old Marathi speaking Brahmin family of land-owners and lives in Jagalbet in Karnataka. He graduated with Honours in English and Sanskrit from Bombay University in 1935 and tried several careers including a successful one in the Army before he published his first book, Kanhoji Angrey (1959), a historical biography of the Maratha admiral. Malgonkar's preoccupation with the Maratha history led him to write Puars of Dewas Senior (1963) and Chhatrapatis of Kolhapur

(1971). As a historian he has drawn heavily on the researches of others, but his books on history are carefully documented and are as readable as his fiction. Though it was with the publication of The Princes (1963) that Malgonkar won fame and recognition, he had already published two novels, Distant Drum (1960), a highly sympathetic and absorbing account of life in the British Indian Army, and Combat of Shadows (1962), a thrilling drama of confrontation of races in colonial India. The Princes and A Bend in the Ganges (1964) are his most impressive achievements in fiction so far. In these novels his immense narrative power and skill sustain historical themes of epic significance. The Princes, perhaps the most ambitious work by any writer on the disintegration of the old aristocratic order represented by Indian royalty, is a moving story. A Bend in the Ganges, a novel on the inter-related themes of violence and nonviolence, also deals with the pre-Independence phase of Indian history. In these two novels, Malgonkar comes closest to stating his own distinctive vision of life. The Devil's Wind (1972) is the story of the so-called Indian Mutiny and of Nana Saheb, told from the Indian point of view. Malgonkar, using up-to-date research in the area, has done an admirable job in extricating Nana Saheb from malicious propaganda and presenting him as a human being. Malgonkar has also written a large number of short stories, some of which are included in A Toast of Warm Wine (1974). He has novelised Krishna Shah's Shalimar (1978) and published a book on the assassination of Mahatma Gandhi, The Men Who Killed Gandhi (1978). Dead and Living Cities (1977) is a collection of his occasional writing.

MALHI, GOBIND (Sindhi, b. 1921), a versatile Sindhi writer, was born at a small village, Tharushah, in the interior of Sindh in a family of a small landlords. His mother died when he was barely sixteen months old. His early schooling started at his village, but was soon shifted to Karachi for further studies under the care of his married sister.

It is interesting to note that young Malhi was drawn to the national movement and took part in political activities at an early age, much against his father's wishes, who was a conservative and law-abiding citizen. This brought him in direct clash with his father, which continued till the father breathed his last.

Shri Gobind Malhi matriculated from the Bombay University in the year 1939, but as communal disturbances overtook that part of Sindh, he obtained the degree in law 1944. Remaining deeply involved in political and literary activities, he did not practice law even for a day.

MALI-MALIK, SATYAWATI

When the national struggle for independence reached climax during 1942, Malhi jumped in the fray; he was arrested and imprisoned for three months. He came in contact with a revolutionary Marxist student-leader, Sobho Gianchandani, who initiated him to Marxist philosophy. Later, he joined the communist party and remained Secretary of the Karachi Branch of the party for some time.

He had deep interest in literature even at school. He reminisces in his Autobiography (Part I, 1987): '...I grew up among books. There was a big library in the house, creative person was rising in me...when one of my poems was published in the Sindh, the most outstanding literary magazine of that time, I was simply overwhelmed by joy, and confidence in my creative ability opened up before me!

Being attracted by Marxian thought, he was drawn towards progressive literature and became a pioneer of progressive movement in Sindh. A nucleus was formed under the name of 'Nai Duniya Circle' which became a vehicle for the spread of progressive literary ideas. A monthly magazine Nai Duniya was also started and Malhi became its editor.

After the partition of the country, Malhi migrated to Bombay. A literary circle, 'Naon Sahit Mandal', was set up in Bombay of which Malhi became the first general secretary. Thus, he was again in the forefront of Sindhi literary scene, carrying two missions at the same time—his creative activity and promoting the cause of the Sindhi language for its survival in India. An all India platform of writers, artists and educationists, Akhil Bharat Sindhi Boli Ain Sahit Sabha, has been working for the cultural promotion of the Sindhi community for over three decades. Malhi remained its General Secretary for nine years (1963-71) and President of the Sabha for seven years (1980-1987).

Malhi has done pioneering work in the Sindhi cultural field also. He established his Kalakar Mandal (a cultural group) to encourage Sindhi dramatic activity in the year 1951, and inspired many stage artists who are today the pride of Sindhi stage. He ventured in the film world and produced a Sindhi film Sindh je kinare. Kalakar Mandal, under his inspiration, turned into a mobile singing group, toured the whole of India and abroad, thrilling millions with Sindhi melodies and folk-songs for over thirty years.

Malhi was associated with the Indian Peoples Theatre Association (1953-58). He occupied important positions in the organisation and came in contact with the stalwarts of Indian Theatre, such as Ritwick Ghatak, R.M. Singh, A.K. Hangal, Sanjeev Kumar and others. His full play, an adaptation of Maxim Gorky's Lower Depths in Hindi was staged under the name of Musafiron ke liye by the Association.

Malhi's literary output has been huge. He has written twentyfour novels, thirtytwo one act-plays, 40 short stories, and a host of literary articles. He has also translated many eminent writers of English, Hindi and Urdu in Sindhi. His novel Pyar ji pyas (Thirst of love) received the Sahitya Akademi award (1973). Some of his novels have been translated into Hindi, Gujarati and Malayalam. One of his stories, 'Hia bi ka akhani ahe' has been translated into many languages.

His works include: Novels: Ansoo (1952), Zindagi je raha te (1952), Jivan sathi (1952), Pakhiara valara khan vichhidia (1953), Man jo meet (1953), Lalkar (1954), Chanchal Nigahun (1954), Sharma b'uti (1955), Lok Ahe b'ok (1955), D'ehi pard'ehi thia (1956), Ishq nahe rand (1957), Piyar ji shikast (1958), Desi sena kajani (2 editions, 1959, 1972), Jin suri bhain seja (1960), Hiku Insan sau tufan (1963), Smuglar (1964), Pritam vio pardes (1966), Sindhua je kinare (1968), Saudagar sunha ja (1970), Piyar ji piyas (1972), Tun man hua (1974), Muhabat je rah te (1975), Masuria ji rani (1976). Short stories (collections): Iha bi ka akhani ahe (1984), Ag'te kadam (1987). One-act plays: Ghot kunwar razi (1973), Gustakhi maf (1988). Autobiography series: G'alhiyun munhje g'otha Jun (Part I, 1987), Sindhri munhji jindri (Part II, 1988).

MALI (Malayalam; b. 1915). Madhavan Nair or Mali as he is popularly known is a native of Trivandrum. The son of Sadasyatilakan T.K. Velu Pillai, he had his entire education in Trivandrum. While practising as an advocate he joined the fraternity of journalists and worked for a few years in Bombay and Delhi but became at last an employee of All India Radio, where he continued until retirement as Assistant Director.

Though distinguished as a sportsman and also as one who has published well researched articles on music and certain other arts, Mali is primarily known as a writer of children's literature, in which he earned a lasting reputation. Of the 12 books belonging to this category, Mali ramayanam and Mali bharatam are deservedly popular. Among the other works including a play and a collection of stories, special mention may be made of Karna shapatham (Karna's vow), an experiment in writing 'attakkatha' which attracted vast audiences. He also translated some of his own works into English.

K.S.N.

MALIK, SATYAWATI (Hindi; b. 1907). Born in Srinagar, she developed a fascination for creative writing in Hindi at a very early age. The two main genres in which she has written are short story and sketch on the one hand, and personal essay on the other. She is better known as a short story writer. Her three published short-story collections are Do phool (1948), Baishakh ki raat (1951) and

MALIK, SYED ABDUL

Din raat (1955). Her other works are Manav ratna (Biography, 1949), Amit rekhayan (Sketches, 1951) and Amar path (Essays, 1954).

Satyawati Malik's short stories reveal two important trends in the main. The first is that they offer glimpses of a dream world in a typical romantic mood. The other is an urge to establish firmly the concept of an idealist hero. While she realises the inevitability of a realistic approach for a proper perspective of life's myriad situations, she does not find herself mentally prepared to do away with her idealism. That is her dilemma. This conflict within her psyche does affect the naturalness of her characterisation, but it seems such a self-contradictory approach was inherent in the age of uncertainty and flux of values in which she grew up and wrote. She was very much in the thick of the Freedom Movement that swept the country and inculcated in the people a sense of pride for our traditional values and culture. Some of her stories are representative of the changing moral code and patterns of social behaviour.

Tendentiousness mars the communicability of her biography, Manav ratna. Her sketches too suffer from the same malady. Her characters reveal at times a sort of exaggerated approach to an issue, or a too liberal streak of emotionalism gives them a melodramatic flavour. In either case, they create a credibility gap.

Being a woman devoted to the cause of awakening people in general, and women in particular, she has acquired, as a litterateur, a larger than life image.

MALIK, SYED ABDUL (Assamese; b. 1919) graduated with Honours in English in 1941 from Cotton College, Gauhati, and took his M.A. degree in Assamese from Gauhati University.

Malik began his career as a school teacher in Jorhat Government High School and later served as an Excise Inspector and Civilian Censor during 1942-1944. He then taught Persian at J.B. College, Jorhat, and later, in 1948, he joined the All India Radio. Since 1957 he taught Assamese in J.B. College, Jorhat, until he became a Member of the Rajya Sabha.

Malik has been associated with a number of cultural and other organisations like the Sahitya Akademi, Sangeet Natak Akademi, Lalit Kala Akademi and the National Book trust. For sometime he was the General Secretary of the Asam Sahitya Sabha and in 1977 he became its President. In 1957 he represented Assam in the Asian Writers' Conference and visited the Soviet Union as a member of a team of Indian writers. In 1973, he won the Sahitya Akademi award for his novel, Aghari atmar kahini. Malik has also been actively associated with politics. Syed Abdul Malik's literary career began with the publication of his story 'Andha kon?' on the eve of World War II. Since after the War Malik's facile pen has continued to pour out literary creations in almost every genre. He has written short stories, novels, poems, dramas, serious and humorous essays; he has translated and produced research works. Malik has undoubtedly the unique distinction of being the most versatile and prolific living writer in the whole area of Assamese literature. He can be singled out as the only Assamese writer of the post-War period who has to his credit not less than a thousand short stories and as many as thirty seven novels, eight dramas, two collections of poems and several works of translations and miscellaneous writings. Malik has also edited two news magazines, Paygam and Jamjam.

His collections of short stories include Rangagara, Ejani natun chhowali, Maraha papari, Siskare sikhare, Maram maram lege, Sil aru sikha, Chhay nambar prasnar uttar, Asthayi antara, Bahut bedana etopal chakulo, Bibhatsa bedana and Eka beka britta. Malik's first novel was La-sa-gu which was published as a book under the title of Omala gharar dhuli. His other novels include Ben jui, chhabighar, Rathar chakari ghure, Matir chaki, Rajtirthar, Surujmukhir swapna, Rajanigandhar chakulo, Prachir aru prantar, Pahumara habir bat, Jetuka patar dare, Anyam mritya, Nal birina khagari, Ui haflu, Anyak akas anyatara, Arunabhar sampurna jivani, Mor babe nuruba malati phool, Khara nidan, Jujajur ghat, Agnigarbha, Eha surya, Dukhan nadi eta marubhumi, Bih metekar phool, Adhar sila, Andhakup, Rupabarir palas. He has two collections of poems to his credit, viz., Beduin and Swkshar. His other notable works are Jikir aru jari, Majat mathon himalaya, Tirthayatri, Chirakumar sabha, Mirza Ghalib, Surdas, Pranam natun prithivi, besides nine dramas viz., Assam maya, Durar devata, Andha ake chhabi, Miri jiyari, Rajdrohi, Makarajal, Sakuntala, Tejimala, and Alahighar.

Malik is not only a master story-teller and one of the most popular and distinguished writers of the Assamese short story but he has also shown a rare mastery over the technique and conception of novel writing. As a short story writer, Malik has as easily dealt with the most romantic themes as the most realistic ones in all conceivable backgrounds—rural, urban and the exotic. In his almost uninhibited exposure of sexual realities, economic and social evils and psychological depths, he is a realist; but with his dream of social, political and economic changes and with his idealistic sentiments he invariably dilutes his realism with romantic idealism. None, however, can deny the entertaining quality and human appeal in Malik's short stories.

Malik's novels are remarkable for a variety of themes, the breadth of canvas, a penetrating insight into the conflicts of human passions and desires, a sustained imaginative power and a lively style. Perhaps his best novel is Surujmukhir swapna which has already been translated into most of the Indian languages.

MALIK RAM-MALKANI, MANGHARAM UDHARAM

His Jikir aru jari is the fruit of an admirable work of research into Muslim devotional songs in Assamese.

His versatile talents and inborn sense of humour have also found expression in some of his humorous and satirical pieces and the dramas he has written.

MALKANI, MANGHARAM UDHARAM (Sindhi, b. 1896, d. 1980) was an eminent playwright, poet, critic and literary historian. He became a legendary figure of the Sindhi world of letters in his life time and was popularly known as the 'Grand old man' of Sindhi literature. Born in an educated Amil family, he graduated at D.J. Sind College, Karachi, and started his career as a lecturer in English. His first book Gum thial sandukri (A missing briefcase, 1914), a translation of an English novel, was published when he was just 18. He formed Rabindranath Dramatic Club at Hyderabad (Sindh) in 1923, the foundation stone of which was laid by Mahakavi Tagore himself. On that occasion the club presented Tagore's play Chitrangada in which he played the important role of Arjun. His first adapted full-length play Kismat (Fate) was presented by the club in 1927. Khina ji khata (Mistake of a moment, 1930) was his original short play which was adjudged as the best play of the year. Another short play Tea party (1935), was also very well received by audience and drama critics. A collection of his five short plays Panja nadhra nataka (1937) made him a pioneer of Sindhi drama. He struggled hard to pave new ways in this neglected form of literature and came out successfully with many plays in the Sindhi theatre world. He translated Tagore's Gitanjali (1942) and Malancha (1940). After the partition, he migrated to Bombay and worked as Professor of English at Jai Hind College from where he retired in 1962, and settled down in Calcutta. He was one of the founders of Sindhi Sahit Mandal (1940) at Bombay for encouraging the budding writers and remained its President for 14 years. He authored over 50 books which include 35 one-act plays and five full-length-plays, two of which were awarded prizes by Rabindra Nath Literary and Dramatic Club, Hyderabad (Sindh). He rendered yeoman's service to the Sindhi literature with his book Sindhi nasr ji tarikh (History of Sindhi prose, 1968), which is considered to be a historical document of pre and post-partition Sindhi literature. This scholarly treatise was acclaimed as the most authentic piece of writing in India and Pakistan and was reprinted in Sindhi. The book won him Sahitya Akademi award in 1969. The Sahitya Akademi honoured him by awarding him fellowship in 1972 at a special function at Calcutta. His bold play Pyara ji seja (Bed of love) was awarded first prize in All India Sindhi Drama Competition held at Calcutta in 1973. His last book Bharat mein Sindhi sahit jo mukhtsar jaizo (A shot survey of Sindhi literature in India, 1980) is considered to be a worthwhile contribution to the post-Partition Sindhi criticism. Many of his books have been prescribed as text books in various universities.

His works include Anarkali (A play, 1937), Adabi usula (Literary principles, 1950); Short plays: Jivan chahichita (Episodes of life, 1957), Papu kina punju (Sin or virtue, 1962), Khurkhabita pia timkani (Fireflies keep shining, 1967), Akhrin bheta (The last presentation, 1976), Samund ji gajkar (Roar of the sea, 1979); Poetic prose: Javana ja jazba, piria jun yadgiryun (Emotions of youth, reminiscences of old age, 1975); Sahitkarani jun smrityun (Memories of litterateurs, 1979).

MALKANI, NARAINIDAS RATANMAL-MALLIK KUMUDRANJAN

MALKANI, NARAINIDAS RATANMAL (Sindhi; b. 1890, d. 1974) was a non-fiction prose writer in Sindhi. Among other books, he published G'othani chahira (vol. I, 1933; vol. II, 1934) and Anar-dana (1942). Known for his own inimitable style, the author enriched the field of personal essay in Sindhi. Beginning his career as a Professor of Economics, he ended up as a nominated member of Rajya Sabha (1952-62) in independent India.

Thereafter, he was associated with Lajpat Bhawan, New Delhi, an organisation devoted to the socio-cultural advancement of the country. When he was an inmate of Lajpat Bhawan, he published his autobiography Nirali zindagi (1973) in Sindhi.

Some select pieces from the two volumes of G'othani chahira were included in Anar dana which was marked by humour and satire in style and sensitive portrayal of socio-economic conditions in content. His essays from Anar dana make a good reading material for text-books of Sindhi prose.

His Nirali zindagi recalls his association with national leaders like Gandhiji and Jawaharlal Nehru and looks back at the time before and after the independence of the country in 1947.

MALLAYYA SASTRI, BANKUPALLE (Telugu; b. 1876, d. 1946), an eminent and renowned Sanskrit scholar, is specially remembered today as the earliest translator of the Rigveda into Telugu. Mallaya Sastry was the eldest son of Ganganna and Srimati Suramma. Ganganna was a protege of the Zaminder of Utlam (Sri Kakalam District). Mallaya Sastri had his early and advanced education in Sanskrit Grammar under Mahamahopadhyaya Parevastu Rangacharyulu of Tuni and Sri Nanduri Venkata Sastri of Srikurmam logic, Vedanta and Bhagavadgita under Kurelle Suryanarayana Sastry of Vijayanagar and under Bhallamudi Dakshina Murthy Sastri; and the Mantra shastra under Bankupalle Kama Sastri.

In 1897, Mallaya Sastri joined as a Telugu pandit the High School in Srikakulam and subsequently at the High school in Parlakimidi (Ganjam district, Orissa). The Raja of Parlakimidi was impressed by the profound scholarship of Mallaya Sastri and made him a Lecturer in Sanskrit at the local college and also honoured him as his court-scholar. While a scholar in the Parlakimidi Raja's Court, Sastry mastered astrology under Nilamani Panigrahi, who was the court-astrologer. He also studied mimamsa under Ganti Suryanarayana Sastri and English from Gidugu Ramamurthi. He acquired a knowledge of music from his own father-in-law, Pokala Simhachalam, who was the court-musician of Parlakimidi. Simhachalam gave his daughter in marriage to Mallaya Sastri, after the latter lost his first wife. With his knowledge of music, Mallaya Sastri used to render in song, before large audiences in towns and villages, under the name 'Purana Harikatha', themes from the Ramayana, the Mahabharata, and other Sanskrit and Telugu classics.

At some point of time in India's religious history, centuries ago and quite early, some vested interests tabooed the shudras (men of the fourth caste) and the women from learning the Vedas; the shudra, under the Sacred law (Dharma shastra) could even be harshly punished, if he dared even to listen to the Veda. As a consequence, like the Pope's ban in medieval Europe against the translation of the Bible into the European vernaculars, in India there was an orthodox sanction that the Veda, which is in Vedic Sanskrit, should not be rendered into the vulgar and vernacular tongues of the country, as this would make possible for the Shudras and the women to go through it. Till the turn of this century, the orthodox among the Hindus obstinately persisted in this taboo against the Shudra and the woman. These people though they could not object to the translation of the Vedas into the European vernaculars by people like Max Mueller, successfully excommunicated the Indian scholar who dared to translate the Veda into the Indian vernaculars. In Telugu, Bankupalle Mallayya Sastri, boldly and successfully revolted against this tyranny of the orthodox over knowledge (the Veda). Much to the chagrin of many an orthodox pandit he helped the translation of the Vedas into Telugu in the forties of this century. Himself a translator of the Rigveda, he was the general editor for the translation of the other Vedas, by different scholars. Telugu translations of the Vedas were published in the 1940's by the Vinayasraman, headed by Gollapudi Sitarama Sastri, a disciple of Mahatma Gandhi.

Among the other important works of Mallaya Sastri, besides the translation of the Rigveda, may be mentioned his commentary on the Bhagavadgita, called Gitarahasya, based on the Purushottamatattva of Aurobindo and a Telugu rendering of the Sahitya darpana, Viswanatha's Sanskrit work on rhetoric. He wrote a number of 'yakshaganas' in Telugu—the Chaitanya charitramu, the Rukmini kalyanamu etc. to name only a few among many others. He wrote Harikathas in Sanskrit, Sitakalyanamu, janaki vahni praveshamu, etc. and was conferred the title Purana Vachaspati by the raja of Chikati state. While on his way back home from Kashi, where he went on a pilgrimage with his wife, Mallaya Sastri met with his death.

MALLIK KUMUDRANJAN (Bengali; b. 1882, d. 1970) was a teacher in his village school (Mathrun High School). The even tenor of his life and the placidity of his temperament were as much reflected in his poems as in the way he lived his life. He was intensely religious and a devout Vaishnavite. His language is devoid of literary artistry and is as simple as the natural surroundings in which he lived. His strong attachment to the values of the indigenous culture and to the rural way of life marked all his poems. His devotional nature was not of an abstract kind, and in his scheme of poetry love of God and love of the common man were very often interchangeable terms.

Ujani (1911) is his most representative book of poems. Among the others are: Bantulasi (The wild basil, 1911), Shatadal (The lotus, 1911), Ektara (The one-stringed instrument, 1914), Banamallika (The wild jasmine, 1918), Rajanigandha (The tuberose, 1942), Ajay (The river Ajay, 1927), Swarnasandhya (The golden evening, 1948).

MALLIK VAIDYANATH (Maithili; b. 1912, d. 1987), pen name 'Vidhu' was born at village Biraui in Madhubani district (Bihar). Due to poverty he could not get formal education. And an early age he had to enter the service of Rajnagar Estate as a Nayab Patwari and served there till he retired. He also practised Homeopathy. For some time he edited Chandni, a Hindi monthly of short stories published from Patna. He was also a correspondent of Aryavarta, a leading Hindi daily of Bihar. He got the Sahitya Akademi Award for his Sitayana in 1976.

His only published work Sitayana (1974) is a testimony to his poetic power. It is a voluminous epic based on the mythical and popular story primarily of Sita and secondarily of Rama. So the character of Sita is more exalted here. The poem consists of seven parts, and each part is divided into seven chapters. Thus the whole poem is completed in 49 (7x7) 'sargas'. The first part describes the land of Mithila, the story of Sita's previous birth and her present incarnation. The second part deals with her childhood, her lifting of Shiva's bow, Janaka's vow, and the curse of a she-parrot on Sita. In the third, the 'Dhanusha-yajna' and the marriage and departure of Sita are described in the typical folk style of Mithila. In the fourth, Sita proceeds to the forest with Rama and Lakshmana. The fifth deals with the abduction of Sita. The sixth describes her return to Ayodhya, the coronation of Rama, and the abandoning of Sita. In the last part, Lav and Kush are born and brought up, and ascend the throne, and Sita re-enters the womb of her mother, Earth. Deficiency, if any, in refinement and classical touch is amply compensated by the charm of folk-style and smooth flow of the story.

MAMANG LEIKAI THAMBAL SHATLE (Manipuri), a slender collection of 35 poems in 56 pages by Laishram Samarendra Singh, was published in 1974. It won the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1976. The poems deal with common incidents and the simple feelings they cause in the sensitive mind of the poet. As the poet looks at these apparently common incidents from a poetic angle, they all assume different shapes and colours and appear in a completely new light. Some appear ridiculously shameful while some others appear to cause mirth and laughter. Such poems as 'Ingagi nong', 'Huramba macha' and 'Mamang leikai thambal shatle' are mildly satirical in tone while the poems like 'Konung kang tubada', 'Keisampat' and 'Lairaba inakkhubai wa' contain sentiments which testify to the poet's deep understanding and sympathy. Mamang leikai thambal shatle has been one of the trend-setters in Manipuri poetry and has come to influence the works of other poets.

MAMMATA (Sanskrit; b. 11th century) is one of the most important writers in the area of Sanskrit poetics. Mammata had the title 'Rajanaka'. Both the name and the title being exclusively peculiar to Kashmir indicate that Mammata was a Kashmirian. His date cannot be precisely determined; yet he can roughly be assigned to the later half of the eleventh century A.D. It is recorded by a later commentator that Mammata was the son of Jayyata. It is also maintained that Mammata had his education in Varanasi.

Mammata was the author of Kavyaprakasha, an important work on poetics, as well as of Shabdavyaparavichara (published by Nirnaya Sagara Press, Bombay), which discusses the functions (vyaparas) of the words, which convey the various types of meaning. A work on music, viz., Sangitaratnavali, is also attributed to Mammata by one Gajapati Narayanadeva in his Sangita-narayana.

Kavyaprakasha is Mammata's magnum opus. It is believed that a very short portion of this work was composed by a co-author named Allata. But Mammata was the author of the major portion which also embodies the more momentous decisions on certain controversial issues. This book is traditionally called an 'akara', i.e., 'a source book', and this epithet is justified in so far as it provided the definitions of various literary elements to be quoted by later commentators of literary works, and also set a model for the later works on poetics in respect of the scope and the order of treatment of the topics of poetics. Kavyaprakasha deals with all the topics of poetics except dramaturgy. A later notable work, Sahityadarpana, which has a chapter on dramaturgy, follows almost the same pattern as that of Kavyaprakasha in respect of the other topics of poetics. Much of Mammata's discussions is based on the works of his predecessors such as Bhamaha, Vamana, Rudrata, Udbhata, Anandavardhana and Abhinavagupta. Yet Mammata does not lack originality. He also refutes the views of the predecessors wherever necessary. Kavyaprakasha is aimed at upholding the theory of 'dhvani', propounded by Anandavardhana (c. A.D.850), which recognises a suggestive potentiality (called 'vyanjana') of the words and meanings of poetry (kavya), and also claims that suggestive poetry is the best type of poetry and 'rasa' (i.e., aesthetic relish) is the most appealing and most desirable element of poetry. Some later theorists, e.g., Mahimabhatta, author of Vyakti-viveka, vehemently criticised the views of Anandavardhana. Mammata on his own refuted all the adverse arguments of the opponents of the dhvani theory. In the course of doing so Mammata has given a very good account of his vast erudition and particularly of his mastery over Vyakarana, Nyaya and Mimamsa. Some salient features of Mammata's literary theory are as follows: (i) Mammata believes that the poet is a creator, (ii) According to Mammata one can become a poet with (a) inborn literary talent, (b) training and (c) practice—all taken together, (iii) There are three levels of literary composition, viz., the 'best' (i.e., where the suggested element predominates, 'mediocre' (i.e., where the suggested element does not predominate); and the 'worst' (i.e., where there is no suggested sense but only a figure of sense or a figure of words), (iv) Poetry brings forth fame, wealth and well-being to the poet, and wisdom, well-being, agreeable counsels, and an extraordinary joy to the readers, (v) Poetry consists of words and meaning free from blemishes ('doshas'), endowed with qualities ('gunas'), and normally endowed with figures of speech, (vi) So-called qualities (gunas) are the qualities of rasa, and not of words and senses. The number of qualities is only three and not ten, (vii) It is implied that poetry, worth the name, should invariably have the suggestion of some sentiment (rasa).

The text of Kavyaprakasha is characterised by utmost economy of words and recondite intellectual references, so much so that it cannot be understood without a prior acquaintance with various lores such as Mimamsa and Buddhist logic, and without a commentary. Consequently it became a mark of scholarship to be the author of a commentary on Kavyaprakasha. To put it in the words of P.V. Kane, "except the Bhagavadgita there is hardly any other work in classical Sanskrit that has so many commentaries on it."

Mammata's Shabdavyaparavichara (also referred to as Shabdavyaparaparichaya by S.K. De) is a smaller work having contents similar to those of the second chapter of Kavyaprakasha, where there is a treatment of the various powers (vyaparas) of the words with which the primary, secondary and the suggested meanings are conveyed as well as of the power with which the sentence conveys its total meaning. Philosophical systems like Nyaya and Mimamsa are concerned with these powers because of epistemological considerations, since verbal testimony is recognised by most of such systems as one of the 'pramanas' (i.e. instruments for the attainment of valid knowledge). Philosophical systems are, however, opposed to the recognition of a suggestive potentiality, which is the very forte of the dhvani theory. Mammata establishes the conception of the suggestive potentiality of words and meaning after refuting the views of the opponents. In the Shabdavyaparavichara Mammata mainly refutes the views of Mukulabhatta as expressed in his Abhidhavarittimatrika (published by Nirnaya Sagara Press, Bombay).

It is a pity that Mammata's Sangitaratnavali is known only from reference and remains yet to be discovered.

Incidentally, the views of Mammata, who was an intellectual prodigy, also did not go unchallenged. Vishvanathakaviraja and Panditaraja Jagannatha, for instance, vehemently criticised various views of Mammata in their respective works Sahityadarpana and Rasagangadhara. Siddhichandra Gani (1587-1666) wrote a book called Kavyaprakashakhandana with the sole aim of refuting Mammata. There is also another similar work of an unknown author which bears the title Kavyamritatarangini with the sub-title Kavyaprakashakhandana.

MAMTORA, ASANAND (Sindhi; b. 1903) was born at Karachi. He did B.A. (Hons.) in English as well as in Sindhi literature from the University of Bombay. He also did B.T. and M.R.S.T. (London). In his early career, he worked as a teacher, and later, as a Principal at Karachi and Bombay. Mamtora had the honour of being the Chairman of Karachi Vidyarthi Sangam and also Chairman of the Reception Committee of Akhil Bhartiya Vidyarthi Sammelan in 1931 at Karachi, which was presided over by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. In early 1920, Mamtora abandoned studies and actively participated in the Non-cooperation Movement. After the Independence of India, he migrated to Bombay and established a High School for Sindhis in the heart of Bombay city. Mamtora's contribution in the field of education is immense and laudable.

Mamtora is the most accomplished fictioneer in Sindhi from the pre-Independence era. He entered the literary scene with a booklet Felsuf: Prem ain amrit (Philosopher: Love and nectar, 1927) and never looked back. During the long span of his literary career from early twenties to eighties, the number of books brought out by him are less in quantity, but rich in quality. Jivat: Prem ain papa jun kahaniyun (Lite: stories of love and sin, 1939), Arsi (The mirror, 1943), G'anwarin (The illiterate, 1978) are distinguished collections of his short stories. Shair (The poet, 1941) and Halima (1977) are his novels. Pakistan? (1945) is a book which reveals his socio-political thoughts. Hanj chug'aninoti (1985) is a collection of his selected essays.

'Kiki' (1939), one of his most famous and controversial stories, in which Mamtora deals with the theme of sublimation, is considered to be a milestone in Sindhi literature and has been translated into English and other Indian languages as well as in foreign languages. The substance of the story shows of the influence of James Joyce on Mamtora. Truly, the credit of introducing the trend of stream of consciousness goes to Mamtora. Mamtora's novel Shair is his another noteworthy achievement. Shair is known for its imaginative and innovative style. L.H. Ajwani, historian and litterateur, hailed Shair in 1941 as unlike anything yet attempted in Sindhi—a marvellous mosaic phantasy which opened up new possibilities in Sindhi language and literature. Shair, with its finer qualities and aesthetic heights, lucid and poetic language created a wave of self-confidence among all the Sindhi writers of that time. Mamtora's second novel, Halima (1977), which he considers his best, is a heroine-oriented novel in which the heroine Halima accepts the challenge in her life, fights, and undergoes numerous agonising experiences. In his short stories and novels, Mamtara's approach is quite unique and different from that of his contemporaries. He is very much known for a profound study of human psyche and also for his metaphysical quest. The study and deep knowledge of Freudian theories and influence of the great master of French short story, Guy De Maupassant, and Rabindranath Tagore gave new look to Mamtara's writings. In his themes, he dealt with various mental complexes and spiritual aspirations through the characters.

In the year 1985, he received a cash award of Rs. 5,000/- from Sarva Bharat Sindhi Boli Sahitya Ain Kala Vikas Sabha, Bombay. He also received a cash award of Rs. 10,000/- for the year 1987-88 from Maharashtra Sindhi Sahitya Academy for his outstanding contribution to Sindhi literature.

At the age of eightysix, Mamtara is still active and mentally alert. A wizard with words, he still writes essays and articles on various subjects for literary magazines, and commands respect from all the generations of writers.

MAMU (Oriya) is a remarkable social novel by Fakirmohan Senapati, written and published about the year 1913. This is the author's third novel which came fifteen years after the publication of his masterpiece Chhaman atha guntha. This is a domestic novel and the plot is set against the backdrop of the social and economic conditions of Orissa during the period 1840-1880. Mamu (uncle) in its structure, design, treatment and temper has a number of affinities with his previous famous novel, Chhaman atha guntha. Mamu like Chhaman atha guntha deals with economic exploitation, jealousy, hypocrisy, and the inhuman treatment meted out by greedy relatives to their minor dependents. Babu Dasarathi Das is a revenue moharir serving the Collectorate of Cuttack District. In Cuttack he lives in a rented house. His wife Menaka Dei and two sons Banambar and Natabar live at Rukunadei, his home village. Menaka Dei is always ill and her sister Saraswati Dei, a widow, looks after their household. Dasarathi has one daughter named Chandramoni who has been brought up in luxury and parental indulgence. She is beautiful. While Natabar is clever, sturdy and industrious, Banambar is indifferent and never applies himself to studies. Pratap Uditta Malla Roy of Naripur Zamindari is their classmate. Natabar and Pratap Uditta pass their Entrance Examination. Meanwhile Banambar has married, and now it is time for Chandramoni's marriage. She is married to Pratap Uditta Malla Roy. Dasarathi Babu is worried about his other son, Natabar. The father in his worry arranges his marriage with Bishakha, a poor village girl. After Dasarathi Babu retires from his service in the Collectorate, Natabar is appointed in his place as Nazir.

Gradually it becomes evident that Natabar Das's only purpose in life is to amass wealth by means fair or foul. In achieving this goal he takes to collection of illegal money, keeping his eyes shut to virtue and morality. His wife Bishakha is clever and a well-intentioned lady. Natabar Das takes his wife Bishakha to Cuttack. Chitra, a woman of dubitable character, regularly visits their house.

Chandramoni after her marriage with Pratap Uditta Malla Roy lives very happily. Pratap Uditta soon becomes popular with his tenants as a benevolent and upright landholder but their happiness is short-lived because Pratap Uditta dies. Chandramoni who was very much devoted to her husband now becomes desolate and grief-stricken. Saraswati Dei comes to live with Chandramoni to look after her and her property. The death of Pratap Uditta Roy provides an opportunity to Natabar Das to usurp the vast property of his sister Chandramoni. Hearing the news of the death of his brother-in-law, Pratap Uditta Roy, Nazir Natabar Babu rushes to Naripur where his sister Chandramoni is lying unconscious in utter grief. Natabar Das behaves as a well-wisher of his sister and her son Naru and volunteers to perform the rituals. For this he cleverly extracts a large sum from his sister. Saraswati Dei does not suspect Natabar Das's dubious activities. As Chandramoni's son is a minor, he volunteers to take the management of the estate in his hand and he obtains the signature of his sister on a plain sheet of paper. On returning to Cuttack, he persuades the District Magistrate to vest the management of his sister's estate with him as the guardian. He somehow manages to steal away the jewellery of his sister. He persuades his sister Chandramoni to leave her son Naru for study at Cuttack and accordingly Naru remains with him. For this also Chandramoni is required to make a monthly payment to her brother Natabar Das. Bishakha Dei is not kind to Naru. She harrasses him in every possible way and her brother Raghav, misguided and mischievous as he is, begins to spoil Naru. Chandramoni falls seriously ill, while Natabar in the name of her treatment, extracts huge money with the help of Pitambar. Chandramoni is treated by an expert physician and cured. But gradually the wealth of the estate of Pratap Uditta Roy is drained out by Natabar Das.

The situation at Naripur further deteriorates as Natabar Das heavily comes down upon the tenants and extracts revenue. But he does not deposit the same with the Government. His plan is that Naripur Zamindari will be put to auction for non-payment of Government revenue and he would bid and buy off the estate. He is opposed severely by one villager called Haribol Barik whose role throughout the novel is replete with seriousness and humour. Chitra, a wicked and ill-famed lady, has been the sole adviser of Natabar Das in his various shady deals. Raghav becomes a drunkard and there is Prabhudayal Bhagat, another wayward man, to assist Natabar in his plan and design. Now Natabar realises that huge money will be required to buy the Naripur Zamindari. Natabar goes on thoughtlessly demanding tax from the tenants and deposits the huge amount in the chest in his bed-room. But the money is stolen by Chitra, Prabhudayal Bhagat and Raghu Mohanty jointly. Now on the charge of misappropriation of Government revenue, Natabar Das is arrested and tried in the Court of Law. Raghu Mohanty, Prabhudayal Bhagat and Chitra are sentenced to imprisonment. Natabar Das is full of remorse and repentance for his misdeeds.

This is a typical rural theme and in executing the same Fakirmohan has shown tremendous and remarkable craftsmanship. He displays a fine power for description, blend of pathos, humour, satire and keen observation of rural life which has sustained the theme from the beginning to the end. He is an adept in presenting characters in various dimensions. His language has a beauty and rhythm. Mamu is an adequate and symptomatic study of rural life. It is full of humour and irony and exhibits a deep understanding of human relationships.

MANA (Maithili) in Maithili literature is a sort of erotic song, depicting the anger or the indignation of the heroine, and the effort of the hero to calm and soothe her. Sometimes the theme works in the opposite direction. A confidant of the heroine is described, trying to reconcile the hero and the heroine. This kind of songs is said to have originated from Vidyapati. Some of his songs in which a lover tries to win back his indignant beloved, offended by his infidelity, were highly popular. Following him, the later poets produced a large number of manas. A mana has a certain dramatic effect, since it develops through the succinct words of the hero and the heroine (or her confidant) addressed to each other. Because of this effect almost all the 'kirtania' dramas of Mithila and Nepal have accommodated some songs of mana. This is why the ability to sing mana was considered an essential qualification for the actors or performers of the kirtania dramas.

Vidyapati wrote manas, depicting different moods and moments of love. Amongst them, the most charming are those where the hero passes the whole night kneeling before his angry beloved and cajoling her to pardon him. The later poets wrote a number of manas in the manner of Vidyapati. Ultimately this sort of mana developed into the type, 'parati' (morning song). During a marriage ceremony mana is invariably sung in early mornings for four days.

Manas written by several poets of Mithila and Nepal are very popular. Besides Vidyapati, mana-writers deserving mention are Govinda, Kansanarayan, Chaturbhuj, Umapati, Ramapati Nandipati, Jagajjotirmalla, Vanshamani, Jagatprakash Malla, Bhupatindra malla and Harshanath. In the modern age also Jivan Jha has some mana songs to his credit.

MANABODH (Maithili; 18th century) or in full Manabodh Jha, is said to be identical with Bhaba-kavi Bholan as recorded in the Maithili genealogy. He flourished in the first half of the 18th century. He was an astrologer. He was the first known Maithili poet who heralded a new era of prabandha-kavya or epical poem. His only work, Krishnajanma, was first edited by George Abraham Grierson and published in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society of Bengal in 1882. Later on it was published several times edited by different scholars like M.M. Umesh Mishra, Ramanath Jha, Surendra Jha Suman and others. In Mithila there were many persons known by the name of Manabodh. Among them the author of the Krishnajanma is identified as above on the evidences available so far. In Grierson's edition the said work is called Harivamsha, but in all other editions it is called Krishnajanma. Being the first prabandha-kavya in Maithili, it is regarded as having some historical importance. Manabodh was the first writer in Maithili who rescued Maithili literature from the narrow confine of the lyrical composition of Vidyapati's tradition. While Krishna in Vidyapati's tradition is an amorous, erotic, sportive and jubilant figure, Manabodh's Krishna is a loving object of affection, a daring hero and a social leader. The Krishnajanma tells the story not only of the birth, as the name suggests, but also of the deeds of the Lord including the slaying of Kamsa and Jarasandha. Woven in the most simple quadruped (chaupai) metre, it enjoyed great popularity, next only to lyrics, thanks to its use of the most simple, rustic natural spoken form of contemporary language punctuated with charming local songs, attributed to him. Available in some anthologies, they are fine examples of the Vidyapati tradition where the emotional feeling is as moving as the language is charming.

MANADANDAM (Malayalam). Joseph Mundassery's (1903-77) Manadandam (measuring scale), published in 1946, consists of three essays on literary criticism and is an attempt to assess the poetic genius of Kalidasa. The title itself is a word borrowed from the first stanza of that great Sanskrit poet's Kumarasambhava, in which the Himalayan mountain is depicted as the measuring scale of the earth.

The first of the three essays, captioned 'Simhavalokana' is an intellectual peregrination through the epics, the Ramayana and the Mahabharata, and also through the major works of Kalidasa. This is followed by an examination of the influence of Sanskrit literature on some standard Malayalam works. While discussing the poetic beauty of Kalidasa's works, the author observes, contrary to the established critical opinion, that Kumarasambhava is superior to Raghuvamsha. He also urges critics to attempt an exhaustive analytical study of the works of great masters. He also exhorts modern writers to present old themes with a socialistic outlook, approving the theory of Stephen Spender that all good literature has a revolutionary impulse.

The second essay establishes its caption "There is only one sandeshakavya, the kavya mentioned being the Meghasandesha (Cloud-messenger) of Kalidasa. But admirers of Malayalam would be disappointed to see Mayurasandesha, the great work of Kerala Varma Valiya Koil Tampuran, being relegated to the position of a mediocre work. Thus the description given in it of the town Kollam (Quilon) is condemned as silly, childish and artificial in comparison with that of Ujjaini in Kalidasa's work. The author seems to have been blinded by his over-enthusiasm for the Sanskrit classic to overlook the beauties of even such major Malayalam works as Unnuni-lisandesha.

The third essay is an appreciation of Kalidasa's 'shaili' or style. According to Mundassery, style is a simple way of presenting complicated ideas and the success of Kalidasa lies in his sense of proportion and propriety. Kalidasa's bias towards 'Vaidarbhi' style with few compound words, his careful selection of metres and the power of his imagination contribute to the glory of his works, says the author.

According to the author, poetry should please and move. In Manadandam he elaborately discusses this and other characteristics of great poetry which stands the test of times. So, though the work is small in size, having only 75 pages, the author's intellectual insight and penetrating arguments make it interesting and thought-provoking.

MANAMANTHANA (Kannada) is a prose work by M. Shivarama which received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1976. The object of the book is to acquaint the lay reader with the symptoms of mental diseases. Once a mental disease reaches an advanced stage cure is both difficult and slow. Early diagnosis helps both the patient and the family. The book comprises two parts. The first gives information about diseases like hysteria, paranoia and schizophrenia; the second explains how the mind works and discusses the body-mind relationship. A number of cases are presented in a homely and conversational language. Incidents are placed in the context of everyday life and the tone is informal. Shivaram has a fine sense of humour. His narration is lively, while the exposition itself is characterized by an interest in and sympathy for the patient and an understanding of the problems of those around him. It is the voice of an elderly, compassionate man that speaks throughout. The explanations of the diseases themselves are clear and accurate. The treatment for each disease is briefly discussed with a clear indication of how those who love the patient can help him.

The book is not just a medical exposition in popular style. Its concern for the well-being of the patient and his family, its understanding of human nature, and, above all, its human approach make it a work of literature.

MANAQIBO (Sindhi) is a form of devotional folk-poetry. The Sindhi word 'manaqibo' (pl. manaqiba) is derived from the Arabic word, 'manqabat', which literally means 'praise, virtue'. In Sindhi folk-poetry, manaqibo is a lengthy narrative poem composed in the praise of the early prophets, or the Holy Prophet Muhammad and his companions or the revered saints. Manaqibo is different from the similar Sindhi poem 'Madaha' and 'Munajata', keeping in view the essential characteristic of narrating a story or an incident from the life of the person praised. In manaqibo a story or an incident so described should delineate meritorious deeds or qualities of the character, but such description should not include a miracle, which again is a subject-matter of the different genre of poetic compositions called 'Mujazo'.

The stories or incidents narrated in manaqiba are mostly those which have already gained popularity among common folks. As the manaqibo poems are meant for recitation in the assemblage of the village folks, it is the general appeal of the theme of the poems rather than its historical authenticity that matters. The aim of these compositions is to impart knowledge of Islam to the masses in their mother tongue by presenting stories from the life of Prophet or the revered saints. Thus, these poems are generally narrative and didactic in nature. The use of the same rhyme throughout the entire poem, or in its given section by generally lengthening a final vowel into 'a', is a popular technique followed by many poets in manaqibo compositions. A few manaqiba are also composed on Persian metres.

The earliest manaqibo poems in Sindhi which have come to light so far, are those composed by Makdhum Ghulam Muhammad Bugai (alive in 1735) and Makdhum Abdul Rauf Bhatti (1683-1753). N.A. Baloch has compiled manaqibo poems under 'Sindhi Folklore and Literature Project', as a second book under this series. It contains seventy-three selected manaqiba classified into four parts as follows: (i) one manaqibo in the praise of the early prophet, Joseph (ii) 54 composition in the praise of the Holy Prophet Muhammad, (iii) 14 compositions in the praise of the Prophet's companions and (iv) 3 compositions in the praise of the revered saints.

MANASAMANGAL-MANASINGHA, MAYADHARA

MANASAMANGAL (Bengali) is the most popular and widely known among the Mangala poems. The different versions written at different times between the fifteenth and the seventeenth centuries by a host of poets may be divided into three groups: (1) the versions from the Rarh area (Bipradas, Ketakadas Kshemananda, Sitaram Das, Rasik Mitra etc.); (2) the versions generally known as Padmapuran from East Bengal (Narayandev, Bijay Gupta, Bansidas etc.) and (3) the versions from North Bengal and Kamrup (Tantrabibhuti, Jagajjiban, Jivana Mitra, Bishnupal etc.). The different versions clearly demonstrate the way in which legends and myths were integrated to build a compelling narrative of divine caprices and the supreme human defiance.

The story of Manasamangal consists of three parts: (1) Manasa's birth, her quarrels with Chand and her marriage with Jaratkaru; (2) Manasa's craving for human worship and adoption of questionable means to secure worship first from cowherds, then from the Muslim farmers and after that from a fisherman family and (3) Chand's continued defiance of and eventual grudging submission to Manasa. The third part is the most popular one and the story may be told briefly as follows. When Manasa assumed the status of a goddess because of her proximity to Shiva, her only concern was to secure human devotees for her worship. Through dubious means she succeeded in securing worship from cowherds and fishermen. She now craved recognition from the upper class, particularly from the merchant community. With this objective, she concentrated on Chand, the merchant Prince who was a staunch devotee of Shiva. Chand possessed divine knowledge and a matted lock and a scarf from Shiva that made him a formidable rival for any god. Manasa first secured the worship of Chand's wife, but when Chand discovered it, he kicked the sacred pot away. Manasa was angry and tried to harm Chand in various ways. In the guise of a beautiful woman she seduced him and this resulted in the loss of his divine knowledge. One by one she killed the six grown-up sons of the merchant Prince. But Chand remained unruffled and unbending. When his youngest son Lakhindar came of age, Chand chose Behula as his bride and fearing Manasa's reprisal, had an airtight iron chamber built for the couple to spend the bridal night. But Manasa managed to suborn the builder who left a chink in the wall through which her thinnest serpent entered and killed Lakhinder. As was the custom, the dead body of Lakhinder was put on a raft and set adrift in the river Balluka. Behula, unable to reconcile with the loss of her husband, accompanied the corpse. In the course of her journey, she encountered all the evil forces and all sorts of temptations. Eventually she reached heaven and having entertained the gods with her songs and dance, asked for her husband's life. On Shiva's command, Manasa was compelled to give back Lakhindar's life but Behula had to promise that, in return, she would persuade her father-in-law, Chand, to worship Manasa. Behula's triumph is the eternal triumph of chastity. Chand, who defied Manasa's spite and threats through all tribulations, finally succumbed to Behula's tearful persuasions and offered worship to Manasa (albeit with his left hand) not with devotion but with extreme reluctance. However, Manasa's purpose was served. She got established as a deity among all classes.

Readers and critics have found seeds and potentiality of an epic in the story of Manasamangal. The triumph of Behula's chastity and Chand's supreme defiance are the stuff of which epics are created. But it seems that no poet of Manasamangal had the necessary poetic genius to lift the narrative above the tradition of Panchali and Mangal-kavya and create an epic out of it. The character of Chand offers an interesting study for the sociologists as to how nonconformism could exist in the representative of a predominantly conformist (merchant) class. The narrative also lends itself to meaningful archetypal interpretations.

MANASINGHA, MAYADHARA (Oriya; b.1973), eminent poet, playwright and critic, was educated at Ravenshaw College, passed M.A. in English from Patna University and obtained Ph.D. degree from Edinburgh University (U.K.). He worked as a College teacher, Educational Adviser for the Eastern States, Inspector of Schools, and as Principal in various Colleges of Orissa. He edited a literary journal called Samkha. He was the chief compiler of the Oriya encyclopaedia, Oriya gyanakosha. His first poem, 'Konark', appeared in Baruni in 1926. His most well-known collection of love lyrics, Dhupa (Incense, 1931) bears testimony to his poetic genius. Hemashasya (Golden crops, 1933) and Hemapushpa (Golden flowers, 1935) treat of love and are both sensuous and idealistic. Another notable collection of poems, Matibani (The voice of the soil), depicts beautiful scenes of the rural Orissa. Bapu-tarpana indicates the poet's sincere love and regard for Gandhiji. Jiban chita (Pyre of life, 1947) projects the mysteries of inner life. Swarajya ashrama contains some beautiful satires based on the post-Independence times. His collections of sonnets like Akshata (The unbroken) and Krusha (The cross, 1956) reveal the metaphysical experiences of the poet. Besides these, he wrote a number of poems which found place in his complete works under the titles of Sedinar kabita (The poems of the bygone days), Kishora kabita (Poems of youth) and Bindu o sindhu (The drop and the sea, 1962). Mansingha also wrote some fine kavyas like Jema (1947), Sadhana jhina

MANAV, VISHWAMBHAR-MANDANA BANDHARO

(1946) and Kamalyana (1947). The first one deals with the tragic life of a widow, the second one centres around the folklore of Taa poi, a legendary daughter of a Sadhaba (the Sadhabas are a traditional business community in Orissa). Kamalyana is written in the epic style and depicts the problems of pre and post-Independence India, through the life sketches of Kamala, the hero and Karuna, the heroine. Mayadhar Manasingha wrote poetic plays such as Rajakabi Upendra (Upendra, the Poet Laureate, 1928), Pujarini (1932), Nasta nida (The spoiled nest, 1931), Buddha and Durbhiksha. Kabi o kabita (Poets and poems) and Matira mahakabi Saraladas (Sarala Das, the great poet of the land) are critical works of high order. Siksha bitra gatha (an autobiography) and Saraswati Fakirmohan are also remarkable for their style and approach.

MANAV, VISHWAMBHAR (Hindi; b. 1912) was born at Dibai in district Bulandsahar (Uttar Pradesh). He started his career as a teacher. Later, he worked with the All India Radio for a few years. He is a poet, a dramatist, a novelist, and a critic, though he is better-known for his critical writings. He made a keen study of such trends in literature as 'Chhayavad' and 'Rahasyavad', and wrote about them. He laid more emphasis on the content than on the form of 'Chhayavad', and held that while an epic excels through its depiction of 'bibhava' the lyric touches the reader by the power of its 'bhava'. The esemplastic imagination achieves emotional synthesis. Herein lies the particular strength of 'Chhayavad'. 'Rahasyavad', dismissed summarily by Acharya Ramchandra Shukla, was given its due by Manav. His commentary on Kamayani and such critical works as on Premchand and Khari boli ke gaurav grantha are well-known.

His play Lahar aur chattan (Waves and rocks) was written originally for the All India Radio, but it was not much of a success. He wrote a novel also, Premikayen (Beloveds), adopting the romantic idiom of love, but the excess of sentimentalism detracts from the beauty of the work. He wrote lyrics too in the tradition of the post-Romantic poetry, but here as well his sentimentalism carries him away. Some of his well-known works, besides those mentioned above, are Mahadevi ki rahasya sadhana (1944), Avasad (Anthology of poems, 1944), Sumitranandan Pant (1951), and Nayi kavita (1957).

Manav is essentially an aesthetic critic and writer. He does not subscribe to any external code, but values a work on its intrinsic strength.

His criticism aims at understanding the work and its creator. The finest form of such criticism is seen in his Mahadevi ki rahasya sadhna. Keeping himself at a distance from political creeds he respects human values and the creativity of a work of art.

MANDAL, ANOOPAL (Hindi; b. 1867), born in Sameli in the district of Purnea, Bihar, he began his career as a teacher in a local primary school. Later, he shifted to Sethia College, Bikaner, as a teacher in 1928. Finally, he gave up teaching to establish a publishing house of his own, Yugantar Sahitya Mandir, Bhagalpur.

He entered the field of literature with an edited work, entitled Rahiman Sudha, in 1927. His first original novel, Nirvasita, which has a social backdrop, appeared in 1929. Another of his novel Mimansa formed the basis of a successful film 'Bahurani' in 1940. Apart from these two novels he wrote or edited the following works:

Panchamrit (ed.), Maharshi Raman, Yogi Aurobindo, Upanishadon ki kahaniyan (2 Vols.), Upadesh ki kahaniyan (4 Vols.), Samajshastra (trans.), Bhagwadgita (trans.), Kendra aur paridhi (novel), Rakta aur Rang (novel).

He had also a stint at the Aurobindo Ashram, Pondicherry, where he stayed for two years and became its life member. He also worked as officer-in-charge of the publications programme of the Bihar Rashtrabhasha Parishad for some years.

He is reckoned as one of the major novelists hailing from Bihar. His importance lies in a deep and sympathetic understanding of the social milieu of the people and their problems and a forthright expression of his reaction thereto. This directness of expression accounts for the vitality of his creative writings.

MANDANA BANDHARO (Gujarati; b. 15th century), was a poet who was by caste, a Bandharo. He lived at Sirohi in Rajasthan. He is the well-known author of Prabodhabatrissi (Thirty-two chapters on enlightenment), a collection of didactic verses divided into 32 parts according to subjects. Here the poet satirized contemporary society; he also employed in his compositions the popular proverbs of his times. The philosopher poet Akho who lived more than a century after Mandana, was indebted to the Prabodhabatrissi for his satires and one can cite many a parallel passage from the works of the two poets. •

Apart from writing Prabodhabatrissi, Mandana also composed some other works. His Ramayana is a versified summary of the famous epic, Rukmangada katha. It presents the mythological story of King Rukmangada. He also wrote a few other works which are available in the manuscript form.

MANDUKYA UPANISHAD-MANEK, KARSANDAS

MANDUKYA UPANISHAD (Sanskrit) belongs to the Atharvaveda. It is the smallest Upanishad containing only 12 verses. It appears to be the last of the older batch of the Upanishads.

Mundukya upanishad maintains that whatever there is beyond the threefold time is only a syllable Aum. All this is Brahma. This self is Brahman, which has four states of being. The recognition of the four chief states of individual consciousness waking, dreaming, sleeping, and transcendental—has played a great part in the later Vedanta philosophy. The analysis which the Mandukya upanishad makes of the four states of consciousness is very significant. Corresponding to these four states of consciousness there are four kinds of the soul. The first kind is called Vaishvanara which is conscious only of external objects and enjoys the gross things. The second kind is called Taijasa which is conscious only of internal objects and enjoys the subtle things. The third kind is called Prajna which being centred in itself enjoys bliss. The fourth kind of the soul is that of pure self-consciousness, when there is no knowledge of internal objects, nor of external ones, nor of the two together. The great originality of the Mandukya upanishad consists in positing the fourth state of consciousness, which corresponds to the fourth kind of the soul. The last kind of the soul alone is ultimately real. It is the Absolute of upanishadic philosophers. The Mandukya upanishad describes the Absolute mostly in negative terms, "The Absolute is neither inwardly cognisant, nor out-wardly cognisant, nor on both sides together. It is not a cognition-mass. It is neither knower nor non-knower. It is unseen, impracticable, ungraspable, indefinable, unthinkable, unpointable. It is the essence of the experience of self-identity; in it all this universe ceases. It is tranquil, blessed, and without a second".

Several Upanishads advocate meditation by means of Aum for the realisation of the self. But the Mandukya upanishad surpasses all others in the exaltation of Aum. It is described as not merely the supreme means of meditation, but the goal to be reached by the meditation itself. It divides the symbol Aum in three different morae, a,u,m, and adds a fourth mora-less part. The reason for this four-fold division of the symbol Aum appears to be to bring in its correspondence with the parts of Aum, the states of consciousness on the one hand, and the kinds of soul on the other. The mora-less part of Aum has correspondence with the fourth state of consciousness as well as with the fourth kind of the soul. The spiritual significance of this correspondence of the parts of Aum lies in the great help that is supposed to be given by meditations on it in intuiting the fourth kind of the soul.

Gaudapada, the teacher of Shankara's teacher wrote his famous 'Karika' on this Upanishad, thus laying the foundation of the later Vedantic philosophy.

MANE, LAXMAN BAPU (Marathi; b. 1949) belongs to a nomadic tribe. He passed B.A. in 1986 from Kolhapur, and presently he is a freelance journalist. His literary career starts his first book with Upara (Autobiography), which got him the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1981. It was translated into French in 1987. This work is recommended for the students of three Universities. His second book is Band darwaja (Close door, 1984). He edits a Marathi magazine exclusively devoted to nomadic tribal research titled Band darwaja. For his work, Upara, he received a Ford Foundation Fellowship, and many other awards, including Homi Bhabha Fellowship in 1985. He is a member of many social and educational institutions. His work is a 'clinical expose' of the caste-corroded Hindu society, with the bitter experiences a socially handicapped Dalit has to encounter. Yet the work is fraught with human sympathy and does not have the rancour of a reformist zealot's retributive wrath. The narration shows artistic restraint, and yet it is an acid comment on the upper-class, upper-caste hypocrisy and the loud-mouthed but hollow idealism.

MANEK, KARSANDAS (Gujarati; b. 1902, d. 1978) was born in Karachi and had his primary and secondary education there. Thereafter he joined Gujarat Vidyapith (National University) started by Gandhiji, and then moved to the Vishwa Bharati University. He took active part in non-cooperation, salt-'satyagraha' and other movements started by Gandhiji and went to jail several times. In the late 30's he shifted to Bombay, and took to journalism.

Manek has successfully tried his hand in almost all the genres, such as poetry, novel, short story, drama, and essay.

He began his literary career by translating two of Tagore's verse dramas Muktadhara and Saradutsava in Gujarati which were published in 1922 when he was twenty.

His composition are Khakhnan poynam (1934), which is an elegy, touching the innermost recesses of the heart. Albel (1936) and Madhyanah (1957) contain lyrics on various topics depicting different moods in an enchanting style. Mohabatne Mandve (1942) is a long love poem in a rhythmic style. Kalyan yatri (1945) is an eloquent tribute to Gandhiji. Aho raijuji suniye (1945) and Vaishampayan-ni Part I & II (1946) are satirical poems, written in medieval 'akhyana' style. They are his unique contribution to Gujarati poetry. Ram taro divedo (1968) is collection of devotional songs. Satabdi-nau smito ane ashmo (1969) which was published in the Gandhi Birth Centenary year, depicts the joy of the pre-Independence era and the tribulation, disillusionment and frustrations of the post-Independence era in a graphic style.

MANGAL KABYA-BENGALI

His verse dramas Pratigna Pursoltaru (1967), depicts the final hours of Lord Krishna's early life and is a review of the mission accomplished by him. Dharma kshetre Kurukshetre (1969) is a collection of seven verse plays dramatically presenting the message of the Gita.

He has to his credit two novels Sindhunun samarpan (1964) and Darpan ane samarpan (1968). Both have in the background the history of Sindh. His collection of short stories, 'Matini' contains psychological interactions.

In his Mahabharat katha (1959) he lucidly and artistically narrated the story of the Mahabharata with a commentary in which there are indirect comments on the political situation of the post-Independence era.

His first collection of essays, Vatnan vadan (1972), consists of 42 essays, mostly philosophical. His second essay collection, Geeta vichar, contains 50 essays bringing out the essence of the Bhagvatgita.

MANGAL KABYA (Bengali) Apart from the 'padabali' (Vaishnava lyrics), the charita-sahitya (biographical literature) and the bhasha-puran (free translations from the Ramayana, the Mahabharata and the Bhagavata-purana), mangal-kabya stands as a distinctive genre of medieval Bengali literature. It was Jayadeva who first employed the term 'mangal' in Gitagovindam in connection with the praise of Krishna. Indian classical music contains one mode which bears the same name. The term 'mangalgit' frequently occurs in the Mahavamsa, the Harivamsa, and the Ramacharitmanas of Tulsidas, and clearly indicates that song-cycles, markedly recitative in nature, played an essential part in marriage ceremonies and on other auspicious occasions.

The term 'mangal kabya' gained currency as a result of the Turkish invasion (1202 A.D.) which apart from causing socio-cultural confrontations at various levels, created a value-vacuum in Bengal for over a century. Islamic lawgivers and caretaker governments did not necessarily aim at a complete overturning of indigenous cultural patterns. In fact many of them beguiled their leisure by listening to Bengali tales well-stocked with mythical allusions. By and large an element of acculturation, imbued with a sense of catholicity, was evident in the position they took up. But the assault from without, together with the cultural encroachment it brought, produced a sense of unity among local inhabitants. They sought to evolve a means of personal as well as collective expression motivated by sheer defence mechanism. Scholars like Sunitikumar Chatterji have persuasively suggested that in this way the authentic Matter of Bengal based on legendary and semi-historical stuff, came to the fore as a distinct from the Matter of Sanskrit (or ancient Hindu world). While the former constitutes the essence of the mangal-kabyas, the latter persists as a perpetual source of norm-making literature, available through regional renderings particularly in Bengal, Assam and Orissa.

Along with the search for its lost identity mangal-kabya reveals the urge to evolve and extol deities, so as to protect their devotees and nurture the latter's earthly aspirations. These deities correspond to clear needs. Kabikankan Mukundaram Chakravarti, author of the brilliant Chandi-mangal (1589) expressed this desire when he wrote: 'I laud the village deity amid the gathering' ('gramer devata bandi asar bhitari'). This attitude is herotheistic in nature. On a surface reading, mangal kabyas often denote the supremacy of one determined goddess or god over another. It is true that at times these deities are capable of descending to the lower depths of internecine strife which is loathsome even for humans. But once the battle is over the divine greatness and the transcendental dignity are restored to them.

It is not, however, the appeasement of local religious deities that can be described as the cardinal feature of the mangal-kabya. Their pivotal personages are human beings of flesh and blood. In some of the mangal-kabyas gods or god-like beings are reborn on earth because of some peccadillo. Their lives on earth are full of vicissitudes and ordeals till they prove their integrity and are ultimately rewarded. It is the paradise regained on earth that the whole narrative is centred on. Their redemption and ultimate return to heaven are sometimes shown in the manner of an epilogue which merely rounds off the story.

Both the puranas and the upapuranas have vitally contributed to the texture of the mangal-kabya. The puranas are described as having five characteristics, viz., genesis (sarga), dissolution (prati-sarga), the triumph of gods (vamsha), the division of time (manvantara) and biographies of the kings worshipping a particular god or goddess (vamshacharit). All these features are present in the mangal narratives. But their motivation comes from the upapuranas, where local cults, sects and totems play the major part. The non-Aryan totems such as serpents and golden lizards appear there as motifs symbolizing yearnings, tribal or sectarian. The fusion of the Aryan and the non-Aryan systems of beliefs testifies to the eclectic bent of the Bengali mind.

It has to be admitted in this connection that the puranas underwent a profound transformation in the mangal cycles. The fact that some mangal kabyas have been also described as 'bijayas' (the defeat of the enemy) and puranas, leads to the surmise that they imply the spirit of an imaginary perfect future. It is not only the conquest over the opponents, but also an optimistic reorientation of time which has been intended here. For purana (mythology) also connotes replenishment and not merely a blind-fold preservation of the past. In other words it is the renewal of the time-honoured themes in terms of the present requirements and future prospects. This melange of imagination and realism can be termed as a salient aspect of the mangal-kabya. In the Manasa-mangal, as the heavenly couple Usha and Aniruddha are reborn on earth as Behula and Lakhindar, the ancient culture goes through a process of tansmigration in medieval Bengal.

What emerged in this process has gone down in the history of Bengali literature as a living documentation of psychological realism. The Chandi-mangal (paean to goddess Chandi) by Mukundaram Chakravarti, the most outstanding of the mangal poets, testifies to this. Ramesh-chandra Dutt is right when he says, 'In Old Bengali literature there is one poet who stands head and shoulder high above all others, and that is Mukundaram. He is a true poet, a true creator, and his portraiture of the humble, peaceful Bengal village life will live for ever.' The designation 'true' is apt as far as the poet's environmental awareness is concerned. One can only add here that his poetry is not a mere mimetic presentation of humble and peaceful Bengal village life. It is also a normative representation of the Bengal village life which the mangal poets dreamt about. His idyllic description of Kalketu, a rustic hunter turned ideal landlord through the grace of Chandi clearly shows the empirical as well as the sublimated characteristics of the Bengali folk-culture in the Middle Ages.

The psycho-realistic manifestation of the Sakti cult is equally noticeable in the Manasa-mangal. Identifiable with goddess Saraswati, bedecked with white snakes, cast in the Vedic-mythological tradition, Manasa has been represented also with a trident and covered with peacock feathers in the Buddhistic tantric tradition. That a peacock, the arch-enemy of serpents, has been employed later on as a decorative motif of Manasa, the goddess of serpents, is a pointer to the mysterious ambivalence of this myth which became immediately popular not only in the West and East Bengal but also in Assam. There are evidences that from the fourth century A.D. on, the snake-mythologies of the Aryan and the non-Aryan sources merged. In Bengal, a region rich in snakes and permanently threatened with inundation, this very ambiguity and unpredictability enhanced the popularity of goddess Manasa. She came to symbolize the shadowy depths of this riverine culture. The touching passages on Manasa's ceaseless cravings to win over the tradesman, Chand Saodagar, together with the characterization of the latter's daughter-in-law, Behula, are some gems of poetical description. Ketakadas Kshemananda (17th century), one of the most distinguished poets of the Manasa-mangal succeeded in showing social anomalies in medieval Bengal through the delineation of Behula. When her brothers come to take her back to their parental home, Katakadas lets the young widow Behula express her dissent in the following manner, 'I do not fit in any longer in my parent's house. All my sisters-in-law fall foul of me/I cannot stand harsh words at all/Why do you, brothers, wail in vain on the shore?' And yet this Behula defies death and brings her husband back to life again. What appeals to the readers of Manasa-mangal is a tacit bond of predestination and power between Manasa and Behula. Anthropologically speaking, Mangal-kavyas with pronounced matriarchal mould have been most efficacious in the Gangetic delta. Shashthi, the deity of fecundity, Shitala, the deity healing smallpox, and many other famine semi-divinities are aspects of this design of matriarchy. John Wodroffe spells the issue out in a very significant way when he says: 'Did not Kipling say something about Kali who is Parvati, who is against the small-pox? So also every philosophical principle is an aspect of another principle, but never a well-circumscribed, independent thing by itself?' The principle referred to here is to be seen as one of organic coordination. This principle is not always confined to female domination. Dharma-mangal kabyas, for instance, are emphatically masculine in their approach. Dharma commingles the triple stress of Hinduism, Buddhism and Islam and incorporates a militant yet secular ethos drawn from the Bengali psyche. The term 'dharma' signifying religion, thus loses its narrow contour and acquires a wider import. A deeper analysis reveals that dharma gradually recedes into the background and permits a casteless pariah couple such as Kalu Dom and Lakhai Domni to contend against all sorts of socio-economic injustice. Manikram Ganguli's version of Dharma-mangal (1569) exceeds in the exposition of this popular spirit as well as beautifully unabashed revelation of the Hindu Trinity.

Mangal-kabyas went on serving spatio-temporal requirements in Bengal till rather recently. Ray-mangal, for example, has not yet completely ceased to exist as the tiger-deity of the southern sundarbans. Biharilal Chakravarti (1835-1894), the precursor of neo-Bengali poetry, wrote Sarada-mangal (1879), which bearing a remote resemblance to the medieval mangal-kabyas survives as a lyrical narrative dedicated to the Muse of poetry.

Mangal-kabyas are a living medley of epic, ballad and lyrics. It is, however, not the artistic quality which makes them unique. Their primary merit lies in the quality of a mind constantly renewing its own identity.

MANGALA KAVYA (Rajasthani). Marriage is the happiest bond of love. Epithalamion on this occasion is common to all countries, classes and castes. It comprises the feelings of the fulfilment of one's desire, prosperity and happiness, the prayer to Vishnu and his blessings. In Rajasthani the nuptial poems are of three varieties: 1. Jain mangala kavya, 2. Charan mangala Kavya and 3. folk poetry of marriage.

Jain mangala kavya: It describes the nuptial of the Tirthankaras, the saints and the nuns, the marriage of God and soul or the sadhika with herself. It shows the superiority of spiritualism over materialism and secularism.

Charan mangala kavya: These poems express beautifully the wedding of Krishna and Rukmani, Shiva and Parvati and thereby bring out the elements of heroism, devotion and love. The poets have reproduced the puranic stories with the medieval settings of the rajas and feudal lords.

Folk poetry: These poems describe the rites and ceremonies, the dress, diet and drink, the decoration and make-up of bride and bride-groom. Many puranic stories popular among the people are sung on the occasion of marriage. Krishna and Rukmani, Shiva and Parvati are no longer divine; they are represented as human beings. These songs exhibit the devotion of the people to their worldly lords, the embodiment of love and valour. Through the characters of Krishna and Rukmani, Shiva and Parvati, the poet aims at the emancipation of the women of India. He paints the beauty, the separation, the conflict and difficulties in love and marriage, the victory of the hero, the various aspects of love, the birth of a son and so on. The poet intermingles in his poem wit and humour and makes it palatable to the people. Some of the mangala kavyas that entertain and delight are:

Sahasamal Rukmani mangal (1648); Hirdaya Ram, Rukmani mangal; Priya Das, Rukmani mangal; Indraman, Rukmani mangala; Hiramani, Rukmani mangal; Agar Chand Nahata, 'Rukmani mangal Udo' in Prachin Kavyon Ki rup parampara; Kesho Rai, Rukmani mangal (1693); Mahachand Dvija, Rukmani mangal (1722); Bansidhar Sharma, Rukmani mangal khayal, Uma Dutt, Rukmani mangal, Rukmani mangal gitavali; Kayastha Kavarchand Mulachandot, Krishna Rukmani mangal (1849); Agarchand Nahata, 'Rukmini mangal' in Prachin kavyon ki rup parampara, (Bikaner); Mehtab singh Alakh, Janaki mangal (1852), Samaya Sunder, Rukmani mangal; Rupmati, Rukmani mangal (1906).

MANGALA SHLOKA (Malayalam) is a verse written in praise of a person and presented to him on some auspicious occasion. The system of composing such verses started during the 'Manipravala' period in Malayalam, i.e., in the 14th century. In the anonymous Manipravala works like Chandrotsava there are references to verses composed and dedicated to the heroines and devadasis of the period. And a large number of shlokas are available in early Manipravala literature in which these heroines and beautiful ladies have been described with erotic sentiments and deep passion.

In later periods, the practice of dedicating mangalashlokas to lords and kings became very popular. Men with some poetic gifts used to write poems in praise of some respectable person with the desire to obtain his favour. Even long poems in praise of kings were composed and sometimes such verses are found interpolated in other works. For example, there is a Sanskrit shloka in a drama entitled Balamartanda vijaya written by Devaraja, a court poet of King Martanda Varma. In this shloka, the king is described as the sun who pleases the scholar-lotuses, who dispels the hostile darkness and who fulfils the desires of man. Ramapurattu Warier wrote a boat-song, Kuchelavrittam vanchippat, in which the poet who is going to meet the maharaja is described as Kuchela going to meet Srikrishna.

On the birthday of nobles and kings the local poets used to compose poems in praise of them. Srimula raja vijayam by the renowned poet, the late K.C. Kesava Pillai, is such a work. Pillai has written another mangla stotra kavya in Malayalam on the 'Shastipurtti' (sixtieth birthday) of the late Kerala Verma Valiyakoil Tampuran, the pioneer of modern Malayalam prose. It goes like this:

Sree Kerala Varma the royal jewel of the Parpa family shines immensely and his fame is beyond any limit. This glorious lamp keeps on shining day and night with unequalled brightness.

A number of mangalashlokas were written in the early period by various poets known and unknown but in the post-Independence period the tendency has shown a downward curve.

V.S.S.

MANGALA SHLOKA (Sanskrit) literally an auspicious stanza. In Sanskrit dramaturgy the term signifies a benedictory verse (or verses) at the beginning of any sustained literary composition or scientific treatise. It was customary among writers of classical Sanskrit, or Prakrit or even regional languages of medieval India to begin their works (except isolated verses) with a benediction generally in the form of a verse or verses. It was considered 'mangala' (auspicious) since it was believed to possess the power of removing obstacles in the way of completion of the work undertaken, be it of composing an original work or expounding, amplifying, commenting upon or studying an original work. It was thus believed to be beneficial not only for the author of the work, but also for its expounders, commentators and students; it was also believed to give them strength and long life, and prosperity.

Essentially, mangala shloka is of an invocatory nature. It invokes grace of some deity which might either be the favourite of the author (e.g. in Kalidasa's Raghuvamsha, its subject is Rama, Lord Vishnu's incarnation, but its mangala shloka invokes Lord Shiva and his consort), or appropriate to the subject-matter of the work (Ratirahasya, a treatise on erotics, invokes in its mangala shloka Kamadeva, the Indian god of Love) or in some cases, both favourite and appropriate (Mammata, himself a Sarasvata brahmin invokes Goddess Sarasvati, the Indian Muse of poesy, in mangala shloka of his Kavya Prakasha, a work on poetics).

The invocation may contain only a salutation to the deity (Bhavabhuti's Rama-plays) or may, as it often does, combine with it blessings for the reader-listener-connoisseur, actor, student, audience, etc. in some such a way as: 'May the diety protect you' (mangala shloka of Dhvanyaloka) or 'fulfill your desires' (Venisamhara) or 'bestow welfare upon you' (Priyadarshika) etc. Sometimes it is so composed (or, more often so interpreted by the ingenious commentators like Raghavabhatta on Abhijana shakuntalam) as to suggest the theme or plot or principal characters of the composition, especially of drama. Some of the Trivandram plays ascribed to Bhasa have peculiar mangala shloka containing a verbal figure of speech called 'mudra' ('impress') in which words are so juxtaposed as to introduce the names of the important dramatis personae of the play e.g. mangala shloka of Svapnavasavadatta.

R.N.

MANGARASA III (Kannada; b. 1508). As there are more than one Mangarasa in Kannada literature, it is customary to denote them in numbers according to chronology. Mangarasa the First lived in the middle of 1350 A.D. He was the author of Khagendramanidarpana which deals with poisonous medicines. Mangarasa the Second is said to have lived during the later half of the fourteenth century and was the author of Mangaraja nighantu, which comes under the classification of lexicon. Mangarasa the Third was a Jain who belonged to a royal family, in charge of Kallahalli, located near modern Hunsur, and he has to his credit six works. D.L. Narasimhacharya has identified one more Mangarasa, who was later to Mangarasa III and his work, Manmatha vijaya is written in Bhamini Satpadi.

Mangarasa III belonged to a learned family and the well-known poet, Nanjunda, the author of Kumararama charita was related to him. The works of Mangarasa III, as noted by R. Narasimhacharya, are Jayanrupa kavya, Sripala charite, Prabhanjana charite, Supa shastra, Nemijineshana sangati and Samyaktva kaumudi.

Jayarupa kavya is written in parivardhini satpadi containing 16 chapters and 1037 stanzas in all. The story of Jayanrupa occurs in Jinasena's Mahapurana which is in Sanskrit. The poet takes the theme from that book and narrates it fairly well. Mangarasa often gives beautiful descriptions in his work and he tries his best to add poetic quality to the mythological theme. The work is noted by scholars more for its form than for its poetry.

Supashastra is a work on cookery written in vardhaka satpadi. There are six chapters and more than 350 stanzas and this deals with the preparation of several dishes. The book is informative and it testifies to the versatile taste of the poet.

Samyaktva kaumudi is also a work written in satpadi, which the poet calls uddanda satpadi. (Though scholars have discussed much the relevance of calling this satpadi uddanda, it is in no way different from vardhaka satpadi). There are twelve chapters. There are a number of stories in this interesting work which uphold the greatness of Jainism. Mangarasa narrates these stories very effectively. Both the style as well as the art of poetry blend together harmoniously. Even the metre of the work is best suited to the successful narration of the work.

Mangarasa's three other works, viz., Prabhanjana charite, Sripala charite and Nemijinesha sangati are written in sangatya metre which was one of the popular metrical forms in the 16th century.

Among the works written in sangatya, Nemijinesha sangati happens to be one of the foremost works from all points of view. A close study of his works along with the Kumararama charita and Ramavijaya kavya by Nanjunda and Derappa respectively reveals that they were influenced by Mangarasa. The continuous and sincere efforts of these Sangatya poets may be said to have paved the way in Kannada literature for the production of Ratnakarani's Bharateshavaibhava which is regarded as a masterpiece written in sangatya. Thus Mangarasa III occupies an important place in Kannada literature both because of the variety of his works as well as of his talent and sound scholarship.

MANGESH RAO, PANJE-MANIAR, PRIYAKANT

MANGESH RAO, PANJE (Kannada, b. 1874, d. 1937) regarded as the pioneer of Kannada renaissance, was born in Bantwal, South Kanara. He lost his father when he was sixteen, had his secondary education in Mangalore with the financial help from relatives. In 1884, he was appointed Assistant Kannada Pandit in the Government College, Mangalore. He took his B.A. degree in 1904 from Madras and also attended the Teacher's Training Course (L.T.). Returning to Mangalore he worked for sometime in the Government College but soon was appointed Sub-Assistant School Inspector of Mangalore. Subsequently he became the Headmaster, Teacher's Training School, Mangalore and also the Headmaster of Central School at Marcara.

Panje edited a monthly literary journal, Suvasini, from 1900 to 1903 in which the first short story in Kannada appeared (1900). Other stories and lyrics appeared in the issues of Suvasini. With his contact with the Basel Mission, Mangalore, he got acquainted with new methods of teaching. The Basel Mission's journal, Satyadipike, published some of his essays. In 1905 a Kannada Grammar by Panje was published by the Mission. In 1912 the Basel Mission brought out an anthology of poems edited by Panje which included a few compositions of his own. The second book of poems appeared in 1919. In 1916 the Basel Mission published his Bala kathavali—a collection of stories for children. He started his own publishing house for children's literature, Bala Sahitya Mandala Ltd., in 1921. He organised the literary conference of Mangalore in 1927 and was President of the Kannada Sahitya Sammelan at Raichur in 1934.

The distinguishing feature of Panje's prose is its simplicity and directness of appeal. His essays are mildly satirical. His lyrics have an absorbing rhythm and an engaging style. Panje was a notable writer of children's literature. For children's stories he chose fables with animal and bird characters rather than stories from mythology. He chose the themes suited to the child's mind. Panje was interested in the folklore of the region which he exposed extensively. His Koti-Chennaya is based on the local legend about two young heroes of yore—Koti and Chennaya.

MANI, MADHUKAR (Rajasthani, b. 1942) was born at Rajgad, district Churu (Rajasthan). He has two verse collections to his credit. The first one Sudhi sapnon ki tir was brought out under his pen name 'Madhukar Sadhana Sajan', rather a romantic sort of name. The book mainly contains his Hindi poems and a few Rajasthani ones are also appended. Practically all of the poems follow the romantic trend. He is more known for his second book Pagafero (Auspicious or inauspicious arrival of a person, 1974), which won the Sahitya Akademi award in 1975. As usual, being a committed writer, he delves deep into the plight of socially persecuted man and depicts his lot. With many poets the depiction of social reality has been rather a fashion and Madhukar seems to be no exception. His poems lack true feelings for the down-trodden. Nevertheless, he has been able to bring out the agony of such people to a certain extent. His diction and style of expression are powerful, and he seems to know his subject well. The book contains eighty-three poems, and some of them are individualistic. He has also made a mark in the field of theatre. He has made certain experiments in the art of stage and introduced indigenous styles which have proved to be very popular. He has been honoured by the Literary Institutes, and stands apart as a unique personality. A post-graduate of the University of Rajasthan, he also edited literary magazines like Kalpna, Akath, Rangyog and of Akriti. Equally efficient in Hindi writings, his works have been translated into a number of regional and European languages.

MANIAN (Tamil; b. 1933) or Sitaraman Venkata Subramaniam was associated with Ananda vikatan, a popular Tamil weekly for nearly two decades before he started his own weekly, Idhayam pesugiratu in 1977. He is currently the editor and publisher of Gnana bhoomi and Manian, a monthly besides Idhayam pesugiratu. He is a run-of-the-mill popular writer with nearly twelve novels to his credit (All of these were serialized in popular Tamil weeklies).

Manian's first novel Kadalittal poduma (Is it enough only to love, 1968) was of a pure Mills & Boon genre. Ten sindhum malar (Honey-dripping flower, 1971) was a story of the relationship between two girls—one set to avenge her brother's death and another magnanimous enough to forgive even a person who had harmed her. Unmai solla vendum (Speak the truth, 1975) was written to coincide with the birth centenary year of Mahatma Gandhi. To Vanaja, the heroine of the story, truth is the most precious thing in the world. Even after her marriage, she remains steadfast in her friendship with Sundaram maintaining that her friendship is pure, though it wrecks her marriage. Illavu katta kili (Parrot that waited in vain for the ripening of the fruit) is the story of three sisters falling in love with the same person. This was filmed as Sollathan ninaikiren (I want to confess). Mogum muppatu Varusham (Passion for thirty years, 1975) was also made into a film.

MANIAR, PRIYAKANT (Gujarati; b. 1927, d. 1976). Priyakant's poetry is a dialogue with eternity. It has carved for him a special niche in the heart of the people of Gujarat. He has written such powerful and meaningful poetry that so long as Gujarati poetry and language will survive, his poetry will live. There are seven collections of his poems: Pratik (Symbol, 1953), Ashabda ratri (Silent night, 1959), Sparsha (Touch, 1966), Sameep (Nearness, 1972), Prabal gati (Powerful speed, 1974), Vyom lipi (Sky's alphabet, 1979) and Lilero dhhal (Green slope, 1979). He always saw the world with a childlike wonder and enjoyed it, and in the same strain, he has written soulful poetry overflowing with emotions. In this sense he can be called a poet of abundance. He has composed his poems in metrical, prosodic, orthometric and blank verses. Priyakant has written songs in lyrical form full of sentiments with matchless melody. After Meera, Dayaram, Nanalal and Rajendera Shah, Priyakant is the only poet who has written songs like pearls strung in a beautiful necklace. Priyakant's contribution to the lyrical compositions is all the more great for his songs of amorous play, separation in love and devotion to Krishna.

Niranjan Bhagat, Priyakant Maniar, Hasmukh Pathak and Nalin Raval are the four principal poets of the modern group who exhibit a new sensibility. In the structure of construction also a new technique-motive is adopted. Novelty in the use of brackets, new images, new sensation and emotions and the traits of the symbolic composition are clearly perceived. Priyakant's first symbolic poem is 'Dove'. Then he wrote another symbolic poem, 'Cow'.

In his collection, Silent night, except for 'Squirrels' and 'In silent night,' all the poems express harsh reality and a faceless recognition—'we are like thousands of copies of some newspaper' of human agony. Due to his boundless love for India, the world and the whole human race, we get from him his three poems 'Those people', 'Blood of war' and 'Massacre', written in heated anger against the exploiters of man, his murderers or the war-mongers.

To Priyakant Maniar poetry flows easily like a stream. He was a poet with an agonized heart. So he wrote passionate poems—songs steeped in emotional love and lust and choked with emotions in devotion to Krishna. On the one hand he composed traditional poems—songs of love, lust and devotion while on the other hand, imbibing fully the consciousness in the context of his age, he also composed the poems of dehumanization and alienation. He wrote with commitment and involvement. Among all these tunes, there lay at the poetic centre the dialogue with—'water merges into water and flows into water'—the supreme being. For this very reason he had a dialogue with eternity. Therefore, with a heart of Gopi, he composed melodious songs of longing for Shri Krishna. Like the skill of a powerful accomplished poet, Priyakant has presented all the halos, the geography of emotions and the experiences of life. Gujarati poetry has been enriched by a fresh imagery in every poem, novel symbols and new techniques he adopted. For his skilful poetic work and a continuous enlightened search for the poetic language, Priyakant Maniar will remain immortal in Gujarati literature.

Y.T.

MANIKKAVACHAKAR (Tamil; b. 9th century A.D.) is one of the four major poets in the Shaivite tradition. Some consider him the oldest poet of the tradition, dating him back to the sixth century A.D. but that is not generally accepted. Most scholars place him in the eighth or ninth century. Unlike the work of three other major poets whose work is known collectively as the 'devaram hymns', Manikkavachakar's output is styled Tiruvachakam, the sacred chant. Apart from the body of work included in Tiruvachakam, another work, Tirukkovaiyar, was also written by him.

Of the 'Four' poets ('Naalvar'), who is more popular than who else is a disputed question. Each has his own admirers and most Tamils of the Shaivite persuasion know most of the works of the Four by heart and sing them, if they can, at their daily pujas. The chants attributed to the Four are chanted daily in temples and inspire most listeners though the old modes of singing these songs are not available. Tiruvachakam songs also accompany the dead. The manner of singing might be lost but the songs remain, though a tradition of a kind both in rendering and in the poems themselves remain.

Like most of the poets of the ancient times, the Shaivite Four are surrounded by mystery, miracles and legends. Except saying that the legendary has a way of turning into reality in most Indian cases, the legendary is accepted even in these rational days as real, with a most willing suspension of disbelief. Legends connect Manikkavachakar with the court of the Pandya king of Madurai by the name of Arimardhana though his name occurs in no other list of the Pandya kings. The real name of Manikkavachakar is not known; he was of brahmin birth and is identified as belonging to the village of Vathavur to the south of Madurai. He early acquired a reputation for scholarship and learning and all kinds of traditional knowledge and it is said that the Pandya Arimardhana invited him while he was still in his teens to become one of his ministers. His knowledge of various things was proverbial. His knowledge among other things, of horse lore and his ability to read the signs on the horses was considered fabulous, and was to be his undoing.

Vathavurar, as most of the story-tellers and most traditional accounts call him because he hailed from Vathavur acquired the name of Manikkavachakar because of the 'gem like' quality of his poems, 'gemlike' in sharpness, in brightness and in clarity. It is a name believed to have been bestowed on him by his guru himself. A Venetian traveller who came to Madurai a couple of centuries later, the famous Marco Polo, was to remark upon the Madurai king's horsemen. He remarked not only on the skill of Madurai horsemen but also on how the fine-bred Arabian horses brought to India by Arab traders by ship perished in the uncongenial weather of Madurai and were a constant source of expense for the Madurai king. The king had never a sufficient supply of horses. There was a time when Manikkavachakar was a minister and the king, knowing that the saintly young man was skilled in recognising horses of noble strain and in reading of their body signs, called him, entrusted him with a large sum of money and sent him to buy as many horses as he could from the Arabian traders who were by hearsay camping at Titupperundurai, a village in the Chola kingdom near some eastern port.

The saintly young man, no doubt skilled in recognising horses of noble quality, set out equipped with palanquins and foot soldiers and courtiers befitting the minister of a powerful king. But when he neared his destination Fate interfered in the form of a learned expounder of the Shiva doctrine; legend credits this guru with having been none other than the Lord Shiva himself. Manikkavachakar fell under his spell, disbanded the courtiers and asked his palanquin bearers to go back to Madurai. He himself donned mendicant robes and placed everything he had at the disposal of the guru. Manikkavachakar had a large amount of money meant for buying horses. But instead of buying horses, the money now went to the building of a Shiva temple in Tiruperundurai, a temple which we can still see adorned with many horses in stone as reminder of Manikkavachakar's original purpose of buying horses.

Soon rumours were afloat that the funds entrusted to him were being misused in building temples and in various other ways. And perhaps the need for horses for the army was becoming more pressing! The king sent for Manikkavachakar and the story traditionally says that the saint came of himself, but he might have been brought forcibly back to Madurai. Accused of misusing royal funds, he prayed to Lord Shiva, and replied that the Pandya would have his horses on a given date. Jealous of Manikkavachakar's reputation, his rival countries accused him of prevaricating and under their influence the king punished Manikkavachakar severely. But Manikkavachakar was unmoved, repeating that by the given date the Pandya would have his horses.

And the horses did miraculously come, led by a noble looking stranger who is identified as Lord Shiva himself by the legend. The horses, like the horsemen, were of exceptional quality and Manikkavachakar was reinstated in royal favour.

But the ensuing midnight was a night of confusion. All the new and noble horses miraculously turned into jackals and apart from killing the real horses in the stable, escaped into the city striking terror into the hearts of the citizens of Madurai howling as loud as they could.

Vathavurar again fell from royal favour and was jailed by the all-too-willing fellow ministers of his. The legend continues that with the sending of the floods to Madurai by Lord Shiva and the slow opening of the Pandya's eyes to the "true" religion of Shiva—he had evidently been a Shamana or a Bauddha till then though the queen was a reputed Shaivite—and finally after caning Shiva himself, which caning by the king was felt by every one living, including the king and queen, the Pandya was convinced that Manikkavachakar was a great man of God. He released him from his ministership as well as prison and sent him on his "vagabondage of God", visiting temple after temple, singing his songs of Shaivite sweetness. The legend is loftily silent about the lost royal funds; the legend is concerned only with establishing the greatness of Manikkavachakar.

Manikkavachakar is said to have visited various temples at Tiruvadamarudur, Tiruvarur and others until finally he came to Chidambaram, won over the Buddhists in debates and attained salvation. At what age he died is not clear. He was born at Vathavur and died at Chidambaram.

The Tamil tradition of devotion, both Vaishnavite and Shaivite, is replete with great poetry of a kind which has accompanied the Tamils in their daily lives. And Manikkavachakar is one of the greatest singers in the tradition. His poems and songs are on the tongue of the people and both amateurs and professionals sing the songs in the divine presence in temples. There is both clarity and an immediacy of recognition and experience in the poetry of Manikkavachakar. It is moving in many of its parts and the Tamils have a saying that he who is not moved to tears by Tiruvachakam has a stone heart and cannot be moved by anything else.

One experiences the immediate and palapable presence of something divine in the reading of Manikkavachakar's poems.

"Thou art a flower of flame
In what form else do I need to know you?"
"Thou art formless truly
But I see you as a flame."
"Thou art man; thou art woman;
Thou art both man and woman;
Thou art the eunuch;
Thou art the flaming Heavens
Thou art all else one can name besides.
Thou art beyond and behind them all!"

"You are the Mad Fellow.
You are everything and all Beside everything. You are

The Supreme Trickster
Your tricks are beyond knowing."

MANIKYACHANDRASURI-MANIMEKALAI

And lastly

"Thou art available:

I have only to spread my net of Devotion

And you will become my prisoner; you are the Great one."

MANIKYACHANDRASURI OR MANIKYASUNDAR-SURI (Gujarati; b. 15th Century), was a medieval Gujarati prose-writer, disciple of the Jain sage, Merutung-suri of Anchalagachcha. His teacher and mentor was the Jain sage, Jayshekharsuri. Since his literary work indicates the date of composition as 1407, it may be surmised that he belonged to that period. No further details are available about his life. His contribution to literature covers the Medieval Gujarati prose and poetry and small compositions in Sanskrit as well. He has been identified as 'Manikyachandrasuri' by some of the Gujarati scholars and as 'Mankyasundarsuri' by many others.

Pruthvichandracharita (1422) is known to be his most impressive prose composition. This story, divided into five Parts, is greatly fascinating and important on account of its fantastic story element, wonderful set of characters, and minute description. Neminathkumar rajimati charitra phaag (Nemishwarcharitra phaag, 1442), is yet another composition of this kind. It occupies an important place in Medieval Gujarati 'phaag' poetry as it happens to be an excellent specimen of what is known as 'phaag kavya' and also the way in which it reflects the poet's style of dynamic representation of facts, vivid descriptions and use of rhyme. Apart from these compositions which are published, there are four unpublished compositions such as Satarbhedi sat prakar katha, Vichar sar satvan, Parshwanath stavan and Chaknaputra-kathanak.

His composition in Sanskrit, Chanra-dhaval Dharmadatta-katha (1422) has been published whereas his other compositions such as Shreedhar-charitra (1947), Gunadharmacharitra, Chaturpoorvi champoo-katha, Shukraraj-katha, etc. are still unpublished. He occupies a remarkable and important position as a prose-writer and creative artist in medieval Gujarati literature.

B.J.

MANIMEKALAI (Tamil) which is supposed to have been composed by about 600 A.D. by Chattan is said to be one of the five major epics in Tamil, the rest being Silappadikaram. Both these works are considered to be twin-epics. It is said that these two together expound the four values and objectives of life viz., 'aram' (virtue), 'porul' (wealth), 'inpum' (love) and 'vitu' (salvation), of which Manimekalai stands for the last and Silappadikaram for the three rest. It is to be noted that the religious tolerance and broad-mindedness of Silappadikaram are absolutely absent in Manimekalai which is purely a mouthpiece of the Buddhist propaganda.

The epic, Manimekalai, is named after its heroine's name. Manimekalai is the daughter of Kovalan and Matavi. When Kovalan is unjustly killed, Matavi abandons all the arts and luxuries of women of her profession and turns her daughter also to vows of austerity. All this is unwelcome to the mother of Matavi and she begins helping Utayakumaran, the prince of the land, to court Manimekalai. Though the pretty Manimekalai is firm in her pursuit of truth, she is in danger of distraction, for she finds herself drawn to Utayakumaran in spite of herself for the reason that she had been his wife in previous births. Therefore, in fleeing from him, she is actually fighting herself, trying to free herself from the temptation of human ties. When the prince importunes her, Manimekalai, her guardian spirit, after whom she has herself been named, helps her in her struggle; she lifts her up by air to a distant place, endows her with some superhuman powers, causes her to come back by a magic bowl which when filled by the hand of a chaste woman will go on issuing food eternally. She is now a chastened nun with a never-failing bowl of food. This change is also not taken seriously by the prince. He gets himself involved in a serious scrape. There is a famine in the land which she helps to relieve with her magic bowl. To avoid the attention of the prince she disguises herself as Kayachantikai, a well-known woman there. But the prince sensing the trick pursues her. Kayachantikai's husband who is unaware of these, believing that the prince in all earnestness is making love to his wife, kills him on the spot. The bereaved mother of the prince gets angry with Manimekalai and tries to harm her in several ways, like putting her in prison. But his mother is quickly brought to her knees by Manimekalai's miraculous escape from all assaults, and the king sets her free. She then learns the various schools of philosophy. While thus learning, she comes to know that the city of Kaverippattinam, the capital of the Cholas and her mother's place has been washed away by the sea. Finally she joins her unfortunate mother, from whom she had been separated by her guardian spirit, and then goes to Kanchipuram and meets there Aravana Adigal, an enlightened Buddhist seer and saint. He teaches her the Buddhist philosophy. She then performs 'tapas' (penance) to end all future births.

The story of Manimekalai, thus, is rather loosely constructed. Though the main thread of the story sounds interesting, it is indeed a difficult task to extricate it from the mass of confusing details found in the work. There is no specific plot, no hero and Manimekalai herself is not a very interesting heroine. The sole purpose of the work is to propagate the Buddhist religion and philosophy. In the aspect of religious disputation, the work is the fore-runner of several such later writings. The work is a mine of information on Buddhist logic and philosophy, which are not to be found elsewhere in the whole of Tamil literature.

The work is also important for its didactic and social values. The Buddhist ideal of being detached from the worldly ties in spirit while serving all living things is preached. Pity for animals is stressed. Yet it is very intolerant in ridiculing the Jain religion. It is to be noted that though it refutes nine schools of thought, its main target for attack is the Jain School.

Manimekalai follows Silappadikaram in the use of 'achiriyam' metre. It also has the same number of thirty chapters (over 4800 lines). Superficially, indeed, there are some more point of comparison between these two works. Frequently, the same images, sentiments, phrases, sometimes even the same clauses occur in both the works. But it does not deal with 'muttamil' viz., 'iyal' (the subject matter of all literary composition), 'isai, (music) and 'natakam' (dance, drama, and dramatic composition), the traditional three-fold classification of Tamil literature, whereas Silappadikaram deals with it. The social, religious and national integration emphasised in Silappadikaram finds no place in Manimekalai.

Though Manimekalai makes good poetry in places, especially while praising the Buddha, it is hardly conceivable as an epic. Considering the lapse of a few centuries and the similarities and dissimilarities between Silappadikaram and Manimekalai, they cannot be called twin epics as has been done by some. However, the greatness of Manimekalai cannot be underestimated. It is a treasure house of information on Buddhism.

MANIPRAVALA (Malayalam) is the name given to a particular linguistic style that originated in Malayalam during the early stages of its development. 'Manipravala' literally means the combination of 'mani' (pearls) and 'pravala' (corals). Applied to literature, it implies a mode of poetry that adopts an aesthetic combination of Malayalam and Sanskrit words.

Manipravala is a direct off-shoot of the sociological conditions of the age in which it originated. The Aryans who migrated to Kerala roughly by the middle of the 8th century A.D. brought Sanskrit with them and in order to teach the language to the native Dravidians, they combined it with the indigenous vocabulary. Even during religious festivals and dramatic performances, they blended Sanskrit words with Malayalam. For example, in kutiyattam, the traditional Sanskrit theatric form of Kerala, the hero's speech in Sanskrit found a parody or sometimes a parallel speech rendered by the Vidushaka, in which this mixed language was employed. This device made the intricacies of drama intelligible to all sections of society. Thus, out of this cultural communion between the Aryans and the Dravidians, a hybrid language emerged, which was termed manipravala.

The specifics and characteristics of the corpus of manipravala literature are found in Lilatilakam, a 14th century work of unknown authorship. It is evident from the profuse quotations and usages in manipravala that the text was preceded by a considerable bulk of literature belonging to it. Lilatilakam defines manipravala as a mixture of Malayalam and Sanskrit ("bhashasamskritayoga Manipravalam") and proceeds to explain that manipravala is that which appeals to men of good taste. Lilatilakam considers Malayalam as the more important ingredient in manipravala, and Sanskrit as a means to the enrichment of Malayalam. In the earlier phase of the development of manipravala, three methods of adaptation were in vogue: (1) mixing Malayalam words and Sanskrit words having inflectional endings, (2) Sanskritising the existing Malayalam vocabulary, and (3) adapting inflectional uniformity in nouns and adjectives in Malayalam, imitative of the Sanskrit grammatical pattern. As time progressed, this language became so multivalent and comprehensive that it set the aesthetic standard in literature for later ages and periods.

Among the major manipravala works that were written before Lilatilakam, mention may be made of Unnunilisandesham. Written in the form of a 'Sandeshakavya' (messenger poem), this poem describes the situation of love-in-separation, but in the poem there also emerges a picture of the social background of the age from the descriptions of places, life-style, customs and manners, etc. Among the other major sandesha kavyas, Kokasandesha, Mayuraduta, Kokilasandesha, Bhramanasandesha, deserve mention.

As time progressed, manipravala poetry began to develop under several conventional branches like champu, pattu, stotra, attaprakaras, kilippattu, etc. Champu is a form which integrates both poetry and prose in its structure. Among the champus of the earlier age are Unniyachchi charitam, Unniyati charitam, and Unnichchirutevi charitam. In a later stage, Punam Nambutiri's Ramayana champu and Mazhamangalam Nambutiri's Naishadha champu are best illustrative of the aesthetic precepts of manipravala as enjoined in Lilatilakam. The transformation of themes from the Ramayana and Nishadha into the complex structure of champu made them favourites with the educated and sophisticated classes of society. The lyrical, romantic, devotional and epical strains in these poems found themselves in complete harmony with the manipravala tradition. For example, in Ramayana champu, the description of Sita at the time of her swayamvara goes like this:

MANIPRAVALA-TAMIL

Her hands the lovely garland holding, and beetles o'er the flowers humming, overwhelmed with virgin modesty, stealing intermittent looks of Rama's face, and learning on her confidantes
the scene she illuminated with her grace; and trembling with joy, she walked slowly up to her lord with beautiful steps

(trans. by P.K. Parameswaran Nair)

Champus were adapted by chakyars (actors of kutiyattam) for narration, and they were known as prabandhas. They were imitative of their Sanskrit counterparts; hence were ridden with Sanskrit vocabulary, and Malayalam usages were scanty. Attaprakaras and kramadipikas, theatre manuals of kutiyattam, were also written in manipravala, largely in prose interspersed with poetry, containing a generous mixture of the vocabulary of the ordinary folk. Pattu was comparatively more indigenous—among the composers of pattu, the three Kannasans or Niranam poets are significant. Pre-eminent among them is Rama Panicker, the author of Ramacharitam. Stotras or poems in praise of God in his multifarious manifestations were also written in the manipravala style.

Though in the earlier phase of Malayalam literature, manipravala was more simple and direct, later it tended to be stale and exaggerated—excessiveness of eroticism, recurrent formulas, circumlocution, etc. set in. For example, in Chandrotsavam, the subject matter is centred around the courtesan named Medinivennilav, who celebrates the Moon Festival. The introduction of the courtesan as the central figure is in keeping with the tradition of manipravala in which shringara is the dominant rasa. But apart from the recounting of feminine charm at great length, the poem also digresses to give the readers glimpses of the medieval society of Kerala.

A reaction to the excesses of manipravala is seen in the works of Tunchat Ezhuttacchan, the harbinger of a new kind of poetry in Malayalam. His contribution to Malayalam literature has been put succinctly by P.K. Parameswaran Nair thus: 'He felt that the ideal medium would be one which incorporates the essentials of manipravala which was the prime literary force of the day into the texture of Malayalam with its innate strength and simplicity'. In his Adhyatma Ramayana and Mahabharata Ezhuttacchan mastered this unique blending and emerged as a people's poet. Secondly, he deviated from the manipravala convention treating shringara as the dominant rasa, and instead emphasised bhakti (devotion). The whole gamut of human experience falls under his purview and he created superb poetry of incomparable force.

Manipravala is thus not merely a style of writing, but a part and parcel of a rather elitist culture. It conformed to the taste of the upper class society, and did not relate to the life of the ordinary people either in subject-matter or in treatment. This is perhaps the reason for its deterioration and decline in the ages to come.

MANIPRAVALA (Tamil) In the continuous history of Tamil language and literature, the emergence of the language of manipravalam or the manipravala style is a phenomenon which has to be analysed not only in its linguistic framework but also against its socio-political and religio-cultural background. The term 'manipravala' is a hybrid form which means the combination of Sanskrit and Tamil just as pearls and corals in a garland. One can trace the origin of the manipravala style from the inscriptions and copper plates of Pallava and Pandya kings from the 5th century. A.D. onwards. In Pallava period, the language of manipravala was used as a court language for official communication. Later the language of manipravala was used in religious discourse and this tradition might have played a binding force among the commentators of religious works especially those who wrote commentaries on the hymns of Nalayira divya prabandham. Initially it was in practice among Jain and Buddhist scholars, and later it was adopted by Vaishnava scholars headed by Tirukkurucaippillan who wrote the first commentary on Tiruvaymozhi of Nammalvar around A.D. 1060. His commentary is known as Arayirappati (six thousand granthas). This time the use of manipravala as a medium of writing commentary was legitimately accepted by the scholars who were well versed in both Sanskrit and Tamil. Though Sanskrit was not the lingua franca of the region it is a matter for consideration why these scholars started writing commentaries in a language which was unintelligible to the layman who can easily understand the language of these religious works even now without the help of the commentaries. Was that kind of literary convention allowed in those days among the Vaishnava scholars to retain their sectarian identity intact in the name of religion? We have the commentary of six thousand granthas in this style. Nampillai, Alakiya Manavala Jiyar, Periyavaccan Pillai and Vatakkut Tirvitip Pillai also wrote commentaries on Tiruvaymozhi consisting of nine thousand, twelve thousand, twenty-four thousand and thirty-six thousand granthas respectively.

In contrast to Lilatilakam, a Malayalam grammar, which describes manipravala as Bhashasamkrittayogam i.e., "the union of indigenous speech and Sanskrit", Virocholiyam, a Tamil grammar by Puttamittiranar, criticises the style of manipravala as 'nataiyetum illa manipravala', i.e. the manipravala style is no style. More than this, the language of commentaries in manipravala style is not only the mixture of Sanskrit 'tatsama' forms and native words which is against the phonemic system of Tamil but was also a violation of the syntactic structure of Tamil. Linguistically speaking, the manipravala style is now a kind of creolized language, unintelligible to the Tamils who are now totally away from the cultural moorings of Sanskrit. As a result manipravala style has almost vanished from both the creative and the critical side of the literary tradition of Tamils.

MANIPRAVALA SHAKUNTALAM (Malayalam) The Abhijnanashakuntala of Kalidasa rendered into Malayalam by Kerala Varma Valiya Koil Tampuran (1845-1915) is popularly known as Manipravalashakuntalam because of the preponderance of Sanskrit in the language used by the author. One of the first and foremost writers of Kerala to introduce a work of Kalidasa in the vernacular, Kerala Varma got the appropriate distinction of being referred to as Keralakalidasa throughout the land.

The publication of the Malayalam rendering appeared in 1882, though it was first serially published in the pages of the monthly magazine called Vidyavilasini edited by P. Govinda Pillai, the first historian of Malayalam literature. Later the text was slightly revised and issued in a book form from the Keralavilasam Press. The original title given to the work was Keralabhashashakuntalam.

But the title belied the expectations of the Malayalam readers. The style evolved by the author was grand, being saturated with the vocabulary and idiom of Sanskrit and an excessive measure of rhyme. The alliteration of the second syllable in every line of the stanza, popularly known as 'dvitiyaksaraprasa', was scrupulously followed by the author since he advocated that genre of literary style. Though Kalidasa was known for grace and simplicity, being the best exponent of the 'vaidarbhi' style, his translator did not bestow any attention in following his original author. Instead he pressed into service his own pedantic style with all its grandeur. In fact he believed that his was the better style and hoped that some day people would come to accept it.

Though people applauded him for his unique translation of Shakuntala they began to complain about the excessive use of Sanskrit in this Malayalam version.

At last he bowed to the pressure from the world of scholars and effected some revisions before he re-issued the book some nine years later under the new title, Manipravalashakuntalam. There is some limitation in the style of the author since he was an ardent admirer of Sriharsha, the author of Naishadhiyacharita. Hence, however much he tried to simplify his style, for the common reader it remained as inaccessible as before.

Historically speaking, it was Ayilyam Tirunal Maharaja of Travancore who translated Shakuntalam into Malayalam for the first time. His rendering was in prose form exhibiting the peculiarities of the time. But it remained unpublished for long. Ironically, it was printed by the same press which published Kerala Varma's great work. Just after its publication the prose version too appeared in the same year. Though the translation was in a highly Sanskritised Manipravala style, the classic in the new garb made tremendous appeal both on and off the stage. It was hailed as a landmark in the history of Malayalam dramatic literature. In fact it could claim the unique position of being the first ever Malayalam drama. Attracted by its unprecedented success, Sanskrit plays began to appear in the vernacular one by one in quick succession.

Valia Koil Tampuran's work has its own merits and limitations. The deliberate attempt at rhyming has curtailed the flow of sentiments and natural grace. The popular belief that a perfect translation is yet to come prompted scholars to make fresh attempt in this direction. Attur Krishna Pisharoti collected readings from different regions in India and tried to bring out a translation of a critical text constituted by him and his effort was rewarded. A.R. Rajaraja Varma, known as Keralapanini on account of his work on grammar, tried to present a simple Malayalam version for which he gave the significant title Bhashashakuntalam. It is considered to be a protest against the highly Sanskritised version of his renowned predecessor. Vallattol Narayana Menon also brought out a good translation in which he succeeded to a great extent in bringing the salient features of the original. Still the enthusiasm for translating Shakuntalam remains unabated. Today more than two dozens of translations have already appeared. In spite of all these later attempts Kerala Varma's version remains a classic with all its merits and limitations.

MANJHAN (Hindi; b. 1513, d. 1593), one of the eminent sufi poets, was a disciple of Sheikh Muhammad Ghaus. His philosophy of life is based on eternal and profound love, achieved through humanitarian acts.

Manjhan is famous for his only work in Hindi, entitled Madhumalti. It was written in 1545 in the regime of Salimshah Suri, the son of Shershah Suri.

Madhumalti is the love story of Manohar, the hero, and Madhumalti, the heroine. In form, the poem is a metrical romance, written in Awadhi. The poet follows the traditional technique of Karvakant Dhatta of Apbhrmsha literature. Description of physical beauty, separation in love and depiction of nature in different moods are the salient features of the poem.

MANKAD, DOLARARAI RANGILDAS-MANKAR

Madhumalti is, indeed, an important work in the sufi tradition, dealing with exalted love and beauty.

MANKAD, DOLARARAI RANGILDAS (Gujarati; b. 1902, d. 1970) is a renowned Gujarati critic, well-versed in Sanskrit poetics. He is also an archaeologist. He did his M.A. with Sanskrit and Gujarati from the University of Bombay. After having worked as a professor and principal, he became the Vice-Chancellor, Saurashtra University for five years. He was awarded the Ranjitram Gold Medal for his outstanding contribution to the fields of literary criticism and research. He was honoured posthumously with the D. Litt. degree from the University of Saurashtra. He edited two monthly journals Nagarik and Urmi. He had good command over English and Gujarati. He enjoyed reputation as a learned scholar in his own language and outside for his evaluation and analysis of literature with the help of the tenets of Sanskrit poetics. Works like Sanskrit natyashastrana vikasni ruprekha (1928), Kalidas and Guptas (1944), The Ancient Indian Theatre (1950), etc. earned him the reputation of a scholar and researcher in the field of the Sanskrit language and poetics. With Kavya vivechan (1949), Naivedya (1962) which brought him the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1964 and Gujarati kavyaprakasho (1964), he came to be respected as a critic with a discerning vision, balanced view and flexible attitude. He also discussed features of various literary genres like novel, short story, Sanskrit champu katha, one-act plays, etc. Dolararai's significant contribution is his scholarly and scientific attempt to critically evaluate modern poetry with the help of Sanskrit poetics.

Dolararai propounds the theory that the process of simplification is meant to be applied to the process of appreciation by the interested reader. Among his articles on literary criticism are his incisive reviews of the translation of Shakuntalam, Sharvalik, Gher to peedhar chee jani jani, etc. Along with his scientific and literary outlook, these also reveal his attitude towards life with his concern for cultural and social progress. In his discussion about language, Dolararai has given the translation of Nirukta.

In his articles on archaeology, Dolararai reveals his devotion to truth, fearlessness and scientific attitude as a researcher. In his Anusritinun yattatattya, he takes a positive attitude and suggests that one must proceed on the assumption that the details compiled in Anusriti are most probably authoritative. He has translated Rudradhyaya (1929), Shakradaya stotra (1929), Ahunavar (1935). Apart from these, the most significant contribution by Dolararai is the translation of Dhvanyaloka (1964), with commentary. Rigvedaman Vashishthanun Dashar (1964), Hindudharman madhyamamarge (1964), Gitano buddhijoy (1969) are good fruits of Dolararai's study of religion and philosophy. The Yugapuranam (1951), Kishkindha kandha (1965) are the well-edited versions prepared after a deep study of those works. The Puranic Chronology (1952) and The Date of Rigveda (1952) are the two important works of archaeological research. Dolararai has also composed a well-knit long poem Bhagawanani lila (1948) of 1273 lines in the flowing 'anushubh' metre based on a folk-tale. Dolararai was a leading scholar who made a thorough study of the concepts in Sanskrit literature and evaluated them in an authoritative manner.

MANKAR (Assamese), an early sixteenth century panchali poet, wrote during the reign of the Koch King Bishwasimha (1510-1540) of the Kamata Kingdom which consisted of parts of the present western Assam and northern West Bengal. Panchali as a verse medium for the Tantric or Sakta religious literature flourished in Assam and Bengal towards the later part of the 15th century and during the sixteenth century. Panchali literature may also be called Ojapali literature since this verse literature was intended to be sung by Oja, a singer-cum-dancer who was to interpret to the audience the verses he sang with the help of his main supporter called the Dainapali and secondary supporters called Palis. The Ojapali literature generally dealt with the myth of the snake-goddess Manasa and Beula. Another branch of this literature narrated stories from the Ramayana, the Mahabharata and the Puranas. This branch of Assamese literature is akin to the Bengali panchali literature.

Mankar belongs to the panchali groups of poets like Durgabar, his contemporary and Sukavi Narayanadev, his successor, though, as a poet, he is inferior to both. There is reason to believe that he himself was an Oja. His verses reveal his close association with the common people. His language contains more colloquial words or the idiom of the masses than the sophisticated words and idioms of the written language. His style has thus the charm of the folk-songs. In his taste too he is very much a commoner who occasionally degrades his writing with crude elements of humour and sex. But at the same time, his verses are full of the pictures of the domestic life of the people of his time. Mankar's available verse story of the goddess Manasa is, however, incomplete. While a full-fledged Manasa kavya contains two parts: the story of the snake-goddess's birth, life and might, and the story of Beula, the daughter-in-law of the merchant Chand, an arrogant antagonist of Manasa who is finally subdued. Mankar's Manas kavya has in its present form only a part of the goddess Manasa's story. Even this is incomplete as it deals only with the story of creation, the marriage of Hara and Parvati and the birth of Manasa.

MANKUTIMMANA KAGGA (Kannada) is one of the popular works of Gundappa D.V. Ever since it was first published in 1943, the Kannada reading public has welcomed it whole heartedly. Many of the stanzas of this collection are as popular as the compositions of Sarvajna.

The name of the book Mankutimmana kagga (The boredom of Mankutimma) itself looks rather strange. Gundappa has created a character known as Mankutimma and through him he has given expression to his rich experience. It is customary in Kannada to call a dullard as Mankutimma and the word 'kagga' is equally contemptible because it conveys the sense of boredom which is despised by one and all. This fictitious character Mankutimma is a village school master who used to take pleasure in teaching a few pupils. He was a bachelor and hence he had no responsibility of married life. Still, he had an attachment to his nephew, Somi, who was his sister's son. Somi went to the city for his higher education. In the meanwhile, Timma was also transferred from Mudaluru to Mandugere. All of a sudden, Timma went to see his nephew and he felt supremely happy that the boy was progressing well. He came back to his village contented and after a few days, he took leave of the village without informing anybody. After the lapse of one month, Somi's father received a letter from Timma informing that he had come to Tirupati and would proceed to Kashi to spend his last days of life. He had stated clearly that he owed nothing to anybody and he had resigned his job. He had expressed his joy for the progress of Somi and lastly, he had added a line stating that he had left behind a bunch of papers containing some writings meant for his beloved nephew, Somi. His last request was not to think of him any longer. In case they could not resist his remembrance, he advised them to light a candle in his memory in the nearby temple of Shiva. This prelude to the book is not only interesting but also instructive. The imaginary character, Mankutimma, represents a person with rich experience in life and still very humble in his attitude. The author preferred to give his utterances through such a person who was virtually a personification of dispassionate itself. The word 'Mankutimma' used as Nom de-plume (ankita) in each stanza actually stands for the author who is a reputed scholar in different spheres of knowledge. Similarly, the much debased word 'kagga' acquires infinite meaning in this context since the whole book is a kind of treasury of golden thoughts meant for one and all.

The text resembles the rich collection of stanzas of Sarvajna in Kannada, of Vemana in Telugu and above all of Tiruvalluvar in Tamil. Each one of these stanzas reads like the subhashitas of Sanskrit. The author has followed the pattern of quatrain in his construction of the stanza which ends in his nom-de-plume Mankutimma. Though each stanza may be treated as an independent unit, the author himself has grouped them under a number of sub-titles. A casual glance at these subtitles gives the reader an idea of the vast range of his subjects which covers all the aspects and attitudes of human life. In all, there are 945 stanzas. The greatness of these stanzas lies in the fact that they are so popular among the Kannada speaking people ranging from an average man to a learned scholar. One can derive full benefit even if it is read at random. Many of these stanzas are often quoted by people. Though the content of these stanzas is mainly didactic. They are palatable because of their poetic approach in general. The rich similes from daily life, the thought provoking expression of the author, the incorporation of noble ideas of great thinkers of the world render preciousness and popularity to these compositions.

MANMOHAN (Marathi; b. 1911) was a pen name adopted by Gopal Narhar Natu. By his bold, non-traditional, paradoxical and satirical rhymes he came to be popularly known as Lok Kavi Manmohan, i.e. poet of the masses. He was educated up to matriculation. His poetry is both neo and non in character. He became the leader of Youth League, Pune in 1932 and joined the freedom struggle. He refused to follow the beaten track and set a new blaze in parody and satire which was his own. His earlier compositions carried the distinct impression of imitations and adaptations, but soon he set his own style. He was temperamentally a free bird of forthright expression. He severely attacked blind following of tradition. In his formative years he was greatly impressed by Gandhiji and his earlier poems reflect the influence. Principal exponent of sonnets in Marathi, he came to fame with his Suneetganga which is a collection of his Marathi sonnets. Combining humour and parody, his poems became popular. He came down heavily on contemporary poets attacking them with his caustic intelligence. He challenged through his poems the vanity and vainglorious attitude of self-styled poets which had then become characteristics of the intellectuals of that time. Collegian (1929), Uddhar (Uplift of the untouchables (1933), Bomb (1934), Yugayugache sahpravasi (Eternal fellow-travellers, depicting Hindu-Muslim unity (1946) are some of his popular long poems. He showed a new style in these compositions expressing his sense of vengeance against a society neglectful of his talent.

He compared himself with Omar Khayyam and proudly proclaimed that he breathed poetry and contrary to the so-called 'Rajkavis' (Royal Poets), he was a 'lok kavi' (Poet of the people). His poem 'Rajsinh maza nijala' (Here sleeps the royal lion) on Subhashchandra Bose earned him wide acclaim. Hi nadi saraswatachi (The sacred river of Literature), 'Shwasach asashi tu ge maza' (I breathe thee), 'Shreshtha kavi janmala yava' (So that a great poet be born), and 'Priya hi mazi kavita premal' (My dear loving poetry) ably project his characteristic traits. Nevertheless, he mellowed down to a humble poet in his later life to say 'Me na maza rahilo' (I haven't remained my own self), Ya nadila ghat chhota bandhuni me chalalo (I am going ahead after building a small shore to this river).

He also wrote under another pseudonym Meenakshi Dadarkar. Besides poetry, he wrote several historical novels as well as novels on social themes. A four-part series of novels on Chhatrapati (Shivaji) instantly became popular. Zapurza is another bestseller he wrote. He also wrote a couple of plays and booklets on games like cricket and carrom. Nearly 100 books stand to his credit. A prolific writer, he is still engaged in literary activities

MANMOHAN NATU (Marathi; b. 1911) began writing poetry as early as in 1921. A prolific poet, Manmohan has to his credit, besides a large number of as yet uncollected poems, thirteen collections of poetry. They are: Tai teleen (1926), Suneet-Ganga (1928), Collegian (1929), Shank-hadhyani (1932), Uddhar (1933), Afoochya golya (1933), Jeevanadhar (1934), Daryatil khaskhas (1936), Yuga-yuganche sahpravasi (1946), Kuhu kuhu (1949) and Shiv-Shilpan-Jali (1965). A representative selection of Manmohan's large poetic output, edited by Shankar Vaidya, appeared in 1971 in a volume entitled Aditya.

The fact that Manmohan has always chosen to describe himself as Lokakavi (People's poet) as against Rajkavi (Poet Laureate) is in some measure an indication of his non-conformist, rebellious poetic spirit. A man of progressive outlook right from the beginning, Manmohan was fascinated by great historical figures such as Savarkar and Mahatma Gandhi. His early poetry shows traces of the influence of contemporaries like Madhav Julian and Gadkari. Around 1945, however Manmohan's poetry underwent a change which may in part be related to the change in literary ethos caused by the Second World War. It was during this period that Manmohan became an iconoclast, sometimes even a bitter one, trying to lash out vehemently at the literary establishment and its outdated poetic conventions. Yuga-yuganche sahpravasi (Fellow travellers of ages), for a long time a forgotten classic of poetry, but now restored to its proper place, came out in 1946. A long poem dealing with Hindu-Muslim riots in Bombay, Yuga-yuganche sahpravasi is based on the theme of the degeneration of human relationships under the impact of fanaticism in the longer context of poverty, mechanization, power politics and atomic weapons and in general violent bloodshed all over the world. Equally significant is Manmohan's use of style and technique in this poem. He manipulates metaphors in a bold surrealist attempt to portray the strange, fascinating borderland between dream and reality, conscious and unconscious, life and death. For a poet who began as a rebellious romantic, this foray into surrealist experimentation was a major achievement. This is the reason why a new generation of poets in the sixties, fighting a similar battle against the literary establishment, rediscovered Manmohan and acknowledged their affinity with him.

MANNI PUNAV (Konkani) is a collection of seventeen essays by Dattaram K. Sukhthankar, published in 1977. The work was picked up for Sahitya Akademi award for 1978. Most of the essays are humorous and satirical. Sukhthankar is a leading essayist in the language who has been contributing consistently to the genre for over twentyfive years. Goa and the Goans are the author's constant obsession. Manni Punav is the name of a famous zatra in a Goan village, called Mashel, the author's birthplace. The publishers have rightly called these essays, "the writings on a single theme of Goa and Goans, the author's first love." The author shows keenness of observation and wields a cartoonist's pen in delineating the unusual typical characters and situations which he excellently caricatures. Essays like 'Mashel', 'Alampeddyar and Honvollo', 'Mhalo', 'Madvall' are good illustrations. Some of the essays, while being humorous, are also tinged with serious introspection and musings on the themes like urbanisation of Goan villages, a continual drift towards cities and a lament over the change over. The very first essay 'Mashel' is an instance in point. The author usually weaves his essays around situations and persons, and when the characters come vividly alive, one almost sees one's own reflection in them. Sukhthankar's is a simple conversational style interspersed with local idioms, word-play, childhood reminiscences, dialogues, etc. Most of his humour is regional. Structurally, the author's approach is traditional, having a beginning, exposition and development of the theme, a little digression and a planned ending. A publication of Vivek Prakashan, Bombay, this small book is really worth treasuring.

MANOEL-DA-ASSUMPSAM (Bengali) was a Portuguese missionary and the writer of the first Bengali grammar. Nothing definite is known about his life except that he was a native of Evora and served as the rector of an Augustinian mission near Dacca. His first work is entitled Kripa shraster arthabhed (Meaning and implication of the Faith of Mercy). Written in 1734 and published from Lisbon in 1743, it is a bilingual work in the form of a dialogue between a guru and a shishya, interspersed with short tales of moral intent. Both the Portuguese text and its Bengali translation are printed in Roman type. The Bengali version provides useful linguistic information as a specimen of the variety known as the 'missionary Bengali' which was used for the propagation of Christianity among the speakers of Bengali. Since this variety was based on the Dacca dialect, it also gives an approximation of the phonological shape of various forms as spoken in that area two and a half centuries ago. The verbal and pronominal forms are mainly of the written variety (sadhu bhasha). The influence of the Portuguese syntax is apparent. His second important work is the Bengali grammar which was published along with a Bengali-Portuguese lexicon under the title Vocabulario em Idioma Bengalla e Portuguez (1743). The first forty pages deals with grammar and are written in Portuguese. In the absence of an existing model, the writer adopted that of the Latin grammar. This is the reason for his presenting nominal and pronominal paradigms in six different cases. Any deviation from Latin was looked upon as a defect of the language. The writer also expressed a strange notion that Bengali was a hybrid of Sanskrit and Hindustani. Besides these two linguistically important works, he also translated Dom Antonio's catechism from Bengali into Portuguese.

MANOHAR MADHAV (Madhav Balwant Vaidya, Marathi; b.1911) wrote under the pseudonyms 'Pancham' and 'Saraswat'. He is a drama critic, playwright, novelist, translator and columnist. He was educated in Nasik. He passed his B.A. from the University of Bombay in 1934. He first taught in the S.N.D.T. School for girls and then in the same institution's university.

Under the name 'Madhav Manohar' he started publishing short stories and poems from 1928. Between 1930 and 1933, he published in the magazine Vagishwari of Nagpur poems such as 'Jo sampate youvan', 'Ashwasan' and 'Sa—' as also stories including 'Parisacha shodh', 'Deshdrohi', 'Kartavyacha marg' and 'Phulachi abhilasha'. He wrote prolifically in these forms as well as in drama, fiction, biography and criticism. His literary and critical columns have been conducted in such periodicals as Kesari, Sobat, Rasarang, Navashakti and Menaka. He has written more than 200 articles about Marathi literature, some 125 short stories and several adaptation of plays from Indian & foreign languages and one-act plays.

Madhav Manohar is the author of the novels Jwala (1940), Sukhdukh (1975), Kaifiyat (1977) and Doura (1978). His novels are unusual in theme and narrative format, portraying intimate relations among unconventional characters. Among his translated novels are Annadata (1945), Ek ani doan (1948), Eka ratrichi goshta (1953) and Killi (1974). In these he has covered some of the classics of literature from the East and the West. Madhav Manohar is best known for his dramatic adaptations. These include Aai based on Karel Capek's Mother (1942), Ajobanchya Muli (1943), Sashachi shinge (1947) and adaptations of Priestley's Time Plays (Zoplele naag, etc.), Clifford Odets's Waiting for Lefty (Davrechi waat) and Maugham's The Breadwinner. Most of these plays have been staged by avant-garde troupes of the Marathi theatre.

In the late forties and fifties, Madhav Manohar was one of the two or three playwrights whose work had a key role to play in the revival of the Marathi theatre under the aegis of the Mumbai Marathi Sahitya Sangh. In later years progressive producers like Atmaram Bhende consistently staged the adaptations of contemporary experimental plays made by Madhav Manohar. This includes the one-man show by Bhende of Samuel Beckett's Krapp's Last Tape as translated into Marathi by Madhav Manohar. Madhav Manohar had natural empathy for the playwrights and actors of the Group Theatre in America.

Madhav Manohar has a collection of translated short stories to his credit called Chandrashekhar (1963). His one-act plays include Aapan Sarya Durgabai and Souda. Madhav Manohar's journalistic writing has always been provocative. Literary events, problems and controversies have always been his favourite subjects.

Since then he has had three more collections to his credit, Vahi (1971), Pavasali Kavita (1982) and Ajanta (1984). He has also written a novel, Gandhari (1973) and stories brought together and published in a volume entitled Gavatalya Goshti (1981). In addition, he has edited three books, Gapsap (1972), a collection of folk-tales; Punha Ekda Kavita, an anthology of contemporary Marathi poetry, edited in collaboration with Chandrakant Patil; and Palaskhedchi Gani (1982) a collection of folk-songs found specifically in the vicinity of his village. Mahanor has also written songs for an award-winning film, Jait re Jait. From 1979 to 1984, he was a member of the Legislative Council. Mahanor's contribution as a poet, novelist and film-song writer has brought him many awards and prizes.

Mahanor's career is the example of a poet who, rejecting the modernist, experimental tradition of metropolitan sensibility, goes back to the relatively less exploited tradition of folk-poetry and forges his own individual idiom out of it. Mahanor's precursors in this tradition were Lowlekar and N.G. Deshpande. Finding in them kindred souls, Mahanor tapped for his creative purposes the resources of the folk-tradition he had known so closely since his childhood days in the vicinity of the Ajanta caves. His very first collection, Ranatalya Kavita, containing sixty-three poems, provides ample evidence of this. Using rural space as the central principle of his poetry, Mahanor absorbs a variety of folk-rhythms into his poetic texture and depicts different aspects of nature and folk-life in terms of changing moods and emotive tones. The basic energy of this kind of poetry comes from the poet's unambiguous identification with nature, not as an abstract, superhuman principle, but as a concrete, palpable locale replete with age-old folk-beliefs, customs and rituals. Love in its unsophisticated, erotic aspects finds abundant expression in images drawn from nature and agricultural life. Mahanor continued to write in this vein in his later collections such as Vahi and Pavasali Kavita. Ajanta, his latest, is a slight departure in that it combines the lyrical with the narrative. It unfolds, against the massive backdrop of the beautiful Ajanta caves, the tragic love-story of Major Gill, an army officer and painter in the East India Company and Paru, a tribal girl. Taken together, Mahanor's poetry can be described as an authentic extension of Marathi romanticism to folk-tradition.

Mahanor's prose fiction which includes a novel Gandhari and a collection of short stories, Gavatalya Goshti provide a somewhat different dimension to his sensibility as a poet. Mahanor's concern with the primeval relationship between man and nature as enshrined in folk-traditions continues in his prose works also. However, he now sees these hitherto stable folk-traditions as caught in the process of social change. This disruption of rural culture by the forces of urbanization, modernism and politics creates a crisis of values. Mahanor explores this crisis in his prose fiction.

MANOHARAN (Tamil) is a drama by Pammal Sambhanda Mudaliar in five parts and nineteen scenes written in the year 1895. He was a lawyer by profession. The author was the first to introduce the parameters of modern drama such as the time frame, serial sequence, and a touch of seriousness to the Tamil drama. For these reasons and for the list of more than eighty plays he has written and enacted, he will be remembered as the pioneer of the modern trend in Tamil drama.

The play Manoharan dwells on the age-old theme of good prevailing over the evil ultimately. The hero Manoharan, the heir apparent to the throne of Chola Kingdom, has been portrayed as an embodiment of all the virtues of the medieval royalty. The story tells about the odds he had to overcome in the cold war with Vasantsenai, his father's second lady, who wants to get rid of the prince and his mother by expediently using the king's involvement with her. Vasantsenai, through her insidious plans, makes the king despise the queen and ascends the royal throne by winning the king's confidence. By further villainous manipulations and fabrications, she also procures the king's order for the execution of his own son Manoharan. The outraged Manoharan challenges the king in the open court, but his mother intervenes and makes him accept the royal order. This incident restores sanity in the king who cancels the execution order at the last minute delivering the message himself, disguised as a messenger. With all the plots against the royal family unearthed by the king himself, Vasantsenai meets her deserved end by killing herself and her son. The play closes in with the coming back of Manoharan and his friends from their self-imposed exile to a battlefield to help the wounded, retreating king and his forces. After the inevitable victory the curtain falls with the happy reunion of the family and friends in the royal court.

The play in totality in simplistic in its objectives and their communication. Vasantsenai's character needs special mention here. A western proto-type lady villain character was a novel experience to Tamil drama. Her unwavering adherence to her objectives and her impenitence round up her character to perfection. Manoharan like other plays of P. Sambhanda Mudaliar, deserves commendation for its historical importance in the growth of Tamil drama.

MANONMANIYAM-MANSAROVAR

MANONMANIYAM (Tamil), a Tamil play in verse written by Rao Bahadur P. Sundaram Pillai (1855-1897), was first published in 1891 in Madras. The Renaissance in Tamil dramatic literature began with this work. Justice K.G.Sesha Iyer of Trivandrum High Court said: "It is altogether one of the healthiest and most suggestive books to be found in Tamil. It bounds in great thoughts felicitously expressed. Its lessons reach our hearts, inform our minds, quicken our finer sensibilities, and elevate our whole moral being".

Manonmaniyam is an adaptation of Lord Lytton's Lost Tales of Miletus : The Secret Way, and the play within the play 'Shivakami charitam,' of Oliver Goldsmith's The Hermit. Though Sundaram Pillai attempts to give the play a historical verisimilitude, it is throughout romantic. To suit his dramatic requirements, he has effected omissions, additions and modifications, and steeped Manonmaniyam in shroud of mysticism, in keeping with his personal philosophical and Oriental view of life.

Like a great painter, P.Sundaram Pillai paints the delicate lights and shadows of his characters endowed with virtues and vices in varying proportions: Manonmani is the embodiment of grace, filial duty, and of a love touched with a supersensuous element drawn from a far-off region of thought. Among the other characters, there are Purushottaman, Vani, Natarajan, Jivakan, Narayanan and Kudilan, with their own individual traits, all juxtaposed in an impressive, dramatic manner.

By careful plot construction, judicious use of dialogue, development of characters and incidents, skilful manipulation of diverse characters, P. Sundaram Pillai leads us to the main action. Manonmani's marriage is an event out of human control, but the unseen power leads victims toward the inevitable denouement.

In the non-observance of unity of time and place. Sundaram Pillai follows Shakespeare. The entire play is in verse, agaval metre, the simplest in Tamil prosody and closest to blank verse. K.N.Sivaraja Pillai is of the opinion that verse should have been reserved for leading personages and dramatic situations and prose for menials, farmers, soldiers, citizens, etc. to establish close links with reality. Dialogue is skilfully constructed, taut, appropriate, easy and effective, though at times long, which may be condoned as the play was meant for reading and not for the stage.

P.Sundaram Pillai demonstrates wonderful control over his language. Diction is of choice and varied, though occasionally it slips into blase rhymes and alliterations. The diction, especially in Shivakami charitam, is simple, clear and direct, and hence incredibly effective. He has introduced new turns of phrases, concepts and figures of speech from English literature: prick the pride, knowledge is power, vox populi, vox dei, silence implies consent, two strings to a bow, all is well that ends well. References to Vedantic concepts, scientific theories, gravitation, eclipse, cross fertilization, etc. and scientific instruments like mariner's compass and hand lens are novel and very useful, opening to the Tamil audience a window on Western science and technology.

Invocation to Tamil Muse, in the prologue has been a kind of National Anthem of Tamil Nadu. The prologue has some references to Aryan culture which did not find favour with some critics. Conceived in the classical oriental mode and presented in occidental Shakespearean model, Manonmaniyam is a fine blend of rare flavours from the East and the West.

MANSAROVAR (Hindi). Mansarovar is the title given to the eight-volume collection of Premchand's short stories. The first two volumes were published by Premchand himself in March, 1936. The selection of short stories herein was done by Premchand himself. The six subsequent volumes were published by his elder son, Sripatrai, after Premchand's death. The selection was also done by Sripatrai. Later, Premchand's younger son, Amritrai, published eight volumes of Mansarovar from his Hans Prakashan, Allahabad.

The first volume of Mansarovar (27 short stories) contains, amongst others, such widely acclaimed short stories as 'Algyojha' 'Idgah' 'Shanti', 'Pus ki raat', 'Thakur ka kuan'. The second volume (24 stories) too has some well-known short stories like 'Nyaya', 'Do bailon ki katha', 'Dudh ka daam', and 'Jadu'. The third volume, compiled by Sripatrai, differs from the first two compiled by Premchand. It contains 32 short stories. Prominent amongst them are 'Stri aur purush', 'Nairasya lila', 'Muktidhan', 'Shatranj ke khilari', 'Satyagrah', etc. The first 16 short stories have been borrowed from Prempramod and the later 16 from Prem pratima published earlier. The fourth volume (1939) consists of 20 short stories. Amongst them mention may be made of 'Sadgati', 'Darogaji', 'Mritak Bhoj', 'Savaser gaihun', 'Sabhyata ka rahasya', etc. Nineteen of them figure in four of his compilations published earlier. The fifth volume (1946) consists of 24 short stories, prominent amongst them being 'Ramlila', 'Mantra' 'Himsa paramodharmah', 'Kajaki', 'Sujanbhagat', and 'Istifa'. The sixth volume (1946) consists of 20 short stories, outstanding among them being 'Yeh meri matribhumi', 'Raja Hardaul', 'Rani Sarandha', 'Garihda'. The seventh volume has 23 short stories. Best known amongst them are 'Atma Ram', 'Bare ghar ki beti', 'Panch prameshwar' 'Shankhnad', 'Suhag ki sari', etc. The last volume published both by the Saraswati Press, Benaras and Hans Prakashan, Allahabad in 1950 consists of 31 short stories, such as 'Balidan', 'Pashu se manushya', 'Vimata', 'Burhi kaki', 'Har ki jit', 'Guptadhan', 'Namak ka daroga', 'Sajjanata ka dand' and others.

In short, Mansarovar's eight volumes contain Premchand's 203 short stories. About seventyfive other short stories by Premchand do not figure in these volumes and could have been accommodated in another two volumes to make the set exhaustive and complete.

These short stories relate to almost every facet of Indian life during the British rule, impoverished at every level. They are living documents of Indian social problems. They reinforce idealism tinged with a robust sense of realism and do not in the least mark an escapist approach. They reflect a sense of purposefulness and an urge to remould the social structure on the basis of human relationships and a regard for the basic values of life. He belongs to no group or sect, and subscribes to no political 'ism' or dogma; his sole approach is that of a humanist, trying to better the lot of his suffering brethren the world over. Premchand represents the zenith of excellence in terms of both thematic variety and artistic craftsmanship in Hind short story.

MANSOORI, ADIL (Gujarati; b. 1936). His real name is Mansoori Farid Mohammad. He is an eminent Gujarati and Urdu poet, ghazal writer of the younger generation. He ran a textile shop for some years. At present he is working as a copy-writer in an advertising firm at Ahmedabad. In the beginning, he was writing ghazals only in Urdu, but later, he turned to Gujarati ghazal as well. Even now he continues to write in Urdu and has earned reputation as an experimentalist Urdu poet. With sound background in Urdu poetry, he soon made his mark as a promising young Gujarati ghazal-poet. In fact he, along with some contemporaries, revolutionised the Gujarati ghazal which had by then become too much hackneyed and tradition-bound. He replaced the hackneyed images and symbols with fresh ones, used a new diction and thus changed the entire face of the Gujarati ghazal. However, he never betrayed the true colour, mood and essence of the form of ghazal. He became an important member of the Rey Group, an off-beat group of young avant garde poets and writers of Ahmedabad, which had changed the literary scene of Gujarat in the sixties. Adil's first collection of poems Valank (Turn, 1963) proved a turning point for Gujarati ghazal. The next year he published another collection named Pagarav (Sound of footsteps) which enhanced his reputations as a leading young modern Gujarati ghazal-poet. In 1970 he came out with yet another collection of poems named Satat (Continuous). His absolute command over Persian metres, successful handling of subtle emotions and bold experimentation earned him a high and permanent place in Gujarati ghazal. He has also written some prose poems which bear his hallmark as a modern creative poet. Adil is also one of the pioneers who heralded the advent of absurd plays in Gujarati. His two collections of such one-act plays entitled Haath-pag bandha yela chhe (Hands and legs have been tied down, 1971) and Jo Nathi te (One which is not, 1972) are the examples of his command over the form. However, he will always be remembered as the one who completely transformed the Gujarati ghazal.

MANTO, SAADAT HASAN (Urdu; b. 1912, d.1955) was born at Sambrala, district Ludhiana and died at Lahore (Pakistan). He had his education at Amritsar and Aligarh. He got married in 1939 and had three daughters. He lived at Amritsar, Lahore, Delhi and Bombay. He migrated to Pakistan after the partition of India.

Manto started his literary career in early thirties as translator of the well-known English, Russian and French classics, but soon made his mark as a short story writer of great distinction. His plays also attracted wide attention. Through his writings, he was actively associated with the All India Radio, a number of distinguished literary journals and film organisation during the course of his literary career. Several films based on his stories have been made in India and Pakistan. The years of his life in Pakistan after partition were full of agonised literary activity of a very high order. Some of his stories were the subject of Court trials on charges of so-called pornography. Manto's works include: short stories: Aatish paray (Fragments of fire, 1936), Manto ke afsane (Manto's stories, 1940), Dhuan (The smoke, 1941), Janaze (Corpses, 1942), Afsane aur drame (Stories and plays, 1943), Lazzat-e-sang (Pleasure of the stones, stories and essays, 1947), Siah hashie (The black marginalia, 1948), Chughad (The fool, 1948), Khali botlen, Khali dibbe (Empty bottles, empty boxes, 1950), Badshahat ka khatima (End of a kingdom, 1951), Yazid (The arch heretic, 1951), Upar, niche, darmiyan (Above, below, in-between, 1954), Shaitan (The devil, stories and plays, 1954), Baghair ijazat (Without permission, 1955) and Burquey (The veils, 1955); novel: Baghair unwan ke (Without a title, 1940); plays: Teen auraten (Three women, 1942); essays: Manto ke mazamin (Manto's essays, 1942); sketches: Ganje frish-te (The stripped angels, 1953).

The following works of Manto were published posthumously: Ratti, masha, tola (The tiny measures), stories; Shikari auten (Women, the hunters), stories; Karwat (The changed side), plays; Loud speaker, Sketches; Namrud ki khudai (The kingdom of Nimrod), stories; Sarak ke kinare (By the road side), stories, Sarkandon ke piche (Behind the reeds), stories; Manto ke drame (Manto's plays); Phundane (The tassels); Talkh, tursh, shirin (Bitter, sour, sweet), essays, Thanda gosht (The cold flesh), stories; Nakhun ka qarz (The nail's debt), impressions; Chashm-e-rauzan (The window's eye), stories. Ghulab ka phool (The rose), stories; Majzoob ki bar (The ascetic brags), stories; Nurjahan, Saroor Jahan sketch; Ismat Chughtai, a biographic sketch. He has also left behind the manuscript of an unfinished novel. Manto's works have been extensively translated into several Indian and European languages.

Manto is a story teller par excellence, a master craftsman with an eye for the structure and precise, significant detail. The so-called red-light areas, prostitutes, pimps, profligates, hangers-on of sorts, their lusts and cravings form the back drop of Manto's stories. Most of his characters both men and women seem to have lost their grace long back. Manto seldom tries to explore the history of their fall. He is primarily concerned with their contingent existence, their lost innocence, their tarnished happiness and dwindling wealth of affection and understanding which, here and there, still treats them benevolently. Some of them like Mozelle Saughandi and Babu Gopinath have the strength to transcend their sordidness. Manto never sits in moral judgement over his characters. In fact, time and again, he attempts to restore them to their state of meaningful being alongwith their lost innocence and happiness. 'Hatak' (The insult), 'Babu Gopinath', 'Kali shalwar' (The black trousers), 'Naya qanoon' (The new law), 'Boo' (The odour), 'Khole do' (Undo it), 'Mozelle', 'Toba Tek Singh', 'Shaheedsaz' (The martyr maker), 'Thanda gosht' (The cold flesh), 'Phundane' (The tassels), 'Siah hashie' (The black marginalia) and his play Is manjdhar men (In this midstream) are some of his representative creations.

MANTRA (Sanskrit). The theory of the 'mantra' is that it is a word of power born out of the secret depths of our being where it has been brooded upon by a deeper consciousness than the mental. It is framed in the heart and not constructed by the intellect. It is held in mind, again concentrated on by the waking mental consciousness. It is then thrown out silently or vocally.

The mantra creates new subjective states in ourselves. It can alter our psychical being. It can reveal knowledge and faculties which we did not possess before. It can produce similar results in other minds. It can produce vibrations in the mental and vital atmosphere.

The word, in the system of the ancient mystics, is power and it creates. For, all creation is expression. Everything exists already in the secret abode of the infinite, 'guhahitam', and has only to be brought out here in apparent form by the active consciousness. The vedas proclaim that the worlds have been created by the goddess Vak. In the vedas even 'anushtubh', 'tristubh', 'jagati' and 'gayatri', which are poetic measures of the sacred 'mantras', are considered as symbolic of the universal movement of things.

By expression, then, we create and by affirmation we establish. As a power of expression the word is termed 'gih' or 'vachas', as power of affirmation 'stoma'. In either aspect it is named 'manma' or 'mantra', expression of thought in mind and 'brahman', expression of the heart or the soul.

Fashioned by the heart the mantra is confirmed by the mind. Poetry is the mantra only when it is the voice of the inmost truth and the ancient vedic poets claimed to be uttering the mantra because they strove to see the occult truth.

The Nirukta says, "mantrah manant". That which is cogitated is the mantra. What is expected in this 'manana' is 'tadarthabhavana' (thinking over its meaning). The Samhita part of the vedas is constituted of mantras. The Rigvidhāṇa lays down the procedure of the mantras. The Paniniya Siksha tells us that if the mantra is uttered deficiently and wrongly it kills the mantra. For example, by the wrong pronunciation of the word 'Indrashatruh' Tvashta got a son who was killed by Indra whereas he wanted one who could kill Indra.

MANUCHARITRAMU (Telugu), one of the five great classics in Telugu literature known as 'pancha kavyas', is considered to be the harbinger of a new kind of 'prabandha' in Telugu. The work earned for its author, Allasani Peddana, the title of 'Andhra Kavita Pitamaha'. He tried to introduce a certain amount of inventiveness and nativeness in the basic story still borrowed from Sanskrit, so that it became relevant to the people of Andhra. From this perspective, Peddana could justifiably be called the 'Father of Telugu Poetry'.

Peddana adorned the court of Krishnadeva Raya as a kind of presiding poet over the famed 'Ashta Diggajas'. A senior friend of the king, he is believed to have been his teacher too, at Chandragiri. It may be reasonably believed that Peddana was born around 1475 at Kokata near Gandikota in Cuddapah district and studied under Sathakopa Yati, who later became head of the Ahobila Mutt. He must have moved to the king's court when Krishnadeva Raya ascended the throne in 1509 and continued to be a close associate during times of peace and war. He received several honours from the king and after Manucharitra was dedicated, the king himself seems to have lifted his palanquin. He lived on after the king's death in a somewhat subdued poetic and financial state. The kavya is said to have been composed around 1522, at the request of the king after his conquests which extended upto Gaya.

Swarochisha Manusambhavam, as the work is otherwise known, deals with the events leading to the birth of the hero mentioned in the title; Kalidasa's Kumarasambhava is yet another work of this kind. The present work deals with the story and 'prestory' of the birth of 'Swarochisha Manuvu', one of the 14 Manus, lawgivers and rulers of a 'Manwantara'. The poet drew the story from Markandeya purana in Sanskrit by Vyasa; the work was translated into Telugu by Marana and it formed the basis for the framework of the story of the kavya. Like Tikkana, Peddana also gets straight into the main story without much circumlocution. With admirable dramatic skill, he raises the curtain over Arunaspada, then focusses attention on a traditional Brahmin household and finally on the head of the house, Pravara. He presents a sketch of the chief character, who is a handsome youth as fascinating as the lord of love and yet full of deep ritualistic religiosity. And then arrives on the scene a wandering saint (siddha), who excites in the brahmin a desire for travel. After the saint applied an ointment to his feet, Pravara goes to the Himalayas and, as he wanders about under the heat of the sun, the ointment melts away. Unable to go back to his village, he feels lost when he comes across a Gandharva lady, Varudhini. She falls in love with him at first sight. When he asks her to direct him on his way back home, she taunts him, 'you certainly have eyes wide. Why then, do you seek other's help to find your way back? Don't you know the way you came up here? Maybe, it's just a pretext to speak to women in solitude'. After initial suggestion of her infatuation, which does not disturb the young man, she interprets the Vedic declaration, 'Anandobrahma', to mean carnal pleasure. But neither the physical attraction nor the ingenious arguments of the lady succeed in swerving Pravara from his matrimonial fidelity; he even pushes her away gently when she tries desperately to hold him in her embrace. Finally, the lord of fire, whom he has worshipped each day, carries him back to his home. The moment of infatuation of Varudhini is utilised by a Gandharva, whose love for her was unrequited; he now assumes the form of Pravara and approaches her. She readily receives him and at the moment of their joy, she keeps in her mental eye the figure of Pravara alone. Eventually, she gives birth to Swarochi. The third Ashwasa (section) ends with the union between Varudhini and Maya Pravara. With this also ends the gripping part of the book.

The second half commences in the third chapter with the birth of Swarochi and narrates how he acquired proficiency in martial arts quickly and becomes an expert at hunting. The poet gives a vivid description of hunting in over 45 poems and also describes the cooking of raw meat in a way which shows that the poet must have had personal knowledge of the hunting expeditions of his king. A similar authenticity of experience can be seen in the description of a fierce duel between the king and a demon from whose clutches the king tries to rescue a damsel, Manorama. The demon, in the end, turns out to be the father of the girl; he is a Gandharva king called Indivaraksha, who presents both his daughter and knowledge of Ayurveda to Swarochi. The king later cures the friends of Manorama of a dreadful disease and marries them as well. Subsequently, Swarochi during one of his hunting expeditions, falls in love with a deer who was really the goddess of the forest and their union results in the birth of a son called 'Swarochisha'. The young boy takes to meditation of Achyuta early in life and attains the position of Manu, thus justifying the title of the prabandha.

The above account shows that the story revolves round a number of characters—Pravara-Varudhini, Varudhini-Maya Pravara, Swarochi and his wives including Vana devata and finally Swarochisha. The plethora of characters and variety of situations gives rise to the criticism that the work lacks unity of theme. A critic, Veturai Prabhakara Sastry, felt that the work was really two books rolled into one and that a reader would read the second half only with the hope that he might come across Pravara and Varudhini once again. But Viswanatha Satyanarayana, in Alla sani Vani Allika Jigibigi, has shown that there is admirable unity in the work, since the very description of Pravara as a beautiful and devout person indicates the qualities to be expected in a future Manu. Like Kalidasa's Raghuvamsha, this work presents history, embellished with poetic imagination and instances of verses with lyric beauty and vivid descriptions of the Himalayan environment, the quiet domestic scene of Pravara's family, etc. In the presentation of human character and the portrayal of natural grandeur, the poet exhibits much originality. Peddana possesses admirable skill in the handling of dialogue like Tikkana, and he also transposes into a prehistoric story, the natural scenes and the social mores known to him. The Himalayas described by him are really the hills he had known in the Rayalaseema region of his times and the hunt and the war described are based on the exploits of Krishnadeva Raya. Peddana combines in his writing the best styles known till his time—the pleasant narrative technique of Nannaya, the presentation of character through dialogue of Tikkana, the evocation of the atmosphere of the Telugu land of Yerrana and the stylistic excellences of Srinatha. Critics have shown both the influence of poets like Srinatha and Pinaveerana on the style of his writing and of his poetry on the style of poets like Ramarajabhushana and Kuchimanchi Timmana. In the fluent originality of imagination, vivid descriptiveness and the construction of an epic based on a thin framework from the Sanskrit original through the addition of events and details in his personal experience, Peddana's work stands even today as a pace-setter for many other prabandhas in Telugu literature.

After the work remained in palm-leaf collection for centuries, the distinguished savant of Telugu literature, C.P. Brown, arranged for the printing of the first modern edition with a learned commentary by Juluri Appayya around 1830. Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Akademi brought out a well-edited version of the work with introduction by T. Kodandaramaiah in 1965. In 1968, Venkatarama publishers brought out an edition with exhaustive introduction by Vemparala Suryanarayana Sastry.

MANUSCRIPTOLOGY (Pan Indian). Manuscript preparation is an old art of India, but the science of manuscriptology has come into existence only recently in its present form. This science is concerned with scribing, survey, collection, preservation, and indexing for meaningful study, as well as editing and publication of ancient manuscripts. It is still in its infancy but the people and the Government are taking good interest in its development. The science is useful not only for the scholars of this country but also for foreign scholars who have shown interest in old manuscripts, their preservation, editing and publication.

In this connection we have to mention a little about the art of writing, the material for writing, the instrument for scribing and the substance with which scribing is possible. For thousands of years knowledge was transmitted through mouth, as the synonym for the Vedas, "Shruti" suggests. When the art of writing was discovered various sorts of material were used for the purpose. There were the leaves of palmyra tree, leaf and bark of birch tree, leather, gold-silver and copper plates, stones, bamboo, lead, cloth and much later paper. In Europe the skin of a tree named papyrus was used and in Egypt the oldest book on this material has been discovered. It is evident that the word 'paper' is derived from 'papyrus'. It is proved that at the time of Alexander's invasion birch bark or the inner bark of the bhurja tree, which the Himalaya produces, was used in Brahmanical and Buddhist writings.

The oldest documents written on this material are in Kharosthi script. The other script was Brāhmi. Cotton cloth was also used for official and private documents. Wooden-boards were referred to in the Jatakas. They were named 'phalka'. Palm-leaves were used much later as referred to by Huan-Chuang. Bricks have also been found with Buddhistic Dharmasutras. Writings on gold silver and copper plates have come to light. Iron was also used for the purpose. Cannons have been discovered with several type of writings.

Manuscripts have been found in different shapes and sizes. Manuscripts bound in one compact small volume are called gutaka hand-books. A lot of manuscripts are found in the form of Bahis (old type Account books). Unbound manuscripts found loose are called 'patrākār', and those written on long rolls of paper are known as 'khārdakār'. Many articles were written in pictures, some had pictures with the texts. A large number of manuscripts are shaped like the idols of the deities concerned.

Ink is the basic writing material. Ink was of several types. It was also 'kachchi' and 'pakki'. The 'pakki' inks were prepared by cooking peel of pepper with cloves and borax mixing with fume of sesamun oil. 'Kachchi' was prepared by mixing gum and kajal in water with copper coil. The ink had several colours including those of gold and silver for which very thin sheets of gold and silver were used. The inks were brilliant and they kept their lustre for hundreds of years. The general name for the instrument of writing was 'lekhani' which included stilus, pencil, brushes, reed and wooden pens. The professional writer was called 'lipikār' or 'libikār'.

The process of writing has also been described. While writing on tarapatra the leaves were first horizontally cut, soaked in water, pressed flat and dried. After drying the surface was made smooth by conch-shell or cowrie. In ancient Rājasthān and Gujarāt tarapatra were written in ink but in the South letters were incised with pointed instruments and finally blackened. While writing, blank spaces were left for perforation after which these patra were knotted to wooden boards. That is why the book was called 'grantha'. For purposes of writing on cloth, starch was also applied to it. In Shringeri Matha numerous books on cloth are available, both cotton and silk cloths were used; leather was sparingly used. A large number of rock inscriptions have been discovered on stones, pillars and statues. A big inscription called Rajaprashasti is there in Udaipur district and it is supposed to be the biggest stone inscription in the world.

Preparation of manuscripts was a regular feature in India. Most of the Sanskrit texts were scribed under the patronage of temples, ashramas and maths. In many of the native states the chiefs employed regular scribes for copying religious, moral and philosophical texts. Medical and astronomical texts were also copied down. Some persons prepared manuscripts for their own use—religious or extra-time reading. Even now in the Jain religious places, upāsaras, regular writing work is done by the Jain monks and nuns. It is for this reason that we have good manuscript collections in religious places, palaces, and with pundits and some other individuals. A survey of the manuscripts mostly in Sanskrit has revealed that they are in different states of safety. Some of the palace collections are well looked after, but those in religious places are mostly neglected and manuscripts under private possession are in a bad state of decay. Many of the manuscripts have gone out of the country and very many suffered a watery or earthen grave. Of late some institutions have tried to acquire them for keeping them safe. Very many of them have been microfilmed or photographed and attempts are in progress to repair the damaged manuscripts and elongate their life. All this has now become a science.

Preparing manuscripts is all right but keeping them safe is a big task. A survey of the manuscripts has shown that those put in the palaces are enjoying a good shape and form and they can be properly utilised. Some of the chiefs had proper staff to look after them and allow them to be used by scholars. But many of these manuscripts also have gone out either as presents or as articles of plunder. Among the manuscripts in the Royal Asiatic society in London there is a letter written by a lord of the army that he got many important manuscripts in the library of the Rājā of Bharatpur while looting the palace and that he was sending them to Great Britain for preservation and translation into English. Those of them which are there are safe from decay, but some of the collectors are not so devoted to them. MSS in religious places are mostly neglected and those with private individuals are either destroyed or in very bad state of decay. They should give them to some of the institutions devoted for their safety. In all sorts of ways the MSS have suffered at their hands besides natural calamities which have proved very injurious to them. The task before a manuscriptologist is to save treasure, which once gone can never be obtained. Collection of MSS is a big challenge and all lovers of this old treasure are doing their best in collecting MSS from different sources. Some of these institutions have laboratories which give treatment to all types of sick manuscripts. The MSS damaged by insects are treated in the fumigation chambers with certain chemicals; torn MSS are repaired either by hand or by machines; some of the ill MSS undergo lamination treatment and in various other ways attempts are made to preserve and conserve possessions of a rare nature. They are kept in safe places where natural calamities cannot harm them. The difference in temperature is ineffective and they are safe from moist or dry conditions. Catalogues are prepared, indexing is done, microfilms are taken and deposited in very safe places. In some of the illuminated MSS the pictures are also looked after and proper treatment is given to them.

From collection and preservation we come to the other aspects of manuscriptology like editing and publication. The MSS when put safe in shelves either in the original after treatment or as microfilms or photo-stat copies, are expected to reveal the knowledge contained in them. For this purpose they need proper editing and publication. A glance at the several catalogues of the same and different collections will reveal that there are several manuscripts of the same name and origin. They are to be studied in the light of the prescribed rules of textual criticism, which is said to be the skilled and methodical exercise towards the settlement of the authenticity of the texts. The study needs scholarly editors well-versed in the science of determining texts and possessing good knowledge of the subject matter contained in them, alongwith some knowledge of allied disciplines. A manuscript is not usually a clear copy or a single piece of writing. It is often found with alterations by erasure, additions and substitutions which are due either to the scribe or the reviser and due to several other circumstances. The editor is expected to bring out a clear copy of the manuscript and try to bring out the original text of the author. He is to pass through the four processes of textual criticism—heuristic or assembling and arranging the entire material; recension or restoration of the material; emendation or restoration of the text of the author and Higher Criticism or separation of the sources utilised by the author. He is also to make the proper geneological tree of the MSS and name the important ones. The edited copy of the prepared text needs publication with all the needed information. For private individuals it is a difficult task but for registered institutions the Government of India has a scheme of remuneration. Even for cataloguing manuscripts in Sanskrit, the Government of India in the Ministry of Education and Culture some sort of honorarium is provided item-wise and when the catalogue is completed in the prescribed proforma the job of publishing it is undertaken by the Government. By this scheme several institutions collecting manuscripts have been benefited and millions of Sanskrit MSS have been catalogued.

Manuscript collection, preservation, editing and publication is a useful science, for it brings to light plenty of knowledge hidden so far. In spite of foreign invasions, our own negligence, inundations, fires, rat and termite, we have plenty of useful MSS and it is urgently needed through Government and private efforts to save them and give treatment to those which are ill in a well-equipped manuscript laboratory. Many of our valuable manuscripts found their way out through our lethargy and selfishness. The manuscripts enshrine our cultural heritage and they deserve all care.

MANUSCRIPTS—ASSAMESE

MANUSCRIPTS (Assamese). With the introduction of the script the people of different countries started recording their religious beliefs, spiritual and physical experiences and intellectual thought on parchments, palm leaves, bhurjapatra and some times on rocks and metal plates. But when a particular subject, intellectual or emotional, had to be elaborately treated, palm-leaves, processed agara barks and parchments, cut into different sizes were used as writing materials. In Assam the agara barks duly processed were used from the ancient times, the earliest reference in which is found in the Harshacharita of Banabhatta. Hamsavega, the envoy of Bhaskaravarman of Kamarupa presented to the king of Kanauj, among many other things, "several manuscripts with leaves made from aloe bark and of the hue of the ripe pink cucumber." Since then or even from an earlier period the main writing material on which writings were imprinted has been the processed barks of aloe wood. At a later stage when indigenous process of making paper by pressing cotton pulp was introduced towards the late medieval period, paper as a writing material was used as an alternative to aloe barks. As aloe bark, called sachipat, was more durable than paper, the former was preferred by most of the writers and copyists. Before and after the Vaishnavite revival movement, we come across hundreds of scholars in Sanskrit, Prakrit and Assamese who have left their imprints in the sands of time by their works in Sanskrit and Assamese. The writing, or copying sacred as well as utilitarian scriptures was considered as an act of merit. The copyists usually concluded their copies with the following apology: "Whatever I have seen in the original, I have copied them faithfully. If any mistake has crept in I am not to be blamed, because even sages committed mistakes and Bhima sometimes fled from the battle field."

The neo-Vaishnavite movement initiated by Shankaradeva in the early part of the sixteenth century, brought about an unprecedented revival in the fields of literature, art and music. Not only the earlier Sanskrit and Assamese works like those of Madhava Kandali, Hemasaraswati, Harivara Vipra, Damodara Mishra of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries were copied, the two epics, the entire Bhagavata-purana and many other puranas were also rendered into Assamese verses. Separate independent kavyas and plays (ankiya-nata) were composed for edification and entertainment. Prose as a medium of literary expression came into being in the last part of the sixteenth century and religious works like the Gita and the Bhagavata and biographical works on the lives of the religious saints and preachers were written in prose. A large number of chronicles in the Assamese and the Ahom (Tai) languages were also produced in prose. Works on medicine, astronomy and astrology, aphorisms and incantations, songs and lyrics were written and copied in Assamese. Sanskrit works on the above topics including the tantras and on the smriti and rituals are abundantly available in manuscript form.
